AGENTS WANTED—MORE MONEY made, more real satisfaction given, and more ready sales guaranteed by selling the "Great New Union Pictorial Stationery and Recipe Package." NOW ACKNOWLEDGED by all Dealers to be no question as article as the SECOND STAKE. Our resources are best great for Agents, and we propose to make this, like the rest, they are leaving the field. We supply the trade and package combining real worth. RICK WISH. NEW AND SPLENDID STATIONERY AND RECIPE PACKAGE containing many articles, of a better quality, and a finer piece of Jewelry than any other Package ever sold.
Send for our circulars, which we will mail free. $5 to $10 per day can be made. We put in each package a beautiful and life-like engraving of GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, &c.
75 Valuable Recipes. 6 Sheets Ladies' Billet Paper.
6 Steels Commercial Note Paper. 6 Buff Envelopes.
6 Gilt Ladies' Note Paper. 2 Fine Steel Pens.
6 White Linen Envelopes, 1 Fine Pencil.
6 colors. 1 Sheet Blotting Paper.
6 Ladies' White Union Envelopes. 1 Accommodation Pocket-Book.
ALSO A VALUABLE PIECE OF JEWELRY.
RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York.

ESTABLISHED 1839.

THE GENUINE

IN BARRELS, HALF-BARRELS AND CASES. Shipped direct, to parties ordering, from Kentucky, or furnished from cellar of the Distillery, 54 OLD SLIP, N. Y. Orders should be directed "ST. SUIT'S DISTILLERIES, Jefferson County, KY."

A Splendid Business for one man in every town. Send for Confidential Circular. Address
JONES & CLARK, 95 Nassau Street, N. Y.

STATIONERY FOR THE ARMY.
H. HARTSHORN & CO., 58 Beekman St., New York, MANUFACTURERS for SOLDIERS' STATIONERY and PATRIOTIC PORTFOLIO RECIPE PACKAGES. STATIONERY and JEWELRY. ARMY SUPPLIES QUITE NEW. Circulars free. AGENTS WANTED.

AGENTS WANTED—TO SELL THE McCLELLAN PORTABLE WRITING DESK, the most useful article for the soldier ever invented. CAN BE CARRIED IN THE KNAPSACK, AND FORMS A COMPLETE WRITING DESK. Contains every thing necessary for writing sixteen letters. THE MOST SALEABLE ARTICLE for the soldier now in use. Price 25 cents. Agents wanted everywhere. Send stamp for a Circular. W. H. CATELY & CO., 102 Nassau St., New York.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices, Made to Measure at $18 per doz. OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS.
MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosom, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $2 50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $3 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of one dozen $18 fine shirts:

9 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 14d. c. per yd.	$ 1 35
7 yards of fine Linen, at 60c. per yard	4 20
Making and cutting	6 00
Laundry $1 75, buttons and cotton, 50c.	2 25
Profit	3 65
Total	$18 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.
The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.
The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK

The Wide World!
Published weekly in Boston. Racy, spirited, abounding in Stories, Essays, Editorials, Fun, Poetry, Incidents, and General Information. Only 4 pages, smart, genial, and entertaining. $2 a year.
Sold by all News Dealers. 4 cents.

Patents for New Inventions.
Messrs. MUNN & Co., Proprietors of the Scientific American, No. 37 Park Row, New York, continue to solicit Patents in the United States, and in all foreign countries, on the most reasonable terms. Consultations and pamphlets of advice may be had gratis by calling or addressing them at the office. Messrs. M. & Co. have been employed in soliciting Patents over sixteen years, and more than Fifteen Thousand Patents have been granted through their Agency.

Grover & Baker's
CELEBRATED NOISELESS
SEWING MACHINES,
For Family and Manufacturing Use.
495 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
The GROVER & BAKER S. M. Co. now offer, in addition to their splendid stock of Machines making the celebrated Grover & Baker stitch, new and superior Shuttle or "Lock-Stitch" Machines, adapted to all varieties of sewing. Much more Simple, Durable, Reliable, and Perfect than any "lock-stitch" machines heretofore in use.

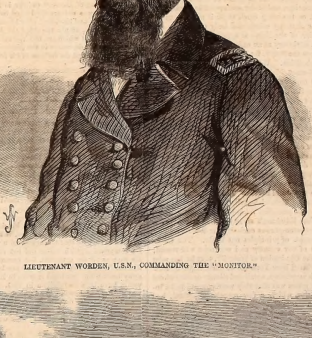
Gold Pens Repointed—Equal to New,
On receipt of 25 cts. in money or stamps. Orders by Mail promptly attended to. Gold Pen and Silver Extension Case $1 50. E. S. JOHNSON, 58 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

To Consumptives.
THE Advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks, by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used free of charge, with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure CURE for CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing.
Parties wishing the prescription will please address
REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,
Williamsburgh,
Kings County, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.
Have Just Published:
A STRANGE STORY. A Novel. By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON, Bart. Author of "Pelham," "Eugene Aram," "My Novel," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," &c., &c. Illustrated by ARTHUR LEMON. 8vo. Paper, 50 cents.
PILGRIMS OF FASHION. A Novel. By EDWARD CARTWRIGHT. Illustrated. 12mo. Muslin, $1 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.



VOL. VI.—No. 273.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

LIEUTENANT WORDEN, U.S.N.

We are delighted to be able to present our readers on this page with a portrait of LIEUTENANT WORDEN, U.S.N., the hero of the great NAVAL BATTLE at Hampton Roads.

Lieutenant John Lorimer Worden is a native and citizen of New York, from which State he was appointed to the Navy. His original entry as a midshipman into the service bears date from the 10th of January, 1834, and he obtained his present commission on the 30th of November, 1846. His sea service under his present commission to the end of 1860 had been eight years and nine months, his total sea service being to that date nearly seventeen years. His shore or other duty amounted at that time to nearly seven years, and he was over three years unemployed. His total length of service up to the present time exceeds twenty-eight years. He was last at sea in November, 1860, on board the sloop Savannah, twenty-two guns, on the blockading squadron, and was granted a short leave of absence on his return; after which he was sent as a special messenger to Fort Pickens, with dispatches to Captain Adams, of the Sabine, commanding the fleet off Pensacola, with notice that the fort would be reinforced by two companies of artillery, and instructions to Captain Adams and Colonel Brown as to their conduct in case of an attack by rebels upon the fleet and fort. He went by the land route, and on the way he destroyed his dispatches. As he anticipated, he was arrested at Montgomery, and as no papers were found on his person he was allowed to pass. On his arrival at Pensacola he obtained a pass from the rebel General Bragg, permitting him to carry a verbal message from Secretary Cameron to Captain Adams. He went to him and repeated from memory his dispatches. The fort was reinforced, and as he was returning he was arrested by the rebel General Bragg, under the false pretense of having broken his parole; but the main object was to obtain his dispatches to the Government, if he should have had any in his possession. He was sent to Montgomery, where he was kept for some time as a prisoner of war. There was an intense excitement against him, as the rebel General Bragg had collected a force of 1000 men and intended to attack Fort Pickens the very night it was reinforced. Lieutenant Worden was kept in confinement until the middle of November last, when he was exchanged and went to Fortress Monroe, where he joined the Minnesota. He was afterward detached from that vessel and appointed to the command of the Monitor.

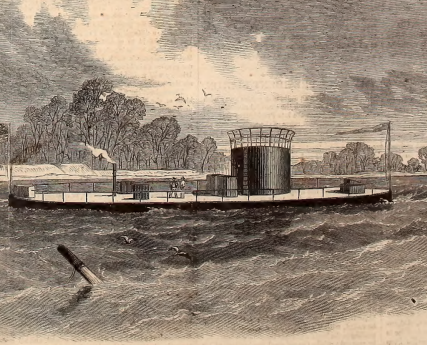
LIEUTENANT WORDEN, U.S.N., COMMANDING THE "MONITOR."

His gallant performance at the battle at Hampton Roads is recorded in another part of this paper. Under Providence he saved our navy. The correspondent of the Associated Press well says:

"The Monitor was handled with unsurpassed skill, decision, and coolness, for which all praise should be given her officers. She has come up to the expectations that were formed of her, and has proved herself impregnable to the heaviest shot at close quarters.

"Lieutenant Worden, who handled the Monitor so skillfully, is in Washington, in the hands of a surgeon. He was in the pilot-house of the Monitor when the Merrimac directed a whole broadside at it, and received his injuries from the minute fragments of powder which were driven through the look-out holes. Lieutenant Worden was stunned by the concussion, and was carried away. On recovering he asked, 'Have I saved the Minnesota?' The reply was, 'Yes, and whipped the Merrimac.' To which he answered, 'Then I don't care what becomes of me.'

"The injuries of Lieutenant Worden are not supposed to be dangerous."



The rebels are, of course, jubilant over the affair. The dispatch says:

The Merrimac, or, as it is called by them, the Virginia, had received damage, but nothing that was serious.

They admit the loss of four killed and several wounded on board. Captain Buchanan, who commanded her, was seriously wounded on Saturday, and the command devolved upon his First Lieutenant. The officers say little or nothing about the Sunday's fight.

The commander of the Cumberland is spoken of as fighting his ship with a gallantry worthy a better cause. The total rebel loss is said to be nine killed and twelve wounded. Twenty-three prisoners arrived at Norfolk on Saturday night from the Congress; one died on the passage.

The Monitor is said to have been seriously injured by the Virginia.

THE ERICSSON STEEL-CLAD BATTERY "MONITOR."—[SEE PAGE 183.]

LANDER.

When a hero goes
Unto his last repose,
When earth's trump of fame shall waken him no more;
When in the heavenly land
Another soul doth stand
Who perished for a nation ere he reached the shore;
Whose eyes should sorrow dim?
Say, who should mourn for him?

Mourn for the traitor—mourn
When honor is forsworn,
When the base wretch who sells his land for gold
Stands up unblushingly
And boasts his perfidy,
Then, then, O patriots! let your grief be told!
But when God's soldier yieldeth up his breath,
Oh, mourn ye not for him! It is not death!

Where is the flag he bore?
Where is the sword he wore?
Lay one upon his breast, the other spread
Around his wasted form,
That perished in the storm,
And name him reverently whom ye call dead.
Name him not silently—
Shout all, exultingly!

"Lander! Lander! awake!
Thy heavenly armor take,
And gird upon thy thigh again thy sword!
Beside the great white throne,
Where sits the Blessed One,
Stand thou forth in the army of the Lord!
Soldier of Christ, arise!
And join Him in the skies!"

ADVERTISEMENT.

☞ The Publishers of Harper's Weekly congratulate their readers upon the appearance in last Number of the first part of a new serial tale entitled "No Name," by Wilkie Collins, Esq., author of "The Woman in White." Its opening gives promise of the same wonderful power and matchless dramatic skill which entranced the readers of "The Woman in White." It is seldom that a periodical is enabled to furnish its subscribers with such a series of attractive tales as have appeared consecutively for the past two years in Harper's Weekly, from the pens of Dickens, Wilkie Collins, and Bulwer. The commencement of this Tale affords a good opportunity for parties residing in the country to form clubs, and obtain Harper's Weekly at the reduced price of subscription.

The crisis which the war has reached imparts fresh interest to the war-pictures which are appearing in every number of Harper's Weekly. We have now regular Artist Correspondents, to wit:

Mr. A. R. Waud, with the army of the Potomac;
Mr. Alexander Simplot, with Gen. Grant's army;
Mr. Henry Mosler, with Gen. Buell's army;
Mr. Theo. R. Davis, with Gen. Sherman's army;
Mr. Angelo Wiser, with Gen. Burnside's army;

besides a large number of occasional and volunteer correspondents in the Army and Navy at various points. These gentlemen will furnish us faithful sketches of every battle which takes place, and every other event of interest, which will be reproduced in our pages in the best style. People who do not see Harper's Weekly will have but a limited comprehension of the momentous events which are occurring.

The circulation of Harper's Weekly being now over 120,000 copies each week, it is the best advertising medium in the country.

In reply to numerous inquiries we would say, that, as Harper's Weekly is electrotyped, we can at any time supply the Numbers for the past year, or from the commencement of the paper (January 3, 1857), if desired.

Persons wishing to complete their files can have the missing Numbers furnished by remitting direct to the Publishers.

To Postmasters and others getting up clubs of ten subscribers we will send an extra copy gratis. To those who prefer them we will send the Numbers of the past year as premium for the club, instead of those for the current Volume.

See Terms, on page 191.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Saturday, March 22, 1862.

THE PROGRESS OF EVENTS.

At last events are moving with breathless rapidity. The fall of Leesburg is followed by the fall of Winchester, the abandonment of the rebel batteries on the Potomac is no sooner announced than we hear of the capture of Brunswick and Fernandina; the evacuation of Columbus is succeeded by the evacuation of Manassas, now held by Union troops. One by one every rebel strong-hold is forced or turned.

From the far West, where our gallant Curtis is driving the tatterdemalions of M'Intosh and Price before him, to the shore of the Atlantic, whose bosom now reflects the stars and stripes, and no other flag, from North Edisto to Key West, the soldiers and sailors of the Union are pressing onward with steady tread, and crushing rebellion as they go. There is not a point in the line of three thousand miles at which the rebels can make a stand.

Last week we announced the commencement of the work of reconstruction in Tennessee by the appointment of Andrew Johnson as Military Governor. As we write, men are discussing whether John Minor Botts should not be Governor of Virginia under the President. In a week or two Governor Harris of Tennessee and Governor Letcher of Virginia will be as thoroughly wiped out as Governor Claib. Jackson of Missouri and the rebel Governor of Kentucky, whose name we have forgotten. Before the anniversary of the bombardment of Fort Sumter we may hear of "reconstruction" in Louisiana, Arkansas, and North Carolina. And what is done is done well. M'Clellan's motto is—No Step Backward!

The night was very dark and very gloomy; but the dawn is bright indeed, and surpassingly glorious.

ABOLITION IN HIGH PLACES.

The President last week sent in to Congress a Message recommending the passage of the following or a similar resolution:

Resolved, That the United States ought to co-operate with any State which may adopt a gradual abolishment of slavery, giving to such State pecuniary aid, to be used by such State in its discretion to compensate for the inconveniences, public and private, produced by such change of system.

This Message has been applauded with equal fervor by the opponents and by the supporters of slavery. It is equally approved by the Herald and by the Tribune, by the Evening Post and by the Journal of Commerce.

The old friends of slavery commend it because it recognizes the right of the Southern slave-owners to their slave property, and the exclusive right of the slave States to regulate or abolish the institution within their limits.

The friends of freedom rejoice at it because it places the United States Government squarely on the record as preferring freedom to slavery, in the abstract, and as looking forward, in some future time, and in some yet undetermined way, to the abolition of slavery, and the emancipation of the negro race.

In fact, the difference between the two great parties in the North has been narrowed down by the Message to an almost imperceptible line. So far as can be judged by the public press, there is no party in the North which sets its face positively against the abolition of slavery, at some future time, and under some possible conditions: and, on the other hand, there is no evidence to show that any substantial body of men in any section of the North is opposed to the recognition of slavery as an existing and lawful institution at the South, for the purpose of compassing its abolition. We are all brought by this common-sense Message upon the same platform. The cannon-shot against Fort Sumter effaced three-fourths of our political lines: the President's Message has wiped out the remaining fourth.

It is very instructive to read articles in the Herald recommending the Border States to abolish slavery, and articles in the Journal of Commerce commending the abstract righteousness of emancipation, and admitting that the writers only differ with Garrison and Wendell Phillips in respect of way, time, and detail. Such indications are cheering proofs that even in our time the world moves. Lord Cockburn, in his charming Memorials, tells us that in his youth a man who professed Whig principles was a pariah in that Edinburgh society which now regards with contemptuous curiosity the few remaining adherents of principles not Whig. The Cockburn of our country and our time will record, for the admiration of posterity, that he has seen infuriated New York mobs, encouraged by New York merchants, assail and silence orators whose only crime was that they were opposed to an institution which, a few months afterward, had not a single supporter left in New York.

The Message has achieved another useful result. It has placed the North on a platform of square antagonism to the rebels. Henceforth, no compromise will be possible which obliges the North to recognize the abstract justice or policy of slavery, or to forego the desire that it may some day be abolished. Henceforth, the Northern people may be considered a unit against slavery in principle, and only differing among themselves with regard to the time and way of abolition. When we remember Mr. Adams's proposition of last winter, and how narrowly it escaped being accepted by the rebels, we can measure the stride which the civilization of the North has made during the past twelve months.

THE LATE PRESIDENT FELTON.

It is seldom that a public man passes away with such strong claims upon the grateful remembrance of the community as the late President of Harvard College. In the best sense of the term, he was peculiarly a man of the people. Born of a quiet New England family, whose modest industry was their only title to distinction, he was early inured to habits of self-reliance and active effort. He was never dandled on the lap of luxury into the pride of exclusive privileges. His native love of learning prompted him to seek a liberal education; but the golden prize did not drop into his hands spontaneously; it was the fruit only of strenuous toil and self-denial on his part. From the first he was obliged to contribute to his own support while pursuing the usual studies of his class. But in spite of every drawback he attained a high position as a scholar, which he never lost. Not content with the prescribed range of college study, he was ambitious of higher attainments, and marked out a path for himself which few could follow. While yet an undergraduate he became familiar with the principles of physical science, and commenced the study of many languages, in which he subsequently became a master. From the day of leaving college his course was onward and upward. He devoted himself to the drudgery of teaching, if it must so be called, with a peculiar zest; his success in appealing to the best faculties of the young was strongly marked; while the original productions of his pen evinced at once the brilliancy of his intellect and the soundness of his cultivation. At the age of twenty-two he was appointed tutor in Harvard College; in three years more he became Professor of Greek; and before he was twenty-seven years old he succeeded to the important chair of Greek literature, which had been made famous by the splendid erudition of Mr. Edward Everett, and the classical enthusiasm of Professor Popkin, whose towering figure seemed irradiated by the spirit of Homer and Sophocles. Following such eminent examples, Professor Felton gave a powerful impulse to the study of Greek letters, and became himself certainly one of the best, if not the very best scholar in that department of whom the country can boast. But he never yielded to the indulgences of a recluse student. He had nothing of the arrogance or the exclusiveness of literature. His interest in public affairs was constant and vivid. He was not, indeed, an active politician, but no man watched more closely the course of our statesmen, or was more ardent in the support of the principles which he deemed essential to the national welfare. Without being a partisan, he was the strenuous advocate of a conservative policy, and conscientiously avoided the extremes to which he might have been tempted by private friendship or personal relations with their champions. The cause of general education commanded his warmest sympathies. He never made his position an excuse for declining an active part in popular instruction. As an earnest friend of common schools, as a public lecturer, and a literary counselor, he exerted a wide influence, and invariably challenged the confidence of the community by his wisdom and zeal. He possessed an uncommonly genial temperament; entirely unknown to him were the formality and reserve of the scholar. He had the keenest sense of the ludicrous aspects of social life; and his presence was often indicated by his hearty ringing laugh before you fairly recognized the sunshine of his benignant face. On the resignation of Dr. Walker as President of Harvard College in 1860, Professor Felton was universally looked to as his fittest successor; and his career, after his accession to that high office, amply rewarded the hopes that were formed, but which are now forever quenched by his lamented departure in the glorious ripeness of his manhood and the fullness of his fame.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A year ago there were a great many men who said, and a great many more who felt, "Oh for an Andrew Jackson!" It was thought that he would have laid a heavy hand upon the rebellion, and have ended it by a vigorous blow. That thought was the natural result of impatience and ignorance. Alexander the Great, Hannibal, and Napoleon, all combined in one great military genius, could not have done the work which it was supposed Jackson would have done. The world could be easily moved at any time if you could only get a place to stand upon.

Besides, while all praise that is his due will be gladly granted to Andrew Jackson, it is a great mistake to suppose that he suppressed a rebellion. He compromised with it—he did not conquer it. He suppressed the symptom, but encouraged the disease. If Jackson had finally and absolutely shot away treason and punished traitors in 1833, there would have been no rebellion in 1861. Jackson was neither a philosopher nor a statesman; he was a soldier. But to destroy this rebellion requires more than military skill. Shot and shell may subdue the form of the symptom, but what will annihilate the disease?

It is fortunate for the country and for the world that at this moment it is a wise and calm civilian, and not a soldier, who is our Chief Magistrate. And it is a peculiar satisfaction that, throughout the astonishing events of the last year, this journal has not faltered in its faith in the ability of the President, or in its support of the patriotic policy of his Administration. The country rocked with civil war. Every citizen and editor had his special nostrum for peace. No man was ever called to a task so difficult as the President's. When he left Springfield to undertake it, he said that no President since Washington had a work so weighty. But Washington's work as Chief Magistrate was not greater than Lincoln's. And thus far, at least, History will record that it has been wrought with similar wisdom.

Throughout the wild uproar of the year the President of the United States has held upon his way undisturbed. Openly slandered by his political enemies before the inauguration, he has been stealthily slandered by many of his political friends since. Because he and the Secretary of State, although known to be friendly to a peaceful annihilation of the political supremacy of the slaveholding interest in the Government, did not upon their accession to power advocate an immediate emancipation, they have been pursued with a bitter suspicion of moral cowardice, or pricked with the sharp taunt of treachery to their cause, or insulted by the imputation of incapacity.

Meanwhile the policy of the President slowly vindicates itself. The end and the method proposed by him were clearly stated in two sentences of his December Message. First, "The Union must be preserved, and hence all indispensable means must be employed;" and, second, the sentence that immediately follows it: "We should not be in haste to determine that radical and extreme measures, which may reach the loyal as well as the disloyal, are indispensable." To these he now adds a third in his Message of March 6: "A practical reacknowledgment of the National authority would render the war unnecessary, and it would at once cease. If, however, resistance continues, the war must also continue, and it is impossible to foresee all the incidents which may attend, and all the ruin that may follow it. Such as may seem indispensable, or may obviously promise great efficiency toward ending the struggle, must and will come."

These words are in perfect harmony with every serious word of Mr. Lincoln's political life. His convictions, evidently, are as profound as ever. Certainly no man who said, as he did, on the 17th June, 1858, "I believe this Government can not endure permanently half slave and half free," has found any reason in the events of the last four years to change his opinion. But Mr. Lincoln and his friends have never desired that the disease should be removed by the sword. He and they do not desire it now. But he and they and all good patriots are resolved that the disease shall not conquer. If the sword must end slavery, it will end it. And it is for the rebellion to decide.

JOHN BRIGHT VERSUS JOHN BULL.

It is not surprising that the name of John Bright, whenever it was mentioned at the great meeting at the Cooper Institute on Washington's birthday, was hailed with a tumult of applause. Throughout our difficulties of the last year John Bright has been one of the few men in England who truly saw and frankly stated the scope of this rebellion. When Great Britain flamed into rage at the Trent affair, John Bright laid his finger upon the arm of John Bull, and begged that testy and foolish old person not to make himself ridiculous by losing his temper in advance of the occasion, but to wait and hear whether an insult was intended, or whether it was an accident. An accident it proved to be, and the reparation was made which mutual honor demanded; and it is surprising that when Mr. Bright called the affair an accident, and was oh, oh'd from the benches of the Government party in Parliament, he had not covered Lord Palmerston with confusion by stating the notorious fact that at the very time when, as Palmerston had just said, the British Government had every reason to fear war with America, that Government knew officially that war would not spring out of the difficulty.

John Bright is the present representative of that strong common sense and intelligence which has always saved John Bull against the encroachment of privilege. He stands as the Barons stood against King John. It is his spirit, and the nerve, and eloquence, and sagacity of men like him, that perpetually wrests Magna Charta from the itching fingers of despotic power. A representative of the great middle class, the industrial interest of the kingdom, he stands for the peaceful development of popular liberty under law, on the one hand against the aristocracy and on the other against the mob which is at once the consequence and the tool of an aristocracy. In a country so Hindoo-bound with caste as England, of course such a man stands much alone, for even those who theoretically and politically sympathize with him, may be otherwise alienated by inexorable social prejudice.

During this war of ours his have been the only speeches in England which show a truly comprehensive and sagacious statesmanship. Lord John's, or the Earl Russell's, speeches have been quibbles and subterfuges. Lord Palmerston's have been the bland plausibilities which he always palms off upon the British public as practical common-sense views. Politically, the Earl Russell figures as the artful Dodger, and the spruce, complaisant Palmerston as Charley Bates. Unquestionably the conviction which John Bright so amply and pointedly expresses in his speeches, whether acknowledged by the Government or not, is the conviction which has withheld that Government from blundering into war with this country. The Earls Russell and Palmerston have "forborne" in Parliament: the London Times and the other journals, with a very few noble exceptions, have "forborne" in their daily leaders: private British correspondence and conversation have "forborne," and all in the same way, by torturing the language for insult and invective, by an absurdly haughty assumption of the destruction of this Government as already accomplished, and by an affected impartiality of belligerent concessions.

John Bright sums it all up in one ringing sentence: "The course taken by the Government, not in the demand, not in the dispatch, not in the courteous way in which Lord Lyons managed every thing he had to do with regard to it [hear, hear], but in the instantaneous and alarming menaces of war, followed and accompanied every day by incessant and offensive charges from the press supposed directly to represent the Government—I say that that tends to leave on the minds of even the most moderate men in America the feeling that England in the hour of her trial has not treated them in the magnanimous and friendly manner which they had a right to expect from us."

There is a moral in the position of John Bright which we shall all do well to take to heart. We respect and love him to-day more than any Englishman, and yet we feel that every drop of his blood and particle of his flesh is British. But he dares to expose and criticise the faults of England. Justice, he knows, like charity begins at home. He has not the least respect for venerable error, and crime, although hoary with dignity and respectable with law, is simply criminal in his eyes.

How such a member of the Imperial Parliament would astonish some Republican Senators of the United States!

CONSERVATISM.

The text is Conservatism, of which, brethren, there are two kinds. Let us suppose the case.

A rattlesnake is in your nursery, and trying to dart at your children.

Conservatism number one rushes at the reptile; seizes it; if it has lost a fang, puts it back in its place; if it has dropped any venom, restores it for future emergencies; then shuts the rattlesnake into the closet, saying, "Go, and sting no more."

Conservatism number two rushes at the snake, grinds its head beneath its iron heel, and flings it dead from the window.

Here are two kinds of conservatism. Number one conserves rattlesnakes; number two conserves the human race. It is easy, and apparently generous, to say, "Go, and sting no more." But, unluckily, it is the nature of rattlesnakes to sting. Yet a rattlesnake, you think, has a right to the life nature gave it. Yes; but so have your children. And when snakes and children are in the same nursery, you must decide promptly which has the better right.

If a man should say, "Don't hurt that rattlesnake; your business is simply to prevent his stinging your child," would you call that man a knave or a fool? Would you think he had much regard for the life of your child? Having flung the dead snake from the window, wouldn't you feel very much like throwing that man after it? And wouldn't you always afterward believe that, if rattlesnakes could become men, they would become just such men as he?

—Or you, dear Madame, discovering mould upon your apple-pies, what would you do if you were, like your respected husband, conservative in all your views and acts? Would you put your pastry into a damp corner, or would you scrape the mould off?

There is a conservatism which preserves and propagates mould, and another conservatism which scrapes it away—just as the one reasons with rattlesnakes and the other punches their heads. Monseigneur, of the old French régime, was a conservative of the first class; George Washington of the second.

—An illustration is not an argument, you think? Yes; but some things need no argument, but only an illustration.

A NEW REIGN OF TERROR.

THE article in the Richmond Examiner of March 3, which has been generally copied into our papers, can not be read without the same emotion which is excited by the history of the French Revolution in 1793–'94. The rebellion is becoming a domestic reign of terror. Nor can any man be surprised at the result. The inexorable logic of facts explains it. In a society which has assumed that to question the most atrocious injustice is so dangerous to social existence that the questioner may be properly lynched, what can be expected when it feels itself in danger from any cause? A man who carries concealed weapons will draw them upon every occasion of danger, real or fancied. A society which is founded upon injustice is necessarily barbarous.

Southern society is composed of the aristocracy who own the laborers, and the great middle class, more ignorant than any corresponding class in the world at the present day. Wealth and distinction are in the hands of the aristocracy. The middle class are poor and wretched; but they feel their wretchedness compensated by the fact that there is a servile race beneath them, and that by virtue of color they are the peers of the aristocracy. Hence, although not rich enough to own slaves, they support slavery, and they are the ready tools of the slave lords. Passionate, ignorant, prejudiced, ferocious—bred in a society where the unbridled will of rich proprietors is practically the sole law of a subject race—here are the elements of the most remorseless mob.

And to the reign of this mob the article in the Examiner, and similar articles in papers of the Southwest plainly point. No honorable and loyal citizen of the United States but must shudder as he contemplates the present position of men who have been faithful to their country, but who are at last exposed to the pitiless crowd which has been made sullen by the defeat of its armies, and has been inflamed by the appeals of leaders anxious to divert to the heads of the innocent the punishment of their own crimes. The editors of the Richmond Examiner would rather see John M. Botts hung to a lamp-post than their own office gutted and themselves swung from its windows.

The reign of terror that has long existed in the rebellious section now openly appears. As in the blackest hour of the mob despotism in Paris, men are in danger of losing their lives upon suspicion of being suspected. "Now that the Government," says the Examiner, "appears really in earnest in the suppression of treason, it becomes every citizen who knows a man or set of men inimical to our country and cause to point them out."

This is the very tone of the French terrorism. "The more the social body perspires," said Collot d'Herbois, "the healthier it becomes."

Here again is the Richmond Examiner: "The universal Yankee sympathizers dangling from as many lamp-posts would have a most wholesome and salutary effect.

It is but the echo of the French terrorist Barrère: "There are none but the dead who do not return."

Our faithful fellow-citizens now in the power of the rebels, in whom desperation breeds ferocity, are exposed to these frightful perils. Their situation is but another stern appeal for the exercise of every power that can most speedily end the rebellion and secure actual peace. Already the bad bold men of the South are drifting into the terrible necessities of their stupendous crimes against human society. And how accurately does the French historian Mignet, describing the terrorists of '93 and '94, describe the chiefs of the rebels of to-day in Richmond and the Southwest:

"Sprung from contention, they wish to support themselves by it. With one hand they fight to defend their domination, with the other they lay the foundation of their system. They kill in the name of their principles. Virtue, humanity, the welfare of the people, all that is most sacred upon earth, they employ to sanction their executions, to protect their dictatorship, until they are worn out and fall."

"SOLID MEN OF BOSTON."

MR. SENATOR DAVIS, of Kentucky, presented a petition from citizens of Boston, the other day, asking Congress to drop discussing the negro, and to take order for suppressing the rebellion.

These worthy citizens of Boston, who must have at least three relatives in Gotham, ought to send a petition to Commodore Foote to drop considering how many guns and gun-boats he must have for Memphis, and to take measures to defeat the enemy. They ought long ago to have sent word to General M'Clellan to stop bothering with fortifications at Washington, and attend to subduing the conspiracy. They ought to have telegraphed to Grant at Fort Donelson and Burnside at Roanoke not to be firing guns and charging bayonets, but to hurry up victory.

Those Generals would smile and hold their tongues—as they have done before. But some young aid might whisper to these citizens of credit and renown in famous Boston town that, in calculating forces, and building fortifications, and killing rebels with mortars and rifled guns, these Generals were doing the very thing required. They were forcing the enemy, by the relentless eloquence of injury to person and property and social peace, to submit.

Doubtless Congress will make no reply to these worthy citizens of Boston. But if they listen they will hear that Congress is doing what the Generals are—considering how to force the enemy to submit, and how to destroy the tap-root of treason.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

I ONCE HAD A TAILOR.

(SONG OF A WALL-FLOWER.)

AIR—"My Lodging is on the Cold Ground."

I ONCE had a Tailor; 'tis some time ago:
  More years than I care to confess.
But then I delighted in personal show,
  And paid some attention to dress.

My dress suit has lasted from that time to this;
  For service it only hath seen
On occasions like visits of envoys from Bliss,
  Not many, and distant between.

Its nap is as yet but a little effaced,
  And that you want daylight to see;
But the coat of my youth is too small in the waist,
  So the trowsers and vest are, for me.

Costumes oft have changed since this old one was new;
  But its style may revive in our day:
So I yet may appear in the fashion like you,
  Once again, ere I cast it away.

Which is the most deceitful part of a lady's walking-costume?—The false hood on her cloak.

MATHEMATICAL.—If a house has three stories, how many tales has it?

BODY-SNATCHER'S MOTTO.—De mortuis nil nisi bone'em.

THE CLAIMS OF KINDRED.—The greatest rarities in the world are kind relatives. Truly kind relatives will never oppose your inclinations, but, on the contrary, encourage you to follow them, and will take all unpleasant consequences of your doing so on themselves. They will lend you money to speculate with, and as often as you fail they will allow you to fall back upon them, and lend you more, and so on until they have no more to lend, and then they will lend you their names and their credit, and apologize to you for having done so little for you.—NEERDOWEEL On Goodness.

PROVERBS A LA DUNDREARY,

And dedicated, with every respect for that nobleman's stupendous stupidity, to Mr. Sothern, T. R. H.

There are as many early birds as were ever caught in the sea.

Too many broths spoil the child.

Cut your mutton according to your dinner-cloth.

When Love flies out of the window, it's useless shutting the stable door.

Nine tailors make a man look alive, I believe you.

Spare the rod, and you'll have no fish for dinner.

When things won't mend, it's best to wash your dirty linen at home.

Fine feathers butter no parsnips.

Adversity makes us acquainted with strange bed-fellows, but it's absurd kicking against them.

There's a silver lining to every cloud—no, no (stuttering, hesitating, correcting himself, and attempting all the while to sneeze), it isn't that—it's a coat—of course it is?—there's a silver lining to every coat, to be sure—that's it! How foolish to suppose it was a cloud! Who ever saw a cloud with a silver lining? Ha! ha! By Jove, it might as well have gold facings, a velvet collar, and a star on its breast.

One man may steal a hedge, while another mustn't even as much as look a gift-horse in the mouth!

Which is the most enduring trade?—A cobbler's, because it is ever-lasting, and the sole is at the bottom of it all.

Why is weeping in solitude like the Confederate ship Sumter?—Because it's a private tear.

When do trees resemble besieged garrisons?—When they are releaved.

JUDICIOUS AND TENDER REPROOF.

INGENIOUS CHILD (crying). "Oh! papa, I've hurt my 'ead."

CLEVER PAPA. "I see you have, my dear; you've knocked an h off it."

The greatest feat of the day—Foote-ing it up the Cumberland.

A young lady who has the misfortune to know little of music, and yet who is vain of her singing, was recently entertaining a party of friends with a somewhat difficult song, in a shrill voice, when an old bachelor lodging in the same house rushed out of his room to the head of the stairs, and shouted, "What are you hurting that pig for? Turn him into the yard!"

The battle of Bull Run (LL.D. Russell) showed many Man-asses.

"What ails your eye, Joe?" "I told a man he lied," replied Joe.

Breakers on the Southern sea-coast: Columbiads, Dahlgrens, and Paixhans.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

☞ FOR an account of the Battle in Hampton Roads, see page 183.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, March 4, in the Senate, a memorial from merchants and others, of New York, doing business on the Pacific coast, asking Congress to provide immediately for the transportation of the mails between New York and San Francisco, via Aspinwall and Panama, was presented and referred. The bill providing for the safe keeping and maintenance of United States prisoners was passed. The bill authorizing the President to appoint a Commissioner to confer with British and French Commissioners, to take measures for the preservation of the Atlantic fisheries, was passed. A bill providing for the codification and revision of the laws of the District of Columbia was reported. The Confiscation bill was taken up, and Senator M'Dougall, of California, concluded his speech in opposition to it. Senator Cowan, of Pennsylvania, also spoke against the bill. The Conference Committee on the bill relative to paying certain Western railroads for transporting troops made a report, which was agreed to. The Senate then went into executive session, and afterward adjourned.——In the House, the Pennsylvania contested election case was taken up, and Mr. Verree, the sitting member, declared entitled to his seat. The Senate's amendments to the bill providing additional clerks to the New York Assistant Treasurer's office, and for the appointment of a Deputy Assistant Treasurer, were agreed to.

On Wednesday, March 5, in the Senate, petitions in favor of a general bankrupt law, and asking for the transmission of the California mails via Panama, were presented and referred. A bill granting pay, pensions, and bounty to the Kentucky Home Guard was introduced by Senator Davis. Senator Morrill, of Maine, then made a speech in favor of the Confiscation bill, and the further consideration of the subject was postponed. A joint resolution authorizing equitable settlements with contractors who have failed to construct machinery by the day stipulated in their contracts, was referred to the Naval Committee. The bill for the codification and revision of the laws of the District of Columbia was passed. The bill defining the pay and emoluments of certain army officers was taken up, and several unimportant amendments adopted. The pay of all chaplains was fixed at $1200 per annum, and the bill then laid aside. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a bill increasing the number of cadets at the West Point Academy was introduced. A bill appropriating $60,353 to carry out the treaty for the abolition of the Stadt dues was passed. A bill to discontinue pensions to the children of officers and soldiers of the Revolution was passed. A joint resolution authorizing the sale of all unsuitable army supplies was adopted. The Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill to define the pay and emoluments of army officers, and also a bill to compensate loyal citizens for property destroyed, and to prevent the same being used by the enemy.

On Thursday, March 6, in the Senate, the Post-office Appropriation bill and the Postal Money Order bill were reported respectively by the Committees on Finance and Postal Affairs. A joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore Goldsborough and his officers and seamen for their gallant conduct at Roanoke Island, was adopted unanimously. The bill relative to the pay of Congressmen was taken up, and an amendment allowing twenty cents per mile for mileage was adopted. Further debate on the bill was cut off by a motion to go into executive session, which was agreed to.——In the House, a Message from the President was received, suggesting the adoption of a joint resolution providing for co-operation with any State for the abolition of slavery with pecuniary consideration. The President, in proposing this initiatory step, predicts important practical results therefrom. On motion of Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, the Message was referred to the Committee of the Whole. The report of the Conference Committee on the resolution providing for the payment of Western war claims was accepted, and the resolution adopted. The bill providing for the organization of the division staffs of the army was passed. The Committee of Ways and Means reported a bill to provide for the purchase of coin and for other financial purposes, which was laid over. A long defense of Alexander Cummings, a contractor for army supplies, was read, and several speeches on the slavery and war questions were delivered in Committee of the Whole, and the House adjourned.

On Friday, March 7, in the Senate, the President's Message on the subject of emancipating slaves was read and referred to the Judiciary Committee. Memorials asking immediate action on the subject of the transmission of the California mails via Panama, and compensation for the loss of the steamer Governor, were presented. The bill to provide for the occupation and cultivation of cotton lands was, after a brief discussion, passed by a vote of 26 to 14. The Senate then went into executive session.——In the House, the Secretary of War was directed to communicate all the facts regarding the number, age, condition, amount of service performed, and the pay, cost of maintenance, etc., of the Africans at Fortress Monroe. A bill was introduced granting bounty and pensions to pilots, engineers, seamen, and crews of gun-boats. The bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase coin and for other purposes, was passed, without amendment. In Committee of the Whole, Mr. Blair, of Missouri, criticised General Frémont's military campaign in the West, and Mr. Colfax delivered a long speech warmly defending the General's conduct.

On Monday, March 10, in the Senate, a joint resolution, requiring higher qualifications for commanders of military divisions, was introduced and referred to the Military Committee. Objection was made to the introduction of a joint resolution coinciding with the proposition in the President's late special Message for aid to States desiring to emancipate their slaves. The bill to encourage enlistments in the army was taken up, and after considerable discussion amendments were adopted reducing the number of volunteer cavalry regiments to thirty, and striking out the provision giving bounty for enlistments from the volunteer into the regular service, when the bill was passed. The Confiscation bill was taken up, and Senator Browning, of Illinois, addressed the Senate. A vote of thanks to Commodore Foote was passed. The bill making a new Article of War, to the effect that no officer of the army shall return fugitive slaves, was taken up, debated, and finally passed, by 29 yeas to 9 nays, when the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Senate bill to regulate the sutler department in the volunteer service was taken up, and, after a long debate, and being amended, was passed. It requires schedules of articles permitted to be sold to be prominently posted in the camps, and prohibits sutlers from farming out their offices or selling to soldiers to an amount exceeding one-fourth their monthly pay. It also stops the sutler's lien on soldiers' pay. A resolution to forward the proposition of the President's special Message relative to aiding States which desire to abolish slavery was introduced, and a long debate on it took place, consuming the greater portion of the day; but the House adjourned without taking final action on it.

GENERAL BANKS'S ADVANCE.

Leesburg, one of the rebel strong-holds on the Upper Potomac, fell into our hands last week. On Friday night Colonel Geary left Lovettsville with his whole force for Leesburg. He marched triumphantly through Wheatland and Waterford, scattering the rebel forces before him. He took possession of Fort Johnson, one of the strongest defenses of the town, at sunrise on 8th, and entered Leesburg with fixed bayonets and flags flying, driving the rebel General Hill with all his command from the town and the surrounding forts, in full retreat toward Middleburg.

THE REBELS FALLING BACK ALONG THE WHOLE LINE.

The rebels are falling back from the lines of the Potomac in every direction. They have evacuated Winchester, on the left wing of their lines, before the advancing troops of General Banks's division. Centreville, in the centre of their position, is also abandoned; the whole line of the Lower Potomac, with all its formidable batteries, is evacuated, and we learn, as we close this record, that the rebels have withdrawn from their almost impregnable position at Manassas, which is now held by our troops.

CAPTURE OF BRUNSWICK AND FERNANDINA.

The naval expedition of Commodore Dupont has accomplished a splendid feat on the Southern coast by the capture of Brunswick, Georgia, and Fernandina, Florida, which gives the Government command of the whole coast of Georgia, from South Carolina to Florida. On the approach of our fleet at Brunswick the rebels fled, abandoning their works, which were taken possession of by our troops. The fleet then proceeded twenty miles further South, and entered Cumberland Sound, the entrance to Fernandina, and drove the rebels from Fort Clinch, which was immediately occupied and the Union flag hoisted. The mission of the expedition was accomplished on the 4th of March. The troops of General Wright took possession of the fort and the town of Fernandina.

ANOTHER VICTORY IN ARKANSAS.

An official dispatch was received by General M'Clellan on 10th from General Halleck announcing the complete rout and defeat of the combined rebel armies of Generals Price, M'Culloch, Van Dorn, and M'Intosh, at Sugar Creek, near Boston Mountains, in Arkansas, by the Union army under General Curtis. The victory was a brilliant one, and disposes of the rebel forces in that quarter. The fight lasted three days. Our loss is said to be 1000 killed and wounded, and that of the rebels is considerably more. A large quantity of stores, flags, guns, and ammunition were captured by General Curtis. Our cavalry was in rapid pursuit of the flying rebels. The energy of General Curtis is worthy of all praise.

REIGN OF TERROR AT RICHMOND.

The Union sentiment in Richmond appears to be growing too strong for the comfort of the rebel chiefs. It will be remembered that Jeff Davis proclaimed martial law in Norfolk and Portsmouth a few days ago, and on Saturday last a proclamation put Richmond also under military rule. John Minor Botts and twenty other leading citizens have been arrested and imprisoned on charges of being connected with a Union conspiracy. The streets of Richmond are placarded with calls upon the Union men to watch and wait, that the day is dawning, and proclaiming "The Union forever!" The Richmond Dispatch advocates the execution of the conspirators. A great panic prevails in the city, consequent upon the late defeats of the rebel arms.

The Richmond papers of Friday last contain an announcement of the arrest of a number of Union men, principally Germans. The discovery by a detective officer, in the room of the Turners, of two National flags, and a painting of the Goddess of Liberty, with other Union symbols, led to the arrests.

THE REBELS BESIEGED AT NEW MADRID.

New Madrid, where the rebels have made a stand, with a force of nearly 10,000 men, with four gun-boats at anchor off the town, is completely invested by the army of General Pope. Some skirmishes had taken place there, in which several of our troops were killed by shells thrown from the rebel gun-boats. New Madrid is a flourishing little town on the Mississippi river, 280 miles southeast of Jefferson City. It is the capital of Madrid County, has a population of 2000 inhabitants, and enjoys a large business in shipping corn, lumber, and cattle for the Southern market. The officers of General Pope's command are confident that as soon as the gun-boats are silenced the town will fall easily into our hands.

OUR ARMY IN TENNESSEE.

Nashville remains perfectly tranquil under the gentle rule of General Buell, whose head-quarters are at Edgefield, across the river. The people are agreeably surprised at the moderation of our troops. The Mayor had formally surrendered the city to General Buell, and issued a proclamation to the citizens requesting that business be resumed, assuring them of the protection of General Buell, announcing that the elections will take place on the regular day, and inviting the country people to bring in their produce as usual. An agent of the Post-office Department had arrived from Washington, and will open the Nashville Post-office soon. He has had forty applications for clerkships already.

JOHNSTON FLYING AGAIN.

A rebel dispatch from Atlanta, Georgia, confirms the report that Murfreesborough, Tennessee, has been occupied by our troops, and gives the additional information that the rebel general, A. S. Johnston, had retreated to Decatur, Alabama, a station on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. This indicates that the rebels, instead of concentrating at Chattanooga, as anticipated, are tending toward Memphis, where the great stand is to be made to dispute the possession of the Mississippi Valley.

MORE UNION FEELING ON THE TENNESSEE.

A dispatch from Lieutenant Gwin, of the gun-boat Tyler, who made a landing at Pittsburg under a flag of truce, says that the cry of the people is to "send us arms and sufficient forces to protect us in organizing ourselves, and we will drive the rebels out of Tennessee ourselves." The utmost joy was exhibited at Nashville on the Stars and Stripes being displayed there, and the familiar tunes of "Hail Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle," played by our bands, were welcomed with enthusiasm.

THE TENNESSEE LEGISLATURE.

The Tennessee Legislature is having a hard time at Memphis. Another meeting was held on the 27th ultimo, when each house resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of counting noses, and the following was the result:

	Present.	Absent.
Senate	10	15
House	22	50

THE LATEST FROM THE GULF.

Our news from Ship Island is of an interesting character. The health of the men is good, although the weather is very hot, the thermometer marking ninety-five degrees in the shade. The details of the capture of the rebel steamer Magnolia, with 1150 bales of cotton, by the South Carolina, while attempting to run out of Mobile, are published. She threw overboard about two hundred and fifty bales, her entire cargo consisting of 1400 bales of the valuable staple. She was bound for Havana. The capture of a dozen or more oyster boats, on their way to New Orleans, will considerably diminish the supply and increase the price of this delicious article in the Crescent City of rebeldom.

PERSONAL.

Governor Andrew Johnson, with his staff, accompanied by Messrs. Etheridge and Maynard, left Washington on Saturday evening for Nashville, to enter upon their charge of the new Government of Tennessee.

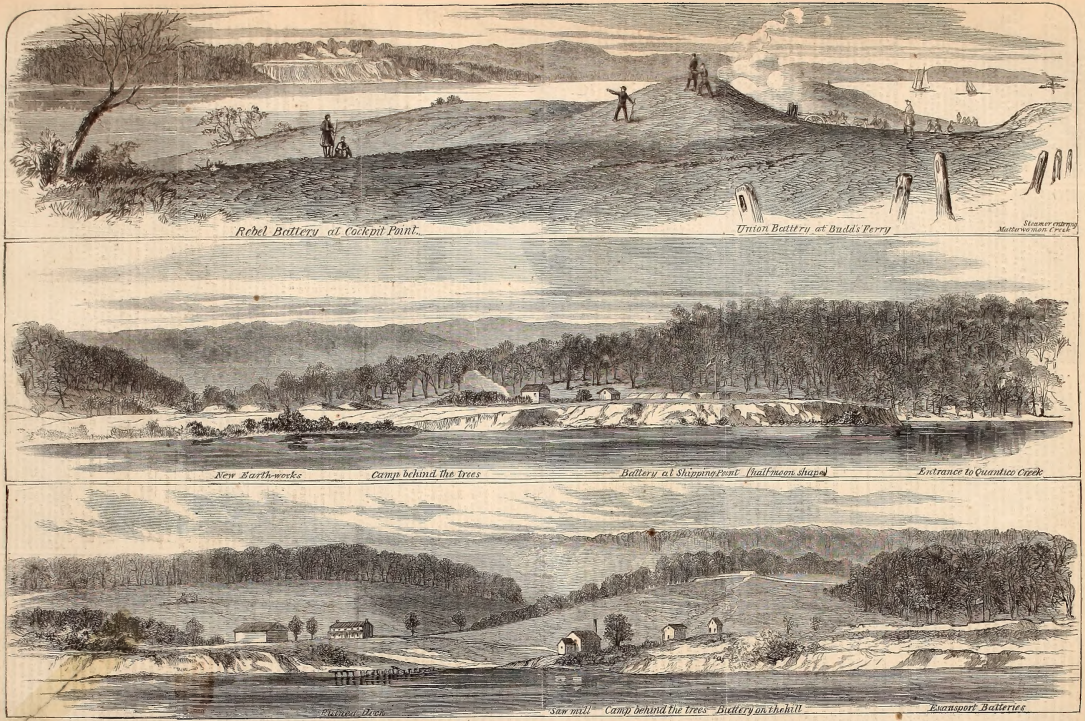
The rebels give as a reason for not exchanging Colonel Corcoran, as expected, that maps and drawings were found concealed upon his person.

The Grand Army of the Potomac has been divided by General M'Clellan into five corps d'armee, respectively commanded by Generals Heintzelman, M'Dowell, Sumner, Keyes, and Banks.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

AMERICAN AFFAIRS IN PARLIAMENT.



OUR affairs continue to be discussed in Parliament. Mr. Bright has made an energetic speech in condemnation of the outlay, added to the naval estimates, incurred by the policy which terminated in the surrender of Mason and Slidell. Mr. Bright evidently thinks, as a commercial liberal, that the game was not worth the cost charged to the British people. Lord Palmerston defended the course pursued by his Cabinet.

Earl Russell acknowledges himself satisfied with the operation of the Union Government in sinking the stone fleet off Charleston harbor. He says the measure was merely an aid to the blockade and was not intended to be permanent. Indeed he says that Charleston harbor could not be obliterated by artificial means, as the water will force an opening in another channel, and that Napoleon agrees with him in the opinion.

Lord Palmerston had stated in the House of Commons that the negotiations relative to the San Juan affair had been suspended, in consequence of the civil war in America, but a joint provisional occupation of the island had been arranged by both Governments. The British Government, in response to a request from The O'Donoghue, had refused to afford any information relative to British vessels running the blockade.

ARREST OF THE CAPTAIN OF THE "SUMTER."

The commander of the privateer Sumter has been arrested by the Moorish authorities at Tangier, but we are not informed as to the cause. The Liverpool Courier of the 26th ultimo says: "The ground upon which the arrest was made is not explained, but from the fact that it was made at the request of the North American Consul, we may surmise that it was on the allegation that Captain Semmes is a common marauder and pirate." The Dublin Freeman of the 27th ultimo remarks: "The arrest was made at the instance of the Federal Consul at Gibraltar and of the Captain of the Federal steamer Tuscarora, who proceeded to Tangier in order to influence the Moorish authorities, and who seem to have found the Moors more complaisant than Christian nations, and more ready to regard the laws of nations as binding them to aid the Northerners against the Southerners.

THE REBEL BATTERIES ON THE POTOMAC NOW IN POSSESSION OF OUR TROOPS.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 187.]

NEWPORT NEWS BATTERY BEFORE THE FIGHT.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL MANSFIELD AND STAFF AT NEWPORT NEWS DURING THE ENGAGEMENT.

THE GOOD OLD FLAG.

Look to your Banner, Boys!
Proudly it waves!
Traitors who trampled it
Cold in their graves.
Far over land and sea
Swells the glad cry,
"Union and Victory!
Praise God on high!"

Look on its gorgeous folds
Sprinkled with light,
Gleaming 'midst battle-wreaths
Sable as night—
Bright as the stars that glow
Through the dark storm,
Bright as through murky clouds
Struggles the morn.

Look on its emblems bright—
Emblems we love;
Fondly we clustered them,
Nailed them above:
Red for our Fathers' blood,
White for their fame,
Blue for our Nation's troth:
Pure be its name!

North winds are fondling it
Gently above;
South winds are greeting it
With hope and love.
Waft it from East to West,
Softly each breeze;
Shout for its gallant deeds,
Rivers and seas!

Look o'er its crimson fields,
Furrowed by death!
Trampled the bleeding sods,
Where the hot breath,
Scorching our very souls,
Treason exhaled,
Wrought in us hero's might
Never we failed.

List to its words of peace,
Pure as the song
Heaven is whispering
All the night long!
"Break not the golden cord,
Brotherly love;
Mar not this foretaste of Union above!"

Swear then to guard it, Boys,
Ever from stain!
Let of suspicion's breath
No taint remain.
Ever in Freedom's van
Onward it bear;
Ever for equal laws
All things to dare.

When in death's giant grasp
Nations shall fall,
Spread out our Starry Flag
Then as their pall;
God of the true and brave,
Then let it rise,
Symbol of Liberty,
Home to the skies!

Nazareth, Pa., March, 1862.

CAPTAIN HARRY'S VALENTINE.

February 14, 1861. Does any body remember what sort of a day it was? Whether it shone with sunshine, or lowered with gray skies? Whether it pelted cold wintry rain, or sent down shrouds of snow? Whether it hardened its hoary heart in walls of icy adamant, or ran out meltingly in rippling rivers and flowing tides? Does any body remember? I remember. It was such a day as sometimes dawns in mid-winter to delude us with spring fancies of budding trees and springing grass. The sky was blue, the air was soft, and birds piped in the warm rays of the sun. Under this blue sky, in this soft air, and genial sunshine of this day of February 14, 1861, Captain Harry, of the United States service, and commander of the vessel lying at anchor in the harbor of ——: Captain Harry, whose rarely mentioned surname shall not betray him here, paced up and down the long, narrow deck of his vessel with no less a personage than Commodore Carey's daughter, Miss Josephine Carey, who in company with her father and perhaps a dozen others, visits the ship on this visiting day.

"Pooh! Commodore Carey indeed! Whoever heard of Commodore Carey?"

Of course you never did. Who said that you had? Did you expect I was going to give you real names with my real people and facts?

Josephine Carey was a pretty little girl. She looked like a child as she walked there beside Captain Harry, with his big shoulders and martial aspect. Very like a child she seemed too. A half-shy glance out of her eye, and a hovering smile flitting about her lips—lips of velvet crimson; and prettiest of all such an enchanting blush, rising and rising, falling and falling, just as tides rise and fall. But young, and shy, and tender as she appeared, it was said that the girl fairly wound Commodore Carey round her little finger. That she carried a high hand in the old house on —— Street, where she was sole and only mistress, in default of a mother who died at her birth. That she coaxed and wheedled her father even while she ruled him, to such a degree that he invariably ended his remonstrances with a "God bless the child!" And all the household seemed to partake of this spirit indeed; for while that young middy, who called her cousin, Dick Carey, would tell with a rueful face how she fairly outwitted him on more than one occasion, he would as invariably end with a remark as emphatic, though certainly not as reverent as the Commodore's,

"Ah, but she's a jolly girl, Sir!"

It is clearly proven then, that Captain Harry had a dangerous companion as he walked the deck that day.

As the waves murmured and sparkled before him, so this little Loreley murmured and sparkled at his side.

Would she wind him round her finger as easily as she had the Commodore? We shall see.

Leaning over the gunwale he asks,

"Do you know, Miss Josephine, what day this is?"

"What day? let me think," counting, "one, two, three," on three little fingers. "Yes, it is Thursday. Why?" looking up expectantly.

"I do not mean what day of the week, what day of the month?"

She counted again, and Captain Harry watched the pretty fingers at their pretty work.

"It is the 14th of February."

"And the 14th of February is St. Valentine's day. Do you remember, Josephine?"

"Remember what, Captain Harry?"

Captain Harry bit his lip at the reproof administered in her address. In his earnestness remembering what she acknowledged forgotten, he had called her "Josephine."

The cool little lady brought him to his senses with two words, "Captain Harry."

For a moment he was indignant, not at her reproof, though it hurt, but the forgetfulness or pretense of it. Another moment and looking down at her he got over his indignation. The shy, soft eyes were giving him a sidelong glance, and the faintest color was rising on her cheek.

She did remember! But still she shook her head. "Remember what, Captain Harry?"

Five seconds agone Captain Harry would have sworn that he would never have answered that question. Five seconds agone Captain Harry had felt himself rebuffed and aggrieved by it. Now, on its repetition, his heart was softened to such a degree that he eagerly made answer. And all for a pair of brown eyes meeting his shyly, and a pink color coming on a face that defied suspicion by its innocence. That was the spell.

He made answer, and there was the least tinge of reproach in his tone.

"You have not forgotten, Miss Josephine, what you said to me one week ago to-night?"

"Said? Ah, one says so many things, how can I recall all that I may have said a week ago? A week is an age."

He groaned inwardly; but the pretty fair face kept on its shy, appealing look, and again hope rose within his heart.

"Perhaps—perhaps it's a girl's way," he thought. So he went on: "One week ago to-night Miss Josephine Carey declined answering a question that I proposed to her. On this day she promised a reply."

Very low was his voice, very quiet was his mien; but Captain Harry was getting sorely impatient under this girl's way.

"A week ago—a week ago," she murmured, at length, as if in a dream. "I know the horns and harps were playing, the 'hundred lights were blazing,' and I walked with Captain Harry in the grand hall. He was very kind, he was very courteous, and I liked him well. He asked me a question, but he would not take an answer then; and I told him he should have it for a valentine on the 14th of February. But there are other 14ths of February to come, I trust, for both Captain Harry and myself."

"Josephine! Josephine! you can not mean to put me off in this way? But no, I shall never—"

What was he about to say? Why did he not say it? Why? Because something dropped upon his hand with a light touch that thrilled his very soul. A little pink palm, soft and warm.

He turned, flushed and expectant. She was not trifling with him! She would give him his answer—and she liked him well.

She began with the very words again.

"Captain Harry, I like you well, but I do not think I love you yet."

Then with a tinge of impatience, "Why did you disturb our pleasant relations? You men spoil every thing by haste. Well, I will give you your answer now if you wish, but I warn you—"

He stayed her with a word. Then, half in disdain at his own weakness, he asks,

"You have known me a year, Miss Josephine. How long must you know me to find out if you love me?"

"A year! And you want me to spend a lifetime with you. Truly your sex are consistent. Give me another year, and on this very day twelvemonths I promise you my answer."

"On this very day twelvemonths our country may be plunged in civil war, and in her service I may be out of the reach of your answer."

She smiled. This gloomy suggestion, in her estimation, was only brought forward for the occasion. She replied,

"I promise you, nevertheless, that on this very day twelvemonths you shall have it."

"I may be dead; what then?" he said, bitterly.

"Then you will not need it."

He reddened, bit his lip, and exclaimed, "Miss Josephine Carey, you are harder hearted than a stone, and I am a fool to drift round at your will!"

"You need not."

"No, I need not. That is very true; but I do it. My fate be on my own head. So I wait—still wait."

Suddenly he faced her.

"Josephine, you are not trifling with me?"

She was perfectly in earnest now; perhaps she had been all along.

"Why should you think I trifle when I say I like you well, but do not love you yet. Do I not here admit much—enough surely for now? I am young—just twenty. Next week I go to Europe. Let me see more of the world. At the end of the year, if I can say 'Yes,' it will be safer for you and for me. Perhaps at the end of the year you will not care for 'Yes' or 'No.' Then, of course, it will have been much safer."

"Then I shall be beyond all care. I shall not change if you do."

She laughed a little, half scornfully.

"Bah, the world is full of change."

"And you, where did you learn that bitter lesson so young?" he questioned.

"By the change about me. Half the married people I know are ennuyé. They have verified the proverb of hasty marrying. I do not mean to make the mistake. And I ask you to wait a year before I give myself to you for all the years of my life."

"Ah," and he shook his head ruefully, "if I only knew that at the end of the year you would give yourself to me for all the years of your life!"

She threw him a rapid glance, in which lurked depths of meaning; then dropping two or three pebbles into the water, she said quickly, "'Ce qui est différé n'est pas perdu.'"

"Jo!" called the Commodore from the gangway.

She turned, but her companion had taken her hand at this last sentence.

"Then I may hope for the best?" he eagerly says.

"No, no, hope nothing; how perverse you are!"

"Jo!" again called the paternal voice.

"And you will give me nothing before we part?" urged the suitor. "No gage d'amitie even: I shall not see you again; we sail to-morrow, you know."

She slipped her hand out of its little white mitten, leaving the latter only in his possession. A mischievous smile, a blush, and murmuring softly, "Gage d'amitie," she sped away to her father, who for the fourth time called her name.

Holding his gage d'amitie, Captain Harry stood a moment the picture of puzzled annoyance.

"She has given me the mitten after all. I had a great mind to throw it overboard. Bah, what a fool that girl makes of me!"

He shook it savagely, and out tinkled a ring—"a ring of amethyst." He had seen her wear it often. Did she mean this too for a "gage d'amitie," or was it accident? He chose to believe the former; and cheered not a little by the double gage, which so deftly turned the gage d'amitie to gage d'amour, he returned to his duties with a lighter heart.

Long before the next year came, the civil war he had prophesied was here.

In Paris with her aunt, Mrs. Carey—that boy Dick's mother—Josephine heard the news. A letter from her father summoned her home. The trunks were packed, the passports visaed, the passage secured, when a sudden and violent illness attacking Mrs. Carey, obliged them to remain behind. This delay was a sore trial to Josephine. She loved her father, as her father loved her, with little less than idolatry. Any day might see him offering up his life for a sacrifice to his country. Did she think as well of another? Did she remember a day in February when the sky was blue, the air was soft, and the sun shone kindly? Did she remember her promise of that day, and the gloomy prophecy whereat she had laughed?

It was spring now, months might elapse before she would again see her native land. In that time what might not happen? What dire disaster on sea and shore? what "——shout and groan and sabre stroke?"

Ah, it was fearful!

All her talk was of "papa, dear papa;" but did her thoughts never recur to him who said, "I may be out of the reach of your answer then!" It is possible; but in Paris—that splendid Paris which was so full of enchantments, so full of allurements—she had found a companion who had given a keener charm to all that was charming; who had sung when she sung, and danced when she danced, and now did not fail to grieve when she grieved.

A year ago Miss Josephine Carey would have laughed in your face, if you had told her that Livingston Raynal would have proved such a companion to her. But a year ago they were in America; now they were in Paris. It made a vast difference. A year ago she had met him in company with spirits of a different order. Men whose lives were moved by the springs of "to-day." Earnest in the present work. Eager for advancement. Interested in all practical schemes of action and endeavor.

In this company Livingston Raynal was out of joint. His smooth cultivation lacked the edge of earnestness, his tastes looked effeminate, his idleness selfish by contrast. But the scene changes. Instead of this atmosphere of the New World, there is the gracious gayety, the careless ease of the fascinating Parisien salons. There is no hurry here. The stream flows evenly and brilliantly, and Life is set to dance-music, while the sun shines and the fountains play. And here has Livingston Raynal his true orbit, where he swings, a star. And here Josephine Carey and the star find each other. Pleasant finding it is, as I have said, but do you suppose that Miss Josephine has surrendered her whole heart to this pleasure? You shall see.

One, two, three months went by, and Aunt Catherine's illness had settled into a slow disease which admitted of no removal. She had been a mother to Josephine, and she was her sole relative in Paris. Could she leave her?

One two, three months, and all her talk was of "papa," until a night in August she sat in their salon reading aloud to her one auditor—Mr. Raynal—a letter just received from her father. It was full of vivid description and suggestion. It told of past conflict and defeat, of present preparation on sea and shore, the gathering battalions and the armed fleet.

As the girl read her color came and went, her eyes darkened and glowed, her lips quivered and smiled.

Her listener watched her, with his fastidious sense of charm fully awakened; and Josephine thought, as she met the gaze, that his heart was stirred—as hers was stirred—with patriotic ardor.

Stopping at last, she fell from her high flight of glory into the sad dreams of a woman who can only watch and wait. Doubly sad to her it seemed then, waiting there, miles and miles away. And as she thought, something rose in her throat. She struggled with herself, but rebellious nature would have its way, and a brief passion of tears relieved the passion of regret.

Mr. Raynal was all alert in an instant. He was very, very sorry.

"What was it—no bad news, surely?"

The eyes wept on uncomforted. The lips refused to answer.

Mr. Raynal grew more solicitous.

What was the matter with dear Miss Josephine?

"Dear Miss Josephine" suddenly glanced upon him from behind her handkerchief with a vehemence that startled and amazed him, answering, quite sharply, that it was matter enough, she should think, to be removed at such a distance from her father in times like these.

Mr. Raynal had made a mistake. Perhaps, if he had been a Frenchman, he would have shrugged his shoulders at it, and in endeavoring to make it better would have made it worse. But Mr. Raynal did not shrug his shoulders, and in endeavoring to remedy his blunder he met with signal success. Asking her pardon like a gentleman, but like a gentleman who was hurt, gravely and with dignity. Whereat Miss Josephine, who had been used to torment better men all her days, actually drew in her little sharp horns, and felt much as if she had made herself ridiculous. So much for Mr. Raynal's power. How far would it extend?

Then the gentleman essaying consolation, patched his blunder up with earnest words of sympathy.

He was sure that before many weeks her aunt would be able to sail. Nothing would be done until then. The movements of the army were slow.

Listening, the tears stopped, and the sun shone in her smile. Listening, she fell a-dreaming—pleasant dreams, for the smile deepened, the eyes beamed. Out of this dream she says, "I must be there on the 14th."

"On the 14th—what then, Miss Josephine?"

She laughed lowly, recalled to herself.

"On the 14th—on the 14th—ah, Monsieur Raynal, on the 14th the die must be cast."

He regarded her with a puzzled air. A moment ago a tender, sorrowful thing, all tears and regrets; now a smiling sprite, dealing in riddles.

What did she mean? he smilingly asked.

"Only that the 14th—the 14th of February, Monsieur, is St. Valentine's day, and I must be home to keep a promise—a St. Valentine promise;" and she laughed again her little low laugh, out of the folds of her lace shawl, into which she had dropped her face.

Livingston Raynal was possessed of keen perceptions. Though almost out of date now—except for boys and girls, or for some merry jest—he knew well enough what the day signified, and quickly guessed the nature of her promise. Going deeper still, he read the "Yes" and "No" swinging in the balance. "Yes" and "No"—which should it be? If he asked himself this question, he answered it as speedily, and it would seem satisfactorily; for a new look of animation came into his face in a moment.

In this Paris life, if the girl before him had learned to know him better, so, too, had his knowledge of her deepened. He saw her here fond of splendor and fashion and show; fond of flattery and power and position. It would be hard to give them up. Could she be willing to go back to the old life—and, further yet, end it all by becoming the wife of a captain in the navy, with little more than his pay for an income?

Perhaps Mr. Raynal asked himself these questions also, for he was no stranger to the poor naval captain who had "hung round" Miss Josephine Carey for the past two years. And perhaps, if he asks them, he feels very confident that "flattery and power and position," and Livingston Raynal, may carry the day.

But do not be too hasty in your conclusions, Monsieur Raynal. Underneath all this love of "flattery and power and position" may lie something of different texture—something akin to the nature of that stanch old republican, Commodore Carey.

Ah! no; there is no need of haste. Monsieur Raynal has plenty of time. His country's call is not for him. The clubs, the balls, the galleries of art, the play, and all the grand procession of Paris pleasures, which occupy him, yet leave him time to pursue still another object. Plenty of time.

Yet he does not delay unnecessarily. He who can be so agreeable infuses on this evening a more vivid charm into speech and manner.

Graceful, handsome, and brilliant, he became the essence of grace and beauty and brilliance; and the fair little Josephine, sitting opposite, looks and listens and admires! And listening, she occupies her fingers in some pretty feminine work which is half play—weaving in and out a lacy mass of fine-spun cotton, for some useless use of toilet or tray.

Keeping the thread of the brilliant talk, she at last drops the thread of cotton from its slender chain of connection. A half-unconscious exclamation, and she goes winding out the blunder into skeins again. Her companion bends forward and offers his services; and contrary to the usual custom, in this coquetish co-operation Monsieur imprisons the hands of Mademoiselle with the countless threads of snow-white cotton.

Round and round he winds the raveled thread—round and round, meshing the little hands in the soft skeins, meshing the little heart into subtler skeins of soft-voiced eloquence. Round and round, until the thread catches against the fretted setting of a jet ring—a jet ring, diamond-sparkling, on her finger. He leans forward to disentangle, a smile upon his lips.

"Mademoiselle has established a picket-guard."

"Whereon King Cotton is held in durance vile," she returns.

A blush rises to her cheek in the pause that follows, as the larger hand delays against the lesser in the process of disentanglement.

"Well," she exclaims at length, a little quickly, "how long is this imprisonment to last? When will the commodity be at liberty?"

"When victory is proclaimed, dear Miss Josephine!"

She laughs, and then, "What a provoking snarl, and all for a little jet ring!"

"Yes, all for a little jet ring—all this delay and ruin perhaps to the whole fabric, for this contraband—a jet ring, truly!"

The sudden bitterness of his tone gave added weight to his words. She understood something of his meaning, not wholly yet. She understood the play, the jesting correspondences of figure and fact. And she says,

"So you think the war rests there?"

"Yes, I think the war rests there. I think it rests at the door of abolition agitation. And I think we shall never know peace or union until that senseless meddling cry shall cease. Let slavery alone, and it will take care of itself, and work out its own salvation by some natural laws."

Snap went the slender thread—lost all the labor of the night. The smooth, soft skein was a snarl again. A snarl that even the skillful patience of Livingston Raynal would fail to untangle.

Drawing back, dropping off the cotton from her hands, she says quickly, "Which natural laws, I suppose you to mean, are servile insurrections."

For a moment her listener was struck dumb with amaze. This fair little Josephine, the gay belle of ball and fête. This fairy in countless flounces and fluttering ribbons to have an opinion beyond her own gay world! The something akin to that stanch old republican, Commodore Carey, was rising now to the surface. "Flattery and power and position" were sinking out of sight.

And while he wonders, she goes on:

"How can you say the war rests there—how can you put this selfish rebellion on that ground—when, as early as 1776, John Adams wrote to his friend Gates—'All our misfortunes arise from a single source—the resistance of the Southern colonies to a Republican Government.' No, it is not abolitionism; it is slavery that has brought it on. You might as well say that the protecting law of a Christian land, which dooms the murderer to death, is the sole cause of his fate. And so you put up this subterfuge when it is the old vantage-ground of baron and serf, noble and slave. And if we keep a base silence we may have peace, you say. Peace! do not talk of peace on such a servile silence as this!"

Stopping a moment, all flushed and eager, she leaned forward, and from a table took a volume of Mrs. Browning—the Casa Guidi. With gathering color and ardent voice she read—

"I love no peace which is not fellowship,
And which includes not mercy. I would have Rather the raking of the guns across
The world, and shricks against Heaven's architrave,
Rather the struggle in the slippery fosse,
Of dying men and horses, and the wave
Blood-bubbling.... Enough said!—By Christ's own cross,
And by the faint heart of my womanhood,
Such things are better than a Peace which sits
Beside the hearth in self-commended mood,
And takes no thought how wind and rain by fits
Are howling out of doors against the good
Of the poor wanderer. What! your peace admits
Of outside anguish while it sits at home?
I loathe to take its name upon my tongue—
It is no peace. 'Tis treason, stiff with doom—
'Tis gagged despair, and inarticulate wrong.
* * * * * *
O Lord of Peace, who art Lord of Righteousness,
Constrain the anguished worlds from sin and grief,
Pierce them with conscience, purge them with redress,
And give us peace which is no counterfeit!"

Well might her listener be amazed. He little suspected this underlying of will and strength—this outburst, which showed clear sympathy for a cause, and clear knowledge of its points.

They had been treading on flowers until now—a sudden step, the flowers are scattered; and on heroic battle ground he is challenged and charged by one who, a moment since, smiled under Flora's most peaceful garland.

Challenged and charged! Does he accept the challenge? Does he charge back again with quivering lance?

No; a few light words of evasion, a polite air of tolerance because it was a woman who spoke, an attempt at good-humored amusement; but no answer. He could not answer!

Twice that night he had blundered. The first found remedy. The second? Did he know it was beyond all remedy? Did he know, as he bent over her hand at parting, and talked, smiling, of their "little tilt," as he was pleased to term it, that the "little tilt" had swung the balance of the "Yes" and "No?"

One, two, three months again, and Josephine Carey is on her way back to America. It is in November; and as she walks the deck, and notes the stars and stripes fling fluttering out from the flag-staff, she checks the absent tune upon her lips, and murmurs with a kind of exultant archness, "I shall be in time—I shall be in time!"

In time for what, Miss Josephine? But Miss Josephine Carey is impregnable when she chooses. She chooses now. The tune goes on as absently as before, the face puts up its mask of silence, and away she walks wrapped in her tweed Capuchin cloak, and catching the salt spray on her floating curls. Just the fair lovely thing of last year; no change but of beauty. The deep violet eyes still droop their shy glances, the cheek's color comes and goes; but the soul looking out of those eyes is conscious of itself, the swift-coming color pulsates to serener changes.

She has seen the world, and she is better for it. She has tried its splendor and its fashion, and is yet glad to return to simpler things.

If, miles and miles away, her soul thrilled with the tidings of her country's struggle, she was not likely to grow cooler in the very midst of it. No, nearness could not cool nor use harden this ardent spirit. Once roused to life's deeper meanings, hers was not the nature to turn back. "In the very midst," with the booming of cannon, and the fluttering of flags comes February, the month of victory. Does she remember a day in February when the sky was blue, the air was soft, and the sun shone kindly? Does she remember her promise of that day?

On the 14th of February, 1862, the sky was overcast, the air was chill and wintry, and the sun refused to shine. It was a bright day nevertheless, for it was preceded by splendid successes, and charged with prophecies of future ones. To none brighter than to the heroes of Roanoke. One of these heroes, sitting in his state-room on that day, is surprised by a brightness which is not of war's successes. For him the sky is blue, the air is soft, and the sun shines kindly as he bends over the letter, which says:

"I wanted to see the world, and I have seen it. I wanted to test its power, and I have tested it. I wanted to know my own heart, and I now have that knowledge. If last year I liked Captain Harry well, this year I like him better. The answer I could not give him then I freely give him now; and my 'Yes,' God willing, shall reach him to redeem my promise of twelve months agone."

The promise was redeemed. On that day of February 14, 1862, Captain Harry received his Valentine.

FORT DONELSON.

We continue in this number our series of pictures of Fort Donelson, from sketches by our correspondent, Mr. Alexander Simplot. The picture which represents the Interior of the Work will show how formidable a place it was, and how large a garrison it was calculated to accommodate. The Water Battery gives a good idea of the terrible obstacles our brave troops had to overcome, and the fearful fire which crippled our gun-boats.

THE NAVAL COMBAT IN THE CHESAPEAKE.

We devote much of our space this week to illustrations of the naval combat which took place in the Chesapeake on 8th and 9th March between the rebel vessels Merrimac, Jamestown, and Yorktown, and our iron-clad Monitor, Cumberland, Congress, and Minnesota.

On page 177 we give a picture of the Monitor. The following account of the vessel we take from the World:

THE ERICSSON STEAMER "MONITOR."

The Monitor was built and launched at Greenpoint, Long Island, by Captain Ericsson on January 30, having been built in one hundred days. She is constructed on an entirely original plan, invented by Captain Ericsson with the specific view of attaining absolute invulnerability. There are, in effect, two hulls to the vessel, the upper one being the defensive portion, and the lower one, which is entirely protected by the upper, being built light of three-eighth inch iron, with an average thickness of three-quarters of an inch. The upper hull is 174 feet long, 41 feet 4 inches wide, and 5 feet deep; the lower hull 124 feet long, 34 feet wide at the top where it connects with the upper hull, so that the upper hull extends over the lower 25 feet over each end and 3 feet 7 inches over the side. The sides of the upper hull are perpendicular, and are built of a bulwark of white oak, 30 inches thick, upon which is placed an armor of solid plate iron, 6 inches thick, extending from bottom to top of the straight side of 5 feet depth, and all around the vessel. The vessel draws hardly 10 feet, and her sides are only 18 inches out of water. The propeller, rudder, anchor, and engines are all protected under the upper hull. The deck is shell-proof. The inclination of the lower hull is such that a ball can not strike it without passing through 25 feet of water, and then striking at an acute angle of about 10 degrees. Upon the deck is a cylindrical turret, which is to contain and protect the guns and gunners. It is 9 feet high and 20 feet internal diameter, having two port-holes on the same side for the guns, and being built to revolve fifteen times a minute, if necessary, by machinery connected with the engine. By this revolution the guns are brought to bear at any point of the compass. The turret is of iron plates, standing lengthwise, riveted, and making in all a thickness on every side of 9 inches of iron. On the side in which the port-holes are bored, which will be the most exposed to fire, will be an additional shield of 2 inches of iron, making the whole thickness 11 inches. It has a perforated shell-proof top. The armament inside the turret consists of two 11-inch Columbiads, which have been furnished with 400 wrought-iron shot, each ball costing $47, and weighing 184 pounds, made on purpose for smashing in the sides of such rebel floating batteries as the Merrimac, where cast-iron shot would break to pieces. The vessel has no unprotected part. If a ball strikes the turret, it meets a resistance of 9 or (if on the fighting side) of 11 inches of iron; if it strikes the sides, a resistance of 6 inches of iron and a bulwark of 30 inches of white oak; and to strike the light portion, as we have said, it must pass through 25 feet of water. The stem and stern of the iron-clad part are pointed at an angle of 80 degrees. The plate being straight on the two sides toward the end, and the sides sharp, the battery is considered by the inventor as one of the most powerful steam-rams ever built, bringing the whole immense weight of the upper hull and deck, a weight of about 550 tons, to operate in one direction.

THE "MERRIMAC."

The following account of the Monitor's antagonist, the rebel iron-plated ship, is from the Herald correspondent:

The Merrimac, the iron-plated steamer, was formerly the United States frigate of the same name, which was scuttled and sunk at the Norfolk Navy-yard, at the commencement of the rebellion, by the officers of the Union Government, in preference to her falling into the hands of the rebels. She was built at Charlestown in 1855, and was pierced for forty guns. Her last service had been in the Pacific squadron. After the rebels took possession of the yard she was raised and converted into a man-of-war for their own use. Her hull was cut down to within three feet of her water-mark, and a bomb-proof house built on her gun-deck. She was also iron-plated, and her bow and stern steel-clad, within a projecting angle of iron for the purpose of piercing a vessel. She has no masts, and there is nothing to be seen over her gun-deck with the exception of her pilot-house and smoke-stack. Her bomb-proof is three inches thick, and is made of wrought-iron. Her armament consists of four eleven-inch navy guns on each side, and two one-hundred pounder Armstrong guns at the bow and stern. Last November she made a trial trip from Norfolk, running down so close to Fortress Monroe as to be seen by the naked eye, but ventured no nearer. Although she was looked upon by the rebels as a very tough customer for a vessel or vessels not protected as she is, she remained inactive, anchored off Norfolk, until her present engagement.

THE FIRST DAY'S FIGHT.

On pages 184 and 185 we give views of the Two Fights—that of the 8th and that of the 9th. The former was thus described by the correspondent of the Associated Press:

The dullness of Old Point was startled to-day by the announcement that a suspicious-looking vessel, supposed to be the Merrimac, looking like a submerged house with the roof only above water, was moving down from Norfolk by the channel in front of the Sewall's Point batteries. Signal-guns were also fired by the Cumberland and Congress, to notify the Minnesota, St. Lawrence, and Roanoke of the approaching danger, and all was excitement in and about Fortress Monroe.

There was nothing protruding above the water but a flag-staff flying the rebel flag, and a short smoke-stack. She moved along slowly, and turned into the channel leading to Newport News, and steamed direct for the frigates Cumberland and Congress, which were lying at the mouth of James River.

As soon as she came within range of the Cumberland, the latter opened on her with her heavy guns, but the balls struck and glanced off, having no more effect than pease from a pop-gun. Her ports were all closed, and she moved on in silence, but with a full head of steam. In the mean time, as the Merrimac was approaching the two frigates on one side, the rebel iron-clad steamers Yorktown and Jamestown came down the James River and engaged our frigates on the other side. The batteries at Newport News also opened on the Yorktown and Jamestown, and did all in their power to assist the Cumberland and Congress, which, being sailing vessels, were at the mercy of the approaching steamers. The Merrimac, in the mean time, kept steadily on her course, and slowly approached the Cumberland, when she and the Congress, at the distance of 100 yards, rained full broadsides on the iron-clad monster, that took no effect, glancing upward and flying off, having only the effect of checking her progress for a moment.

After receiving the first broadside of the two frigates, she ran on to the Cumberland, striking her about midships, and literally laying open her sides. She then drew off and fired a broadside into the disabled ship, and again dashed against her with her iron-clad prow, and, knocking in her side, left her to sink, while she engaged the Congress, which lay about a quarter of a mile distant. The Congress had in the mean time kept up a sharp engagement with the Yorktown and Jamestown, and having no regular crew on board of her, seeing the hopelessness of resisting the iron-clad steamer, at once struck her colors. Her crew had been discharged several days since, and three companies of the Naval Brigade had been put on board temporarily until she could be relieved by the St. Lawrence, which was to have gone up on Monday to take her position as one of the blockading vessels of the James River.

On the Congress striking her colors, the Jamestown approached and took from on board of her all her officers as prisoners, but allowed the crew to escape in boats. The vessel being thus cleared, was fired by the rebels, when the Merrimac and her two iron-clad companions opened with shell and shot on the Newport News batteries. The firing was briskly returned. Various reports have been received, principally from frightened sutlers' clerks. Some of them represent that the garrison had been compelled to retreat from the batteries to the woods. Another was that the two smaller rebel steamers had been compelled to retreat from their guns.

In the mean time the steam frigate Minnesota, having partly got up steam, was being towed up to the relief of the two frigates, but did not get up until it was too late to assist them. She was also followed up by the frigate St. Lawrence, which was taken in tow by several of the small harbor steamers. It is, however, rumored that neither of these vessels had pilots on board them, and after a short engagement both of them seemed to be, in the opinion of the pilots on the Point, aground. The Minnesota, either intentionally or from necessity, engaged the three steamers at about a mile distance with only her two bow guns. The St. Lawrence also poured in shot from all the guns she could bring to bear, and it was the impression of the most experienced naval officers on the Point that both had been considerably damaged. These statements, it must be borne in mind, are all based on what could be seen by a glass at a distance of nearly eight miles, and a few panic-stricken non-combatants, who fled at almost the first gun from Newport News.

In the mean time darkness approached, though the moon shone out brightly, and nothing but the occasional flashing of guns could be seen. The Merrimac was also believed to be aground, as she remained stationary at a distance of a mile from the Minnesota, making no attempt to attack or molest her.

THE SECOND DAY'S FIGHT.

The Herald correspondent writes:

This day (Sunday) the day broke fair. As the sun broke on the horizon a slight haze was visible on the water, which prevented an extended vision. At half past six o'clock A.M. this haze cleared away. Looking toward Sewall's Point there appeared the Merrimac and the rebel steamers Yorktown and Patrick Henry. They were stationary—the Merrimac to the right of the others, blowing off steam. Their appearance was the cause for a second alarm. The rebel craft seemed deliberating what to do—whether to move on to attempt the destruction of the Minnesota, which was yet aground, or move on to the Union fleet anchored near the Rip Raps. The appearance of the Merrimac on this second visit caused great precipitation in the removal of our transport fleet to a safe harbor a mile or two up the Chesapeake Bay. At seven A.M. a plan seemed to have been adopted, and the Merrimac steamed in the direction of the Minnesota, which was still aground. The Yorktown and Jamestown were crowded with troops, and steamed slowly after the Merrimac. The plan of the latter seemed to be to destroy the Minnesota, and then proceed to shell out the Union camp at Newport News, and land and take possession of the Union camp with their own troops.

The Merrimac steamed along with boldness until she was within three miles of the Minnesota, when the Monitor essayed from behind the latter, and proceeded toward the Merrimac. At first the rebel craft seemed nonplused, and hesitated, no doubt in wonderment at the queer-looking machine approaching her. The Merrimac then closed the distance between her and the Monitor until they were within a mile of each other. Both batteries stopped. The Merrimac fired a shot at the Minnesota, to which no reply was made. The rebel craft then fired at the Monitor; the latter replied, hitting the Merrimac near the water-line. The Merrimac then commenced firing very rapidly, first from her stern gun at the Monitor, and then her broadside guns, occasionally firing a shot at the Minnesota. The fight went on in this way for an hour or two, both vessels exchanging shots pretty freely. Sometimes the Merrimac would retire followed by the Ericsson, and vice versa.

While the fight between the batteries was going on one hundred solid 9-inch shot were sent up from Fortress Monroe on the steamer Rancocas to the Minnesota. At a quarter past ten o'clock the Merrimac and Monitor had come into pretty close quarters, the former giving the latter two broadsides in succession. It was promptly replied to by the Monitor. The firing was so rapid that both craft were obscured in columns of white smoke for a moment or more. The ramparts of the fort, the rigging of the vessels in port, the houses, and the bend, were all crowded with sailors, soldiers, and civilians. When the rapid firing alluded to took place, these spectators were singularly silent, as if doubtful as to the result. Their impatience was soon removed by the full figure of the Monitor, with the Stars and Stripes flying at her stern, steaming around the Merrimac, moving with the ease of a duck on the water. The distance between the vessels was forty feet. In this circuit the Monitor's guns were not idle, as she fired shot after shot into her antagonist, two of which, it is alleged, penetrated the Merrimac's sides.

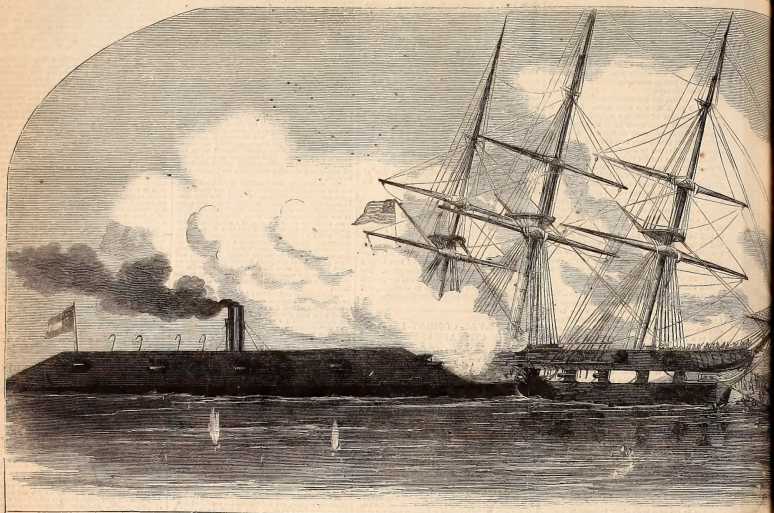
At eleven A.M. the Minnesota opened fire, and assisted the Monitor in engaging the Merrimac. She fired nine-inch solid shot with good accuracy, but with apparently little effect. The Merrimac returned the fire, firing shell, one of which struck and exploded the boiler of the gun-boat Dragon, which was alongside the Minnesota endeavoring to get her off. By this unfortunate affair Jos. M'Donald, sailor, was seriously scalded. For the next hour the battle raged fiercely between the Merrimac on the rebel side and the Union vessels, the Monitor, Minnesota, and Whitehall, but with no particular result. The Minnesota being the best mark for the Merrimac, the latter fired at her frequently, alternately giving the Monitor a shot. The Merrimac made several attempts to run at full speed past the Monitor to attack and run down the Minnesota. All these attempts were parried, as it were, by the Monitor. In one of these attempts by the Merrimac she ran her plow or ram with full force against the side of the Monitor; but it only had the effect of careening the latter vessel in the slightest degree. The rebel boats Yorktown and Patrick Henry kept at a safe distance from the Monitor. The former vessel, at the beginning of the fight, had the temerity to come within respectable range of the Monitor. The latter fired one shot at her, entering her pilot-house, carrying it away, and, no doubt, killing a number of rebels. She retired out of range.

The fight raged hotly on both sides, the opposing batteries moving around each other with the skill, ease, and dexterity of expert pugilists. The Merrimac, though the strongest, did not move with the dexterity of her antagonist; hence the Monitor had the advantage of taking choice of position. At a quarter before twelve o'clock, noon, Lieutenant Hepburn, the signal-officer on the ramparts at Fortress Monroe, reported to General Wool that the Monitor had pierced the sides of the Merrimac, and in a few minutes the latter was in full retreat, heading for Sewall's Point, and chased for a few minutes by the Monitor. The Merrimac had evidently suffered to some extent, and it was thought at one time that she was sinking. After she got safely under the guns of the rebel battery at Sewall's Point, she stopped and signaled for help from her consorts, who were beating a retreat. Subsequently two tug-boats, or gun-boats, went alongside and took her in tow, and proceeded to Norfolk. This ended the engagement.

BRUNSWICK AND FERNANDINA.

We publish on this page and on page 186 charts of the harbors of Brunswick, Georgia, and Fernandina, Florida, which have just been seized by our forces under Commodore Dupont. We take the following descriptions from the Herald:

Brunswick is a port of entry, and is also the capital of Glynn County, Georgia. It is situated on the Turtle River, at a distance of eighty miles to the southwest of Savannah. The place itself is pleasantly situated on a sandy bluff, about ten feet above high-water mark, and the harbor in the neighborhood is both spacious and secure; the soundings give a depth of water to the port varying from three to eight fathoms, so that any vessel drawing not over fourteen feet of water can enter the harbor at almost any time. Over the bar there are fourteen feet of water at low tide. The spring tides rise eight and a half feet, and neap tides six feet. High water, at the full and change, at half past seven. St. Simon's light is on the south point of St. Simon's Island. This light, previous to the rebellion, was a fixed light, and stood eighty feet above the sea. Brunswick is the eastern terminus of the Brunswick and Florida Railroad. The shipping of the district, on the 30th of June, 1852, was 306 tons registered, and 853 tons enrolled and licensed. During that year there were three foreign arrivals, and six vessels cleared for foreign ports. Of course the smallness of the number arose from the close proximity to the harbor of Savannah.

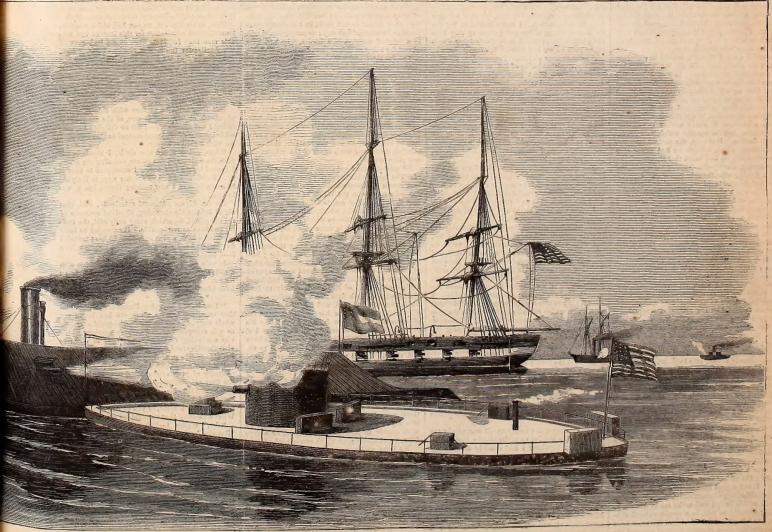


Fernandina is a small village of Nassau County, Florida, and is situated on the northern part of Amelia Island. It is located at a distance of one hundred and eight-five miles east by north of Tallahassee, the capital of the State. It is said to be the best harbor south of Chesapeake Bay. Vessels can anchor in the harbor in forty feet of water, sheltered from all winds.

The Florida Railroad runs to Jacksonville, where the Atlantic and Gulf Central Railroad joins it, and which runs seventy-eight miles in a westerly direction, via Lake City, to Houston. Lake City is sixty miles from Jacksonville, and about double that distance from Fernandina. At Houston the road is connected with the Pensacola and Georgia railroad, which extends the line sixty miles farther to Tallahassee. It then takes a southerly direction to the sea-coast at St. Marks, a farther distance of twenty-two miles.

BRUNSWICK, GEORGIA, NOW OCCUPIED BY THE UNION FORCES.

THE REBEL STEAMER "MERRIMAC" RUNNING DOW



THE ERICSSON BATTERY "MONITOR" DRIV

E FRIGATE "CUMBERLAND" OFF NEWPORT NEWS.

G OFF THE "MERRIMAC."—[See Page 183.]

FERNANDINA, FLORIDA, JUST OCCUPIED BY THE UNION FORCES.

A DREADFUL GHOST.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

"SUCH a dreadful ghost!—oh, such a dreadful ghost!"

My wife, who was luckily sitting by me, was at first as much frightened as I was, but gradually she succeeded in quieting both me and herself, which indeed she has a wonderful faculty for doing.

When she had drawn from me the cause of my terrified exclamations, we discussed the whole matter—in which we differed considerably; and on this subject we invariably and affectionately do so. She is a perfectly matter-in-fact, unimaginative, and unsuperstitious individual: quite satisfied that in the invisible, as in the visible world, two and two must make four, and can not by any possibility make five. Only being, with all her gentleness, a little pig-headed, she does not see that there are in her otherwise very sensible argument, namely, the taking for granted that we finite creatures, who are so liable to error even in material things, can in things immaterial decide absolutely upon what is two and what is four.

There lives more faith in honest doubt,
Believe me, than in half your creeds.

And it is just possible that when the Devil tempted our forefather to eat of the tree of knowledge, he was laughing at him as he often laughs now, to think what a self-conceited fool a man must be ever to suppose that he can know every thing.

When I preach this to my husband he is the humblest and sweetest of women—she replies, is perhaps the most wise; and I am ready to go to argument, with a smile; as she did, when, having talked over and viewed on all sides my Dreadful Ghost, she advised me to make it quite for the good of the community: in which we agreed, though differing. She wondered it would grieve me greatly if silly it is to believe in ghosts at all. I considered—but my story will explain this.

She and I, two only, thinned, invited to a strange house, with which, and with the family, we were only acquainted by hearsay. Not that I, for one, of those "invitations on business," such as literary persons like myself continually get; and which give little pleasure, as we are perfectly aware from what motives they spring; and that if we could push on our reputation in a permanence, and our head in a hat-box, it would answer exactly the same purpose, and be equally satisfactory to the inviting person. However, the present case was an exception; since, though we had never seen our entertainers, we had heard that they were, not a show-loving, literary-lion-hunting household, but really a family, affectionately united among themselves, and devoted to the memory of the lately-lost head. He was a physician, widely esteemed, and also a man of letters, whose death had created a great blank, both in his own circle and in the literary world at large. Now, after a year's interval, his widow and three daughters were beginning to reappear in society; and at the British Association meeting, held at Aberdeen, to which I need not particularize, had opened the doors of their long-hospitable house to my wife and me.

Being strangers, we thought it right to arrive as I would advise all stranger-guests to do, at the tail-end of the day; when candle-light and fire-light cast a kindly mystery over all things, and the few brief hours of awkwardness and unfamiliarity are followed by the nocturnal separation, when each party has time to think over and talk over the other—meeting next morning with the kindly feeling of those who have passed a night under the same friendly roof.

As my wife and I stepped from our cab the dull day was already closing into twilight, and the first only half-illumined the room into which we were shown. It was an old-fashioned, quiet, grown-up apartment—half study, half sitting-room; one end being fitted as a library, while at the other were pleasant thoughtfulness, which already warmed our hearts toward our unseen hosts!—was spread out that best of all meals for a weary traveler, tea-dinner. So hungry were we, that this welcome, well-supplied board engrossed us for a time; why we noticed about the room, except one other thing, which hung close above the tea-table, on the paneled wall.

It was a large full-length portrait, very well painted; the sort of portrait of which one says at once, "What a good likeness that must be!" It had individuality, character—the soul of the man as well as his body; and as far as it is right, looking directly at you, in a simple, natural attitude, you felt what a beautiful kind man must have been: one that even at sixty years of age—for the portrait seemed thus old—would have shed a brightness over any household, and over any society where the person moved.

"I suppose that must be the poor Doctor," said my wife, in her eyes and mine both met upon the canvas, the kindly gloom veiled in the fire-light with the most lifelike aspect, the gentle, benevolent face of the man seeming to follow one about, to every room, as the eyes of most well-painted full-face portraits do. "You never saw him, Charles?"

"No; but this is evidently a picture of man he must have been."

Without our conviction on the matter was so strong that when the door in we abstained from asking the question, lest we strangers might touch painfully on a sacredly-kept sorrow.

She was a very sweet-looking little woman: pale, fragile, and rather silent than otherwise; but merely performed the duties of the tea-table, while the conversation was carried on with spirit and intelligence by her three daughters—evidently highly accomplished women. They were no longer young girls, particularly handsome, but in every feature to have inherited the inexpressible charm of manner which, I had heard, characterized their late father; and they had, by wide traveling and a still greater attraction in her eyes—(she had, dear soul, two little daughters of her own growing up)—which was the exceeding deference they paid to their mother, who was not by any means the head of the house.

Perhaps I, who had not married a woman for her fortune, obtained the most correct view of the Doctor's widow, with her large, soft, sorrowful eyes, where the tears seemed to have dried up, or been frozen up by a ghastly quietude, and with the best evidence of what an excellent man he must have been: how deeply beloved, how sternly mourned.

She never spoke of her husband, nor the daughters of their father. This silence—common in many families consider it almost a religious duty to preserve regarding their dead—we, of course, as complete strangers, had not noticed; but I noticed, therefore, it happened that we were still in the dark as to the cause of the terrified exclamation—to which minute by minute took a stronger hold on my imagination; my wife's, too—or that quality of universal tolerance, which is the highest moral duty for imagination. I never looked at her but she was watching either our hostess or the portrait; and, when she supposed to be the features which to the poor widow had been so deservedly dear.

A most strange picture. It was not by any wonderfully true simulation of life, to sit, almost like an unobserved guest, among the social meals and conversational table. Many times during the evening I started, as if with the sense of a seventh person in the room—the very room where he had been—hearing every thing, observing every thing, but saying nothing. Nor was I alone in this feeling, for I noticed that my wife, when looking up, was directly opposite to the portrait, fidgeted in her chair, and finally moved her position to one where she could escape from those steady, kindly, overpowering, painted eyes.

Now I ask nobody to believe what I am going to relate: I must distinctly state that I do not believe it myself; but I tell it because it is a matter of fact and moral, which the reader can apply if he chooses. All I can say is, that so far as it purports to go—and when you come to the end you will find that out—this is really a true story.

The family party broke upward, sat excepting before the portrait, till she changed places with me, and went a little way down the oblong table, on the same side as myself, so that I could see her and the other a slightly foreshortened view. Between me and it was a candle, the only one which stood on a lamp—one of those reading-lamps which throw a bright circle of light below them, and leave the upper half of the room in comparative gloom. I thought it was this shadow, or some fanciful flicker of the fire, which caused a peculiarity in the eyes of the portrait. They seemed actually alive—moving from right to left in their orbits, opening and closing their lids, and, as I said, to take in every one of the family circle with a variable expression, as if conscious of all that was going on around.

And yet the family took no notice, but went on in their talk with us: choosing the common topics which, between persons new to them, lead on one another's minds and characters: yet never once reverting to this peculiar phenomenon—which my wife, I saw, had also observed, and longed to speak with me more than one uneasy glance in the pauses of conversation.

The evening was wearing on—it was nearly ten o'clock—when, looking up at the picture, from which for the last half-hour I had scarcely taken my gaze, I was startled by a still more marvelous fact concerning it.

Formerly the eyes alone had appeared alive: now the whole face was rounded. It grew up out of the flat canvas as if in bas-relief, or like one of those terribly painful casts after death—except that there was nothing painful or terrible about it. As I have said, the face was a beautiful face—a noble face: such an one as, under any circumstances, you would have been attracted by. And it had the coloring and form of life—no corpse-like rigidity or marble whiteness. The gray hair seemed gradually to rise, look by look, out of the level surface—and the figure, clothed in ordinary modern evening-dress, to become shapely and natural—statuesque, yet still preserving the tints of a picture. Even the chair which it sat upon—which I now perceived to be the exact copy of one that stood empty on the other side of the fire—grew a curious reality to the whole.

By-and-by my wife and I both held our breaths for—from an ordinary oil-painting, the likeness had undoubtedly become a lifelike figure, or statue, sitting in an arm-chair, the form of which was made by the frame of the picture.

And yet the family took no notice, but appeared to be conscious that they were conscious of the remarkable thing that was happening, it did not disturb them in the least: was nothing at all alarming or peculiar, or out of the tenor of their daily life.

So, not even when, on returning with a book that I had gone to fetch from the shelves at the further end of the room, my poor little wife caught my hand in speechless awe—are rather than fear—and pointed to the hitherto empty chair by the fireside.

It was empty no longer. There, sitting in the self-same attitude as the portrait—identical with it in shape, countenance, and dress—was a figure. That it was a human figure I dare not say, and yet it looked like one. There was nothing ghastly or corpse-like about it, though it was motionless, pas sionless: endowed as it were with that divine calm which I have always ascribed to Protesilaus:

Elysian beauty, melancholy grace,
Brought from a pensive though a happy place.

Yet there was an air tenderly, pathetically human in the fixed head, the hands on the knees, as a man does when he comes and sits down by his own fireside. The whole attitude, and in the eyes that followed, one after the other, each of this family, who now quietly put away their several occupations, was full of welcome.

But none of them showed any terror—not the slightest. Perhaps the sweetness of the smile invariably quite familiar—awaking no shudder of repulsion, no outburst of renewed grief. The eldest daughter, who had been at the moment as if she were only apologizing to us heterodox or indifferent strangers for some domestic essential, some peculiar form of family prayer, for instance,

"I am sure our guests will excuse us if we continue, just as if we were alone, our usual evening duties. Which of us is to speak to papa to-night?"

It was his then: summoned back, how or why, or in what mysterious manner we experienced, I know not, and they gave no explanation. They evidently brought some one, invoked; that the whole succeeding was as natural as a man coming home at evening to his own hearth, and being received by his wife and children with affectionate gladness.

The widow and the youngest daughter placed themselves on each side of the arm-chair in the chair. They did not embrace it or touch it, but regarded it with tender reverence, in which was mingled a certain awe; but that was all. The children they began to talk to it, in a perfectly common and natural manner, as people would talk to a beloved member of a family, who had been absent for a day or longer from the home circle.

The daughter to whom she had been reading in town: how she had bought a shawl and a bonnet for her mother, but papa need to like;" the books she had brought home from the library; papa's opinion of them; the people she had met in the street, and the things she had seen and heard in the day: in short, all the pleasant little chit-chat that a daughter would naturally pour out to an affectionate parent, interspersed with those questions which, to us unnatural, so contemptibly small, such a mixture of the human and the heroic, the divine and common sense, and one's sense of the solemn unseen alike recluded.

Gradually it became: apparently none was expected. The figure maintained its place, never altering its attitude, but preserving one of the many things Samuel's rebuke to the Witch of Endor—"Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up?" or of Hamlet's reproach to his father's ghost, "Why wilt thou look upon this fair thing which so shivered at the eyes of the figure moved and rested on us?) the look of various old letters of his, which vividly revived the happy married days; how Saturday one of the former patients died, and to-day a professor-ship, which he meant to have tried for, had been given to a gentleman of favorite pupils. All the old friends, Mr. A——— and Sir B. C——— had been quarrelled, and were again; and it would never have happened had the Doctor been alive—and so on, and so on. To all of which the figure listened with its immovable, its settled, changeless countenance.

My wife and I uttered not a word. We sat apart, spell-bound, fascinated, neither attempting to interfere, nor question, nor rebuke. The whole circumstance was so far removed from the pale of mortal cause and effect that it seemed to throw us into a perfect passive condition, in which we were unable to judge, or investigate, in which we felt, the circumstances which surrounded us.

The figure was—absolutely nothing except the very little that Revelation hints at, rather than directly teaches, of the world beyond the grave. But any one of us who has ever seen a fellow-creature die, has watched the exact instant when the awful change takes place which converts the body with a soul to the corpse without a soul, must feel certain—certain by an intuition which is stronger than all reasoning—that if the soul is good, to which that soul departs, by any thing, or any where, it must be a very different life from this; with nobler aspirations, higher duties, purer affections. The common phrase breathed over so many a peaceful dead face, "I would not have him back again if I could," has a significance, instructive as true; truer than all misty, philosophical speculations, tenderer than all the vagaries of fond spiritualists, with big hearts and no heads worth mentioning. If ever I had doubted this, my doubts would have been removed by sight which I here depict—of this good, amiable, deeply-beloved husband and father—returning in visible form to his wife and his family, so ghastly, but an apparition full of mildness and beauty, yet communicating a sense of nothing unnatural, utterly unsanctity, and ridiculous, degrading contrast between mortal and immortal, spirit in the flesh, and spirit out of the flesh, which even I can attempt to describe.

That the dead man's family did not feel this, having become so familiar with their nightly nocturnal that its gentleness never struck them, and its influence profanity never jarred upon their intellect or affections, only made the fact more horrible.

For a time, long or short I can not tell, my wife and I sat witnessing, like people bound in a nightmare dream, this most mockery of mockeries, the attempt at restoring the sweet familiar relations of the living with the living, between the living and the dead. How many years or months it had lasted, or what result was expected from it, we never inquired; nor did we attempt to join in it: we merely looked on.

"Will papa ever speak?" intreated one of the daughters; but there was no reply. The figure sat passive in its chair—unable or unwilling to break the barrier which divides the two worlds, maintaining still that benign and tender smile, but keeping its mystery unbroken, its problem unsolved.

And now my wife, whose dear little face was, I am sure, growing white and convulsed minute by minute, whispered to me:

"Charles, I can bear this no longer. Make some excuse to get us home—we will keep their feelings. Don't let them think we are frightened, or disgusted, as I'm like; but we must go—I shall go mad if I do not."

And the half-insane look which I have seen in some than one of the poorest creatures in the present day—people who, twenty years ago, would have been sent to Bedlam, but now are only set down "imbecile" or "nervous," and left among their sensible syes, which have warmed and calmed my restless heart and unquiet brain for more than fifteen years.

I took advantage of the next pause in the "communication," which whatever they called them, to suggest that my wife and I were very weary, and anxious to retire to rest.

"Certainly," politely said the eldest daughter. "Papa, Mr. and Mrs. ———" naming our names, "have had a long railway journey, and must be up us all good-night."

The appointed best upon us—my wife and us—its most benevolent, gentle aspect, apparently acquiescing in our retiring; and slowly rose as if in kind good-night. Like any other guest-host.

Now, in his lifetime, no one had had a warmer, more devoted admiration for this learned and lovable man than I. More than once I had traveled many miles for the merest chance of seeing him, and when he had by myriad people's request known him personally, never having even beheld his face, was mingled with the grief which I, in common with all his countrymen, felt at losing from us suddenly, with his fame at its zenith, his labors approximately still unfinished.

But here, set face to face with this image or phantasm, or whatever it was, of the man whom during I had so loved—I felt no fear. Only, the cold clearness of that gaze seemed to shoot through me with a chill of horror.

When, going round the circle, I shook hands with the widow and daughters, one after the other, I passed before the chair: I could not help it: by. Resolutely I looked another way, as if trying to make believe I saw nothing there; but it was in vain.

For the figure advanced noiselessly, with that air of irresistibly-charming, old-world courtesy of the old school, for which, every body said, the Doctor had been so remarkable. It extended its hand to me—a hand which a year ago, I myself had received two hundred miles to grasp. Now I shrank from it. I loathed it.

In vain. It came nearer. It touched mine with a soft, cold, unearthly touch. I could endure no longer. I exclaimed out; and my wife was from me from what was, thank Heaven, only a dream.

Was it?

"Yes, it was indeed a Dreadful Ghost," said that excellent woman, when she had heard my whole story, and we had spent several miserable as sole occupants of the railway carriage which was carrying us through the dead of night to visit that identical family whom I had been dreaming about—whom, as stated, we had never seen.

"Let us be thankful," she said, "that it was a mere phantasy of your over-excited imagination—that the dear old Doctor sleeps peacefully in his quiet grave; and that his affectionate family have never summoned him, soul or body, to sit of nights by their unsuspecting friends, as your morbid fancy did. What a blessing that such things can not be!"

"Ay," replied I—though, as Imlac says in Rasselas, "Those that doubt can do little"—"I only have been in the body, I must be a still greater fool than I am of it."

"And, Charles," said the little woman, creeping up to me with tears in her eyes, "if I must lose you—dearer as I have you—I would rather bury you under the disicles and in my heart; bury you, and never see you again till we meet in the world to come, than I would have you revisiting your old fireside after the fashion of this Dreadful Ghost."

MOTHER, CAN I GO?

A CONNECTICUT lad, employed in this city, wrote home for his mother's permission to enlist. He is now with the Connecticut Regiment:

I am writing to you, mother, knowing well what you will say;
But I'm filled with tearful fondness all I write to you to-day.
Knowing well the flame of ardor on a loyal mother's part,
That will battle with each impulse, with each throbbing of your heart.

Here's my country calling for her sons that still are free;
I have loved that country, mother, only next to God and you;
And my soul is springing forward to resist her bitter foe:
Can I go, my dearest mother? tell me, mother, can I go?

From the battered walls of Sumter, from the wild waves of the sea,
I have heard her cry for succor, as the voice of God to me;
Is prosperity? I know it well here—in her days of dark distress,
When your spirit is an traitor, mother, could I love that country less?

Here I pierced her heart with treason, they have pierced mine since I left her;
I have loved that country, mother, only next to God and you;
And my soul is springing forward to resist her bitter foe:
Can I go, my dearest mother? tell me, mother, can I go?

Here's a country worthy of her standard, and she calls me in her woe:
Can I go, my dearest mother? tell me, mother, can I go?

Oh young and slender, mother—they would call me such yet a boy,
But I love the land I live in, and the blessings I enjoy;
I am old enough, my mother, to be loyal, proud, and true
To the faithful name of liberty, and to the starry blue;
I am most computer this restriction! let the doubting heart be still:
I am most computer it, or perish. We must conquer, and we will!
Are the faithful most and bitter, and shall I be counted by?
Let me go, my dearest mother! tell me, mother, can I go?

In who let the chosen people, in their effort to be free
From the tyranny of Egypt, will be merciful to me.
Will protect me by His power when the battle-storm shall rattle?
Will return me home in safety, dearest mother, for your sake,
Or should this my bleeding country need a victim such as I,
I am nothing more than others who have perished to be free.
Can he bosom let me slumber, on her altar let me lie;
I am not afraid, my mother, to be counted by; then let me go!

There will come a day of gladness, when the people of the Lord
Shall look proudly on their banner, which His mercy has restored;
Then the stars in perfect number, on their azure field to blend,
Will be hailed in a Union, then and ever firm and true.
I may live to see it, mother, when the patriot's work is done,
And your heart, so full of kindness, will beat proudly for your son;
Or through tears your eyes may see it with a sadly thoughtful look,
And may love it still more dearly for the cost it won from you.

I have written to you, mother, with a consciousness of right—
I am thinking of you fondly, with a loyal heart to-night:
When I have your noble bidding, which shall tell me to press on,
I will rouse and see you, mother—come and kiss you, then be gone.
In the sacred cause of freedom! I have written this to you:
In the sight of God and Justice, I have written this to you:
In anger, anxious, longing to resist my country's foe:
Shall I go, my dearest mother? tell me, mother, shall I go?

February, 1862.

IN A WATER STREET DANCE-HOUSE.

WELL, I never thought they'd done it, Sir, and I say it was a ——— shame! There's a many big lugs and cribs, respectable like, down in the New York—folks as keep their own kerridges and have pews at fash'nable churches, and go to watering-places, and spend their money free as air —why, they'd ha' raised a million o' dollars to ha' saved the Captain—one million, Sir! Why, I've spent your life they would! And yet he one hung arter all!

Do I think the slave-trade right, then? Well no; not exactly. It's a bad business—most on it not to bear a purse—but then they've got reasons for it, white man's a white man, and a nigger's a nigger, there's no gettin' over that. You ain't no abolitionist, are you, Sir? I never knowed one as had any sense.

To see a seaman's life is the hardest out; Jack gets monkey's allowance, more kicks than ha'pence, all the world over. And it pays better than any thing else, Sir, that trade. I've sailed in many lines and you've done first-rate for owners, shipper, and crew, and nary expense but fittin' outward bym by in run ashore as truck for the provisions. So it's a great temptation. I never knowed a Merican as liked it exactly, but I've known it many as has ben in it. Spaniards mostly thinks nothin' on it; them fellers has no sort o' conscience or humanity.

Maybe I've seen a little of it myself? That's tellin' me! Perhaps I have and perhaps I don't. How you don't catch this child goin' back on himself, no how! You only inquired out o' curiosity? Well, I suppose so. I guess you don't get a many gallant comes to such' places as this, except on a spree to see the ward. Not much of a show here to-night, unless is bad for the landlords. You should go to the "Flag" some evenin' when a hull crew's ben paid off—see 'em raise ——— there sometimes.

Well, I don't mind! your health, Sir. I've drunk worse and seen worse, and better. I write stories for the magazines and newspapers? I guess I could tell you a thing or two as you might work up into somethin'—about what was a talkin' on, too. Why won't I? Well, most folks is pretty shy of owning up to knowing such as me in Ebony Trade, though I don't see how it could hurt a poor devil of a common sailor like me, as nobody expects to have any kind of a character or keer for one. We lives hard, works hard, and dies hard, and can't be expected to be very perticular. I don't want to blame for what I done either. So here goes. Put up that pencil; I don't like the notion of having a man's words took down; the kinder knocks me. I guess you'll remember well enough.

Also I don't mind telling you as I've a recklect time good—when I came ashore arter a two-year whalin' cruise in the Pacific Ocean, and, like a fool, went to live with my mother, as had a respectable rent that I had in the world. It ended in my getting shanghaied and sold into a slaver. What shanghaiing? Why, Lord love you! don't you know that? and you writes for the newspapers! It's me arter I'd ben—well, I was all sorts—a-drunk and with laudanum. The landlord drawn his first month's pay for me, and put me into a train-an-hand aboard, and the first thing poor Jack knows about it is when he's roused by the mate or skipper with some kicks, and finds as he's on board, aloose or hit over the head with a ring-bolt, or any thing as shall answer best, and a-sailing out to sea again about, Sir—in this yere port of New York, too—that they've jumped overboard—live or six o' 'em, one arter t'other—when we was a-lookin' out for a pilot.

That's often the meanin' of bodies bein' found about the piers, as you reads on in the newspapers.

However, I was one as stuck to the ship, and, to, mainly, were half a dozen others as had had the same luck, and we was all o' us mates and, others turned to and made the best of it, all of us being pretty much cleaned out and obliged to ship somewhere. We was a rare mixed crew, though strong: Yankees, Irish, English, Dutch, Spaniards, and one Indian—a Portugee, and the cries and groans and Irish than any thing else. Things looked uncommon ship-shape aboard, and we were told we was bound in the Mediterranean for Smyrna, or Palermo.

Our ship was just as pretty a clipper-built one as was ever turned out of a New York dock-yard; most new, I guess, and in first-rate order, from the time that we was hauled out into the stream, with one of them inforest, high, spear-looking jerry topmasts—and a full suit of sails—and stores fore and aft on the mizen, bark fashion, you know. She could spank along under a ten-knot breeze with most any thing afloat, Sir. Her captain, he never mind about him!—he was a 'Merican and a good seaman, and a man as knowed his business. Yes.

Our real business soon got whispered about before the mast; as for me I suspicioned it from the first, from the many warnin's we had about the three tons of rice and physic aboard. The mates, too—both on 'em New Orleans, and one, the second mate, most piratical-looking villain enbuag, I do believe, laughed and talked kinder curious-like with some of the hands—and they was all hands—about any thing as was. So, when the Captain had us all forred on the third day out, and made a bit of a speech, telling us that we was bound for Africa—not a dollar a head on every nigger landed safe in Cuba—much—it has as it never was before, and I'll tell you as any. Some liked the notion of makin' a big pile easy—some didn't care—and all concluded to go—"specials" as they called 'em, to get over it.

We made a fetch run to the African coast, nearly down to the line, and then we split among ourselves, though there was a knife or two drawn, and the first mate turned out a devil incarnate. He was a weed of a man, but he'd a heart as black as blow first often. He'd hit a man for any thing—knock him down, I mean—and he'd many well. I guess I can put my pretty free when I'm mad, and I've sailed under them as could cuss some, but what feller head at, Sir, for a bit, and then, and his French, and his furrin' English, and the niggerlasher he'd learnt in the Brazils, and his own bad hair of your head right on end in no time; it 'most made your flesh creep to hear him. If that——— feller had had his head cut off, it would ha' ben a fair fit for us; but the Cap'n was different, and we thought better of him. You'll see what he done though before I come to the end of the story.

He was a good seaman, I said, and worked the ship handsome. We was off the coast of the Congo River, the best place to get what we wanted, for the niggers inland there are allus at war with the another—they do say on purpose to get prisoners to sell to the traders. They has barracoons as we covered right down to the beach, where mighty quick up country for 'em to tote along the coffles when the right kind o' vessel comes up the river. It's big and broad and deep enough, and most like fair weather in that latitude; so one can go up a good ways. There's a many islands in the river as the Captain had bargained for a full cargo of prime hands—a thousand men, women, and children. He told her in plain words what he meant to do with 'em.

The gentle o' 'em aboard and stowed em between decks—two tiers, one above the other, a platform between 'em—was done in double-quick time arter they had been passed as sound and likely and trunkfast. It didn't take long, Sir, for the ship to be ready as they came over the side, and he'd just have 'em along like so many sheep—some ripped off their o' rag some on 'em wore around their middles and heavin' 'em overboard. The night arter them were a-got aboard the ship was under way and all consarned, "specials" white men, good as drunk as so many devils. All bein' ready we up anchor and away for Cuba.

Our Captain had laid his plans smart, and knew the ropes well enough on the coast. It's the custom for ships of the squadron—the African squadron I mean, which is allus on the look-out for slavers—to take each a port and kinder blockade it, mevin' on from one to another at regular dates, accordin' to the orders of the Commodore on the station. We'd slipped in safe enough, knowin' our time, and had got aboard the right day of the week. We done it too, though we run a right smart chance of being nabbed by a blamed Yankee ship, per, as you'll bear more on in good time. I'll tell you how that happened, as I learnt it arterward about their movements.

He was the only Northern captain on the station, and the others—all Southerners—had sorter leant him to Coventry for a snub as really meant business, and wouldn't make things pleasant for a consideration. (They have a fellow-feeling, you know, for they owns niggers themselves when they're to home, and buys and sells 'em too.) So he got mad and determined to play possum. He had rendezvoused away from the Congo River to a station farther north to meet the provision vessel, as per our Captain knew well enough—I ain't going to say who told him. Then he pretends to damage his machinery (as he for three days, and then comes right back expectin' to fetch us, and making for the river.

We knew nothin' of all this, then; but as luck would have it, we seen the smoke of his funnel at long break, when we was well under way with a fair wind astern. Our Captain always kept the cupboard of arms locked, and the key in his own pocket when at sea, so the crowds all sail and given the stranger a wide berth. She followed, I believe, but we knowed that a many pair of heels that time, and by night bells we'd lost all sight of her. So there was no sort of danger for the present. We would ha' ben better, arter all, if we had ha' ben captured by her then and there, as you'll soon hear.

Of course the steam-ship was all in a stew as soon as we got out into blue water, and a dreadful moanin' and groanin' arose from the many ignorant savages made. You could hear it right through the main deck and up in the shrouds, even when a lawyer was a-talkin' and above the racket of the wind. We'd fixed 'em in the regular way, stark naked, in a sitting position, jammed into one another's laps as they could hardly move any thing but their heads, for with such a crowd there warn't no inch of room anywhere, and the cries and groans and smell was horrid. When I turned in that night, I was pretty well used up, what with bein' on my arm and the streak o' lightning and a growl o' thunder to the sou'west—if I didn't dream I was in hell among the devils—I almost joined the Dutchman!

It blew hard all the next day, and the next to that, so we couldn't tend to 'em much, or have any of 'em up on deck. Once the sea broke over us, and we had to battle down the hatches. You may fancy what it was like 'tween decks then! What with the gale had overblown itself and we were below somebody's feet in a jiffy, and one man turned sick and fainted dead away with the smell—there was forty odd crammed in a space not much more'n a Dutchman!

It blew hard all the next day, and the next to that, so we couldn't tend to 'em much, or have any of 'em up on deck. Once the sea broke over us, and we had to battle down the hatches. You may fancy what it was like 'tween decks then! What with the gale had overblown itself and we were below somebody's feet in a jiffy, and one man turned sick and fainted dead away with the smell—there was forty odd crammed in a space not much more'n a Dutchman! The bad air, the rollin' and crowdin', and chokin' and smotherin', and want of water, had killed 'em. They was awful creatures and children.

The Captain cured some at the loss, which, however, made a good deal more room for the rest of the mis'able devils. We hauled 'em on deck in squads —some on 'em was so cramped and stiff they couldn't stand—some on 'em, and, and 'em in the sun to dry, and served 'em out an allowance of water—a pint a piece, I think—but we should ha' seen them niggers drink! the eattin was bad enough, bollin' the grub like starvin' wolves, but the drinkin' was awful. They actually fit and struggled over the first inchetaful so that every drop of the water was spilled, and then lapped it up off the deck like dogs! If the mafics hadn't used handspikes pretty free we couldn't ha' got 'em to behave themselves.

Well, we did what we could for 'em in cleanin' and physickin', and managed to deliver again. Always and always the trip was had up, by turns, on deck and never put in irons except when mutinous. The decks was washed out once, and, sprinkled with somethin' o' lime—I misremember the name—to prevent sickness. It answered, and the 'tween decks generally thinks as slavers hasn't got any humanity. If it's warn't again the law that they say's vouchin' for, I'd be crowned up, by Jickie! so many; that's what makes it unpleasant.

There was one thing, however—and I'm free to confess it—as I couldn't stand. To see the bigger and stronger ones got to fightin' and struggling for more room, as we thought, a-sittin' jammed up in a heap like that. In consequence the weaker crowd, the women and picaninnies, suffered. So we made 'em take turns, and then some fetched a case of tacks—little nails, you know—and sprinkles 'em across among the boards. The more they was used arter that the more the tacks run into their sore bodies, and though it hurt bad it didn't keep 'em from fightin'. So the mild hand aboard told me this was the regular thing before it was thought they got used to it and warn't particular hard.

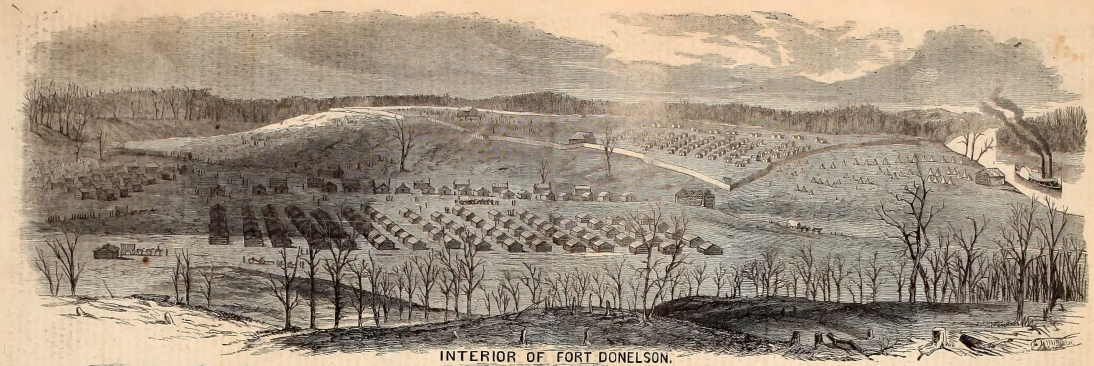
Was you ever at sea, Sir? Because, if so, you'll know that if there's one thing a sailor hates it's worse than a cockroach is a rat. It's more than a storm by a long sight. To have the sails a flapping, the yards a-creakin', every thin' comfortable a-rockin' and wearin' itself and no rottin'—the blue water all around as smooth as a pond—and then to have a nigger—why, it's enough to set a saint swearin' at his grandmother! Well, just suppose you've got a lot of 'em aboard, and a pitch-hot overhead, and us with nigh a thousand niggers on board!

I tell you it was awful; hardly a breath of air stirring on deck, and just like the black hole of Calcutta below. The sun blazed, the pitch-heads blazed, and bribed, and moaned, and yelled by turns and altogether, as if they'd known of the sharks as were a-swimmin' alongside a-waitin' for 'em. They say the dumed varmints will nose out a fever and follow a ship for days. I don't know about that, and I believe it, for, sartain, two stuck pretty close to us from the third day out. They weren't mistaken either. A fever broke out among the niggers, and they began to die off like rotten sheep; we had to throw nigh two hundred overboard in three days. That, with the ones as had gone before, made a loss of a fourth of the cargo, and a awful dipper in an ugly temper. One of the hands took the fever and died, too, spite of the Captain's doctorin'. I was by his hook when he shipped his wind, and I wouldn't like to tell what he said about the slave-trade then—it warn't comfortable, I can tell you, to lead a life of that. We all began to think luck was agin us in that voyage, and so it proved. The only man as didn't seem to care was the first mate; he feared neither God or devil. He cursed and swore ten times worse than ever, and knocked the niggers around just as if it was their fault, poor devils! for havin' the fever and dyin'.

We were seven days out, standing to the sou'west with all sails set, a fulrish wind and hazy weather, when we espied a vessel under the lee, nearer than our Captain liked. At first we thought little of it, supposin' her to be bound for the West Indies, for the chance of any thing else seldom troubles you when you've got clear of the coast of Cuba or a hundred miles or so; you have to look out for then is inquisitive Yankee captains; you can laugh at the Britishers by hoisting the Merican flag and hailin' 'em high! in the French yes, though they does it sometimes—their inspectors is first promoters, and has fuller cause for't, and seems to be followin' of us. Soon there's no doubt about it, and the Captain makes her out to be a steamer with two stars and stripes flyin'. So she tries to get off by virtues of wind and canvas, and there's a proper lark as ever you had with us one for over two hours. Slavers don't fight, you know; they allus runs, and is afeard of nothin' but steamers.

Of course there was other ones as made out we should have gi'n in, on'y the haze thickened a bit and we began to see we might double on her. She stood of that it cleared up some and the wind began to slacken; so the Captain, arter consultin' with the first mate, resolved to fight it through. About fifty of the niggers was fetched on deck, by twos and threes at a time, and was handed up the arter us, stayin' for nothin', so the Captain determined to drown every nigger on board, that they might not be recaptured by us.

He had cut our heaviest chain-cable, fed a hundred-and-odd shot to it, and was in the act to commit it I shall never forget that, Sir. Some cried and jabbered in their gibberish for mercy, some howled, some cursed, some stupefied with fear, but what was goin' to be done to 'em, and some fought with fists and teeth, and died fightin'. The first mate he warn't sorry to see it—nearly had his thumb bit off by one of 'em. When they went over the side they was all alive as swallies—leastways we ever heard tell on in all your born days—a sort of dreadful yell as went right through your head and left it a-singin' for a week after horrid—horrid; I seen men turn white as death when they heard it. The splash of the last nigger plump down to bottom, a great streak of bubbles rising up arter them.



The Captain would have never ha' ben rest the same arter that, for he was had enough of it and stood right stark-still—almost muttering in spite of his self-control—when the lookout sung out from aloft on 'em would have come to mischief if they'd touched any body. We knew that the game was up then, and that the jig was for the present over was a-goin' on as fast. In less than twenty minutes she was a-going across our stern firing on to, and sent a boat alongside to take possession of us as a prize. And then—what do you think? if you'll believe me, Sir, she warn't a Yankee after all—as we'd given the go-by to off the Congo River, I'm—! at luck would have it, for they done us up as nice as nicked. Hardly a hundred o' 'em lived to see Africa again; and I learnt in after days they had sores all over their bodies, and died off like rotten sheep.

We was headed for New York, and pretty well treated, for the Yankee sailors we had aboard, without any particular knowledge of the craft, or ben put aboard in the way I tolled you of at the beginnin', was willin' enough to work the ship, and many on two in prison, others not; and they was right, for they knowed that they'd be cleared out by the 'cept landin' as without a red cent of pay. The Captain and mates warn't afraid, bless you! they had plenty of friends, and we warn't them under a ——— Black Republican Government. And so it happened. They was tried once or twice and let off, and I see the Captain, with my own eyes, six months arter, ridin' up Broadway in a carriage, with a couple of ladies lolling just as you please.

You'd like to know who he was, Sir? Dare say! Well, I'll tell you—I was just about his size of the Tombs last Friday.

THE REBEL BATTERIES ON THE POTOMAC.

On page 180 we publish a series of views, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. A. R. Ward, illustrating the REBEL BATTERIES ON THE POTOMAC: which have just been taken by our troops. For several months the Potomac has been blockaded by these batteries, and they have annoyed vessels going up to Washington very seriously. On 9th the rebels began to fire their tents at Cockpit Point; they burned the Page, and retired. At the same time the batteries were down the river at Evansport and Aquia Creek, and General Hooker occupied them, missing a number of valuable guns.

INTERIOR OF FORT DONELSON.

INTERIOR OF THE LOWER WATER BATTERY AT FORT DONELSON.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 183.]

WILKIE COLLINS, ESQ.

In connection with the commencement of Mr. WILKIE COLLINS'S new Tale, "NO NAME," we publish herewith a portrait of this distinguished man.

WILLIAM WILKIE COLLINS was born in London in 1824. His father was a painter, who went to Italy shortly after his son's birth, and remained there till the latter had reached manhood. Mr. Wilkie Collins's first work, "ANTONINA," which was published in 1850, revealed his remarkable genius; but the subject was ill chosen, and the book did not meet with great success. His later Novels, and especially the "WOMAN IN WHITE," published in Harper's Weekly, have placed him in the first rank of contemporaneous Novelists.

Mr. Collins is allied to the family of Mr. Charles Dickens.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF THE "WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN MCLENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and Early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER III.

When she returned to the house, Miss Garth made no attempt to conceal her unfavorable opinion of the stranger in black. His object was, no doubt, to obtain pecuniary assistance from Mrs. Vanstone. What the nature of his claim on her might be seemed less intelligible—unless it was the claim of a poor relation. Had Mrs. Vanstone ever mentioned, in the presence of her daughters, the name of Captain Wragge? Neither of them recollected to have heard it before. Had Mrs. Vanstone ever referred to any poor relations who were dependent on her? On the contrary, she had mentioned of late years that she doubted having any relations at all who were still living. And yet Captain Wragge had plainly declared that the name on his card would recall "a family matter" to Mrs. Vanstone's memory. What did it mean? A false statement, on the stranger's part, without any intelligible reason for making it? Or a second mystery, following close on the heels of the mysterious journey to London?

All the probabilities seemed to point to some hidden connection between the "family affairs" which had taken Mr. and Mrs. Vanstone so suddenly from home, and the "family matter" associated with the name of Captain Wragge. Miss Garth's doubts of the day before thronged back on her mind as she sealed her letter to Mrs. Vanstone, with the captain's card added by way of inclosure.

By return of post the answer arrived.

Always the earliest riser among the ladies of the house, Miss Garth was alone in the breakfast-room when the letter was brought in. Her first glance at its contents convinced her of the necessity of reading it carefully through in retirement before any embarrassing questions could be put to her. Leaving a message with the servant requesting Norah to make the tea that morning, she went up stairs at once to the solitude and security of her own room.

Mrs. Vanstone's letter extended to some length. The first part of it referred to Captain Wragge, and entered unreservedly into all necessary explanations relating to the man himself and to the motive which had brought him to Combe-Raven.

It appeared from Mrs. Vanstone's statement that her mother had been twice married. Her mother's first husband had been a certain Doctor Wragge—a widower with young children; and one of those children was now the unmilitary-looking captain, whose address was "Post-office, Bristol." Mrs. Wragge had left no family by her first husband; and had afterward married Mrs. Vanstone's father. Of that second marriage Mrs. Vanstone herself was the only issue. She had lost both her parents while she was still a young woman; and, in course of years, her mother's family connections (who were then her nearest surviving relatives) had been one after another removed by death. She was left, at the present writing, without a relation in the world—excepting perhaps certain cousins whom she had never seen, and of whose existence even, at the present moment, she possessed no positive knowledge.

Under these circumstances, what family claim had Captain Wragge on Mrs. Vanstone?

None whatever. As the son of her mother's first husband, by that husband's first wife, not even the widest stretch of courtesy could have included him at any time in the list of Mrs. Vanstone's most distant relations. Well knowing this (she later proceeded to say), he had nevertheless persisted in forcing himself upon her as a species of family connection; and she had weakly sanctioned the intrusion, solely from the dread that he would otherwise introduce himself to Mr. Vanstone's notice, and take unblushing advantage of Mr. Vanstone's generosity. Shrinking, naturally, from allowing her husband to be annoyed, and probably cheated as well, by any person who claimed, however preposterously, a family connection with herself, it had been her practice, for many years past, to assist the captain from her own purse, on the condition that he should never come near the house, and that he should not presume to make any application whatever to Mr. Vanstone.

Readily admitting the imprudence of this course, Mrs. Vanstone further explained that she had perhaps been the more inclined to adopt it, through having been always accustomed, in her early days, to see the captain living now upon one member and now upon another of her mother's family. Possessed of abilities which might have raised him to distinction in almost any career that he could have chosen, he had nevertheless, from his youth upward, been a disgrace to all his relatives. He had been expelled the militia regiment in which he once held a commission. He had tried one employment after another, and had discreditably failed in all. He had lived on his wits in the lowest and basest meaning of the phrase. He had married a poor ignorant woman, who had served as a waitress at some low eating-house, who had unexpectedly come into a little money, and whose small inheritance he had mercilessly squandered to the last farthing. In plain terms, he was an incorrigible scoundrel; and he had now added one more to the list of his many misdemeanors, by impudently breaking the conditions on which Mrs. Vanstone had hitherto assisted him. She had written at once to the address indicated on his card, in such terms and to such purpose as would prevent him, she hoped and believed, from ever venturing near the house again. Such were the terms in which Mrs. Vanstone concluded that first part of her letter which referred exclusively to Captain Wragge.

Although the statement thus presented implied a weakness in Mrs. Vanstone's character which Miss Garth, after many years of intimate experience, had never detected, she accepted the explanation as a matter of course; receiving it all the more readily inasmuch as it might, without impropriety, be communicated in substance to appease the irritated curiosity of the two young ladies. For this reason especially, she perused the first half of the letter with an agreeable sense of relief. Far different was the impression produced on her when she advanced to the second half, and when she had read it to the end.

The second part of the letter was devoted to the subject of the journey to London.

Mrs. Vanstone began by referring to the long and intimate friendship which had existed between Miss

"COME, FRANK!"

Garth and herself. She now felt it due to that friendship to explain confidentially the motive which had induced her to leave home with her husband. Miss Garth had delicately refrained from showing it, but she must naturally have felt, and must still be feeling, great surprise at the mystery in which their departure had been involved; and she must doubtless have asked herself why Mrs. Vanstone should have been associated with family affairs which (in her independent position as to relatives) must necessarily concern Mr. Vanstone alone.

Without touching on those affairs, which it was neither desirable nor necessary to do, Mrs. Vanstone then proceeded to say that she would at once set all Miss Garth's doubts at rest, so far as they related to herself, by one plain acknowledgment. Her object in accompanying her husband to London was to see a certain celebrated physician, and to consult him privately upon a very delicate and anxious matter connected with the state of her health. In plainer terms still, this anxious matter meant nothing less than the possibility that she might again become a mother.

When the doubt had first suggested itself she had treated it as a mere delusion. The long interval that had elapsed since the birth of her last child; the serious illness which had afflicted her after the death of that child in infancy; the time of life at which she had now arrived—all inclined her to dismiss the idea as soon as it arose in her mind. It had returned again and again in spite of her. She had felt the necessity of consulting the highest medical authority; and had shrunk, at the same time, from alarming her daughters by summoning a London physician to the house. The medical opinion, sought under the circumstances already mentioned, had now been obtained. Her doubt was confirmed as a certainty; and the result, which might be expected to take place toward the end of summer, was, at her age and with her constitutional peculiarities, a subject for serious future anxiety, to say the least of it. The physician had done his best to encourage her; but she had understood the drift of his questions more clearly than he supposed, and she knew that he looked to the future with more than ordinary doubt.

Having disclosed these particulars, Mrs. Vanstone requested that they might be kept a secret between her correspondent and herself. She had felt unwilling to mention her suspicions to Miss Garth until those suspicions had been confirmed—and she now recoiled, with even greater reluctance, from allowing her daughters to be in any way alarmed about her. It would be best to dismiss the subject for the present, and to wait hopefully till the summer came. In the mean time they would all, she trusted, be happily reunited on the twenty-third of the month, which Mr. Vanstone had fixed on as the day for their return. With this intimation, and with the customary messages, the letter abruptly and confusedly came to an end.

For the first few minutes a natural sympathy for Mrs. Vanstone was the only feeling of which Miss Garth was conscious after she had laid the letter down. Ere long, however, there rose obscurely on her mind a doubt which perplexed and distressed her. Was the explanation which she had just read really as satisfactory and as complete as it professed to be? Testing it plainly by facts, surely not.

On the morning of her departure Mrs. Vanstone had unquestionably left the house in good spirits. At her age, and in her state of health, were good spirits compatible with such an errand to a physician as the errand on which she was bent? Then, again, had that letter from New Orleans, which had necessitated Mr. Vanstone's departure, no share in occasioning his wife's departure as well? Why otherwise had she looked up so eagerly the moment her daughter mentioned the post-mark? Granting the avowed motive for her journey—did not her manner, on the morning when the letter was opened, and again on the morning of departure, suggest the existence of some other motive which her letter kept concealed?

If it was so, the conclusion that followed was a very distressing one. Mrs. Vanstone, feeling what was due to her long friendship with Miss Garth, had apparently placed the fullest confidence in her, on one subject, by way of unsuspiciously maintaining the strictest reserve toward her on another. Naturally frank and straightforward in all her own dealings, Miss Garth shrank from plainly pursuing her doubts to this result: a want of loyalty toward her tried and valued friend seemed implied in the mere dawning of it on her mind.

She locked up the letter in her desk; roused herself resolutely to attend to the passing interests of the day; and went down stairs again to the breakfast-room. Amidst many uncertainties, this at least was clear: Mr. and Mrs. Vanstone were coming back on the twenty-third of the month. Who could say what new revelations might not come back with them?

CHAPTER IV.

No new revelations came back with them—no anticipations associated with their return were realized. On the one forbidden subject of their errand in London there was no moving either the master or the mistress of the house. Whatever their object might have been, they had to all appearance successfully accomplished it—for they both returned in perfect possession of their everyday looks and manners. Mrs. Vanstone's spirits had subsided to their natural quiet level; Mr. Vanstone's imperturbable cheerfulness sat as easily and indolently on him as usual. This was the one noticeable result of their journey—this, and no more. Had the household revolution run its course already? Was the secret, thus far hidden impenetrably, hidden forever?

Nothing in this world is hidden forever. The gold, which has lain for centuries unsuspected in the ground, reveals itself one day on the surface. Sand turns traitor, and betrays the footstep that has passed over it; water gives back to the telltale surface the body that has been drowned. Fire itself leaves the confession, in ashes, of the substance consumed in it. Hate breaks its prison-secrecy in the thoughts, through the doorway of the eyes; and Love finds the Judas who betrays it by a kiss. Look where we will, the inevitable law of revelation is one of the laws of nature: the lasting preservation of a secret is a miracle which the world has never yet seen.

How was the secret now hidden in the household at Combe-Raven doomed to disclose itself? Through what coming event in the daily lives of the father, the mother, and the daughters was the law of revelation destined to break the fatal way to discovery? The way opened (unseen by the parents, and unsuspected by the children) through the first event that happened after Mr. and Mrs. Vanstone's return—an event which presented, on the surface of it, no interest of greater importance than the trivial social ceremony of a morning call.

Three days after the master and mistress of Combe-Raven had come back the female members of the family happened to be assembled together in the morning-room. The view from the windows looked over the flower-garden and shrubbery; this last being protected at its outward extremity by a fence, and approached from the lane beyond by a wicket-gate. During an interval in the conversation the attention of the ladies was suddenly attracted to this gate by the sharp sound of the iron latch falling in its socket. Some one had entered the shrubbery from the lane; and Magdalen at once placed herself at the window to catch the first sight of the visitor through the trees.

After a few minutes the figure of a gentleman became visible at the point where the shrubbery path joined the winding garden-walk which led to the house. Magdalen looked at him attentively, without appearing, at first, to know who he was. As he came nearer, however, she started in astonishment, and, turning quickly to her mother and sister, proclaimed the gentleman in the garden to be no other than "Mr. Francis Clare."

The visitor thus announced was the son of Mr. Vanstone's oldest associate and nearest neighbor.

Mr. Clare the elder inhabited an unpretending little cottage situated just outside the shrubbery-fence which marked the limit of the Combe-Raven grounds. Belonging to the younger branch of a family of great antiquity, the one inheritance of importance that he had derived from his ancestors was the possession of a magnificent library, which not only filled all the rooms in his modest little dwelling but lined the staircases and passages as well. Mr. Clare's books represented the one important interest of Mr. Clare's life. He had been a widower for many years past, and made no secret of his philosophical resignation to the loss of his wife. As a father, he regarded his family of three sons in the light of a necessary domestic evil, which perpetually threatened the sanctity of his study and the safety of his books. When the boys went to school, Mr. Clare said "good-by" to them, and "thank God" to himself. As for his small income, and his still smaller domestic establishment, he looked at them both from the same satirically indifferent point of view. He called himself a pauper with a pedigree. He abandoned the entire direction of his household to the slatternly old woman who was his only servant, on the condition that she was never to venture near his books, with a duster in her hand, from one year's end to the other. His favorite poets were Horace and Pope; his chosen philosophers, Hobbs and Voltaire. He took his exercise and his fresh air under protest; and always walked the same distance to a yard, on the ugliest high-road in the neighborhood. He was crooked of back, and quick of temper. He could digest radishes, and sleep after green tea. His views of human nature were the views of Diogenes, tempered by Rochefoucault; his personal habits were slovenly in the last degree; and his favorite boast was, that he had outlived all human prejudices.

Such was this singular man in his more superficial aspects. What nobler qualities he might possess below the surface, no one had ever discovered. Mr. Vanstone, it is true, stoutly asserted that "Mr. Clare's worst side was his outside;" but in this expression of opinion he stood alone among his neighbors. The association between these two widely-dissimilar men had lasted for many years, and was almost close enough to be called a friendship. They had acquired a habit of meeting to smoke together on certain evenings in the week in the cynic-philosopher's study, and of there disputing on every imaginable subject—Mr. Vanstone flourishing the stout cudgels of assertion, and Mr. Clare meeting him with the keen-edged tools of sophistry. They generally quarreled at night, and met on the neutral ground of the shrubbery to be reconciled together the next morning. The bond of intercourse thus curiously established between them was strengthened on Mr. Vanstone's side by a hearty interest in his neighbor's three sons—an interest by which those sons benefited all the more importantly, seeing that one of the prejudices which their father had outlived was a prejudice in favor of his own children.

"I look at those boys," the philosopher was accustomed to say, "with a perfectly impartial eye; I dismiss the unimportant accident of their birth from all consideration, and I find them below the average in every respect. The only excuse which a poor gentleman has for presuming to exist in the nineteenth century is the excuse of extraordinary ability. My boys have been addle-headed from infancy. If I had any capital to give them, I should make Frank a butcher, Cecil a baker, and Arthur a grocer—those being the only human vocations I know of which are certain to be always in request. As it is, I have no money to help them with, and they have no brains to help themselves. They appear to me to be three human superfluities in dirty jackets and noisy boots; and, unless they clear themselves off the community by running away, I don't myself profess to see what is to be done with them."

Fortunately for the boys, Mr. Vanstone's views were still fast imprisoned in the ordinary prejudices. At his intercession, and through his influence, Frank, Cecil, and Arthur were received on the foundation of a well-reputed grammar-school. In holiday-time they were mercifully allowed the run of Mr. Vanstone's paddock, and were humanized and refined by association indoors with Mrs. Vanstone and her daughters. On these occasions Mr. Clare used sometimes to walk across from his cottage (in his dressing-gown and slippers), and look at the boys disparagingly, through the window or over the fence, as if they were three wild animals whom his neighbor was attempting to tame. "You and your wife are excellent people," he used to say to Mr. Vanstone. "I respect your honest prejudices in favor of these boys of mine with all my heart. But you are so wrong about them—you are indeed! I wish to give no offense; I speak quite impartially; but mark my words, Vanstone: they'll all three turn out ill, in spite of every thing you can do for them."

In later years, when Frank had reached the age of seventeen, the same curious shifting of the relative positions of parent and friend between the two neighbors was exemplified more absurdly than ever. A civil engineer in the north of England, who owed certain obligations to Mr. Vanstone, expressed his willingness to take Frank under superintendence on terms of the most favorable kind. When this proposal was received, Mr. Clare, as usual, first shifted his own character as Frank's father on Mr. Vanstone's shoulders—and then moderated his neighbor's parental enthusiasm from the point of view of an impartial spectator.

"It's the finest chance for Frank that could possibly have happened!" cried Mr. Vanstone, in a glow of fatherly enthusiasm.

"My good fellow, he won't take it," retorted Mr. Clare, with the icy composure of a disinterested friend.

"But he shall take it," persisted Mr. Vanstone.

"Say he shall have a mathematical head," rejoined Mr. Clare; "say he shall possess industry, ambition, and firmness of purpose. Pooh! pooh! you don't look at him with my impartial eyes. I say, No mathematics, no industry, no ambition, no firmness of purpose. Frank is a compound of negatives—and there they are."

"Hang your negatives!" shouted Mr. Vanstone. "I don't care a rush for negatives, or affirmatives either. Frank shall have this splendid chance; and I'll lay you any wager you like he makes the best of it."

"I am not rich enough to lay wagers usually," replied Mr. Clare; "but I think I have got a guinea about the house somewhere; and I'll lay you that guinea Frank comes back on our hands like a bad shilling."

"Done!" said Mr. Vanstone. "No: stop a minute! I won't do the lad's character the injustice of backing it at even money. I'll lay you five to one Frank turns up trumps in this business! You ought to be ashamed of yourself for talking of him as you do. What sort of hocus-pocus you bring it about by I don't pretend to know; but you always end in making me take his part, as if I was his father instead of you. Ah, yes! give you time, and you'll defend yourself. I won't give you time; I won't have any of your special-pleading. Black's white, according to you. I don't care: it's black for all that. You may talk nineteen to the dozen—I shall write to my friend, and say Yes, in Frank's interests, by to-day's post."

Such were the circumstances under which Mr. Francis Clare departed for the north of England, at the age of seventeen, to start in life as a civil engineer.

From time to time Mr. Vanstone's friend communicated with him on the subject of the new pupil. Frank was praised as a quiet, gentlemanlike, interesting lad—but he was also reported to be rather slow at acquiring the rudiments of engineering science. Other letters, later in date, described him as a little too ready to despond about himself; as having been sent away, on that account, to some new railway works, to see if change of scene would rouse him; and as having benefited in every respect by the experiment—except perhaps in regard to his professional studies, which still advanced but slowly. Subsequent communications announced his departure, under care of a trust-worthy foreman, for some public works in Belgium; touched on the general benefit he appeared to derive from this new change; praised his excellent manners and address, which were of great assistance in facilitating business communications with the foreigners—and passed over in ominous silence the main question of his actual progress in the acquirement of knowledge. These reports, and many others which resembled them, were all conscientiously presented by Frank's friend to the attention of Frank's father. On each occasion Mr. Clare exulted over Mr. Vanstone, and Mr. Vanstone quarreled with Mr. Clare. "One of these days you'll wish you hadn't laid that wager," said the cynic philosopher. "One of these days I shall have the blessed satisfaction of pocketing your guinea," cried the sanguine friend. Two years had then passed since Frank's departure. In one year more results asserted themselves, and settled the question.

Two days after Mr. Vanstone's return from London he was called away from the breakfast table before he had found time enough to look over his letters, delivered by the morning's post. Thrusting them into one of the pockets of his shooting-jacket, he took the letters out again, at one grasp, to read them when occasion served later in the day. The grasp included the whole correspondence, with one exception—that exception being a final report from the civil engineer, which notified the termination of the connection between his pupil and himself, and the immediate return of Frank to his father's house.

While this important announcement lay unsuspected in Mr. Vanstone's pocket, the object of it was traveling home as fast as railways could take him. At half past ten at night, while Mr. Clare was sitting in studious solitude over his books and his green tea, with his favorite black cat to keep him company, he heard footsteps in the passage—the door opened—and Frank stood before him.

Ordinary men would have been astonished. But the philosopher's composure was not to be shaken by any such trifle as the unexpected return of his eldest son. He could not have looked up more calmly from his learned volume if Frank had been absent for three minutes instead of three years.

"Exactly what I predicted," said Mr. Clare. "Don't interrupt me by making explanations; and don't frighten the cat. If there is any thing to eat in the kitchen, get it and go to bed. You can walk over to Combe-Raven to-morrow, and give this message from me to Mr. Vanstone: 'Father's compliments, Sir, and I have come back on your hands like a bad shilling, as he always said I should. He keeps his own guinea, and takes your five; and he hopes you'll mind what he says to you another time.' That is the message. Shut the door after you. Good-night."

Under these unfavorable auspices Mr. Francis Clare made his appearance the next morning in the grounds at Combe-Raven; and, something doubtful of the reception that might await him, slowly approached the precincts of the house.

It was not wonderful that Magdalen should have failed to recognize him when he first appeared in view. He had gone away a backward lad of seventeen; he returned a young man of twenty. His slim figure had now acquired strength and grace, and had increased in stature to the medium height. The small, regular features, which he was supposed to have inherited from his mother, were rounded and filled out, without having lost their remarkable delicacy of form. His beard was still in its infancy, and nascent lines of whisker traced their modest way sparely down his cheeks. His gentle, wandering brown eyes would have looked to better advantage in a woman's face—they wanted spirit and firmness to fit them for the face of a man. His hands had the same wandering habit as his eyes; they were constantly changing from one position to another, constantly twisting and turning any little stray thing they could pick up. He was undeniably handsome, graceful, well-bred; but no close observer could look at him without suspecting that the stout old family stock had begun to wear out in the later generations, and that Mr. Francis Clare had more in him of the shadow of his ancestors than of the substance.

When the astonishment caused by his appearance had partially subsided a search was instituted for the missing report. It was found in the remotest recesses of Mr. Vanstone's capacious pocket, and was read by that gentleman on the spot.

The plain facts, as stated by the engineer, were briefly these. Frank was not possessed of the necessary abilities to fit him for his new calling, and it was useless to waste time by keeping him any longer in an employment for which he had no vocation. This, after three years' trial, being the conviction on both sides, the master had thought it the most straightforward course for the pupil to go home, and candidly place results before his father and his friends. In some other pursuit, for which he was more fit and in which he could feel an interest, he would no doubt display the industry and perseverance which he had been too much discouraged to practice in the profession that he had now abandoned. Personally, he was liked by all who knew him; and his future prosperity was heartily desired by the many friends whom he had made in the north. Such was the substance of the report, and so it came to an end.

Many men would have thought the engineer's statement rather too carefully worded; and, suspecting him of trying to make the best of a bad case, would have entertained serious doubts on the subject of Frank's future. Mr. Vanstone was too easy-tempered and sanguine—and too anxious as well, not to yield his old antagonist an inch more ground than he could help—to look at the letter from any such unfavorable point of view. Was it Frank's fault if he had not got the stuff in him that engineers were made of? Did no other young men ever begin life with a false start? Plenty began in that way, and got over it, and did wonders afterward. With these commentaries on the letter the kind-hearted gentleman patted Frank on the shoulder. "Cheer up, my lad!" said Mr. Vanstone. "We will be even with your father one of these days, though he has won the wager this time!"

The example thus set by the master of the house was followed at once by the family—with the solitary exception of Norah, whose incurable formality and reserve expressed themselves, not too graciously, in her distant manner toward the the visitor. The rest, led by Magdalen (who had been Frank's favorite play-fellow in past times), glided back into their old easy habits with him without an effort. He was "Frank" with all of them but Norah, who persisted in addressing him as "Mr. Clare." Even the account he was now encouraged to give of the reception accorded to him by his father on the previous night, failed to disturb Norah's gravity. She sat with her dark handsome face steadily bent over her eyes cast down, and the rich color in her cheeks warmer and deeper than usual. All the rest, Miss Garth included, found old Mr. Clare's speech of welcome to his son quite irresistible. The noise and merriment were at their height when the servant announced to them the whole party dumb by the announcement of visitors in the drawing-room, Mr. Marrable, Mrs. Marrable, and Miss Marrable, of Marrable Lodge, Clifton."

Norah rose, as readily as if the new arrivals had been a relief to her mind. Mrs. Vanstone was the next to leave her chair. These two went away first to receive the visitors. Magdalen, who preferred the society of her father and Frank, pleaded hard to be left behind; but Miss Garth, after granting five minutes' grace, took her into custody and marched her out of the room. Frank rose to take leave.

"No, no," said Mr. Vanstone, detaining him. "Don't go. These people won't stop long. Mr. Marrable's a merchant at Bristol. I have no influence or trace when the girls forced me to take them to see Clifton. Mere commonplaces—nothing more. Come and smoke a cigar in the green-house. Hang all visitors—they worry one's life out. I'll register at the door to-morrow with an apology; and you shall follow me at a safe distance, and be a proof that I was really engaged."

Proposing this ingenious stratagem, in a confidential whisper, Mr. Vanstone took Frank's arm and led him round the house by the back way. The first ten minutes of seclusion in the conservatory passed without any sense of time. At the end of that time a flying figure in bright garments flashed upon the two gentlemen through the glass—the door was flung open—flower-pots fell in homage to passing petticoats—and Mr. Vanstone's only daughter ran up to him in a heap, a heaving bosom, with every external appearance of having suddenly taken leave of her senses.

"Papa! the dream of my whole life is realized," she said, as soon as she could speak. "I shall fly through the roof of the house, papa, if somebody doesn't hold me down. The Marrables were here with an invitation, and—you darling—guess what they're going to give at Evergreen Lodge!"

"A ball, my dear," Mr. Vanstone, without a moment's hesitation.

"Private Theatricals!!!" cried Magdalen, her clear young voice ringing through the conservatory like a bell; her loose sleeves falling back, and showing her round white arms as far as the elbows as she clapped her hands ecstatically in the air. "The Rivals is the play, papa—the Rivals by the famous what-his-name—and you must see to it! The one thing in the whole universe that I long to do most. It all rests with you. Mamma shakes her head; and Miss Garth looks daggers; and Norah's as sulky as usual—but if you say Yes, they must all bow one way and let me do as I like. Say yes," she pleaded, nestling shyly up to her father and pressing her lips with a fond gentleness to his ear, as she whispered the next words. "Say Yes—and I'll be a good girl for the rest of my life."

"A good girl?" repeated Mr. Vanstone—"A mad girl I think you must mean. Hang these people and their theatricals! I shall have to go indoors and see about this matter. Frank, you throw away your cigar, Frank. You're well out of the business, and you can stop here."

"No, no," said Magdalen. "He's in the business too."

Mr. Francis Clare had hitherto remained modestly in the back-ground. He now came forward, with a face expressive of speechless amazement.

"Yes," continued Magdalen, answering his blank look of inquiry with perfect composure. "You are to act. Miss Marrable and I have a turn for business, and we settled it all in five minutes. There are two parts in the play to be filled. One is Lucy, the waiting-maid, which is the character I have undertaken—with papa's permission," she added, slyly squeezing her father's arm; and he won't say No, will he? First, because he's a darling—and then because I love him and he loves me; thirdly, because there is never any difference of opinion between us (is there?); fourthly, because I'm a fool—a kiss, which naturally stops his mouth and settles the whole question. Dear me, how I'm running on. Where was I just now? Oh yes! explaining myself to Frank—"

"I beg your pardon," began Frank, attempting, at this point, to enter his protest.

"The second character in the piece," pursued Magdalen, without taking the smallest notice of the protest, "is Faikland—a jealous lover, with a fine flow of language. Miss Marrable and I discussed Faikland privately on the window-seat while the rest were talking. She is a delightful girl—so impulsive, so sensible, so entirely unaffected. She confided in me. She said, 'One of our misfortunes is that we can't find a gentleman who will grapple with the hideous difficulties of Faikland.' Of course I soothed her. Of course I said, 'I've got the gentleman, and he shall grapple immediately.'—Oh, Heavens! who is he?'—Mr. Francis Clare.'—And where is he?' —In the house at this moment.'—'Will you be so very charming, Miss Vanstone, as to fetch him?'—'I'll fetch him, dear, directly.' That is the greatest pleasure.' I left the window-seat—I flashed into the morning-room—and found Clare—I followed the smell—and here I am."

"It's a compliment, I know, to be asked to act," said Frank, in great embarrassment. "But I hope you and Miss Marrable will excuse me—"

"Certainly not. Miss Marrable and I are both remarkable for the firmness of our characters. When we say Mr. So-and-So is positively to act the part of Faikland, we positively mean it. Come in, and be introduced."

"But I never tried to act. "I don't know how."

"Not of the slightest consequence. If you don't know how, come to me, and I'll teach you."

"You?" exclaimed Mr. Vanstone. "What do you know about acting?"

"Pray, papa, be serious! I have the strongest internal conviction that I could act every single character in the piece. Frank, you shall let me have to speak a second time, Frank. Come and be introduced."

She took her father's arm, and moved with him to the door of the green-house. At the door she stopped, and looked round to see if Frank was following her. It was only the action of a moment; but in that moment her natural confidence in her own fascinations strengthened itself with the influence of her beauty—communicated—and conquered. She knew lovely: the flush was tenderly bright in her cheeks; the radiant pleasure shone and sparkled in her eyes; the gesture of her figure turned suddenly from the waist upward, disclosed its delicate strength in the supple firmness, and gave it irresistible seductive grace. "Come!" she said, with a coquettish beckoning action of her head. "Come, Frank."

Few men of forty would have resisted her at that moment. Frank was twenty last birthday. In other words, he threw away his cigar, and followed her out of the green-house.

Mr. Vanstone, and others of his class—in the estimation of the world—are the last persons to be consulted with the private theatricals in which their children delight. Accordingly, he stopped again; plucked a twig from a plant near him; threw it away in his hand; looked about him uneasily, on this side and on that. The path to the left led back to his father's cottage. The path to the right led to—Norah.

While he still hesitated Mr. Vanstone and his daughter reached the top of the steps. Once more Magdalen looked round; looked with her most brilliant smile—and—all-conquering—spoke. She beckoned again; and again he followed her up the steps, and over the threshold. The door closed on them.

So, with a trifling gesture of invitation on one side, with a trifling act of compliance on the other, the interview which was to change his life, no thought in hers, of the secret still hidden under the journey to London—they took the way which leads to the discovery, through many a darker winding that was yet to come.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO THE NERVOUS AND DEBILITATED

LAURIE'S LIFE PILLS,
THE GREAT KNOWN REMEDY, DISCOVERED BY
DR. ALEXANDER LAURIE,

Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, England; Licentiate of Apothecaries' Hall, and Graduate of the Ecole de Medecine, Paris. See for many years attached to the French and British Embassies at Hong Kong.

The extraordinary remedy, which has for some time past been meeting unsolicited approval in China, is now offered for the first time, offered to the American public.

It was discovered by Dr. Laurie during his residence in China, where it has been prescribed for many centuries, by royal physicians as a sovereign, safe, and sure antidote to the effects of strong teas, eating of opium, &c.

These pills are composed from the concentrated essence of a rare and beautiful plant, indigenous to the tea-growing districts of China. The Chinese have discovered in the nervous system, whether resulting from sedentary occupation, indulgence in strong drinks, inhalation of noxious climates, domestic griefs, excessive use of tobacco or other causes, a fruitful source of disease. They have found that the Laurie Life Pills are a never-failing remedy for Nervousness, Nervous Headache, Languor, Lassitude, Depression of Spirits, Sick Headache, Dizziness, Fear, Excitement, Trembling, and especially for Dimness, Giddiness of the Head, and Palpitation of the Heart, the last of which frequently leads to aberration or derangement of the nervous system or digestive organs. They have also been used as a cathartic, but especially on the blood and nervous centres, and are guaranteed to be perfectly harmless in this system, being purely vegetable; hale or tender child may take them with entire safety, while their action on the internal intestinal canal removes the impaired powers of life and giving renewed vigor to the nervous and digestive organs. Their surprising efficacy has been manifested to thousands of sufferers, both male and female, and they have universally been a benefactor to the human race, and to the family.

It is simply all be accurately taken after the principal meals of the day, and there is no danger of exposure to indigestion, and many a would-be "gourmand," who has hitherto only a burden to himself and his dinner table, now indulge his reasonable appetite with impunity.

The combination is for sale by all druggists in the packet, they are done up in small Chinese cartons, of neat and portable size, at $1 per box, containing fifty pills, or forty Pills, or two and a half boxes in one for $2. Sent, free of postage, on receipt of money, address, or order of any dollar bill of any good bank, or can be obtained personally at the office, 469 Broadway, corner of Howard Street, New York, from GEO. RUPP'S

Sole Wholesale Agent for the United States.

Commercial Travelers and Agents Wanted to Sell our 25 Cent Portfolio Package.

Contents—20 Sheets Note Paper, 20 Envelopes, 1 Penholder, 1 Pen, 1 Pencil, 1 Blotting Pad, 100 Recipes, 1 Steel Pen, 3 Engravings, 1 New Method for Computing Interest,—2 Fashionable Embroidery Designs for Collars, 1 for Under-Sleeves, 2 for Under-Skirts, 1 for Corset or Handkerchief, 2 for Cuffs, 1 for Silk Purse, 1 for Child's Sack, 1 for Ornamental Pillow Case, 1 Puzzle—and also 1 GOOD BEAUTIFUL ALPHABET OF JEWELRY. $10 a day can be made. Send stamp for circular. Address, Box 5,000, New York.

WEIR & CO., 45 South Third Street, Phila.

$75 A MONTH—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS in every county at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and cheap Family Sewing Machine. Address, H. B. MIDDLEBROOK, Alfred, Maine. (with stamp)

You must Notice,

That the name of the firm of W. Forsyth & Co. is changed to J. H. Winslow & Co., Mr. Forsyth having retired. Business continued the same, and all Certificates with the name of W. Forsyth & Co., attached are good, and will be redeemed by us alone, with the same promptness and faithfulness as heretofore, on their being returned to us.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000.

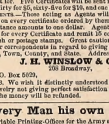
To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

Splendid List!!

Articles to be Sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches..... $100.00 each
50 " " Watches..... 50.00 "
150 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 25.00 "
100 Ladies and Gents' Silver Watches..... 20.00 "
500 Gold and Neck Chains..... 5.00 to 15.00 "
3000 Gold Vest Chains..... 5.00 to 10.00 "
3000 " Lockets..... 5.00 to 8.00 "
3000 Cameo Brooches..... 4.00 to 6.00 "
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches..... 4.00 to 6.00 "
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches..... 4.00 to 6.00 "
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches..... 4.00 to 6.00 "
3000 Cameo Ear Drops..... 4.00 to 6.00 "
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops..... 4.00 to 6.00 "
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops..... 4.00 to 6.00 "
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Ear Drops..... 4.00 to 6.00 "
5100 Gents' Breast Pins..... 2.50 to 6.00 "
5100 Watch Keys..... 1.00 to 5.00 "
5000 Fob and Ribbon Slides..... 2.00 to 6.00 "
5000 Sets of Sleeve Buttons..... 2.00 to 6.00 "
5000 Sleeve Buttons..... 1.00 to 3.00 "
5000 Pairs Bracelets..... 2.00 to 6.00 "
5000 Stone Rings..... 2.00 to 6.00 "
1200 Lockets..... 2.50 to 10.00 each
1000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5.00 to 10.00 "
10000 Gold Pens, 14 Carats and Warr'd. 4.00 to 5.00 each
3000 Business and Pocket Knives..... 1.00 "

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of the various articles, stating what each one can have, will be placed in envelopes and sealed, their numbers in each envelope to be ordered, without regard to choice. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you are to get, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.



The Certificates will be mixed with a great many thousands, and when sold, will be sold indiscriminately. On receipt of a Certificate, you will see by it what you are to get, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

Certificates will be sent by mail, post paid, for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business. Five Certificates will be sent for $1, eleven Certificates for $2, and so on, for a dollar. Certificates will be sent for 25 cents each, or 7 for $1, thirty for $3, sixty-five for $10, and one hundred for $15. A liberal commission allowed to Agents. Those who wish Certificates on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Agents will obtain Certificates for every Certificate and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great inducements should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address. Town, County and State.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,

BANKERS,

P. O. Box 5029, New York.
No. 3, Wall Street, Up Stairs.

No. 32, or 4in. Copper Waterproof Cartridge.

Navy 36in. Copper Water-proof Cartridge.

The 3in., or Navy 4in. cartridge is a ball weighing 18 to the lb., and the No. 32 or 4in. Revolver, a ball 30 to the lb. By recent experiments made in the Army, these Revolvers were pronounced the best and most effective weapons in use. For particulars call or send for a Circular to

MERWIN & BRAY, Sole Agents,
No. 149 Broadway, N. Y.

A corrective for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agents F. C. WELLS & CO., 155 Fratkin St., New York. Sold by Druggists everywhere.

"MOUSTACHES AND WHISKERS" IN 42 DAYS.—Do not be my "Dog-nation" at $1 or $2. I will send 20c. for a BOOK, with the GREAT SECRET and many others, out before you. Satisfied "Oh either new many. Mailed (sealed) free for 2 dimes, by

T. E. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

ARION; A New Collection of Pure Part Songs for Male Voices. In separate Vocal Parts with Piano Score. Published by the undersigned. Subscription Complete.

Each Part bound in Cloth, Price $1.00.

JOHN D. WILLIAMS & CO., Publishers, Boston.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All articles suitable for the Army and Navy Hospitals, Lint, Bandages, and all other stuffs, should be sent, at half rates, by MANDEVILLE'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Suttees charged low rates.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.

HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BRACELETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR LOCKETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR RINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR VEST CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR NECK CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF SETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF PINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR EVERY THING in the Jewelry Line. Parties should call at MANUFACTORY of A. HAYWARD, MANUFACTURING JEWELER, 208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Head-Quarters
FOR WATCHES. WATCHES.

10,000 Watches for sale, at wholesale prices, to the Army and now interested therein. Enclose stamp for descriptive Circular.

J. L. FERGUSON,
198 Broadway, N. Y., Room No. 1.

REVOLVER.

A MOST POWERFUL ARM, WHICH CAN BE carried constantly about the person without inconvenience or danger. Length four inches, scarcely more than that of a bottle. It is the most compact, safe, and powerful Pocket Revolver ever made; weighs only eight ounces, charged with nine balls, and has a sharp projection to cut warp wires, each barrel fitted, gain twist and rifled. Will penetrate two inch deck of plank at one hundred and fifty yards. $12 Send for Illustrated Circular.

Small size, four inch barrel, 100 cartridges, $10 00
Large " six " " " 12 00
Trade supplied. T. H. MOORE, 434 Broadway, N. Y.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS of Every Patent, 513 Broadway, New York.
Send for a Circular.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Marriage Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMA, 376 Canal street, Broadway. Seals and stamps.

AGENTS, Army Traders, and the Speculative Classes generally. Low priced Watches and cheap Jewelry of the most desirable kinds. Call and see them at 208 Broadway, Room 1.

HOBBARD BROS., NEW YORK.

BACK NUMBERS of Harper's Weekly and Magazine always on hand at J. F. TRENWITH, No. 5 Astor House, Broadway, New York.

Chapped Hands, Face, Lips, &c.—CURTIS CONE AND PERFECTION.—HENRIAS & CO.'S CAMPHOR ICE, with GLYCERINE, will keep the skin soft in the coldest weather. Sold by druggists generally. Price 25 cents; by mail on receipt of 30 cents. HIGGINS & CO., Nos. 161, 199, 611, and 156 Broadway, New York.

Rheumatism.—All those afflicted with Rheumatism, Sciatica, Lumbago, Chilblains, Frost-bites, Neuralgia, Foot, and all Nervous Diseases, by wearing Meinzer & Co.'s Patent Galvanic Rubber Plate Bands, will find immediate and permanent cure from their use, never having yet failed in a single case. Sold by druggists. Depot and Agent for Philadelphia, J. B. BANSON, 1013 Girard Avenue. Send for a Circular.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE contains the following Serial Tales by the foremost Novelists of the day, published from the sheets sent to Subscribers by their Authors:

MISTRESS AND MAID." By DINAH MARIA MULOCK.
"ORLEY FARM." By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. Illustrated by J. E. MILLAIS.
"THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP." By WILLIAM M. THACKERAY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each).....2 00
And an Extra Copy to the Person procuring a Club of Four Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4.00.

The Postmasters and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.

The DUTIES NOTES of the United States will be received for Subscriptions. Our distant friends are requested to remit their subscriptions at the Nearest Post.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

A Thrilling Story,
Entitled,
NO NAME.
By Wilkie Collins,
AUTHOR OF
"The Woman in White."
Richly Illustrated by John McLenan,
Was Commenced last Week
IN
HARPER'S WEEKLY,
And will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$2 00
One Copy for Two Years.....3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....3 00
Any Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4.00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month on a specimen—to any one who applies for it.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is stereotyped, and back Numbers can be had at any time.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V., for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861, of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth, each, $1.00; or $2.00 per set, sent free by mail.

Postage 52 cents, per vol.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

JACK. "MR. SECRETARY! MR. SECRETARY! Wake up! Here's the MERRIMAC got out and sunk the Cumberland, and taken the Congress!"

MR. SECRETARY. "Ah! (yawns) you don't say so? I must get MORGAN to buy some more Boats then!"

THE HAND-WRITING ON THE WALLS AT RICHMOND; or, The Dream of the Rebel Bill-Poster, JEFF DAVIS.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

BEADLE'S MILITARY HAND-BOOK.—Containing the Official Articles of War—U. S. Army Regulations—Duties of Officers—Forms—Pay List—Rations—Equipments—Tactics, &c. Price 25 cents. For sale by all Book and News Dealers and Army Sutlers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. Address BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

The Wide World!

Published weekly in Boston. Racy, spirited, abounding in Stories, Essays, Editorials, Fun, Poetry, and General Intelligence. Always bright, smart, genial, and companionable.

Sold by all News Dealers. 4 cents.

Patents Obtained.

Messrs. MUNN & Co., Proprietors of the Scientific American, No. 37 Park Row, New York, continue to obtain Patents in the United States, and in all foreign countries, on the most reasonable terms. Consultations and pamphlets of advice in English and German free on application to the office. Messrs. M. & Co. have been engaged in soliciting Patents for over sixteen years, and more than Fifteen Thousand Patents have been granted through their Agency.

Gold Pens Repointed—Equal to New,

On receipt of 25 cts. in money or stamps. Orders by Mail promptly attended to. Gold Pen and Silver Extension Case $1 50. E. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

28c. in silver.—A Beautiful MICROSCOPE, magnifying 500 times. 28c. 8 different objects. $1. Mailed free by C. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED—The Washington Writing Case, containing soldier's note and letter paper, for the million. It is made of wood, and neatly covered with morocco paper, is as the shape of a perfect desk, containing everything for writing. Price 75 cents. Circulars free. JOHN H. TINGLEY, 151 Fulton St., N. Y.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF SPRING FASHIONS NOW READY. Sold everywhere. Largest and best Fashion Magazine in the world.

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF THE SPRING FASHIONS, NOW READY, contains large and magnificent Fashion Plates, three full-sized Patterns, and all the Spring Novelties for Bonnets, Cloaks, Trimmings, Children's Garments, &c. Published quarterly, at No. 473 Broadway. Sold everywhere, 25 cents; yearly, $1. With a valuable premium. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

To all wanting Farms.

New SETTLEMENT OF VINELAND—40 miles from Philadelphia by Railroad. Good farm soil. Mighty productive for Wheat, Corn, Grass, Fruits, and Vegetables.—good market.—Delightful climate—where farming is profitable, especially three times, and where good business openings can be found. Large numbers are settling. Society good. Farms from $15 to $50 per acre only. Village 6 and 8 acre Lots for sale. Four years' time given. Report of SOLON ROBINSON, Ag. Ed. of N. Y. Tribune, who has visited the place, together with the "Vineland Rural," Pictorial Description, will be furnished. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.O., Vineland P.O., Cumberland County, New Jersey.

The Soldiers' Bullet Proof Vest

Has been repeatedly and thoroughly tested with Pistol Bullets at 10 paces, Rifle Bullets at 40 rods, by many Army Officers, and it approved and worn by them. It is durable, light, and is a true economy of life, for it will save thousands. It will also double the value and power of the soldier; and you'll want it on examination. Sent to the Army by mail, for $3 00. I exhibit the Army of men, and No. 2 Rifle nearly all.

Price for Private' Vest $5. Officers' Vest, $7. They will be sent to any address when cash or retail. Sold by HUNT & GOODWIN, Washington. Agents wanted.

Constitution Water cures Diabetes and all Diseases of the Urinary Organs. Etchen stamp to MORGAN & ALLEN, 46 Cliff Street, N. Y., and get a Circular.

"WHAT CAME AFTERWARD ?" by T. FATHER, T. MOTHER, and "BATTLE-FIELDS OF OUR FATHERS," by CHARLES F. TOWNSEND, now Ready Price, now agreeable to ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE. Try and try Agents.

Price 10 cents a number.

AGENTS WANTED—MORE MONEY made, more real satisfaction given, and more ready sales guaranteed by selling the "GOOD NEWS" Ladies' Prize Stationery and Recipe Package." NOW READY. ENDORSED by all Dealers to be as attractive as GOLD, to be BEYOND RIVALRY. Our resources are long-tried, and them to contend with, consequently, like wise men, we are leaving the field. We put up the ONLY PACKAGE containing real merit. RECKARD'S NEW UNION PRIZE STATIONERY AND RECIPE PACKAGE contains more articles, of a better quality, and a finer piece of Jewelry than any other Package ever sold.

Send for our circulars, which we will mail free. $3 to $10 per day can be made. We put in each package a beautiful GOLD-like engraving of

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN. 6x10.
25 Valuable Recipes; 1 Package Ladies' Toilet Paper,
2 sheets Commercial Note; 6 Gilt Envelopes,
Paper, 9 Fine Pens,
2 Sheets Ladies' Note Paper, 1 Fine Pencil,
6 White Union Envelopes; 1 Sheet Blotting Paper.
in colors, 1 Accommodation Pencil.
6 Ladies' White Undressed Envelopes.

ALSO A VALUABLE PIECE OF JEWELRY.

RECKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York.

STATIONERY FOR THE ARMY.

P. HASKINS & CO., 30 Dickman Street, New York, HEADQUARTERS for "UNION STATIONERY" and "PATRIOTIC and PORTRAIT PRIZE PACKAGES" of STATIONERY and JEWELRY. Also, SOMETHING QUITE New! Circulars free. AGENTS WANTED.

To Consumptives.

THE Advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks, by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption—is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure Cure for CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing.

Parties wishing the prescription will please address

REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,
Williamsburgh,
Kings County, New York.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.
Made to Measure at $18 per doz.
OR SIX FOR NINE DOLLARS.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With Two Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in the retail stores at $12 00 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE AT $3 EACH.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $18 per dozen are mistaken. Here's the cost of each dozen $18 Shirts:

12 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 14½ c. per yd.: $1 75
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard..... 3 50
Making and cutting..... 6 00
Laundry: 24 buttons and cotton, 65c..... 1 00
Profit..... 5 75
Total..... $18 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and number of different styles of linen and cotton sent on receipt of stamp. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure and obtain a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. EWARD, from London,
387 Broadway,
Between White and Walker streets, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have Just Published:

PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. A Treatise specially designed for Young Men. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The Mother at Home," "The Child at Home," "Life of Napoleon," "Napoleon at St. Helena," "History of the French Revolution," &c. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

A STRANGE STORY. A Novel. By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON, Bart., Author of "What will He do with It?" "My Novel," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," &c., &c. Illustrated by American Artists. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

PILGRIMS OF PASSION. A Novel. By KINAHAN CORNWALLIS. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

MAYHEW'S BEN FRANKLIN. Young Benjamin Franklin; or, The Boy Bred through Life. A Book to Show how Benjamin learned the Principles which raised him from Poverty to Power. With Illustrations by JOHN GILBERT. 8vo, Muslin, 75 cents.

STREAMS OF LIGHT; or, Fifty-two Facts from the Life of Christ, for Every Week of the Year. By the Author of "Peep of Day," "Line upon Line," "Precept upon Precept," "The Mother's Last Words," &c. Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, gilt, 60 cents.

NOTICE TO QUIT. A Novel. By W. G. WILLS, Author of "Life's Formidable Image." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE OKAVANGO RIVER: A Narrative of Travel, Exploration, and Adventure. By CHARLES JOHN ANDERSSON, Author of "Lake Ngami." With Steel Portrait of the Author, and Illustrations on Wood, and a Map (not contained in the English Edition), showing the various explorations of Andersson, Livingstone, and Da Cahilla. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 00.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VI.—No. 274.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A THRILLING SCENE IN EAST TENNESSEE—COLONEL FRY AND THE UNION MEN SWEARING BY THE FLAG.—[See Page 193.]

ADVERTISEMENT.

☞ THE Publishers of Harper's Weekly congratulate their readers upon the appearance in Number 275 of the first part of a new serial tale entitled "The Woman in White," by WILKIE COLLINS, Esq., author of "The Woman in White." Its opening gives promise of the same wonderful power and matchless dramatic skill which entranced the readers of "The Woman in White." It is seldom that a periodical is enabled to furnish its subscribers with such a series of attractive tales as have appeared consecutively for the past two years in Harper's Weekly, from the pen of Dickens, Wilkie Collins, and Reade. The commencement of this tale affords a good opportunity for parties residing in the country to form clubs, and obtain Harper's Weekly for the closing price of subscription.

The circulation of Harper's Weekly being now over 120,000 copies each week, it is the best advising medium in the country.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1862.

PROGRESS OF VICTORY.

ISLAND No. 10 is ours! It couldn't stand Commodore Foote's mortar-shelling, and seems to have surrendered after only a single firing, abandoning to us quantities of stores, guns, ammunition, etc., which the rebels can not replace. And the garrison escaped, if they did escape, remains to be ascertained. Thus falls the second rebel strong-hold on the Mississippi.

The next is Randolph, which Commodore Foote will probably have assailed before this paper reaches the public eye. But meanwhile we have authentic intelligence that General Smith and M'Clernand are at Savannah, Tennessee, in the rear of Memphis and below Randolph, with the victorious army from Fort Donelson, probably 30,000 strong. Thus Randolph is flanked as Columbus was, and if the garrison fight successfully there, their only line of flight will be off. Will they not deem it wise to anticipate the inevitable event by another evacuation? And if they do, will not Memphis follow the example of Nashville before another week elapses?

At the hour we write, Commodore Foster, with a powerful battery of mortar and gun boats, is thundering at the gates of New Orleans. What resistance he will meet no one can tell. One account states that every gun-boat but the Mississippi is under arms, drilling daily under the traitor Mansfield Lovell, late of New York. Another says that there are not fifteen left to man the Baton Rouge. It is stated that the rebels have one or two iron-clad rams there, which may, perhaps, if they are ready, contest the passage of three of the gun-boats. But of the final result of the attack there can be no reasonable doubt. New Orleans, like Nashville and Memphis, will object to be shelled, and early in April, if not late in March, Foster and Porter will make himself under the glorious old flag in the Lower Mississippi.

Of movements nearer home it is not quite safe to speak. General Joe Johnston has fallen back upon a new defensive line along the Rappahannock and Rapidan, and is waiting to be attacked. GENERAL M'CLELLAN is not pleased with an army which must be fully double that of Johnston, and is choosing his point of attack. Where that point will be, a few days will decide. The public may rest assured that it will not be where the rebels expect it.

A leading foreign critic, describing the position of the hostile armies three months ago, PRONOUNCED THE LINE FROM NORFOLK, THROUGH MANASSAS AND BOWLING GREEN TO COLUMBUS PERFECTLY IMPREGNABLE, and predicted that every attack made by GENERAL M'CLELLAN upon that line would fail. He also declared that stronger than the famous Italian Quadrilateral. If any one had told him that within three months from that time MANASSAS, BOWLING GREEN, and Columbus would be abandoned by the rebels without firing a gun, and that the garrisons would be scattering in dismay, without arms and without stores, throughout the South, he would probably have been less surprised than he will be to hear that the General-in-chief's genius has contrived these results is being savagely and brutally abused for his incompetency by the New York Tribune.

M'CLELLAN'S ADDRESS TO HIS ARMY.

THE following is an extract from an Order of the Day issued by General M'Clellan from Fairfax Court House on 14th instant:

SOLDIERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC!

For a long time I have kept you inactive, but not without a purpose. You were to be disciplined, armed, and instructed. The formidable artillery you now have had to be created. A new base of operations was to be secured, certain results. I have told you back that you might give this daily labor to the rebellion that has distracted our once happy country.

The patience you have shown, and your confidence in your General, are worth a dozen victories. Those preliminary results are now accomplished. I feel that the patient labors of many months have produced their fruit. The Army of the Potomac is now a real army, magnificent in material, admirable in discipline and instruction, and excellently equipped and armed. Your commanders are all that I could wish. The moment for action has arrived, and I know that I can trust in you to save our country. As I ride through your ranks I see in your faces the unconquerable spirit of victory and the determination to conquer or die. The period of inaction has passed. I will bring you now face to face with the rebels, and only prove that God may defend the right!

These words will thrill the heart of every soldier on the Potomac. GENERAL M'CLELLAN, Jeon, is a believer in the efficacy of military eloquence: his addresses to his soldiers, from his first march into Western Virginia, are the true lyrics of the war. If you wish to ascertain wherein true eloquence consists, compare his addresses with the speeches and proclamations of Joe Johnson the rebel, "General" Howell Cobb, and the other military propagandists of slavery.

Last year the soldiers of the army of the Potomac should be so weak of heart and mind as to be misled from the path of duty by the shamefully mad atrocious attacks upon General M'Clellan which have garnished one or two despicable newspapers published in this city, the Major-General Commanding could not have done it.

In whatever direction you may move, however strange my actions may appear to you, ever bear in mind that my first duty is to the army, and then to the flag. Any thing where I know you wish to be—on the decisive battle-field. It is my business to place you there.

I shall demand of you great, heroic exertion, rapid and long marches, desperate combats, privations perhaps. We will share them together, and when this vital war is over we will all return to our homes, and feel that we can ask the highest honor that the grateful countrymens that we belonged to the Army of the Potomac.

These brief, manly sentences fulfill the highest requirements of military eloquence. A single manswarable argument disposes of the cavaliers who have assailed M'Clellan with the weapon of their own ignorance; the closing appeal will rouse whatever is manly and noble and truly heroic in the breast of his troops.

None of Napoleon's proclamations formed "Orders" reveals a higher order of genius, or promises better results than this Address of General M'Clellan's.

If he can fight as well as he writes, the Army of the Potomac will win imperishable glory.

THE KEY TO RUSSELL.

THE following letter is worth perusal:

WASHINGTON, March 16, 1862.

YOUR NEW YORK paper of to-day's issue had on Russell, of the London Times, for his mistakes about this country and the contest now raging, which has attended his predictions. Yet I venture to say that the Doctor has been more sinned against than sinning. He is a genial, whole-souled Irishman, fond of good company, good liquor, and racy fun; as a writer, possessed of considerable descriptive power and a thorough mastery of British newspaper slang; withal, not much given to do his own thinking, and a good judge of whom he can get imbued with the faculty of omitting the acts of facts and notions, or finding the reasons for the events he witnesses. He is by trade a reporter, and a very good one. His misfortune has been that when he has been sent out to look at the elephant he has never known what to report, and has been the victim of any one who chose to impose upon him. He has been the victim of JEFF DAVIS and his rebel foreign bunkers, New York club men, and that exquisite circle of semi-civilized Washington celebrities are so notorious, and who have no more understanding of or influence over the American mind than the Hottentots of Africa. The fact is, that they undoubtedly believed—that the Union war game, and that the North would not fight. And he, poor man, wrote the whole to the Times to appear side by side with the accounts of the Great Exhibition.

On his return from the South, warned by previous experience, he refused to be interviewed by copolic, and established his head-quarters here. Through the influence of Lord Lyons and some of the foreign ministers, he was introduced into some of our "best society," and from that time to this we have rarely been able to inspect the London Times, and many whole sentences in his recent letters he has picked up in conversation here.

You must consider that the institution is almost as Southern a city as Charleston. Though the number of slaves actually held here is small, the influence of that institution, socially, is as great as if resided here, wholly or in part, for the past ten or fifteen years. There is no doubt in the minds of all of the Union is the slavery interest stronger, in good society, than in the Federal Capital. It is disreputable, in our leading circles, to object to that institution. In the estimation of our good families in Southern society a gentleman is decidedly unmannerly who does not treat his principles, decidedly in favor of the South in the present contest. One of the most respectable negroes admirably with those of the leading families, is Mr. Secretary SEWARD, and no better friends any where than M. Mercier, who represents France, and M. Stoeckel, who represents Russia. These gentlemen have had the best illumination of the rebels, and in their contemptuous pity for the deluded North. They were certain, before the affair at Fort Donelson, that the North could win no victory, and wrote as much to their courts. So did other foreign ministers. The whole feeling of the diplomatic corps has been so emphatically hostile to the United States that a man who was invited to a diplomatic dinner came away convinced that it was all up with the country, and that Europe was going to recognize the rebels early next morning.

Here you have the key to poor Bombastes' nonsense. He has merely repeated what he has heard any time these six or eight months in diplomatic and fashionable circles in this city.

It was in the power of General M'Clellan and the President to set him right; but they had other fish to fry. I suppose they are very sorry for him. Seward is, I'm sure!

THE LOUNGER.

AGITATION.

"It is very easy to say that slavery caused the rebellion. But why didn't you let slavery alone? Why were you always agitating? Why were you forever roaring and raving about slavery, which was none of your business?"

Such is the secret question of many honest minds. But if they were as intelligent as they are honest they would ask it. For slavery would always have been let alone by the country if it had let the country alone. It had been content with its own proposition, that it was a local and a State institution, the country, confident that the Slave States would gradually be compelled to provide for its peaceful extinction, would have pitied and defended, but it would not have divided politically upon the question.

But when slavery, claiming, on one side, for immunity, that it was a State affair, and on the other, for aggression, that it was established and protected by the National Constitution—in pursuance of that claim precipitated upon the side of New York the law of New York forbidding it—sought to corrupt the Territories, and to force upon a reluctant free white labor—and picked a quarrel with Mexico, and tried to pick another with Spain to get more slave and more slave-territory, with consequent preferred slave-representation in Congress—to wield the most enormous political power in the Supreme Court decisive, without any case to decide, that slavery was lawful wherever the Constitution touched it, the country said: "We must conquer slavery, or slavery will conquer us.

The laboring men—who are the great mass of the people—knowing that by their superior numbers they and their children must look for homes to the fertile fields of the Western Territories, saw that slavery disputed the ground; that the great slave-holders would engross vast estates to be cultured with slave labor, and that their land ind hand upon their bread-and-butter. The common sense of the laboring men in the country saw that the slave-holders meant to fill their places in the new States with slaves. Consequently the slavery politicians of the North and the South vainly labelled themselves hoarse about State Rights, that the Territories, like negroes, and their fitness to be slaves, and the workingmen and abolitionists who wanted to bring slaves to the North to fill up the free States, and that for the mass of the people instinctively answered, "If it is a State affair, let it stay at home in the States: if the negroes are inferior, and born to be slaves, poor devils! we are sorry for them, but it's none of our business; if the South will secede for the wicked abolitionists, why, is it any wickeder to fill our places with black men in the old States than in the new? It was trying to get hold of our future houses, and to disgrace the labor by which we live." And in every case the people, by overwhelming tremendous majorities, the transparent trick of slavery.

And so because slavery would not let the country alone, but was forever agitating it by frantic efforts to engross the United States limits, that the nation could not let it alone. When you have a wolf alone that is smelling about your child's cradle—when you have a disease alone that is creeping the springs of your life—then you may look to see a free people letting slavery alone when it is trying to take to itself one out of three States, as well as to deprive them of political rights. For the will obeys the strongest motive, and that supports the universal despotism of slavery, and its right to go wherever it chooses, is the same party which tries to destroy the right of property of the condition of the slave to that of the free black at the North, of a free laborer in England, in order to establish its logical premise that capital ought to own labor.

Let the fairly understood, then, that if slavery had not agitated there would have been no agitation. The whole question of black men and the justice of the system in any State of the Union would have been tolerated by the people of the other States, so long as the slaves were not imported, and so long as their rights were not threatened, as polygamy is tolerated in Turkey, or cannibalism in the Feejee Islands. But when the country saw that the rights, at the labor, at the very existence of free citizens were within the limits of those States, it did just what they would do if the Turks should go to every house and seize as concubines, or the Feejee savages to eat their children for dessert. Slavery had stealthily struck at the country for years. It boldly struck at it openly. In 1860 it put its heel upon it. In 1870 slavery will be a dried relic.

TO A FRIEND IN BALTIMORE.

THE preceding remarks will be accepted by a courteous friend who writes to the Lounger, and signs himself "A Loyal Union man, but conservative," as partly a reply to his letter. The letter is candid and calm. The writer will understand that it is not possible to publish communications in this column, but will doubtless concede that the following is a fair summary of his points:

The letter is suggested by an article of the Lounger in No. 271, March 8, to the effect that henceforth either slavery or its agitation must be suppressed; and that, as the latter is impossible, the former must go to the wall.

The writer says that he holds no slaves, and means to own none; yet he is sure that an effort suddenly to abolish slavery in the most moderate and gradual manner, would lead to civil war, making both races in these States.

He would be glad to see some reasonable plan of gradual abolition in his own State. He says: "If slavery is to be removed there is no way for it, consistent with humanity and justice, but by first providing that all slaves born after that day shall be free on arriving at 21 or 25 years, for if males, at 21, if females. By this gradual mode, alone could there be preserved to the blacks the habit of labor. As one or more States became free, the slaves from him, yet in servitude, his relatives and friends, and would be induced by their example to continue to work. If slavery is ever removed, the moral must begin in the most Northern of the Slave States, and its mode must be gradual; but no interference from without will ever bring it to pass. On the contrary, we know that the abolitionists, however well-meaning they may be, are practically the slave's worst enemies. As an objection to the proposed amendment, it may be said by the immediate abolitionist that, so soon as gradual emancipation was determined upon, many of the slaves would run away, and thus deprived of all advantage from the measure; but this difficulty would, of course, be provided against by the law of emancipation."

He then protests most earnestly against agitation outside of the Slave States, as likely to delay the result.

He complains of the Lounger's statement that Fort M'Henry is the secret of the quiet of Baltimore as harsh, unmerited, untrue, and impolitic. The writer cannot be accused of any disloyal intent in her present position the writer does deny."

In reply, the Lounger will say that if this impending and inevitable discussion could be conducted in the spirit of this letter, we should all be content.

The writer and the Lounger are evidently agreed as to the general question.

As to the method of achieving the result, the writer will observe that the Lounger has not said that immediate and unconditional emancipation is desirable.

And as to agitation, the writer of the letter will find its answer in the preceding article.

The people of the free States, intelligent and obedient to law and good precedent, when they saw the tendency and efforts of slavery, as a political power and industrial system, sought to arrest them by every peaceful means of legislation, by maintaining the Government, they intended, by preventing its perversion, to establish liberty and not slavery as the national policy. The most peaceful, lawful process—according to the spirit and letter of the Constitution—to the ballot-box, discussion, and to progressive civilization. The constitutional majority of the country intended nothing unlawful, nothing unconstitutional, nothing by force or party. They believed that the Constitution was a charter of liberty, and not of slavery and despotism, and that the fair operation of the Government secured every right. With the system of slavery in the States they had no desire to interfere legally. Although slavery had been tearing the country to pieces in the vain effort to establish its supremacy. This perfectly lawful, peaceful policy of the great honest mass of the people, was entirely understood by the abettors of the Rebellion when they began their supervised bond upon the institution, and therefore the Southern attack at Sumter, and that the Democratic party at the North would be more partisan than patriotic. When the smoke of Sumter cannon cleared away they saw that they had failed. Henceforward their doom was only a question of time.

Now a nation that has been roused to political action by the aggression of slavery—that has voted out of power every party that has been formed by the military rebellion of slavery to lead itself with a stupendous force, and to overthrow and bolster of its loyal citizens across a continent, will be eager submit to the dictation and domination of slavery, not will it have any fear that slavery will gain money for nothing. Henceforth the agitation which the Lounger has spoken of for its extension and domination must cease, and henceforth the nation will certainly secure that result, or it will yield to the rebellion.

The Border States will decide as their wisdom suggests. They will encounter no unfair, no unreasonable, no unconstitutional opposition. Thousands of men in those States have been faithful, and true to the end, even if they have accepted the numerical majority, the working minority has been able to vest Tennessee temporarily from the Union, and to blood-stain border States with fire and blood, and that those States have been held in the Union, not by their own efforts, but by United States volunteers. The people of those States will see that slavery, whether right or wrong, generates rebellion, and that so long as they retain slavery, so long they will be the battle-field. If, then, they wish to be at the cause of trouble, their nation offers to help them. If they prefer that their field shall still be battle-fields, they will so decide. If, with Mr. Secretary, of Kentucky, they should favor the rebellion rather than to listen to any emancipation even upon their own terms, the struggle will be prolonged and embittered, but the event must be the same.

If our able Lounger's courteous and candid correspondent in Baltimore will do all that he can to repress the efforts of slavery to convulse the country by seeking to extend itself, and within his own State will vigorously agitate for some wise system of emancipation, he will be doing a patriotic duty. But manifestly, while slavery continues to threaten the people of the Free States politically, industrially, and with arms, those people must defend themselves in every possible way; and a most agitated agitation is inevitable until peace is not only conquered but secured.

CORRECTION WANTED.

The other evening there was a large meeting at the Cooper Institute, and the name of Mr. Bancroft, the historian, was published the next morning as one of the Vice-Presidents. The following day the papers published Mr. Bancroft's disclaimer. He was neither at the meeting, nor had he allowed the use of his name.

This is an abuse which needs correction. Half of the public meetings in this city derive their weight and influence from the names of their officers. They are printed conspicuously and read every where, and stand as sponsors of the sentiments and action of the meeting.

Now when the meeting is intended to support a decided policy or to express strong convictions, nothing can be unfairer toward an individual, or more futile for the purpose of the meeting, than to use a man's name without his consent. For if the affair be of the least importance he will publicly resent the unhandsome familiarity by disclaiming all connection with the meeting. Whereupon the conclusion is inevitable that other names may have been used in the same manner, although the persons do not choose to expose the matter, and an air of doubt and weakness is thrown over the whole thing.

Mr. Bancroft does not live in any inaccessible quarter of the city; and if his name be desirable to give dignity to a meeting why not ask his consent? Even if he would give his name, if you asked him, he might very properly resent the use of it otherwise, because he knows as well as you that his name is thought useful or it would not be taken—and he, like every other man, is to decide when it shall be used.

A famous clergyman once saw his name upon a poster as a speaker at some meeting, and he went to the Committee and told them to take it off. They apologized—and left it on. The meeting was large—and all the larger from the hope of hearing the clergyman. By-and-by the President rose and said that he was very sorry to announce that, although they had expected the reverend brother, he was unfortunately unable to be present. "Not at all," cried a loud voice from the rear of the church, and the audience rose and turned in amazement, while the voice continued: "I am the reverend brother in question, and I am here; but I told the Committee that I could not speak, and that they must take off my name. Now I am going to speak, and I say that the use of my name under the circumstances is a swindle." The reverend brother said more, but that is enough.

The simple rule is that, if you want a man's name to help you or your cause, go and ask him if you may have it.

DON'T FORGET THE NUMBER.

In a great city, while every body is sure that every thing can be found, the great difficulty is to find it. Even those who live in it are perplexed; but the case seems hopeless for those who live away from town in the country. This hardship is felt as much in the matter of books as in any other. Valuable books are constantly published upon every subject. But very few of them are known to any one who is not in the habit of reading book advertisements, and of these the number that any one has the time or chance to read is very small. Then the valuable books are often issued in small editions. They go out of print. They cease to appear in advertisements or in the book shops, and are laid away in those fascinating catacombs, "old book" shops. There they may be found in comely form, in various bindings, and if a really ancient book, in the several editions.

Now all over the country, in quiet and remote places, where such a paper as this finds its way, there are plenty of persons who suddenly begin some special study. They do not even know what books they want, nor where they can be found. They only know that it is somewhere in the city. But how shall they find out what the book is, where it is, how much it costs, and what other books may be had upon the subject?

Or another man wants a new volume of history, or a certain late novel, or book of travels. How is he to find out all about it? How is he to get it and pay for it?

This is precisely the question that Mr. Walter Low, at the Publishers' Circular Office, No. 39 Walker Street, New York, proposes to answer. He will send any book wanted by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, if you will only send the price in coin, United States stamps, or Eastern bills. And if you do not happen to know the price, he will send you any information about any book if you will send a stamp for the reply.

This he will do, and do willingly and well; and this Lounger informs the great lounging, reading, and studying fraternity all over the land, that he says it with full knowledge. Mr. Low's education has been among books. It is his business to know about them, as well as to know them; and when he says that he will send the book or the information you want, you may be sure that he will do what he says.

QUARRELING.

We have taken no part in the quarrel about General M'Clellan. The bitter dispute about General Frémont last autumn—the furious letters—the slanderous reports—the silly stories—all served to convince any candid man that to assert any decided conviction upon such kind of testimony was the height of folly.

What was true of Frémont is no less true of M'Clellan. As we said then that General Frémont had yet to show that he was a great military leader, so we say now of General M'Clellan. But as we said then, there was no proof that Frémont was not equal to his task, so we say now of the Potomac General.

With the vehement party denunciation of M'Clellan no honest [illegible] sympathy. This Lounger has certainly very positive opinions about the cause and cure of this rebellion. But it would be rather a violent inference for him to make, that a man who did not agree with his view was therefore a poor military chief; and it would surely be very unfair for him to explain every military movement that he could not comprehend by the hypothesis of incapacity or treachery. The justice that it was only fair to demand for Frémont shall certainly be accorded to M'Clellan in this column.

One thing of course is clear: if the rebels stole away from Manassas unknown to M'Clellan, the retreat outgeneraled him; because, even if he contemplated a retreat upon their part, to save his military skill he must consciously compel them to it. On the other hand, if he knew that they must retreat, the question is naturally asked why he did not fall upon them in the act.

Yet no one of us is in a condition to answer these questions, simply because we do not know the facts. We may assume a certain state of things, and it may prove to be correct; but it is rather hard to make a man's good name suffer until we know that it is so. For instance, the question is constantly asked, Why was not the rebel army of the Potomac attacked in December? Now this question is asked by those who can not possibly know, but who assume a certain condition of affairs. We can easily enough rebut one speculation by another.

On the 1st of August M'Clellan assumed command of the army. It appears by the President's War Order that he had a supervision of the whole line. The army was to collect, drill, and organize; it was to be equipped in every way; arms were to be made, every thing was to be done, and every thing was subordinated to one condition, namely, that the rebellion must be virtually suppressed by May or June of this year. Is it not, then, perfectly conceivable that under all these circumstances the plan of campaign adopted was to prepare the whole line, then to strike at every point, and push straight forward to final victory? And is it not clear that it was incompatible with this plan to strike prematurely, even if successfully, in any single part? Suppose we had dispersed them at Manassas, and they had sent their army round to the West, to carry the war into Indiana and Illinois?

M'Clellan may be an incompetent General—but did not Frémont seem so to those who did not know the facts when Lyon fell and Lexington surrendered? They have each a genius for silence. Frémont has survived his slanderers—let us hope that M'Clellan will survive his.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"There are people," says Mrs. Partington, "who can bathe with perfect impurity in water as cold as Greenland's icy mountains or India's coral strands; but, as for me, I prefer to bathe in water that's a leetle torpid."

Professor Drycuss, of California, was sitting with his wife in the observatory at San Francisco the other day, when Madam Professor stumped him by remarking:

"My dear, do you know that some of these nasty Chinamen put me more in mind of calves than human beings?"

"Eh! what?" said the Professor, pricking up his ears, as he first looked at the group of traveling Chinamen, and then at his best beloved; "what do you mean, Madam? Chinese like calves! pooh—pooh!"

"Not all, Professor," replied Mrs. D., "only those that come from Macao" (pronounced "Macow"); and the little woman looked up quizzically in his face.

"Martha," rejoined the Professor, as he looked smilingly down upon his better half, "that was a horrible 'bull!'"

A gentleman having lately been called on to subscribe to a course of lectures, declined, "because," said he, "my wife gives me a lecture every night for nothing."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, March 11, in the Senate, Senator Sumner asked to be discharged from further consideration of proposed relief to Ireland and matters connected with the Trent affair. Notice was given of a bill to allow foreign vessels to carry the California mails. A resolution was introduced instructing the Naval Committee to inquire into the circumstances connected with the recent naval engagement at Fortress Monroe. The bill providing for the confiscation of the property of persons resisting the laws and authority of the republic was taken up, when Senator Carlile, of Virginia, addressed the Senate at length in opposition to it. Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, offered an amendment to the Confiscation bill, which was ordered to be printed, when the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a resolution was introduced, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, providing for the establishment of foundries at Chicago, Illinois; Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and Poughkeepsie, New York; for an armory and arsenal at Columbus, Ohio; for a saltpetre and powder dépôt at Indianapolis, Indiana, and for powder-mills at Trenton, New Jersey. A bill was introduced for the establishment of navy-yards at our Northern lake-ports. The regular order, the resolution in favor of assisting States in the emancipation of slaves, in accordance with the recommendation of the President's late special Message, was taken up. Amendments were offered by different members, and a long and very interesting debate took place. A vote was finally taken, and the resolution was adopted by eighty-eight yeas to thirty-one nays.

On Wednesday, March 12, in the Senate, petitions were presented from citizens of Kentucky in opposition to emancipation. The resolution for the expulsion of Senator Powell, of Kentucky, was reported back from the Judiciary Committee, with the recommendation that it should not be adopted. A joint resolution of thanks to Lieutenant Worden, commander of the Monitor in the recent naval engagement near Fortress Monroe, and the sailors under his command, was introduced and laid over. A bill was also introduced to repeal all laws preventing foreign vessels carrying the mails between New York and Aspinwall. The House resolution of co-operation with the President's Special Message, in favor of aiding States which desire to emancipate their slaves, was referred to the Judiciary Committee. The bill to authorize the Secretary of War to accept financial aid from State Governments was passed. The bill defining the pay of the army was taken up, discussed at length, and finally passed. The bill for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia was debated, and several amendments to it were adopted, but the Senate adjourned without reaching a vote on the subject.——In the House, a resolution of thanks to Mr. Ericsson, the builder of the mail-clad battery Monitor, Lieutenant Worden, her commander, and her officers and crew, was introduced and referred to the Naval Committee. The District of Columbia Committee reported a bill for the abolition of slavery in the District, which was sent back to that committee by the House. The Territorial Committee reported a bill providing for Territorial governments for the rebellious States, which caused some debate, and was finally laid on the table. A bill providing a temporary government for Arizona was reported to the House. The Tax bill was then taken up in the Committee of the Whole House, when an extended and animated debate took place, which was participated in principally by Messrs. Bingham, of Ohio, and Wadsworth, of Kentucky, the discussion being made to bear principally on the slavery question. Without coming to a decision the committee rose and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, March 13, in the Senate, the Naval Committee were instructed to prepare some fitting notice of the bravery of seaman John Davis, whose conduct was recently alluded to in terms of praise by Commodore Dupont in his official report. A resolution of inquiry of the Secretary of the Navy, with regard to the removal of the Naval Academy from Annapolis, Maryland, to Newport, Rhode Island, was offered by Senator Kennedy. The Senate voted thanks to Commodore Foote, of the Western flotilla, and Lieutenant Worden, of the mail-clad steamer Monitor, and the officers and men under them, for their recent brilliant exploits. The resolution for the expulsion of Senator Powell, of Kentucky, was taken up, and Senator Davis, of Kentucky, spoke at length in favor of it. He was interrupted by Senator Powell; but, without deciding the question, the Senate went into executive session, and subsequently adjourned.——In the House, the thanks of the republic were voted to General Curtis and his officers and men for gallant conduct in their recent engagement with the rebels, and sympathy for the friends and relatives of the loyal slain was expressed. The National Tax bill was then taken up, in Committee of the Whole House, and a long debate ensued, consuming the greater portion of the day's session and being participated in by various members. An amendment, to allow each State to assume its quota of the tax, was one of the subjects of discussion in connection with the bill, which proposition was finally withdrawn, and, without taking definite action, the committee rose.

On Friday, March 14, in the Senate, the resolution reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, giving power to the Secretary of the Navy to settle the accounts of contractors who have failed to fulfill their engagements, was passed. A resolution was proposed, but objected to, to give the President additional power in the control of military affairs, and a bill to provide for the construction of additional iron-clad gun-boats, and for the completion of the Stevens battery, was introduced and referred. A bill favoring the confiscation of the property of rebels was also introduced and referred. Bills were introduced and referred giving the President control of the gun-boat appropriations, and for the regulation of the army corps, and then the resolution in favor of expelling Senator Powell was taken up, when Senator Powell addressed the Senate at length in his own defense, replying to the remarks made by his colleague, Senator Davis, on the preceding day. A long debate ensued, and the resolution was defeated by eleven yeas to twenty-eight nays, when the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Senate resolution of thanks to Commodore Foote and his command was passed by a unanimous vote. The resolution of thanks to Lieutenant Worden, of the Monitor, was referred to the Naval Committee. The Pacific Railroad bill was reported to the House, and made the special order for Tuesday next. The Tax bill was taken up, and an amendment permitting States to assume their separate quotas was rejected; but no final action was reached, and the House adjourned. Both Houses adjourned over to Monday.

On Monday, March 17, in the Senate, the Military Committee reported a bill for the organization of the army corps staffs. A resolution that the Naval Committee report on the expediency of an appropriation for testing iron-cladding for vessels of war was adopted. The joint resolution giving the President power to assign officers to military commands without regard to seniority was discussed and sent back to the Military Committee. The Post-office Appropriation bill was considered, and amendments agreed to authorizing a more frequent than semi-monthly mail between San Francisco and Crescent City; that all American vessels shall carry to foreign ports such mails as the Postmaster-General may deliver on board, and that vessels coming from foreign ports shall receive any mail matter from consuls, the compensation for which service not to be more than the usual postage. The bill was then passed. The proposition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia was taken up, but postponed. The Senate then held an executive session and adjourned.——In the House, the Senate joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive moneys appropriated by States for the payment of the volunteers of such States was adopted. A resolution of inquiry of the Secretary of War as to recent charters of vessels, and the compensation allowed for the same, was adopted. The Military Committee were instructed to report some plan for securing to the sick and wounded soldiers better medical treatment. The District of Columbia Committee were instructed to inquire into the circumstances connected with the recent arrest in the District, and transfer to and imprisonment in Baltimore, of two persons, in alleged violation of the Constitution. The House then, in Committee of the Whole, took up the Tax bill, when a debate ensued, after which the House adjourned.

THE NEW MILITARY DEPARTMENTS.

Executive Mansion, Washington, March 11, 1862.

Major-General M'Clellan, having personally taken the field at the head of the Army of the Potomac, until otherwise ordered, is relieved from the command of the other military departments, he retaining command of the Department of the Potomac.

Ordered, further, That the two departments now under the respective commands of Generals Halleck and Hunter, together with so much of that under General Buell as lies west of a north and south line, indefinitely drawn through Knoxville, Tennessee, be consolidated and designated the Department of the Mississippi, and that, until otherwise ordered, Major-General Halleck have command of said department.

Ordered, also, That the country west of the Department of the Potomac and east of the Department of the Mississippi be a military department, to be called the Mountain Department, and that the same be commanded by Major-General Frémont.

That all the commanders of departments, after the receipt of this order by them respectively, report severally and directly to the Secretary of War, and that prompt, full, and frequent reports will be expected of all and each of them.

Abraham Lincoln.

WINCHESTER OCCUPIED.

The important town of Winchester, Virginia, is in our possession. A portion of General Banks's division, under General Gorman, occupied the town of Berryville, Virginia, on 11th. There were five hundred of the rebel cavalry in the place; but upon the Third New York Cavalry, properly supported by artillery and infantry, charging them, they fled in confusion toward Winchester. During the night the pickets of General Gorman came in contact with portions of Colonel Ashby's rebel cavalry, and were compelled to fall back; but the General made a reconnoissance in force to within two miles of Winchester, and charging upon the rebels, dispersed them, taking several prisoners, and killing or wounding four of the rebels. This reconnoissance sealed the fate of Winchester. The enemy were blinded and misled by the movement of our troops, and they commenced the evacuation of the place on the afternoon of 11th. General Hamilton advanced from Bunker Hill, the Michigan Cavalry heading the column. The rebel cavalry, one thousand two hundred strong, and supported by a section of artillery, gave battle at five o'clock in the afternoon. Our cavalry were supported by the First Maryland Infantry and a battery of artillery. The fight was a short one. The rebels fled, leaving their guns behind them, and at daylight on 12th our troops entered the city as the rear-guard of the enemy was flying out of it.

EVACUATION OF NEW MADRID.

The rebels abandoned New Madrid on Thursday evening, 13th, leaving a quantity of guns and stores behind them. Some fighting took place between the rebel gun-boats, under Captain Hollins, and our siege batteries, in which we lost twenty killed and wounded. The loss of the enemy is not known, as they carried off all their dead and wounded with them.

CAPTURE OF ISLAND NO. 10.

At 5.30 a.m. on 16th, the Mississippi flotilla got under way, and dropped down slowly until about seven o'clock, when the flag-ship, being about twenty miles ahead and six miles above the island, discovered a stern-wheel steamer run out from the shelter of a point on the Kentucky shore, and steam down the river. Four shells were thrown after her, but the distance was too great for the shots to take effect. At nine o'clock the fleet rounded to about three miles above Island No. 10. The Commodore then ordered three of the mortar boats into position.

A dispatch from the Associated Press reporter says: Eight mortars shelled the battery above the island to-day. The enemy left it several times, but returned. They only fired with two guns. Our shells reached the island easily. General Pope has sent dispatches to Commodore Foote, saying that his heavy guns command the river, so that neither steamboat nor gun-boat of the enemy can pass. The mortar fleet threw two hundred and forty shells, and the Benton forty-one. In response to a serenade at St. Louis, on 17th, General Halleck announced from the balcony of the Planters' House that Island No. 10 is ours, with all the ammunition and transports the enemy had there. He said also that another victory had been won in Arkansas, in which three rebel Colonels were captured.

CAPTURE OF NEWBERN.

General Burnside, who left Roanoke Island with the bulk of his force a few days since, has attacked and taken Newbern, North Carolina. The resistance was stout; we lost 90 killed and 100 wounded. We took a large quantity of ammunition and guns.

OUR TROOPS IN SOUTHERN TENNESSEE.

The forces of Generals Smith, M'Clernand, Sherman, Wallace, and Hurlbut, have arrived at Savannah, Tennessee. The force of the rebels in the vicinity was variously stated at from 30,000 to 100,000 men. The division of General Lewis Wallace advanced on Saturday to Purdy, in M'Nairy County, and burned the bridge and tore up the track of the railroad leading from Humboldt to Corinth, Mississippi, cutting off a train laden with rebel troops.

MEMPHIS IN ANARCHY.

Memphis is reported in a state of anarchy. The citizens are flying from there, and cotton, molasses, sugar, and other merchandise were being shipped South. Such was the insubordination of the citizens that martial law was proclaimed in Memphis on 10th, in order to compel the people to turn out and fight.

Norfolk and Richmond are also under martial law.

THE BATTLE OF PARIS.

At the late battle at Paris, Tennessee, our forces defeated the rebels, six hundred strong, and took possession of the town on the morning of the 12th inst. General Halleck's official report of the battle puts down the loss of the enemy at one hundred killed, wounded, and prisoners.

THE BATTLE AT FORT CRAIG.

A desperate fight took place in the vicinity of Fort Craig, New Mexico, on the 21st of February. It appears that skirmishing, resulting in the daily discomfiture of the rebel Texans, had been going on from the 17th. On the morning of the 21st, at about nine o'clock, a serious battle commenced; and the conflict raged throughout the day. The enemy made desperate charges on one howitzer battery, which was under Captain M'Rae's command, but were repulsed with loss. At last 600 of the Texans, armed with carbines, revolvers, long seven-pound bowie-knives, made their last and desperate charge; the shock was terrible; the battery poured upon them its fearful storm; Captain Plimpton, with a company of United States infantry, was defending M'Rae's guns; his men stood up against this mighty charge like a wall of granite, till half their number were dead; then they retreated; Captain M'Rae, left alone, sat down on one of his guns, with his revolver in his hand, refusing to fly; he died like a hero, the last man at his post. Lieutenants Michler and Stone, and other officers, were slain or wounded. Our loss was about 200. In spite of this success, the day may be said to have been won by the Union troops.

OUR WOUNDED AND DEAD SCALPED AND MANGLED.

The following copy of correspondence has been sent from the commander of the army in Arkansas to the commander of the department at St. Louis, and by him published:

Head-quarters, Trans-Mississippi District, March 9, 1862.

To the Commanding Officer of the United States Forces on Sugar Creek, Arkansas:

Sir,—In accordance with the usages of war, I have the honor to request that you will permit the burial party whom I send from this army, with a flag of truce, to attend to the duty of collecting and interring the bodies of the officers and men who fell during the engagement of the 7th and 8th instant. Very respectfully your obedient servant,

Earl Van Dorn,
Major-General Commanding Army.

Head-quarters Army of the Southwest, Pea Ridge, March 9, 1862.

Earl Van Dorn, Commanding Confederate Forces:

Sir,—The General Commanding is in receipt of yours of the 9th, saying that in accordance with the usages of war you send a party to collect and bury the dead. I am directed to say all possible facilities will be given for burying the dead, many of which have already been interred. Quite a number of your surgeons have fallen into our hands, and are permitted to act under parole, and under a General Order from Major-General Halleck further liberty will be allowed them, if such accommodations be reciprocated by you. The General regrets that we find on the battle-field, contrary to civilized warfare, many of the Federal dead who were tomahawked, scalped, and their bodies shamefully mangled, and expressed a hope that this important struggle may not degenerate to a savage warfare. By order of

S. R. Curtis, Brigadier-General.
T. J. M'Kinney, Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

IRON-CLAD VESSELS.

The Senate appears to be awake to the necessity of providing iron-clad war steamers for the navy. A bill was introduced by Senator Hale, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, on 13th, providing for the construction, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, of an iron-clad steam vessel of not less than five or six thousand tons burden, and of great speed and strength, to be used only as a ram, for which purpose $1,000,000 are to be appropriated; also, $13,000,000 for the construction of iron-clad gun-boats, $783,000 for the completion of Stevens's battery, and $500,000 for extending the facilities of the Washington Navy-yard, so as to roll and forge plates for the armored ships.

CONTRACT COMMISSIONERS.

Hon. Joseph Holt and Robert Dale Owen have been appointed Special Commissioners to audit and adjust contracts, orders, and claims on the War Department in respect to arms, ammunition, and stores. They will proceed at once to an investigation and examination.

FOREIGN NEWS.

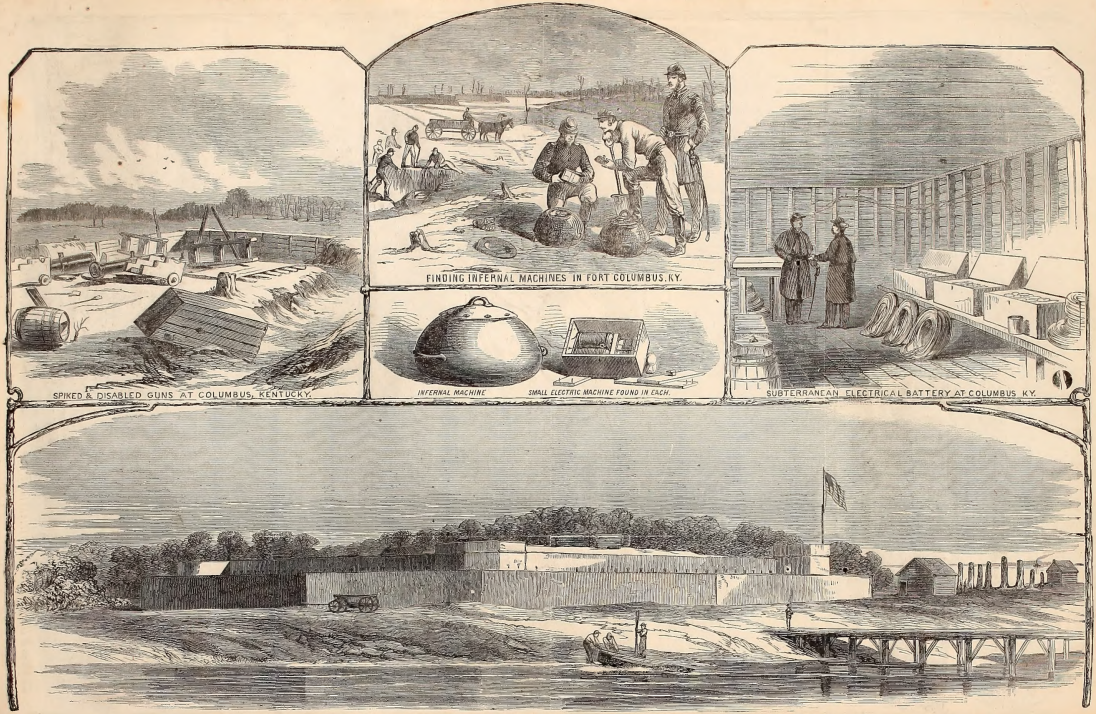
MEXICO.

THE FOREIGN INTERVENTION.

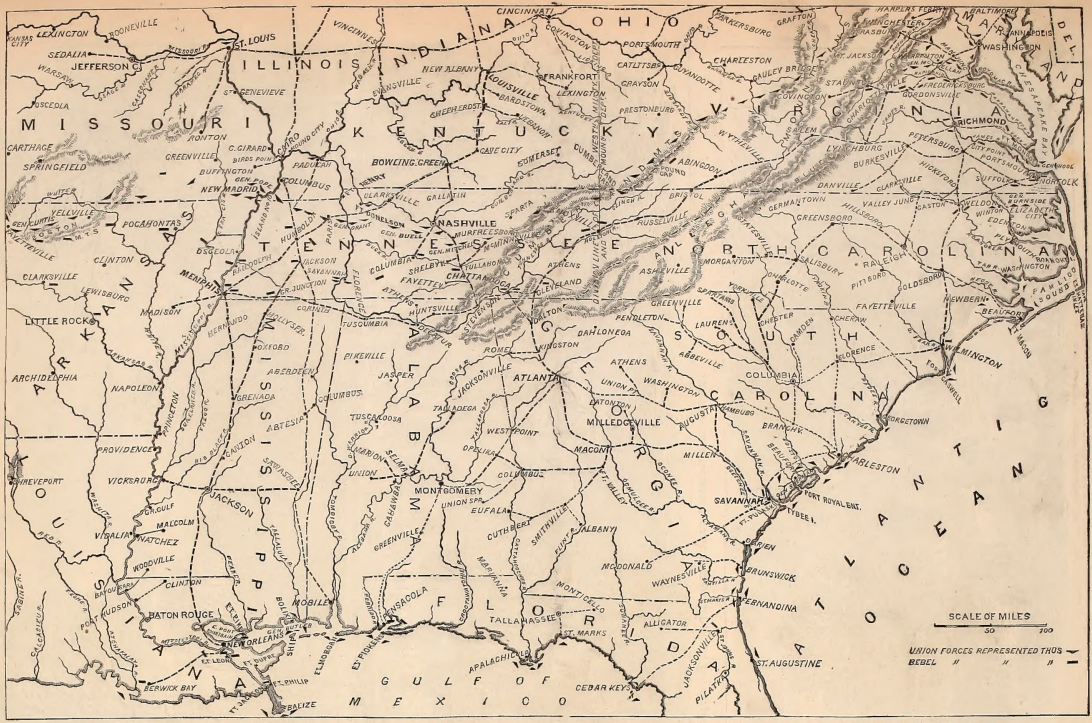
The preliminary treaty of Soledad, agreed upon between the Mexican and Allied commissioners, has been assented to by President Juarez. By this treaty the Allies are permitted to occupy three inland cities, and Vera Cruz was to revert to the Mexican authorities; but it is stated that at latest advices, and when the Allied troops had commenced to occupy the three towns named in the treaty, and when the Mexican flag had been again hoisted in Vera Cruz, and the Mexican officials were returning to resume control there, the English officials became dissatisfied, and it is said that the English forces will be entirely withdrawn. Trouble had also occurred between the French and Spanish, and General Prim was to be superseded by a French commander, and the affairs generally of the Allies seemed to be in great confusion. Two battalions of the Spanish forces had been withdrawn and had arrived at Havana. Accounts from the interior of Mexico report a battle between the insurrectionists and the forces of Juarez, in which the latter were defeated. Mr. Allen, bearer of dispatches to the United States Minister at the city of Mexico, Mr. Corwin, had been murdered between Vera Cruz and the city [illegible]

THE BATTLE OF PEA RIDGE, ARKANSAS—THE FINAL ADVANCE OF OUR TROOPS, MARCH 8, 1862.—[SEE PAGE 202.]

REBEL TORPEDOES, WITH THEIR WEIGHTS & ANCHORS LEFT ON THE LEVEE.



WATER BATTERIES FROM THE BLUFF



COLUMBUS FROM THE FORTIFICATIONS.

COLUMBUS, KENTUCKY, AFTER THE REBEL EVACUATION.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 207.]

REBEL INFERNAL MACHINES (MEMBERS OF THE PEACE SOCIETY) FOUND AT COLUMBUS, KENTUCKY.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 202.]

FORT CLINCH, FERNANDINA, FLORIDA, NOW OCCUPIED BY GENERAL WRIGHT'S UNION FORCES.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEO. R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 203.]

MAP OF THE SOUTHERN STATES, SHOWING THE STRATEGIC POINTS AND THEIR RAILROAD CONNECTIONS, THE PRINCIPAL RIVERS, AND THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE UNION AND REBEL FORCES.

MAJOR-GENERAL M'CLELLAN, MAJOR-GENERAL M'DOWELL, AND STAFFS, ESCORTED BY

BRIDGE OVER BULL RUN, NEAR BLACKBURN'S FORD, BURNED BY THE REBELS.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WARD.]

E FIFTH CAVALRY, CROSSING BULL RUN AT BLACKBURN'S FORD.—[Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.]

EVACUATION AND FIRING OF MANASSAS JUNCTION BY THE REBELS.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 203.]

THE TENNESSEE BLACKSMITH.

NEAR the cross-roads, not far from the Cumberland Mountains, stood the village forge. The smith was a sturdy man of fifty. He was respected, wherever known, for his stern integrity. He served God, and did not fear man—and it might be safely added, nor devil either. His courage was proverbial in the neighborhood; and it was a common remark, when wishing to pay any person a high compliment, to say, "He is as brave as Old Bradley." One night, toward the close of September, as he stood alone by the anvil plying his labors, his countenance evinced a peculiar satisfaction as he brought his hammer down with a vigorous stroke on the heated iron. While blowing the bellows he would occasionally pause and shake his head, as if communing with himself. He was evidently meditating upon something of a serious nature. It was during one of these pauses that the door was thrown open, and a pale, trembling figure staggered into the shop, and, sinking at the smith's feet, faintly ejaculated,

"In the name of Jesus, protect me!"

As Bradley stooped to raise the prostrate form three men entered, the foremost one exclaiming,

"We've treed him at last! There he is! seize him!" and as he spoke he pointed at the crouching figure.

The others advanced to obey the order; but Bradley suddenly arose, seized the sledge-hammer, and brandishing it about his head as if it were a sword, exclaimed,

"Back! Touch him not; or, by the grace of God, I'll brain ye!"

They hesitated, and stepped backward, not wishing to encounter the sturdy smith, for his countenance plainly told them that he meant what he said.

"Do you give shelter to an abolitionist?" fiercely shouted the leader.

"I give shelter to a weak, defenseless man," replied the smith.

"He is an enemy!" vociferated the leader.

"Of the devil!" ejaculated Bradley.

"He is a spy! an abolition hound!" exclaimed the leader, with increased vehemence; "and we must have him. So I tell you, Bradley, you had better not interfere. You know that you are already suspected, and if you insist upon sheltering him it will confirm it."

"Sus-pect-ed! Suspected of what?" exclaimed the smith, in a firm tone, riveting his gaze upon the speaker.

"Why, of adhering to the North," was the reply.

"Adhering to the North!" ejaculated Bradley, as he cast his defiant glances at the speaker. "I adhere to no North!" he continued; "I adhere to my country—my whole country—and will, so help me God! as long as I have breath," he added, as he brought the sledge-hammer to the ground with great force.

"You had better let us have him, Bradley, without farther trouble. You are only risking your own neck by your interference."

"Not as long as I have life to defend him," was the answer. Then pointing toward the door, he continued, "Leave my shop!" and as he spoke he again raised the sledge-hammer.

They hesitated a moment, but the firm demeanor of the smith awed them into compliance with the order.

"You'll regret this in the morning, Bradley," said the leader, as he retreated.

"Go!" was the reply of the smith, as he pointed toward the door.

Bradley followed them menacingly to the entrance of the shop, and watched them until they disappeared from sight down the road. When he turned to go back in the shop he was met by the fugitive, who, grasping his hand, exclaimed,

"Oh! how shall I ever be able to thank you, Mr. Bradley?"

"This is no time for thanks, Mr. Peters, unless it is to the Lord; you must fly the country, and that at once!"

"But my wife and children?"

"Mattie and I will attend to them. But you must go to-night."

"To-night!"

"Yes. In the morning, if not sooner, they will return with a large force and carry you off, and probably hang you on the first tree. You must leave to-night."

"But how?"

"Mattie will conduct you to the rendezvous of our friends. There is a party made up who intend to cross the mountains and join the Union forces in Kentucky. They were to start to-night. They have provisions for the journey, and will gladly share with you."

At this moment a young girl entered the shop, and hurriedly said,

"Father, what is the trouble to-night?" Her eye resting upon the fugitive, she approached him, and, in a sympathizing tone, continued, "Ah, Mr. Peters, has your turn come so soon?"

This was Mattie. She was a fine rosy girl, just passed her eighteenth birthday, and the sole daughter of Bradley's house and heart. She was his all—his wife had been dead five years. He turned toward her, and, in a mild but firm tone, said,

"Mattie, you must conduct Mr. Peters to the rendezvous immediately; then return, and we will call at the parsonage to cheer his family. Quick! No time is to be lost. The blood-hounds are upon the track. They have scented their prey, and will not rest until they have secured him. They may return much sooner than we expect. So haste, daughter, and God bless ye!"

This was not the first time that Mattie had been called upon to perform such an office. She had safely conducted several Union men, who had been hunted from their homes and sought shelter with her father, to the place designated, from whence they made their escape across the mountains into Kentucky. Turning to the fugitive, she said,

"Come, Mr. Peters, do not stand upon ceremony, but follow me."

She left the shop and proceeded but a short distance up the road, and then turned off in a by-path through a strip of woods, closely followed by the fugitive. A brisk walk of half an hour brought them to a small house that stood alone in a secluded spot. Here Mattie was received with a warm welcome by several men, some of whom were engaged in running bullets, while others were cleaning their rifles and fowling-pieces. The lady of the house, a hale woman of forty, was busy stuffing the wallets of the men with biscuits. She greeted Mattie very kindly. The fugitive, who was known to two or three of the party, was received in a bluff, frank spirit of kindness by all, saying that they would make him chaplain of the Tennessee Union regiment when they got to Kentucky.

When Mattie was about to return home two of the party prepared to accompany her; but she protested, warning them of the danger, as the enemy were doubtless abroad in search of the minister. But, notwithstanding, they insisted, and accompanied her until she reached the road a short distance above her father's shop. Mattie hurried on, but was somewhat surprised upon reaching the shop to find it vacant. She hastened into the house, but her father was not there. As she returned to go into the shop she thought she could hear the noise of horses' hoofs clattering down the road. She listened, but the sound soon died away. Going into the shop she blew the fire into a blaze; then beheld that the things were in great confusion, and that spots of blood were upon the ground. She was now convinced that her father had been seized and carried off, but not without a desperate struggle on his part.

As Mattie stood gazing at the pools of blood a wagon containing two persons drove up, one of whom, an athletic young man of five-and-twenty years, got out and entered the shop.

"Good-evening, Mattie! Where is your father?" he said. Then observing the strange demeanor of the girl, he continued, "Why, Mattie, what ails you? What has happened?"

The young girl's heart was too full for her tongue to give utterance, and throwing herself upon the shoulder of the young man, she sobbingly exclaimed:

"They have carried him off! Don't you see the blood?"

"Have they dared to lay hands upon your father? The infernal wretches!"

Mattie recovered herself sufficiently to narrate the events of the evening. When she had finished, he exclaimed:

"Oh that I should have lived to see the day that old Tennessee was to be thus disgraced! Here, Joe!"

At this the other person in the wagon alighted and entered the shop. He was a stalwart negro.

"Joe," continued the young man, "you would like your freedom?"

"Well, Massa John, I wouldn't like much to leabe you, but den I'se like to be a free man."

"Joe, the white race have maintained their liberty by their valor. Are you willing to fight for yours? Ay! fight to the death?"

"I'se fight for yous any time, Massa John."

"I believe you, Joe. But I have desperate work on hand to-night, and I do not want you to engage in it without a prospect of reward. If I succeed I will make you a free man. It is a matter of life and death—will you go?"

"I will, Massa."

"Then kneel down and swear before the ever-living God, that, if you falter or shrink the danger, you may hereafter be consigned to everlasting fire!"

"I swear, Massa," said the negro, kneeling. "An' I hope that Gor Almighty may strike me dead if I don't go wid you through fire and water and ebery ting!"

"I am satisfied, Joe," said his master; then turning to the young girl, who had been a mute spectator of this singular scene, he continued, "Now, Mattie, you get in the wagon and I'll drive down to the parsonage, and you remain there with Mrs. Peters and the children until I bring you some intelligence of your father."

While the sturdy old blacksmith was awaiting the return of his daughter the party that he had repulsed returned with increased numbers and demanded the minister. A fierce quarrel ensued, which resulted in their seizing the smith and carrying him off. They conveyed him to a tavern half a mile distant from the shop, and there he was arraigned before what was termed a vigilance committee. The committee met in a long room on the ground-floor, dimly lighted by a lamp which stood upon a small table in front of the chairman. In about half an hour after Bradley's arrival he was placed before the chairman for examination. The old man's arms were pinioned, but nevertheless he cast a defiant look upon those around him.

"Bradley, this is a grave charge against you. What have you to say?" said the chairman.

"What authority have you to ask?" demanded the smith, fiercely eying his interrogator.

"The authority of the people of Tennessee," was the reply.

"I deny it."

"Your denials amount to nothing. You are accused of harboring an abolitionist, and the penalty of that act you know is death. What have you to say to the charge?"

"I say that it is a lie, and that he who utters such charges against me is a scoundrel."

"Simpson," said the chairman to the leader of the band that had captured Bradley, and who now appeared with a large bandage about his head, to bind up a wound which was the result of a blow from the fist of Bradley. "Simpson," continued the chairman, "what have you to say?"

The leader then stated that he had tracked the preacher to the blacksmith shop, and that Bradley had resisted his arrest, and that upon their return he could not be found, and that the prisoner refused to give any information concerning him.

"Do you hear that, Mr. Bradley?" said the chairman.

"I do. What of it?" was the reply.

"Is it true?"

"Yes."

"Where is the preacher?"

"That is none of your business."

"Mr. Bradley, this tribunal is not to be insulted with impunity. I again demand to know where Mr. Peters is. Will you tell?"

"No."

"Mr. Bradley, it is well known that you are not only a member but an exhorter in Mr. Peters's church, and therefore some little excuse is to be made for your zeal in defending him. He is from the North, and has long been suspected, and is now accused of being an abolitionist and a dangerous man. You do not deny sheltering him, and refusing to give him up. If you persist in this you must take the consequences. I ask you for the last time if you will inform us of his whereabouts?"

"And again I answer no!"

"Mr. Bradley, there is also another serious charge against you, and your conduct in this instance confirms it. You are accused of giving comfort to the enemies of your country. What have you to say to that?"

"I say it is false, and that he who makes it is a villain."

"I accuse him with being a traitor, aiding the cause of the Union," said Simpson.

"If my adherence to the Union merits for me the name of traitor, then I am proud of it. I have been for the Union—I am still for the Union—and will be for the Union as long as life lasts!"

At these words the chairman clutched a pistol that lay upon the table before him, and the bright blade of Simpson's bowie-knife glittered near Bradley's breast; but before he could make the fatal plunge a swift-winged messenger of death laid him dead at the feet of his intended victim; while at the same instant another plunged into the heart of the chairman, and he fell forward over the table, extinguishing the light and leaving all in darkness. Confusion reigned. The inmates of the room were panic-stricken. In the midst of the consternation a firm hand rested upon Bradley's shoulder; his bonds were severed, and he hurried out of the open window. He was again a free man, but was hastened forward into the woods at the back of the tavern, and through them to a road a quarter of a mile distant, then into a wagon and driven rapidly off. In half an hour the smith made one of the party at the rendezvous that was to start at midnight across the mountains.

"John," said the smith as he grasped the hand of his rescuer, while his eyes glistened and a tear coursed down his furrowed cheek, "I should like to see Mattie before I go."

"You shall," was the reply.

In another hour the blacksmith clasped his daughter to his bosom.

It was an affecting scene—there, in that lone house in the wilderness, surrounded by men who had been driven from their homes for their attachment to the principles for which the patriot fathers fought and bled—the sturdy old smith, a type of the heroes of other days, pressing his daughter to his breast, while the tear coursed down his furrowed cheek. He felt that perhaps it was to be his last embrace; for his resolute heart had resolved to sacrifice his all upon the altar of his country, and he could no longer watch over the safety of his only child. Was she to be left to the mercy of the parricidal wretches who were attempting to destroy the country that had given them birth, nursed their infancy, and opened a wide field for them to display the abilities with which nature had endowed them?

"Mr. Bradley," said his rescuer, after a short pause, "as you leave the State it will be necessary, in these troublous times, for Mattie to have a protector, and I have thought that our marriage had better take place to-night."

"Well, John," he said, as he relinquished his embrace and gazed with a fond look at her who was so dear to him, "I shall not object if Mattie is willing."

"Oh! we arranged that as we came along," replied the young man.

Mattie blushed, but said nothing.

In a short time the hunted-down minister was called upon to perform a marriage service in that lone house. It was an impressive scene. Yet no diamonds glittered upon the neck of the bride; no pearls looped up her tresses; but a pure love glowed within her heart as she gave utterance to a vow which was registered in heaven.

Bradley, soon after the ceremony, bade his daughter and her husband an affectionate farewell, and set out with his friends to join others who had been driven from their homes, and were now rallying under the old flag to fight for the Union, and, as they said, "Redeem old Tennessee!"

THE BATTLE OF PEA RIDGE.

WE devote page 196 to an illustration of the great battle won by General Curtis at PEA RIDGE, ARKANSAS, on 6th, 7th, and 8th March. The official report of General Curtis is as follows:

HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE SOUTHWEST,
PEA RIDGE, ARKANSAS, March 9, 1862.

GENERAL,—On Thursday, the 6th inst., the enemy commenced an attack on my right wing, assailing and following the rear-guard of a detachment under General Siegel to my main lines on Sugar Creek Hollow, but ceased firing when he met my reinforcements about four P.M.

During the night I became convinced that he had moved on so as to attack my right or rear, therefore early on the 7th I ordered a change of front to the right, my right, which thus became my left, still resting on Sugar Creek Hollow. This brought my line across Pea Ridge, with my new right resting on Head Cross Timber Hollow, which is the head of Big Sugar Creek. I also ordered an immediate advance of the cavalry and light artillery, under Colonel Osterhaus, with orders to attack and break what I supposed would be the reinforced line of the enemy. This movement was in progress when the enemy, at eleven A.M., commenced an attack on my right. The fight continued mainly at these points during the day, the enemy having gained the point held by the command of Colonel Carr, at Cross Timber Hollow, but was entirely repulsed, with the fall of the commander, M'Culloch, in the centre, by the forces under Colonel Davis. The plan of attack on the centre was gallantly carried forward by Colonel Osterhaus, who was immediately sustained and supported by Colonel Davis's entire division, supported also by General Siegel's command, which had remained till near the close of the day on the left. Colonel Carr's division held the right under a galling, continuous fire all day.

In the evening, firing having entirely ceased in the centre, and the right being now on the left, I reinforced the right by a portion of the Second Division, under General Asboth. Before the day closed I was convinced that the enemy had concentrated his main force on the right. I commenced another change of front forward, so as to face the enemy where he had deployed on my right flank in a strong position. The change had only been partially effected, but was in full progress when, at sunrise on the 8th, my right and centre renewed the firing, which was immediately answered by the enemy with renewed energy along the whole extent of his line. My left, under General Siegel, moved close to the hills occupied by the enemy, driving him from the heights, and advancing steadily toward the head of the hollows. I immediately ordered the centre and right wing forward, the right turning the left of the enemy, and cross-firing on his centre. This final position of the enemy was in the arc of a circle. A charge of infantry, extending throughout the whole line, completely routed the whole rebel force, which retired in great confusion, but rather safely, through the deep, impassable defiles of cross-timber.

Our loss is heavy. The enemy's can never be ascertained, for their dead are scattered over a large field. Their wounded, too, may many of them be lost and perish. The force is scattered in all directions, but I think his main force has returned to Boston Mountains.

General Siegel follows him toward Keithsville, while my cavalry is pursuing him toward the mountains, scouring the country, bringing in prisoners, and trying to find the rebel Major-General Van Dorn, who had command of the entire force at this, the battle of Pea Ridge.

I have not as yet statements of the dead and wounded, so as to justify a report, but I will refer you to a dispatch which I will forward very soon.

Officers and soldiers have displayed such unusual gallantry that I hardly dare to make distinction. I must, however, name the commanders of division. General Siegel gallantly commanded the right, and drove back the left wing of the enemy; General Asboth, who is wounded in the arm, in his gallant effort to reinforce the right; Colonel and Acting Brigadier-General Davis, who commanded the centre, where M'Culloch fell on the 7th, and pressed forward the centre on the 8th. Colonel and Acting Brigadier-General Carr is also wounded in the arm, and was under the continuous fire of the enemy during the two hardest days of the struggle.

Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Ohio, and Missouri may proudly share the honor of victory which their gallant heroes won over the combined forces of Van Dorn, Price, and M'Culloch at Pea Ridge, in the mountains of Arkansas.

The rebels, it is said, had thirty-five thousand men in the field, among whom were twenty-two hundred Indians, under Albert Pike. The rebels acknowledge a loss of eleven hundred killed, and nearly three thousand wounded. Our loss was six hundred killed and from eight hundred to one thousand wounded. We took sixteen hundred prisoners and thirteen pieces of cannon.

COLUMBUS, KENTUCKY.

WE publish on page 197 illustrations of COLUMBUS, Kentucky, from sketches by Mr. Alexander Simplot. The Herald correspondent thus described the place after the evacuation:

The river batteries have been almost entirely demolished—three tiers of them—their guns dismounted and thrown into the river, the gun-carriages mutilated and magazines demolished, leaving nothing to mark their former presence save ruined breast-works and huge piles of cannon-balls and shells. Just below the upper river battery, a huge chain, which has been christened "Pillow's Folly," emerges from the water, extends up the almost perpendicular bank a hundred feet or more, and disappears under the soil, where it extends to—the Lord only knows where. This is the Kentucky end of the chain which the valiant inside-ditch-digger had stretched across the river to obstruct the passage of our gun-boats. A few feet above the chain and below the battery I counted five sixty-four pound guns which had been thrown over the breast-works, with the intention of sinking them in the river; but they had lodged in the yielding earth and become immovable. Two others lay a few rods below, which had been taken from the batteries on the bluff.

Within the breast-works on the hill there was nothing to be seen but the wildest desolation. Burning piles of rubbish, smouldering heaps of grain—the remnants of burned warehouses—charred timbers of what were once quarters for the troops, broken gun-carriages and disabled ordnance, completed the picture.

Leaving the lower town and ascending the hill in the rear, we get the most comprehensive view of the rebel works. From one point near the top of the hill my guide pointed out to me the locality of no less than eight different batteries, besides the positions of forty-five or fifty isolated pieces of heavy artillery. In all, I computed that a month ago there could not have been less than one hundred and thirty pieces of artillery, of the calibre of twenty-four pounders and upward, added to which there were over seventy pieces of light field artillery. Most of these heavy guns are now in the river, or disabled upon the works, easily fished up when the floods go down, or repaired by skillful workmen. I saw in the north fort, upon the brow of the bluff, the ruins of the celebrated one-hundred-and-twenty pounder, Lady Polk, which burst in November last, coming so near causing the Very Reverend Bishop General to "pass in his cheeks." My guide was one of the gunners upon that occasion, and it was really amusing to hear his rendition of the affair:.

"You see," said he, pointing to the breech of the piece, which lay precisely where it fell when the accident occurred, "dat is de butt of Lady Boke what busted. You see I vas standin' shoost here mit der sponge. Shendrel Boke shtood right dere on horsepach, und dem fellers mit der gold lace on der arms, und all over, was shtandin' all 'round; den der Shendrel say, 'Poys, look out; ven Lady Boke speaks I always sthop mine ears up.' Den he rides oop and dakes der lanyard and sherk him, and, mein Cott, you oughter see how Lady Boke she flies in leetle bieces. Her preech flies pack und shlaps ter Shendrel mit der pread pasket und makes him double up like mine shack knife. Der Shendrel vas hurted purty pad, und his horse vas killed; but he shumps up and say, 'Never mind me, poys; dake care of dem odder fellers.' Den I look 'round, und dere was eight mens killed and more as a dozen wounded."

TORPEDOES AT COLUMBUS.

WE illustrate on page 198, from sketches by our correspondent, Mr. Alexander Simplot, the TORPEDOES AND INFERNAL MACHINES which have been discovered by our troops at Columbus. The correspondent of the Chicago Times thus describes them:

After two days' exploration for infernal machines, and to discover where the bluff had been mined, as was reported to have been done, Captain W. A. Schmitt and company, of the Twenty-seventh Regiment, discovered ridges of new earth, similar to ridges which are formed by covering up gas or water pipes in a city, and traced them to a cavern. Effecting an entrance he found a strong, rude, wooden frame, covered by earth to attract no attention. Inside this, with the assistance of a light, he found implements similar to those used in a telegraph office, with wires running in a dozen different directions. Following the raised rows of earth he soon came to a spot where something had evidently been buried. Digging down some five feet, he came to a large iron cask, about three foot high, and a foot and a half through, in shape so near as can be described by a well-formed log with an iron cap fastened by eight screws. Folding at the muzzle, by which they are kept right-point-blank, surrounded by about two bushels of coarse gravel. On the bottom of the cylinder was a wooden box containing several batteries, with hollow wires attached to two larger wires, covered with a substance impervious to water, connecting with the cartridges spoken of. A dozen of these iron pots or casks were thus united with each cavern. Half a dozen of these caverns have been found, and possibly 75 or 100 of these infernal machines are thus buried in the earth, some distance from the enemy's works. The moment the word is pleaded would be when our infantry had driven them inside their works, when it would be easy to ascertain about the extent a signal, and he would send the electric spark through all the wires, and decimate, if not annihilate, the imagined. Whether engineers could thus be blown up did not seem to be thought of. Perhaps they would be the first victims, as far as mere human agency is concerned, in the petitions of their works. Probably other parts of the works are constructed upon the principle that these infernal engines were discovered in time, and no damage has been done to our soldiers, who are constantly on the look for discoveries, and might by accident have set off the train.

Another class of infernal machines, called torpedoes, have been discovered wherever found in the river. They are round, about four feet long and a foot thick at the largest part, with one end tapering off to a point. The river is very high, and the number now found is small, as all the steamers fire down to see what are in the bottom of the river. The very high stage of water has prevented any damage to either gun-boat or transport.

A THRILLING SCENE IN TENNESSEE.

We illustrate on page 199 a thrilling scene which took place in Eastern Tennessee in connection with the recent uprising of Union men in that region of country. The scene is taken from a sketch sent from the KNOXVILLE Register of February 8.

The facts connected with the scene are that Zick Crick Bridge, as there appeared in the testimony elicited by the Court-martial, lies over the ear piercing creek on the road to Unionist house, and are as follows:

A man by the name of David Fry, in connection with William R. Carter, both citizens of East Tennessee, but who had lately deserted the land of their birth and fled to Kentucky, and connected themselves with the enemies of their country, entered the Union Encampment at the mouth of General Zollicoffer's command at Rockcastle Hill, for the purpose of exciting disaffection and treachery among this side, which would result in the entire destruction of the railroad facilities here, and thus cut off the supplies and cut off communication between Virginia and the remaining States of the Confederacy, thereby cut off reinforcements of troops, provisions, and munitions of war to the support of the rebellion against the invasion of our State. Their free use of money is supposed, and the means of which they came by, and their concealed at the home of a Union man, went, at one of the numerous boats, for the purchase, Carter, of Sevier, who made the attempt upon Strawberry Plains Bridge, but who, with the attempt upon Zick Crick Bridge by Keelan single-handed and alone, Pickens himself failing has curiously worked.

It is known that Fry and Carter passed on into Boone County, and passed at Rockford, in Kentucky, on the night of Carter, as no evidence has yet appeared of his whereabouts after that time. Fry, however, returned to his journey up the country, passing through Loudon (no doubt making every arrangement for the destruction of that bridge), then passing through Blount County, and finally reaching Unionist's house on the night of the burning of Lick Creek Bridge.

Unionist left his house at night, and lying by in daylight, standing and traversing the mountains, and the trainers' house to another, his movements could not be traced until arrested, on the night of the 8th inst., the 8th of November, at the house of Anderson Walker, in Greene County. Here he remained from the 8th to the Thursday, the 7th, when he proceeded to Martin Walker's, arriving about eight or nine o'clock at night. Here he met he met his wife, and remained until two o'clock in the morning of the 8th, starting for the house of the spy on the way to Knoxboy, but wished to see a friend near Mobley Lick Creek Bridge, and asking if Jones, the spy, knew of a good a Union man as ever. As appeared from the testimony, Fry made to no residence, but that of the spy, but not starting, as he did, at two o'clock, and not being finished in the house of Jones, but at the house of Unionist.

Unionist, leaving Walker, Fry stopped at the house of Daniel Smith, a violent Union man, living on the road to Zick Crick bridge, arriving there about one hour before daylight. Immediately Fry had his plow horse brought out, and began to act as a messenger from Fry to Jacob Harmon to communicate to Harmon that he (Fry) had come from Kentucky that he had come to destroy the railroad, and that he wanted to see Harmon at Smith's house that morning. The message was communicated by Smith to Jacob Harmon, about eight o'clock on the morning of the 9th of November; and accordingly Harmon, who was a leading Union spirit in the neighborhood, went to Smith's house, where the plans were unfolded, and the plot and programme agreed upon. Harmon, on his return home, made the fact throughout the neighborhood that Fry was at Smith's house, and that he would be his house on that night, when Fry would proceed to Smith's residence, and from then repair to Harmon's house to consummate the conspiracy.

Harmon did his share of the work well, for as early as nine o'clock at night between thirty and forty men assembled and met at his house, ready to be led by their chief on his arrival, and eager for the destruction of the property. At that hour Fry sighted from his horse and bounded into the yard, exclaiming: "Friends, I am Colonel Fry, and I am come to share with you." The party immediately assembled in the house, when Fry commenced addressing the crowd by reviewing his plans, and urging them on to deeds of derision, and the crowd were at once responsive to their expressions of approbation, and were ready and determined that the bridge should be destroyed. Fry then stood by their leader, and that they would do their duty faithfully and well.

Fry drew forth a United States flag, and spreading it upon a table in the centre of the room, called upon his followers to surround their leader, and to swear fealty with him the oath of allegiance. This was late in the night; and after the whole had been fully understood, each of the spirators surrounded the table in groups, and, by direction of the leader, placed their left hands upon the folds of the flag, raising aloft their right hands, and swearing to support the Constitution of the United States, and abide by their expressed determination, and with the exception of one man, who was not present, but who, on being informed of the fact, gave his assent and joined in the oath.

Around than the leader plan of action and revenge, the chief of the conspirators immediately led the way to the bridge, and was followed in eager haste by the whole crowd. The Confederate guard, consisting of five soldiers, watching the bridge, were immediately surrounded by the infuriated mob, and were held in close confinement, while Fry, still leading the way and still followed by the leader of his clan, hastened to the wooden structure, applied the fire, and which was consumed and burned to the ground in an hour.

FORT CLINCH, FLORIDA.

Our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, has sent us sketches from the recent expedition under Commodore Dupont, one of which, representing FORT CLINCH, Florida, the last of the forts reposessed by the United States forces, we reproduce on page 196.

Commodore Dupont reported to the Navy Department regarding Fernandina and its defences:

The towns of St. Marys and Fernandina are uninjured. I visited the town, Fort Clinch, and the earth-works on the sea face of the island. The latter I found to be of ample preparations for vigorous defence without being scarped at all. The guns would have been voluntarily destroyed. Batteries on the north and southeast shores are so complete as art can make them. Six are well concealed and protected by sand hills in front, covering the whole inner shelter for the men, and are so small that thoroughly every shot by the enemy will be buried in the sand, and the sand, that to strike them from the water would be the same result if they were in open air. Their heavy, large, and affording therefore a better mark, is equally well protected. Magazines, bomb-proof batteries, and the heavy guns mounted on Fort Clinch, command all the approaches to the river, and would be fatal to the attacking enemy. Besides them there was another battery of four guns, commanding the channel, and another battery on the end of which would cross the channel inside the bar. The difficulties arising from the indirectness of the channel, and from the narrowness of the bar would have added to the defenses by keeping the approaching vessels a long time exposed to the most gross direct shootings; and when the ships of an enemy had passed all these defenses, they would be in encounter a well-protected and naturally masked battery at the town, which commands the access to the inner anchorage. The position of Fort Clinch I recommend the place perfectly defensible. We are not provided with that, if we choose, to occupy it. Dupont, but Fernandina and Fort Clinch have been given to us.

THE ADVANCE OF THE GRAND ARMY INTO VIRGINIA.

We devote pages 200, 201, and 204 to illustrations of the ADVANCE OF THE GRAND ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, UNDER GENERAL MCCLELLAN, INTO THE SOUTH. EXCEPT. Our artist, Mr. Waud, sends us from sketches by Mr. A. R. Waud, who accompanies the army. One of the sketches on page 200 represents the BRIDGE OVER BULL RUN, near Blackburn's Ford, where some hard fighting took place on July 18, 1861. It will be well remembered by the three months' troops. The large picture above shows the ADVANCE OF GENERAL M'DOWELL CROSSING BLACKBURN'S FORD with an escort of two thousand cavalry. The correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer thus describes the crossing of Blackburn's Ford:

About noon General M'Clellan and M'Dowell, with their staffs, and two thousand cavalry in an escort, came up and took the road to Manassas. We fell in with them and followed close on their heels. All along the hill side the road was one continuous string of hots, tents, and fires, and angry men and mules being of mixed nature to themselves—not a sound save the clutter of the horses' hoofs and the rattle of the wheels as the long column of the cavalry moved on.

At Blackburn's Ford we see the old battle-field of July 18. The fatal bridge, which was between the two fires, and had been riddled with shot and shell, has been repaired, and it was hastily crossed—a rickety, and under such a narrow ensign at the time. The tree tops bear the evidences of the war and shell are there around. Large limbs were cut off, and tree tops twisted in a hundred directions, as though struck by lightning. Here it was which the New York Twelfth, the First and Second Michigan, and the Second Fifth were driven back with a heavy cost away, and we can now see where the rebels had their battery, upon the crest of the hill, which was composed of logs and dirt.

The Wisconsin Artillery of New Orleans and three South Carolina regiments have been encamped near the battle-ground, and have left their marks in the shape of huts. The artillery is squarely at Manassas, etc. Now and then we come across a deserted house, and the occupants had gone home to recruit and re-enlist, but had not yet returned.

The Plains of Manassas are really what their name indicates. The time when they were the objects which obstructed the range of vision, but they are all gone now, and the whole country is an extensive view. On the hills around are the camps still left, and a column of smoke every now and then ascends from the camp fires. Our cavalry had gone there during Monday night, and found the rear of the rebels' force; but they only bring the remaining property. A captain, by whose side I was riding, told me that he had seen a rebel cavalry officer, galloping ahead of the rest, waving his sword, and the rebel infantry could be portrayed; the large machine guns, the rifled cannon, and immense commissary quartermaster store-house, all in ashes. On the track stood the wreck of a locomotive, and not far down the remains of four freight cars which had been burned; to the right, five miles distant, the spires of Manassas could be seen, and the red barrels of vinegar and molasses had been allowed to run together in one chemical combination. Some fifty barrels of pork and beef had been scattered around in the mud, and a few unopened barrels gave them the track is done of smoke was arising from the remains of a factory, which had been used for rendering up fat and burning bones. About a thousand good hides were stretched in a field, and the tanneries and remains undisposed.

On the same page a small picture illustrates the EVACUATION OF SANDY JUNCTION BY THE REBELS, and is thus described:

Sandy Junction consists of two huts—a dreary, dismal scene. All the correspondent's curiosity in saying that it was not intensified. Every thing the rebels could not readily carry away they destroyed, burning houses, clothes, and stores of all kinds, and rendering the place a perfect wilderness.

On page 204 we illustrate the INTERSECTION OF THE ORANGE AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD WITH THE MANASSAS GAP RAILROAD, by the "Junction" which has given its name to the spot, and which imparted to the place so much military importance. The possession of the Junction gives us command of both roads.

The same page contains a general view of CENTREVILLE, showing the rebel Winter Quarters there, mostly in flames and ashes. On one side will be seen a fort which formed the key of their works. In the distance is the Bull Run battle-field; and further yet may be seen the Blue Ridge, with the fires which mark burning bridges and homesteads in flames. Desolation on every side.

It appears that every thing which the rebels could destroy in their retreat was consumed. The store-houses at Manassas, with a large quantity of flour, were burned, and the Warrenton Junction together with the hotel and five or six dwellings. The bridge over Cedar Creek, two miles north of Warrenton, was burned down, and a freight train of fifty-two cars, loaded with commissary stores burned with it. Not content with this wholesale destruction, twelve miles from Manassas, on the road to Winchester, but were rescued from destruction by our troops before the fire had reached the steamers.

Mr. Waud will continue to accompany the army under General McClellan, and will furnish us regularly with the hotel and five or six dwellings. The bridge over Cedar Creek, two miles north of Warrenton, was burned down, and a freight train of fifty-two cars, loaded with commissary stores burned with it. Not content with this wholesale destruction, twelve miles from Manassas, on the road to Winchester, but were rescued from destruction by our troops before the fire had reached the steamers.

Mr. Waud will continue to accompany the army under General McClellan, and will furnish us regularly with

MAP OF THE SOUTHERN STATES.

In order to enable our readers to understand the oft-repeated operations and of the "Anaconda" tightening its folds round the rebels, we publish a general MAP OF THE SEAT OF THE rebellion on page 193, showing the relative position of the rebel and the Union forces. Sixty days ago those positions were very different. Then the rebels held the Mississippi nearly half of Kentucky, and Eastern Virginia in force. Their present shifting line is seen on the Map, whose author writes as follows concerning it:

The Map on page 193 represents the region of Secession, with all its railroad communications and principal rivers, and the present position of the Union and Rebel forces. By reference to the Map it will be seen that some millions of the great magazines in concentrating rebel military forces to oppose the progress of the Union armies, and in facilitating the movements of the troops assisting to their retreats from merited chastisement. The railroad through Western Tennessee, Dalton, Atlanta, Augusta, Georgia; Goldsborough, North Carolina; Lynchburg and Richmond, Virginia, may be noted as of great importance, connecting all the centres of the Southern points in the railroad communications of Union forces is represented, it will be observed how the Mississippi River is commanded by the different divisions of our armies in motion.

The victorious army under General Curtis having reached Pea Ridge, in Northwestern Arkansas, the Rebels had command by this time of the navigable rivers of Arkansas. Using the Arkansas River, nature will carry her army to the rear of Memphis, or to augmented Vicksburg, Natchez, and the Lower Mississippi at the proper time. The victorious General Pope, by the same law of gravitation, can now command Memphis from the south, as the late General Grant and his heroic troops move up the Tennessee River, and, reinforcing Sherman, will command northward to Memphis. General Buell and his powerful army have their front toward Nashville, Abdemarle, and the mountains of Georgia. General Fremont is preparing to put the army under his command in motion, and as soon as the weather will permit directed regions of action. General Halleck, with his splendid and disciplined army, is in motion after the retiring army of rebels which expected to have passed the winter in Baltimore and Philadelphia, and by the time this Map is out the final intention had not been allowed to the accidental victors of Bull Run, they may not speculate on where they will spend the spring and summer, and what pay they will get. General Burnside is at work in the rear of North, Weldon, and Goldsboro.

General Sherman is occupying a strong force of the rebels between Savannah and Charleston, Port Royal, Georgia, Fernandina, and Cedar Keys, Florida, Fort Pickens, and Pensacola, and can operate in both directions; and probably before the next issue of our rebellion will be over, and the time ship Island, which will make a report to be heard throughout the country, and a thick which will be felt so far north as Richmond.

CAPTAIN ERICSSON.

On page 205 we give a portrait of CAPTAIN ERICSSON, the inventor and builder of the Monitor, of which we give below some diagrams. The following is a sketch of his life:

John Ericsson was born in 1803, in the province of Vermeland, among the iron mountains of Sweden. His father was a mining proprietor, so that in his youth he had ample opportunities to watch the operations of the various engines and machinery connected with the mines. In 1814 he attracted the attention of the celebrated Count Platen, who had heard of his bright efforts, and received an interview with him. After carefully examining the various plans and drawings which the youth exhibited in his sketch-book, the Count handed him a gold medal, simply observing, in an impressive manner, "Continue as you have commenced, and you will be a great man—nevertheless extraordinary." There few words of kind encouragement from so distinguished a personage had a deep effect upon the mind of the young mechanician, and confirmed him in the course he had chosen. Before he was fifteen years of age he was appointed a cadet in the military corps on the mechanical engineer; and after six months' tuition, at the age of fifteen years, was appointed assistant of the Grand Ship Canal of Sweden, which connects the North Sea with the Baltic, through Great Finlen. He remained there for year 1816, he was required to set out the work for more than a hundred men, and at fifteen years of age, was not enough to look through the leveling instrument, and to ring it by an assistant, and count the points to which his attendants for that purpose. As the discipline in the Swedish corps of engineers, the cadets should always endeavor his head in speaking to his superior, grey-headed men rants, and to be uncovered in the presence of superiors. His mere desk. There are now many important works in Sweden which were designed by him when he was a mere boy. At the age of fifteen he was in possession of accurate plans of the whole work, drawn by his own hand, which, when the military corps on the mechanical lead given him a tendency for military life, and at the age of seventeen he entered the Swedish army as an ensign. About this time the Government had ordered the northern part of the canal to be surveyed, and Mr. Ericsson in the army should be employed at this service. Ericsson, not willing to remain "active" in the Northern Brigade, was appointed on the survey. There are yet in the archives of the Government the notes and plans which Ericsson miles made by his hand.

While thus employed, only seventeen years of age, he was the house of his School, Ericsson at once commenced the study of mathematics, in which so many young men become confounding flame. On the 10th of May, 1826, he obtained the permission from the King to visit England. In the fall of 1829 the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Company offered a prize for the best locomotive engine that should go on the small portion of the railway then completed. Ericsson, not willing to be outdone by any other engineer, immediately set to work, planned the engine, executed the drawings, made the calculations, and constructed the boiler, and the whole machine was completed within seven weeks. The day of trial arrived. Thousands of spectators were on the ground, and the novelty of the race had attracted an immense concourse of people. The little engine performed for more than a mile per hour, even with this enormous load. It could be no surprise to the admiration of the spectators when Ericsson's engine, called by the inventor, Ericsson, notched by John Braithwaite, and darted along the line at the rate of 29 miles per hour. Mr. Ericsson was the first to apply to marine engines contrivances, not willing to be outdone in this country he left without saying anything. In the year 1831 he applied such machinery, worked by a regulator, to the propeller of the steam-packet Corunna, of 116-horse power, plying between Liverpool and Preston.

Mr. Ericsson emigrated to the country in 1839, then between the United States. His first work in this country was his invention of the steam-fire engine, which he first exhibited in the streets of New York. This engine was the first that was ever constructed. Many of the worst fires in the city were extinguished by it. Ericsson has been employed in the construction of no other than the construction of another new idea of his, so illustrated to satisfy the new safety steam-battery Monitor. He signed the contract for her construction on the 5th day of October, and launched her on the 31st of December—being a period of two months and eight days—her steam, machinery, and armor were put into operation, and on the same hundred and first working day she was launched. This is a celerity which has never been equalled in this country or in England.

THE "MONITOR."

To the views which we have before given of the Monitor we add three plans. They give a more perfect idea of her construction than any thing which has been published. Figure 1 represents her as launched and ready for action; Figure 2 is a plan of her deck; and Figure 3 is a cross section cut down through the turret. The following is a sketch of a plan of the water-line shows precisely how much of her body appears above the water.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

A, Revolving Turret.—B. B. Smoke-pipe.—C, Pilot-house.—D, Anchor Well.—E, Hatches.—F, Propeller.—G, Iron Armor.—H, Recess for Deck Beams.—K, Rudder.—L, Water-line.—I, Pulpit Rail.—J, Observation.

REBEL WINTER-QUARTERS AT CENTREVILLE, VIRGINIA, WITH BULL RUN IN THE DISTANCE.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 203.]

INTERSECTION OF THE ORANGE AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD WITH THE MANASSAS GAP RAILROAD AT MANASSAS JUNCTION.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 203.]

CAPTAIN JOHN ERICSON.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY GUTY & CO.—(SEE PAGE 203.)

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN M'LENAN.

IP Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER V.

MR. VANSTONE'S inquiries into the proposed theatrical entertainment at Evergreen Lodge were answered by a narrative of dramatic disasters, of which Miss Marrable impersonated the innocent cause, and in which her father and mother played the parts of chief victims.

Miss Marrable was that hardest of all born tyrants—an only child. She had never granted a constitutional privilege to her oppressed father and mother since the time when she cut her first tooth. Her seventeenth birthday was now near at hand; she had decided on celebrating it by acting a play, had issued her orders accordingly, and had been obeyed by her docile parents as implicitly as usual. Mr. Marrable gave up the drawing-room to be laid waste for a stage and a theatre. Mr. Marrable secured the services of a respectable professional person to drill the young ladies and gentlemen, and to accept all the other responsibilities incidental to creating a dramatic world out of a domestic chaos. Having further accustomed themselves to the breaking of furniture and the staining of walls—to thumping, hallooing, hammering, and screaming; to doors always banging, and to footsteps perpetually running up and down stairs—the nominal master and mistress of the house fondly believed that their chief troubles were over. Innocent and fatal delusion! It is one thing, in private society, to set up the stage and choose the play—it is another thing altogether to find the actors. Hitherto, only the small preliminary annoyances proper to the occasion had shown themselves at Evergreen Lodge. The small and serious troubles were all to come.

"The Rivals" having been chosen as the play, Miss Marrable, as a matter of course, appropriated to herself the part of "Lydia Languish." One of her bosom friends never secured "Captain Absolute," and another laid violent hands on "Sir Lucius O'Trigger." These two were followed by an accommodating appetite-refiner, who accepted the heavy dramatic responsibility of "Mrs. Malaprop"—and there the theatrical proceedings came to a pause. Nine more speaking characters were left to be fitted with representatives; and with that unavoidable necessity the serious troubles began.

All the friends of the family suddenly became unreliable people, for the first time in their lives. After encouraging the idea of the play, they declined the personal sacrifice of acting in it—as they accepted characters, and then broke down in the effort to study them—or they volunteered to take the parts which they knew were already engaged, and declined the parts which were waiting to be acted—or they were afflicted with weak constitutions, and mischievously fell ill when they were wanted at rehearsal—or they had Parisian relatives in the back-ground, and, after slipping into their parts cheerfully at the week's beginning, oozed out of them penitently, under serious family pressure, at the week's end. Meanwhile the carpenters hammered and the scenes rose. Miss Marrable, whose temperament was sensitive, became hysterical under the strain of perpetual anxiety; the family doctor declined to answer for the nervous consequences if something was not done. Renewed efforts were made in every direction. Actors and actresses were sought with a desperate disregard of all considerations of personal fitness. Necessity, which knows no law, either in the drama or out of it, accepted a lad of eighteen as the representative of "Sir Antony Absolute," the stage-manager undertaking to supply the necessary wrinkles from the illimitable resources of theatrical art. A lady whose age was unknown, and whose personal appearance was stout—but whose heart was in the right place—volunteered to act the part of the sentimental "Julia," and brought with her the dramatic qualification of habitually wearing a wig in private life. Thanks to those vigorous measures, the play was at last supplied with representatives—always excepting the two unmanageable characters of "Lucy," the waiting-maid, and "Falkland," Julia's jealous lover. Gentlemen came; saw Julia at rehearsal; observed her stoutness and her wig; omitted to notice that her heart was in the right place; quailed at the prospect, apologized, and retired. Ladies read the part of "Lucy;" remarked that she appeared to great advantage in the first half of the play, and faded out of it altogether in the latter half; objected to pass from the notice of the audience in that manner, when all the rest had a chance of distinguishing themselves to the end; shut the book, apologized, and retired. In eight days more the night of performance would arrive; a phalanx of social martyrs two hundred strong had been converted to witness it; three full rehearsals were absolutely necessary; and two characters in the play were not filled yet. With this lamentable story, and with the humblest apologies for presuming on a slight acquaintance, the Marrables appeared at Combe-Raven to speak to the young ladies for a "Lucy," and to the universe for a "Falkland," with the mendicant pertinacity of a family in despair."

This statement of circumstances—addressed to an audience which included a father of Mr. Vanstone's disposition, and a daughter of Magdalen's temperament—produced the result which might have been anticipated from the first.

Either misinterpreting or disregarding the ominous silence presented by his wife and Miss Garth, Mr. Vanstone not only gave Magdalen permission to assist the forlorn dramatic company, but accepted an invitation to witness the performance for Norah and himself. Mrs. Vanstone declined accompanying them on account of her health; and Miss Garth only engaged to make one among the audience, conditionally on not being wanted at home. The "parts" of "Lucy" and "Falkland" (which the distressed family carried about with them every where, like incidental matters) were handed to their representatives on the spot. Frank's faint remonstrances were rejected without a hearing; the days and hours of rehearsal were carefully noted down on the covers of the parts; and the Marrables took their leave, with a perfect explosion of thanks—father, mother, and daughter sowing their expressions of gratitude broadcast, from the drawing-room door to the garden gate.

As soon as the carriage had driven away, Magdalen presented herself to the general observation under an entirely new aspect.

"If any more visitors call to-day," she said, with the profound gravity of look and manner, "I am not at home. This is a far more serious matter than any of you suppose. Go somewhere by yourself Frank, and read over your part, and don't let your attention wander if you can possibly help it. I shall not be accessible before the evening. If you will come here—with papa's permission—after tea, my views on the subject of Falkland will be at your disposal. Thomas! whatever else the gardener does, he is not to make my horticultural noises under my window. For the rest of the afternoon I shall be immersed in study—and the sooner the rest of the house follows my example the better!"

With that Garth's battery of reproof could open fire, before the first outburst of Mr. Vanstone's hearty laughter could escape his lips, she threw on the head of Falkland all the gravity she could muster, and left the room.

Frank's departure left the family by themselves, and was the signal accordingly for an attack on Mr. Vanstone's inveterate carelessness in the exercise of his paternal authority.

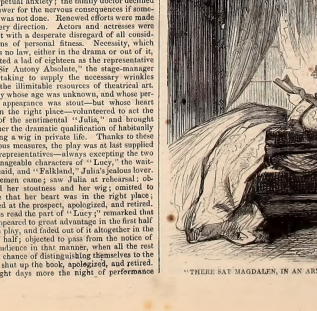
"What could you possibly be thinking of, Andrew, when you gave your consent?" said Mrs. Vanstone. "Surely my silence was a sufficient warning to you to say No?"

"A mistake, Mr. Vanstone," chimed in Miss Garth. "Made with the best intentions—but a mistake for all that."

"It may be a mistake," said Norah, taking her father's part as usual. "But I really don't see how papa, or any one else, could have declined, under the circumstances."

"Quite right, my dear," observed Mr. Vanstone. "The circumstances, as you say, were dead against me. Here were these unfortunate people in a scrape on one side—and Magdalen, on the other, mad to act. I couldn't say I had methodical objections—I couldn't invent methodistical about me. What other excuse could I make? The Marrables are respectable people, and keep the best company in Clifton. What harm can she get in their house? If you come to juice and juice, and that sort of thing—why shouldn't Magdalen do what Miss Marrable does? There! there! let the poor things act, and amuse themselves. We were fleet age once—and it's no use making a fuss—and that's all I've got to say about it."

With that characteristic defense of his own conduct Mr. Vanstone sauntered back to the green-house to smoke another cigar.



"I didn't say so to papa," said Norah, taking her mother's arm on the way back to the house; "but the bad result of the acting, in my opinion, will be the familiarity it is sure to encourage between Magdalen and Francis Clare."

"You are prejudiced against Frank, my love," said Mrs. Vanstone.

Norah's soft, secret, hazel eyes sank to the ground; she said no more. Her opinions were unchangeable—but she never disputed with any body. She had the great failing of a reserved nature—the failing of obstinacy; and the great merit—the merit of silence. "What is your head running on now?" thought Miss Garth, casting a sharp look at Norah's dark, downcast face. "You're one of the impenetrable sort. Give me Magdalen, with all her perversities; I can see through through her. You're as dark as night."

The hours of the afternoon passed away, and still Magdalen remained shut up in her own room. No restless footsteps pattered on the upper floor; no amiable temper was heard chattering here, there, and everywhere, from the garret to the kitchen—the house seemed lonely like itself, with the one ever-disturbing element in the family serenity suddenly withdrawn from it. Anxious to witness, with her own eyes, the reality of a transformation in which past experience still inclined her to disbelieve, Miss Garth ascended to Magdalen's room, knocked twice at the door, received no answer, opened it, and looked in.

There sat Magdalen, in an arm-chair before the long looking-glass, with all her hair let down over her shoulders, absorbed in the study of her part, and comfortably arrayed in her morning wrapper, until it was time to dress for dinner. At a short distance behind her the lady's-maid, slowly combing out the long, heavy locks of her young mistress's hair, with the sleepy resignation of a woman who had been engaged in that employment for some hours past. The sun was shining, and the green shutters outside the window were closed. The dim light fell tenderly on the two quiet seated figures; on the little white bed, with its pure lining of white enamel; on the toilet-table with its sparkling caskets, its crystal bottles, its silver bell with Cupid for a handle, its litter of little luxuries that adorn the shrine of a woman's bedchamber. The luxurious tranquillity of the scene; the cool fragrance of flowers and perfume in the atmosphere; the rapt attitude of Magdalen, absorbed over her reading; the monotonous regularity of movement in the maid's hand and arm, as she drew the comb smoothly through and through her mistress's hair—all conveyed the same soothing impression of drowsy, delicious quiet. On one side of the door were the broad daylight, and the familiar realities of life. On the other was the dream-land of Elysian serenity, the sanctuary of unruffled repose.

"THERE SAT MAGDALEN, IN AN ARM-CHAIR BEFORE THE LONG LOOKING-GLASS," ETC.

Miss Garth paused on the threshold, and looked into the room in silence.

Magdalen's curious fancy for having her hair combed at all times and seasons was among the peculiarities of her character which were notorious to every body in the house. It was one of her father's favorite jokes, that she reminded him, on such occasions, of a cat having her back stroked, and that he always expected, if the combing were only continued long enough, to hear her pur. Extravagant as it may seem, the comparison was not altogether inappropriate. The girl's fervid temperament intensified the essentially feminine pleasure that most women feel in the passage of the comb through their hair to a luxury of sensation which absorbed her in enjoyment, so serenely self-demonstrative, so drowsily deep, that it did irresistibly suggest a pet cat's enjoyment under a caressing hand. Intimately as Miss Garth was acquainted with this peculiarity in her pupil, she now saw it asserting itself for the first time in association with mental exertion of any kind on Magdalen's part. Feeling, therefore, some curiosity to know how long the combing and the studying had gone on together, she ventured on putting the question, first, to the mistress, and (receiving no answer in that quarter), secondly, to the maid.

"All the afternoon, Miss, off and on," was the weary answer. "Miss Magdalen says it soothes her feelings and clears her mind."

Knowing by experience that interference would be hopeless, under these circumstances, Miss Garth turned sharply and left the room. She smiled when she was outside on the landing. The female mind does occasionally, though not often, project itself into the future. Miss Garth was prophetically pitying Magdalen's unfortunate husband.

Dinner-time presented the fair student to the family eye in the same mentally absorbed aspect. On all ordinary occasions Magdalen's appetite would have terrified those feeble sentimentalists who affect to ignore the all-important influence which female feeding exerts in the production of female beauty. On this occasion she refused one dish after another with a resolution which implied the rarest of all modern martyrdoms—gastric martyrdom. "I have conceived the part of Lucy," she observed, with the demurest gravity. "The next difficulty is to make Frank conceive the part of Falkland. I see nothing to laugh at—you would all be serious enough if you had my responsibilities. No, papa—no wine to-day, thank you. I must keep my intelligence clear. Water, Thomas—and a little more jelly, I think, before you take it away."

When Frank presented himself in the evening, ignorant of the first elements of his part, she took him in hand, as a middle-aged schoolmistress might have taken in hand a backward little boy. The few attempts he made to vary the sternly practical nature of the evening's occupation by slipping in compliments sidelong she put away from her with the contemptuous self-possession of a woman of twice her age. She literally forced him into his part. Her father fell asleep in his chair. Mrs. Vanstone and Miss Garth lost their interest in the proceedings, retired to the farther end of the room, and spoke together in whispers. It grew later and later; and still Magdalen never flinched from her task—still, with equal perseverance, Norah, who had been on the watch all through the evening, kept on the watch to the end. The distrust darkened and darkened on her face as she looked at her sister and Frank; as she saw how close they sat together, devoted to the same interest and working to the same end. The clock on the mantlepiece pointed to half past eleven before Lucy the resolute permitted Falkland the helpless to shut up his task-book for the night. "She's wonderfully clever, isn't she?" said Frank, taking leave of Mr. Vanstone at the hall-door. "I'm to come to-morrow and hear more of her views—if you have no objection. I shall never do it; don't tell her I said so. As fast as she teaches me one speech, the other goes out of my head. Discouraging, isn't it? Good-night."

The next day but one was the day of the first full rehearsal. On the previous evening Mrs. Vanstone's spirits had been sadly depressed. At a private interview with Miss Garth she had referred again, of her own accord, to the subject of her letter from London—had spoken self-reproachfully of her weakness in admitting Captain Wragge's impudent claim to a family connection with her—and had then reverted to the state of her health, and to the doubtful prospect that awaited her in the coming summer, in a tone of despondency which it was very distressing to hear. Anxious to cheer her spirits, Miss Garth had changed the conversation as soon as possible—had referred to the approaching theatrical performance—and had relieved Mrs. Vanstone's mind of all anxiety in that direction, by announcing her intention of accompany Magdalen to each rehearsal, and of not losing sight of her until she was safely back again in her father's house. Accordingly, when Frank presented himself at Combe-Raven on the eventful morning, there stood Miss Garth prepared—in the interpolated character of Argus—to accompany Lucy and Falkland to the scene of trial. The railway conveyed the three, in excellent time, to Evergreen Lodge; and at one o'clock the rehearsal began.

CHAPTER VI.

"I hope Miss Vanstone knows her part?" whispered Mrs. Marrable, anxiously addressing herself to Miss Garth, in a corner of the theatre. "If airs and graces make an actress, ma'am, Magdalen's performance will astonish us all." With that reply Miss Garth took out her work and seated herself, on guard, in the centre of the pit.

The manager perched himself, book in hand, on a stool close in front of the stage. He was an active little man, of a sweet and cheerful temper; and he gave the signal to begin with as patient an interest in the proceedings as if they had caused him no trouble in the past, and promised him no difficulty in the future. The two characters which open the comedy of The Rivals, "Fag" and the "Coachman," appeared on the scene—looked many sizes too tall for their canvas back-ground, which represented a "Street in Bath"—exhibited the customary inability to manage their own arms, legs, and voices—went out severally at the wrong exits—and expressed their perfect approval of results, so far, by laughing heartily behind the scenes. "Silence, gentlemen, if you please," remonstrated the cheerful manager. "As loud as you like on the stage, but the audience mustn't hear you off it. Miss Marrable ready? Miss Vanstone ready? Easy there with the 'Street in Bath;' it's going up crooked! Face this way, Miss Marrable; full face, if you please. Miss Vanstone—" He checked himself suddenly. "Curious," he said, under his breath—"she fronts the audience of her own accord!" Lucy opened the scene in these words: "Indeed, ma'am, I traversed half the town in search of it: I don't believe there's a circulating library in Bath I haven't been at." The manager started in his chair. "My heart alive! she speaks out without telling!" The dialogue went on. Lucy produced the novels for Miss Lydia Languish's private reading from under her cloak. The manager rose excitably to his feet. Marvelous! No hurry with the books; no dropping them. She looked at the titles before she announced them to her mistress; she set down "Humphry Clinker" on "The Tears of Sensibility" with a smart little smack which pointed the antithesis. One moment—and she announced Julia's visit; another—and she dropped the brisk waiting-maid's courtesy; a third—and she was off the stage instantly, on the side set down for her in the book. The manager wheeled round in his chair, and looked hard at Miss Garth. "I beg your pardon, ma'am," he said. "Miss Marrable told me, before we began, that this was the young lady's first attempt. It can't be, surely?"

"It is," replied Miss Garth, reflecting the manager's look of amazement in her own face. Was it possible that Magdalen's unintelligible industry in the study of her part really sprang from a serious interest in her occupation—an interest which implied a natural fitness for it?

The rehearsal went on. The stout lady with the wig (and the excellent heart) personated the sentimental Julia from an inveterately tragic point of view, and used her handkerchief distractedly in the first scene. The spinster-relative felt Mrs. Malaprop's mistakes in language so seriously, and took such extraordinary pains with her blunders, that they sounded more like exercises in elocution than any thing else. The unhappy lad who led the forlorn hope of the company, in the person of "Sir Antony Absolute," expressed the age and irascibility of his character by tottering incessantly at the knees, and thumping the stage perpetually with his stick. Slowly and clumsily, with constant interruptions and interminable mistakes, the first act dragged on, until Lucy appeared again to end it in soliloquy, with the confession of her assumed simplicity and the praise of her own cunning.

Here the stage artifice of the situation presented difficulties which Magdalen had not encountered in the first scene; and here her total want of experience led her into more than one palpable mistake. The stage-manager, with an eagerness which he had not shown in the case of any other member of the company, interfered immediately, and set her right. At one point she was to pause, and take a turn on the stage—she did it. At another she was to stop, toss her head, and look pertly at the audience—she did it. When she took out the paper to read the list of the presents she had received, could she give it a tap with her finger (Yes)? And lead off with a little laugh (Yes—after twice trying)? Could she read the different items with a sly look at the end of each sentence, straight at the pit (Yes, straight at the pit, and as sly as you please)? The manager's cheerful face beamed with approval. He tucked the play under his arm, and clapped his hands gayly; the gentlemen, clustered together behind the scenes, followed his example; the ladies looked at each other with dawning doubts whether they had not better have left the new recruit in the retirement of private life. Too deeply absorbed in the business of the stage to heed any of them, Magdalen asked leave to repeat the soliloquy, and make quite sure of her own improvement. She went all through it again, without a mistake this time, from beginning to end; the manager celebrating her attention to his directions by an outburst of professional approbation, which escaped him in spite of himself. "She can take a hint!" cried the little man, with a hearty smack of his hand on the prompt-book. "She's a born actress, if ever there was one yet!"

"I hope not," said Miss Garth to herself, taking up the work which had dropped into her lap, and looking down at it in some perplexity. Her worst apprehension of results in connection with the theatrical enterprise had foreboded levity of conduct with some of the gentlemen—she had not bargained for this. Magdalen, in the capacity of a thoughtless girl, was comparatively easy to deal with. Magdalen, in the character of a born actress, threatened serious future difficulties.

The rehearsal proceeded. Lucy returned to the stage for her scenes in the second act (the last in which she appears) with Sir Lucius and Fag. Here again Magdalen's inexperience betrayed itself—and here once more her resolution in attacking and conquering her own mistakes astonished every body. "Bravo!" cried the gentlemen behind the scenes, as she steadily trampled down one blunder after another. "Ridiculous!" said the ladies, "with such a small part as hers." "Heaven forgive me!" thought Miss Garth, coming round unwillingly to the general opinion. "I almost wish we were Papists, and had a convent to put her in to-morrow." One of Mr. Marrable's servants entered the theatre as that desperate aspiration escaped the governess. She instantly sent the man behind the scenes with a message: "Miss Vanstone has done her part in the rehearsal: request her to come here and sit by me." The servant returned with a polite apology: "Miss Vanstone's kind love, and she begs to be excused—she's prompting Mr. Clare." She prompted him to such purpose that he actually got through his part. The performances of the other gentlemen were obtrusively imbecile. Frank was just one degree better—he was modestly incapable; and he gained by comparison. "Thanks to Miss Vanstone," observed the manager, who had heard the prompting. "She pulled him through. We shall be flat enough at night, when the drop falls on the second act, and the audience have seen the last of her. It's a thousand pities she hasn't got a better part!"

"It's a thousand mercies she's no more to do than she has," muttered Miss Garth, overhearing him. "As things are, the people can't well turn her head with applause. She's out of the play in the second act—that's one comfort!"

No well-regulated mind ever draws its inferences in a hurry; Miss Garth's mind was well-regulated; therefore, logically speaking, Miss Garth ought to have been superior to the weakness of rushing at conclusions. She had committed that error, nevertheless, under present circumstances. In plainer terms, the consoling reflection which had just occurred to her assumed that the play had by this time survived all its disasters, and entered on its long-deferred career of success. The play had done nothing of the sort. Misfortune and the Marrable family had not parted company yet.

When the rehearsal was over, nobody observed that the stout lady with the wig privately withdrew herself from the company; and when she was afterward missed from the table of refreshments, which Mr. Marrable's hospitality kept ready spread in a room near the theatre, nobody imagined that there was any serious reason for her absence. It was not till the ladies and gentlemen assembled for the next rehearsal that the true state of the case was impressed on the minds of the company. At the appointed hour no Julia appeared. In her stead Mrs. Marrable portentously approached the stage with an open letter in her hand. She was naturally a lady of the mildest good-breeding; she was mistress of every bland conventionality in the English language—but disasters and dramatic influences combined threw even this harmless matron off her balance at last. For the first time in her life Mrs. Marrable indulged in vehement gesture and used strong language. She handed the letter sternly, at arm's-length, to her daughter. "My dear," she said, with an aspect of awful composure, "we are under a Curse." Before the amazed dramatic company could petition for an explanation she turned and left the room. The manager's professional eye followed her out respectfully—he looked as if he approved of the exit, from a theatrical point of view.

What new misfortune had befallen the play? The last and worst of all misfortunes had assailed it. The stout lady had resigned her part.

Not maliciously. Her heart, which had been in the right place throughout, remained inflexibly in the right place still. Her explanation of the circumstances proved this, if nothing else did. The letter began with a statement: She had overheard at the last rehearsal (quite unintentionally) personal remarks of which she was the subject. They might, or might not, have had reference to her—Hair, and her—Figure. She would not distress Mrs. Marrable by repeating them. Neither would she mention names, because it was foreign to her nature to make bad worse. The only course at all consistent with her own self-respect was to resign her part. She inclosed it accordingly to Mrs. Marrable, with many apologies for her presumption in undertaking a youthful character at—what a gentleman was pleased to term—her Age; and with what two ladies were rude enough to characterize as her disadvantages of—Hair, and—Figure. A younger and more attractive representative of Julia would no doubt be easily found. In the mean time all persons concerned had her full forgiveness; to which she would only beg leave to add her best and kindest wishes for the success of the play.

In four nights more the play was to be performed. If ever any human enterprise stood in need of good wishes to help it, that enterprise was unquestionably the theatrical entertainment at Evergreen Lodge!

One arm-chair was allowed on the stage; and into that arm-chair Miss Marrable sank, preparatory to a fit of hysterics. Magdalen stepped forward at the first convulsion, snatched the letter from Miss Marrable's hand, and stopped the threatened catastrophe.

"She's an ugly, bald-headed, malicious, middle-aged wretch," said Magdalen, tearing the letter into fragments, and tossing them over the heads of the company. "But I can tell her one thing—she sha'n't spoil the play. I'll act Julia."

"Bravo!" cried the chorus of gentlemen—the anonymous gentleman who had helped to do the mischief (otherwise Mr. Francis Clare) loudest of all.

"If you want the truth I don't shrink from owning it," continued Magdalen. "I'm one of the ladies she means. I said she had a head like a mop and a waist like a bolster. So she has."

"I am the other lady," added the spinster-relative. "But I only said she was too stout for the part."

"I am the gentleman," chimed in Frank, stimulated by the force of example. "I said nothing—I only agreed with the ladies."

Here Miss Garth seized her opportunity, and addressed the stage loudly from the pit.

"Stop! stop!" she said. "You can't settle the difficulty in that way. If Magdalen plays Julia, who is to play Lucy?"

Miss Marrable sank back in the arm-chair and gave way to the second convulsion.

"Stuff and nonsense!" cried Magdalen, "the thing's simple enough. I'll act Julia and Lucy both together."

The manager was consulted on the spot. Suppressing Lucy's first entrance, and turning the short dialogue about the novels into a soliloquy for Lydia Languish, appeared to be the only changes of importance necessary to the accomplishment of Magdalen's project. Lucy's two telling scenes, at the end of the first and second acts, were sufficiently removed from the scenes in which Julia appeared to give time for the necessary transformations in dress. Even Miss Garth, though she tried hard to find them, could put no fresh obstacles in the way. The question was settled in five minutes, and the rehearsal went on; Magdalen learning Julia's stage situations with the book in her hand, and announcing afterward, on the journey home, that she proposed sitting up all night to study the new part. Frank thereupon expressed his fears that she would have no time left to help him through his theatrical difficulties. She tapped him on the shoulder coquettishly with her part. "You foolish fellow, how am I to do without you? You're Julia's jealous lover; you're always making Julia cry. Come to-night, and make me cry at tea-time. You haven't got a venomous old woman in a wig to act with now. It's my heart you're to break—and of course I shall teach you how to do it."

The four days' interval passed busily in perpetual rehearsals, public and private. The night of performance arrived; the guests assembled; the great dramatic experiment stood on its trial. Magdalen had made the most of her opportunities; she had learned all that the manager could teach her in the time. Miss Garth left her when the overture began, sitting apart in a corner behind the scenes, serious and silent, with her smelling-bottle in one hand and her book in the other, resolutely training herself for the coming ordeal to the very last.

The play began, with all the proper accompaniments of a theatrical performance in private life; with a crowded audience, an African temperature, a bursting of heated lamp-glasses, and a difficulty in drawing up the curtain. "Fag" and "the Coachman," who opened the scene, took leave of their memories as soon as they stepped on the stage; left half their dialogue unspoken; came to a dead pause; were audibly entreated by the invisible manager to "come off;" and went off accordingly, in every respect sadder and wiser men than when they went on. The next scene disclosed Miss Marrable as "Lydia Languish," gracefully seated, very pretty, beautifully dressed, accurately mistress of the smallest words in her part; possessed, in short, of every personal resource—except her voice. The ladies admired, the gentlemen applauded. Nobody heard any thing but the words "Speak up, Miss," whispered by the same voice which had already entreated Fag and the Coachman to "come off." A responsive titter rose among the younger spectators, checked immediately by magnanimous applause. The temperature of the audience was rising to Blood Heat—but the national sense of fair play was not boiled out of them yet.

In the midst of the demonstration Magdalen quietly made her first entrance, as "Julia." She was dressed very plainly in dark colors, and wore her own hair; all stage adjuncts and alterations (excepting the slightest possible touch of rouge on her cheeks) having been kept in reserve, to disguise her the more effectually in her second part. The grace and simplicity of her costume, the steady self-possession with which she looked out over the eager rows of faces before her, raised a low hum of approval and expectation. She spoke—after suppressing a momentary tremor—with a quiet distinctness of utterance which reached all ears, and which at once confirmed the favorable impression that her appearance had produced. The one member of the audience who looked at her and listened to her coldly was her elder sister. Before the actress of the evening had been five minutes on the stage, Norah detected, to her own indescribable astonishment, that Magdalen had audaciously individualized the feeble amiability of "Julia's" character by seizing no less a person than herself as the model to act it by. She saw all her own little formal peculiarities of manner and movement unblushingly reproduced—and even the very tone of her voice so accurately mimicked from time to time that the accents startled her as if she was speaking herself, with an echo on the stage. The effect of this cool appropriation of Norah's identity to theatrical purposes on the audience—who only saw results—asserted itself in a storm of applause on Magdalen's exit. She had won two incontestible triumphs in her first scene. By a dextrous piece of mimicry she had made a living reality of one of the most insipid characters in the English drama, and she had roused to enthusiasm an audience of two hundred exiles from the [illegible] of ventilation, all simmering together in their own animal heat. Under the circumstances, where is the screen by profession who could have done much more?

But the event of the evening was still to come. Magdalen's disguised reappearance at the end of the act, in the character of "Lucy"—with false hair and false eyebrows, with a bright-red complexion and patches on her cheeks, with the gayest colors flaunting in her dress, and the shrillest vivacity of voice and manner—fairly staggered the audience. They looked down at their programmes, to see if the announcement had been altered under an assumed name; looked up again at the stage; penetrated the disguise; and vented their astonishment in another round of applause, louder and heartier even than the last. Norah herself could not deny this time that the tribute of approbation had been well deserved. There, forcing its way steadily through all the fields of inexperience—the timidity peculiar to the dullest of the spectators, was the rare faculty of dramatic impersonation, expressing itself in every look and action of this girl of eighteen, who now stood on a stage for the first time in her life. Falling in the natural sequence of the double task which she had undertaken, she succeeded in the one important necessity of saying the main distinctions of her character thoroughly apart. Every body felt that the difficulty lay here—every body saw how difficulty conquered—every body echoed the manager's enthusiasm at rehearsal, which had hailed her as a born actress.

When the drop-scene descended for the first time Magdalen had encountered the ordeal of the whole interest and attraction of the play. The audience politely applauded Miss Marbella, as became the guests assembled in her father's house; and good-humouredly encouraged the remainder of the company, to help them through a task for which they were all, more or less palpably unfit. But as the play proceeded nothing caused them to any genuine expression of interest when Magdalen was absent from the scene. There was no disguising it: Miss Marbella and her bosom friends had not half-hospitably cast in the shade by the new recruit whom they had summoned to assist them in the hypocrisy of forlorn hope. And this on Miss Marbella's own birthday! and this in her father's house! and this after the unanimous exercises of six weeks past! Of all the domestic disasters which the thankless theatrical career had inflicted on the Marbelle family, the crowning misfortune was now consummated by Magdalen's success.

Leaving Mr. Vanstone and Norah, on the conclusion of the play, among the guests in the supper-room, Miss Garth was behind the scenes ostensibly anxious to see if she could be of any use; really bent on assuring herself that Magdalen's head had been turned by the triumphs of the evening. It would not have surprised Miss Garth if she had found Magdalen in full tide of making terms with the manager for her forthcoming appearance in a theatre. Such events really turned out she found Magdalen on the stage, receiving with gracious smiles a visit which the manager presented to pay with a professional bow. Noticing Miss Garth's mute look of inquiry, the civil little man hastened to explain that the card was his own, and that he was merely taking the favor of Miss Vanstone's recommendation for any future engagement.

"This is not the last time the young lady will be concerned in private theatricals, I'll answer for it," said the manager. "And if a regular retreat is wanted on the next occasion, she has fairly promised to say a good word for me. I am always to be heard of, Miss, at that address." Saying those words, he bowed again, and disappeared.

Vague suspicions beset the mind of Miss Garth, and seemed to insist on taking shape in her cord. No more harmless morsel of pasteboard was ever passed from one hand to another. The card containing but the name of Captain Treverton, and, under it, the name and address of a theatrical agent in London.

"It is not worth the trouble of keeping," said Miss Garth.

Magdalen caught her hand before she could throw the card away—possessed herself of it the next instant—and put it in her pocket.

"I promised to recommend him," she said—"and that's one reason for keeping his card. But if does nothing else, it will answer for the happiest evening of my life—and that's another. Come!" she cried, throwing her arms round Miss Garth's neck in feverish gayety—"congratulate me on my success!"

"I will congratulate you when you have got over it," said Miss Garth.

It half an hour more Magdalen had changed her dress, and joined the guests, and had stepped into an atmosphere of congratulation high above the reach of any unpleasant reminiscences that Miss Garth could exercise. Frank, dilatory in all his proceedings, was the last of the dramatic company who left the precincts of the stage. He made no attempt to join Magdalen in the supper-room—but he was ready in the hall with her cloak, when the carriages were called and the party broke up.

"Oh, Frank!" she said, looking round at him, as he put the cloak on her shoulders, "I am so sorry it's all over. Come to-morrow morning and let's talk about it by ourselves."

"In the shrubbery at ten?" asked Frank, in a whisper.

She drew up the hood of her cloak and nodded to him gayly. Miss Garth, standing near, noticed the looks that passed between them, though the disturbance made by the parting guests prevented her from hearing the words. There was a soft, underlying tenderness in Magdalen's assumed gayety of manner—there was a sudden thoughtfulness in her face, a confidential fondness in her hand, as she took Frank's arm and went out to the carriage. What did it mean? Had the passing interest in him, as her stage-pupil, treacherously sown the seeds of any deeper interest in him as a man? Had the idle theatrical scheme, now that it was all over, graver results to answer for than a mischievous waste of time?

The lines on Miss Garth's face deepened and hardened; she stood long after the fluttering crowd around her. Norah's warning words, addressed to Mrs. Vanstone in the garden, returned to her memory—and now, for the first time, the idea dawned on her that Norah had seen consequences in their true light.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NEW MILITARY BOOKS.
MAXIMS, ADVICE AND INSTRUCTIONS
FOR
THE ART OF WAR;
Or, A Practical Military Guide, for the Use of Soldiers of all Arms,
AND OF ALL COUNTRIES.
Translated from the French by Lieut. Lendy.
One vol. 18mo, red cloth, 75c.

HINTS ON TACTICS.
By "Gen'l ——." With Portraits.
One vol. 18mo, Paper, 25c.

OFFICER'S NAVY REGISTER, FOR 1862.
Revised Edition; from the copy issued by the Adjutant-General of the Army.
Paper, 50c.

Any of the above SENT FREE BY MAIL, on receipt of price.
D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
No. 192 Broadway, New York.

A New Edition of
Harper's War Map
Now Ready.
Price Six Cents.
Sent by mail on receipt of price.
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

BRODIE'S
Stock of Spring
and Summer
MANTILLAS,
Now Ready for
Wholesale Cash Buyers,
at the
OLD STAND
300 Canal Street, New York.

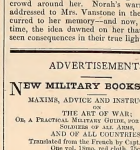
AGENTS MAKE MOST MONEY and give entire satisfaction selling our PATENT SILVER, STATIONERY AND JEWELRY PACKAGES. Circulars free. P. HASKINS & CO. 36 Beekman St., N. Y.

100,000 BARRELS OF THE LODI MANU'G CO'S POUDRETTE For sale by JAMES E. TAYLOR & CO., 58 Cedar, South Street, New York.
The article is the cheapest, best, and most powerful fertilizer offered in market. It ripens crops from two to three weeks earlier, is not injurious to the soil, nor exhausting to the soil. It has no equal in gardens, and upon grass, flowers, and grain. Send for pamphlet containing the corn crop. The Saviour or Lasso pays for the Poudrette.

$25 Now agents wanted for Lodi Manufacturing Co.'s Brand, No. 60 Courtlandt Street. The Co.'s Almanac for 1862, with the opinions of Horace Greeley, Daniel Webster, and over 100 farmers in different States, will be sent free to any one applying for the same.
Address JAMES T. FOSTER,
Care of Lodi Manufacturing Co.,
No. 60 Courtlandt Street, New York.

Commercial Travelers and Agents
Wanted to Sell our
25 Cent Portfolio Package.
Contents.—15 Sheets Note Paper, 15 Envelopes, 1 Pen-holder, 1 Pen, 1 Pencil, 1 Blotting Pad, 100 Recipes, 1 Set Hymns, 1 Backgammon Board, 1 Set Initials for Stamping Interest.—2 Fashionable Embroidery Designs for Collars, 2 for Under-Sleeves, 2 for Cuffs—Sheet, 2 for Corner of Handkerchief, 2 for Cuffs, 1 for Silk Purse, 1 for Child's Dress, 1 for Ornament or Pillow Case, 1 Parisian Garden, and One Hundred Articles Useful Everywhere. $10 a day can be realized. Send stamp for Circular of wholesale prices.
WEIR & CO., 43 South Third Street, Phila., Pa.

$75 A MONTH!—WANTED TO RIDE AGENTS in every County. Salary or $25 per hundred and expenses, to sell a new and cheap Sewing Machine. Address (with stamp) GROVER & BAKER, Alfred, Maine.



A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agent F. C. WELLS & CO., 110 Franklin St., New York. Sold by Apothecaries everywhere.

BACK NUMBERS of Harper's Weekly and Magazine always on hand at J. F. THEW-WITH'S, No. 103 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

Look
In Harper's Weekly of March 22d, No. 273, page 191, the name of the firm of the firm of W. Forsyth & Co. is changed to J. H. Winslow & Co. All Certificates with the name of W. Forsyth & Co. attached are good, and will be redeemed by us as fast as sold in the usual way.
J. H. WINSLOW & CO.
P. O. Box 5079. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Rheumatism—All those afflicted with Rheumatism, Gout, Dyspepsia, Chilblains, Cold and Pyral-bilious Fest, and all Nervous Diseases, by wearing Metallos & Co's Patent Galvanic Electric Metallic Insoles, will find immediate and permanent cure from their use, never having yet failed in hundreds of cases. Office and Headquarters for Philadelphia, J. S. SANSON, 3015 Girard Avenue. Send stamp for circular.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

REVOLVER.
A MOST POWERFUL ARM, WHICH CAN BE carried in the pocket without inconvenience. Superior to shot-guns for close work, and more convenient than that of the barrels. It is the most reliable and effective Pocket Revolver yet made, weighs only about 2 lbs., is charged with cartridges, which can be purchased in packages, of any dealer, and never ruined, gain twist and weight. Will penetrate one inch of pine at one hundred and fifty yards. Price of Revolver, with Cartridges, $20.
Retail price, Plated Frame, with 100 cartridges, $20 00
" " Nickel " " " " 22 00
Trade supplied. T. W. MOORE, 426 Hway, N. Y.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style Ivory Note Paper, Envelopes, &c., at GLEASON'S, Engraver, 182 Broadway. Seals and stamps.

AGENTS. Army Traders, and the Speculating Public, wanted to buy Patent Watches and Jewelry. Sale of the most reliable variety. Price lists sent free. A. BERNARD HALL, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

Chapped Hands, Face, Lips, &c.—Cuticle Cure and Preventive.—Hegeman & Co.'s Camphor Ice, with Glycerine, will keep the skin soft in the severest weather. Sold by druggists generally. Price 25 cents. Sent by mail on receipt of 30 cents. HEGEMAN & CO., Nos. 161, 399, 631, and 766 Broadway, New York.

Every Man his own Printer.
Printing Materials for the Army and Navy, Druggists, and Business Men generally. Send for a circular.
31 Park Row (under Lovejoy's Hotel), New York.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS, PATENT PERMA, 918 Broadway, New York. Send for a Circular.

A Certain Cure for Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, &c.

Laurie's Chinese Life Pills.
This wonderful remedy is chiefly composed from the Ginseng root, which grows in the tea districts of China, the use of which, as prescribed by learned Chinese physicians, is known to be a sure cure for Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Loss of Memory, Impotency, M.R.L. Pills are introduced to the French and British Embassies at the Chinese Court, and by him introduced into European practice.
These pills take no effect as a cathartic, but act specifically on the Nervous System, are a speedy and infallible remedy for Neuralgia, Tic-douloureux, St. Vitus' Dance, Hysterics, Lassitude, Lassitude, Depression of Spirits, Sick-Headache, Irritability, Excitement, and all diseases from indigestion, Loss of Sexual strength, and may be taken with entire safety by the most delicate lady or tender child.
Price One Dollar per box of forty pills, or large boxes of a hundred for Two Dollars. Sent by mail, free, on receipt of remittance; or obtained personally from
LAURIE & CO.,
General Agent for the United States, 429 Broadway, N. Y.

Saleable Articles.
A BEAUTIFUL ASSORTMENT of 500 fine Ivory White Assorted Union Envelopes, containing 50 different designs of the most fashionable and Saleable and Beautiful patterns for $1. Also a room of beautiful Cards (Ivory) to match them for $1. Initial Stamples, Pen or Express free, on receipt of price. Agents and the Trade supplied. CHARLES H. WILSON, Stationer, No. 8 Chatham Square, N. Y. City, care of R. LOCKWOOD, Postmaster.

"The Best Thing Yet!"
Agents wanted. Save your Money, and get the Best. Agents and others engaged in selling the Union Price Sewing Machine, are requested to examine our New Package, and be convinced that they can make more money, and give better satisfaction, by selling Thistle & Co.'s Patent, than any other now in the market. Our Stationery is warranted, and the Jewelry is second to none. Send Stamp for Circular.
THISTLE & CO., 139 Nassau Street, New York.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BRACELETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BREASTPINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR RINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR VEST CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR NECK CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR EVERY KIND OF SETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF PINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR MINIATURE PINS OF ALL THE GENERALS. Sutler stores for the trade supplied. W. A. HAYWARD, MANUFACTURING JEWELER, 208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

WATCHES.
10,000 for sale, at Wholesale prices. Entire stamp for descriptive Circular. J. L. Ferguson, 208 Broadway, N.Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Department will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without irritation or injury to the skin. Sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. C. RICHARDS, No. 10 Nassau Street, N. Y.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—A Preacher of the Gospel, having cured his son of Consumption in his worst stages, after having given up by the most eminent eclectical physicians, desires to make known the mode of cure, which proved successful in every case to those afflicted with Coughs, Colds, and Consumption, and he will send it free of charge to all who feel a wish to profit by a trial of their address.
Address DANIEL ADEE, 281 Pearl Street, New York.

"MOUSTACHES AND WHISKERS in 42 days." This GREAT SECRET and sure mode has been a new DISCOVERY, by which 20c. (slight for 25 cts.) Address U. E. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For April, 1862.
CONTENTS.
PAMBOOKAT.—A FAIRY TALE OF THE MALAYS. Illustrations—Pambookat at Ballimore, Washington, and the Fairy.—Pambookat and the Princess.—Pambookat and the Ogre.—The Ogre's Castle.—Pambookat and the Tiger.—The Lightning Goliath.—The Iron Horse.—The Escaping Goliath.
CARICATURES AND CARICATURISTS.
Illustrations.—Old John.—Egotism Dwarf.—Firmness Ag.-Seller.—Fashionable Fiend of the Middle Ages.—Mary Jane's Escort and Ma Vilas.—Dancing Fad, by Collet.—Dancing, by Hogarth.—Farinelli, by Hogarth.—Jervis Dissecting, by Gillray.—Dancing Fad, by Collet, and John Bull, by Gillray.—The Bottomless Pit, by Gillray.—Reconciliation of 1816, by Cruikshank.—Covent Garden Drawing-Room, by Cruikshank.—The Father, His Son, and the Gridiron, by Cruikshank.—The Fashionable Consequences, by Cruikshank.—Mary Ann's Lynch.—Punch and Toby, by Doyle.—Bun upon the Banks of the Sacramento, by Doyle.—Wm. Wilson and Twigtips, by Keene.—A Principal Misunderstanding, by Darley.—The Poly Atheist, by Darley.—The Bachelor's Reception, by Darley.—Going to be Moonlight, by Darley.—Ham Rachel, of Alabama, by Darley.
THE BUILDING OF THE SHIP.
Illustrations.—The Ship Yard.—Axemen.—The Steam Chest.—Interior of the Ship.—Caulking.—Carpenters.—Ship Joiners.—Furnishing Machine.—Drilling Machine.—Thirty Diagrams.
LUCIO ADA'S CHEATBOOK.
LAMP LIKE AT THE RELAY.
THE LOVE OF HALLECK.
ORLEY FARM. By Anthony Trollope. Illustrated by J. E. Millais.
Chapter XLV. Showing how Mrs. Orme could be very Woebegone.
Chapter XLVI. A Woman's Idea of Friendship.
Chapter XLVII. The Good Old Times.
Chapter XLVIII. The Angel of Light under a Cloud.
Chapter XLIX. Conclusion.—Lady Mason at her Counsel.
Broad Issue is to Publish.
LITTLE FRENCH GIRLS.
MY SPECIAL CONTRIBUTOR.
THE CONTEST IN AMERICA. By John Sherwood.
THE CONTEST IN AMERICA. By Wm. M. Thackeray.
THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. Thackeray.
Chapter XXXII. Narrates that famous Joke about Miss Fotheringay.
Chapter XXXIII. Ways and Means.
Chapter XXXIV.—Poor Cupid.—The Ring.—A Letter from Home.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S LITERARY DRAWER.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
ARTIST'S PROOFS.
Illustrations.—Out-Door Scene.—The Drum and the Fife.—The Council Perk.—The Drive.—Mob in Hollow Square.—Cadet Hazing.—Thirty Shot.
FASHIONS FOR APRIL.
Illustrations.—Dinner Toilet and Child's Pardessus.—Ga. Costume.—Evening Dress.—Bride.

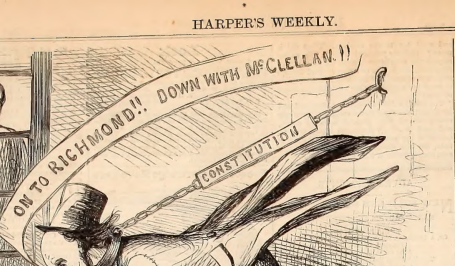
HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE contains the following Articles, by the foremost Novelists of the day, published from early sheets and MSS. furnished by the Authors:

"MISTRESS AND MAID." By Dinah Maria Mulock.
"ORLEY FARM." By Anthony Trollope. Illustrated by J. E. Millais.
"THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP." By William M. Thackeray.

"The Adventures of Philip" will probably be completed in the May No. It will be succeeded by "Framley Parsonage," a favorite Writer, for which engagements have been made.

Mr. J. Sheridan Le Fanu, who is now writing a Story, will furnish a series of Articles, illustrated by himself, descriptive of Scenery and Character. These will be commenced in an early Number. Mr. Lossing will continue the series of papers upon events in the Revolution, which have not been treated in detail by our standard historians. Mr. Edmund Clarence Stedman will contribute, by Dr. Wynne, will comprise anecdotes and reminiscences of the Physicians who have acquired celebrity. Another representative position in our Literature and Science.

Each Number will contain the usual large amount of Miscellaneous Matter, "Editor's Drawer," "Editor's Easy Chair," "Monthly Record of Current Events," &c., &c., making more than any other American periodical of similar class.



TERMS.
One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Eight Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

The Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club Rates.

The Bound Volumes of the United States will be received by the Subscription to Harper's Magazine are requested to remit them in preference to Bank Bills.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

(Scene.—A Private Lunatic Asylum.)

KEEPER. "Yes, Sir; one of our incurables. Dangerous, you ask? No, not at all. Lately he has been rather solid, but we keep him in check, as you see. Take food? Yes, Sir, but sparingly: he has Strange Notions on that point, and no doubt has injured his brain by Eccentric Feeding. Noisy? Oh, very! sometimes makes such a Row that he disturbs all the other Patients. What are his Delusions, you say? Why, he has so many it's hard to remember 'em. Sometimes he fancies he's a General, and sometimes he thinks he's a Nigger; but oftenest he gets it into his head that he's a Newspaper Editor, which is the drollest of all—ha! ha! ha!"

GEN. McC——N. "Ah! indeed! POOR GREELEY! I heartily pity him!"

BULL RUN RUSSELL IN HIS TRUE PART AT LAST.

"The Force of BOMBASTES FURIOSO was last week performed at Lord LYONS's Mansion at Washington. Dr. RUSSELL took the part of BOMBASTES."—Daily Paper.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

McClellan in the Field!

The Life of

Major-General

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

Comprising his Services in Mexico; on the Red River Exploring Expedition; on the Pacific Railway Survey and Exploration; in Northern Oregon; on the Army Commission to Europe, &c., &c., together with a complete History of the Campaign in Western Virginia.

The only complete and authentic Biography of the man.

Price Ten Cents. For sale by all News Dealers, Booksellers, Army Sutlers, and Country Merchants.

Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. Address

BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

"WHAT CAME AFTERWARD?" by T. S. Arthur, and "BATTLE-FIELDS OF OUR FATHERS," by Virginia F. Townsend, two fertile stories, now appearing in ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE. For sale by News Agents.

Price 15 cents a number.

AGENTS WANTED.—The Washington Writing Case, containing entirely new and beautiful designed for the million. It is made of wood and neatly covered with morocco paper, and forms a perfect desk, containing everything for writing. Price 25 cents. Circulars free. JOHN H. TINGLEY, 1851 Fulton St., N. Y.

To all wanting Farms.

NEW SETTLEMENT OF VINELAND.—30 miles from Philadelphia by Railroad. Good farms sell, highly productive for Wheat, Corn, Grass, Fruits, and Vegetables—good market—delightful climate—where farming is profitable, especially fruit growing, and where good business openings can be found. Large numbers are settling, and selling Farms from $10 to $50 per acre. Village lots and 10 acre lots for sale. Five years' time given. Report of Hon. C. E. JOHNSON, Ag. Ed. of the Tribune who has visited the place, together with the "Vineland Rural," giving full description, will be furnished. Address

CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland P.O., Cumberland County, New Jersey.

Constitution Water cures Diabetes and all Diseases of the Urinary Organs. Explicit stamp to MORGAN & ALLEN, 60 Cliff Street, N. Y., and get a Circular.

AGENTS WANTED—MORE MONEY made, more real satisfaction given, and more ready sales guaranteed by selling the "Great New Union Pens" Stationery and Recipe Package." NOW ACKNOWLEDGED by all Dealers to be so overcome as article as to exercise RIVALRY. Our resources are too great for them to contend with, consequently, like wise men, they are leaving the field. We put up the only PACKAGE containing real merit. RICHARDS NEW UNION PRIZE STATIONERY AND RECIPE PACKAGE contains seven articles, of a better quality, and a finer piece of Jewelry than any other Package ever sold.

Send for our circulars, which we will mail free. $5 to $10 per day can be made. We put in each package a beautiful and life-like engraving of GENERAL McCLELLAN. 6x10

GENERAL GEORGE B. McCLELLAN. 6x10
75 Valuable Recipes. 10 Sheets Ladies' Billet Paper.
6 Jewelry Commercial Note Envelopes. 6 Buff Envelopes.
2 Fine Steel Pens.
6 Sheets Ladies' Note Paper. 2 Fine Pencils.
6 White Union Envelopes, in colors. 1 Sheet Blotting Paper. 1 Accommodation Penhold.
6 Ladies' White Union Envelopes.

ALSO A VALUABLE PIECE OF JEWELRY. RICHARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York.

SENT FREE BY MAIL FOR 38 CENTS IN SILVER, A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPIC magnifying GEM, 28c. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free by P.D. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

The Soldiers' Bullet Proof Vest

Has been repeatedly and thoroughly tested at Fort Hamilton, Washington, Harper's Ferry, Old Point, Fifth Regiment of Artillery, and is approved and recommended by all. It is simple, light, and will not impede any movement of the wearer. It will save thousands of lives—it will save thousands. It will also double the value and power of the soldier; and every man in every army is entitled to its protection. Nos. 1, 2, and 3 express the sizes of men, and No. 2 fits nearly all.

Price for Private Vest, $8. Officers' Vests, $12. They will be sent to any address, wholesale or retail, by the MESSRS. ILLIOTT, 192 Broadway, N. Y., and by HUNT & GODWIN, Washington. Agents wanted.

To Consumptives.

THE Advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks, by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption—is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure cure for CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he considers to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing.

Parties wishing the prescription will please address

REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,
Williamsburgh,
Kings County, New York.

Gold Pens Repointed—Equal to New,

On receipt of 75 cts. in money or stamps. Orders by Mail promptly attended to. Gold Pen and Silver Extension Case $1 50. E. S. JOHNSON, 15 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

The Wide World!

Published weekly in Boston. Rare, spirited, absorbing, in short—Romance, Editorials, Fun, Poetry, Readings, and General Intelligence. Always bright, smart, genial, and companionable.

Sold by all News Dealers. 4 cents.

SENT BY EXPRESS

EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S

PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices, Made to Measure at $20 per doz. OR SIX FOR TEN DOLLARS,

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN.

With fine Linen Bosoms, and wristbands, and as good a Shirt as sold in retail stores for $2 00 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $36 00 PER DOZEN.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $20 per dozen are mistaken. Here is the cost of one dozen Shirts:

3½ yards of New York Mills Muslin at 18 c. per yd.. $5 40
3 yards of fine Linen, at 56c. per yard..... 1 92
Making and cutting..... 1 00
Laundry, 24; buttons and cotton, 75c..... 1 00
Profit..... 7 33

Total..... $20 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and directions of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company as receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

387 Broadway, up stairs,

Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

By Author of EAST LYNNE!

THE EARL'S HEIRS!

THE EARL'S HEIRS!

A NEW COPYRIGHT NOVEL OF DOMESTIC LIFE.

It published this day and for sale by all Booksellers and News Agents everywhere. Also, for sale by mail, this volume of over two hundred pages, price fifty cents in paper cover, or seventy-five cents in cloth. It is published and for sale at

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS,

No. 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

To whom all orders must come addressed. Copies sent per mail, free of postage, on receipt of price.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Have Just Published:

A STRANGE STORY. A Novel. By Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Bart., Author of "What will He do with It?" "Lucretia," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," &c. &c. &c. Illustrated by American Artists. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

PILGRIMS OF FASHION. A Novel. By KINAHAN CORNWALLIS. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MAYHEW'S BEN FRANKLIN. Young Benjamin Franklin; or, The Right Road through Life. A story to Show how Benjamin learned the Principles which raised him from a Printer's Boy to the first Ambassador of the American Republic. Mayhew's Book on a Boy's own Subject. By Henry Mayhew, Author of "The Peasant-Boy Philosopher," "The Wonders of Science," "Young Humphrey Davy," &c. &c. With Illustrations by John Gilbert. 16mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

A Thrilling Story, Entitled,

NO NAME

By Wilkie Collins,

AUTHOR OF

"The Woman in White."

Richly Illustrated by John McLenan.

Was commenced in the Number for March 15, No. 272 of

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

And will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year..... $2 00
One Copy for Two Years..... 3 00
One Copy for Three Years..... 4 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together one year, $4.00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—on a specimen—to any one who applies for it.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V., for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861, of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50 each, for sale by all Booksellers.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VI.—NO. 275.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE REBEL STEAMER "NASHVILLE" RUNNING THE BLOCKADE AT BEAUFORT, NORTH CAROLINA.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

CAPTURE OF BEAUFORT AND THE ESCAPE OF THE REBEL STEAM-SHIP "NASHVILLE."

We devote the preceding page to an illustration of the escape of the rebel steamer Nashville, Beaufort, North Carolina.

Immediately upon the capture of Newbern General Burnside started an expedition to Beaufort. The expedition left Newbern on Thursday, 20th, in steamers, and went partially down the River, and on landing struck the railroad, and took up the march for Beaufort, with hand-cars from Newbern loaded with ammunition and baggage. A few days before the gun-boat Stars and Stripes went outside and assisted the blockade, but the Nashville might try to escape to sea when the troops come Inland.

Upon the arrival of the expedition the first report stated that they found the city evacuated by the rebels, Fort Macon blown up by the retreating enemy, and the rebel steamer Nashville burning to prevent her falling into our hands. Later accounts, direct from the blockading squadron, however, say that the Nashville ran the blockade successfully.

General Burnside then sent a force with several gun-boats to Washington. No opposition was made to landing. Our troops occupied the town, and the Union flag is flying at the Court-House.

Our picketa extend about eight miles from Newbern toward Goldsborough. The inhabitants of Newbern are gradually returning to their homes, and taking the oath of allegiance.

We subjoin a CHART of the Harbor of Beaufort, North Carolina.

ADVERTISEMENT.

☞ The Publishers of Harper's Weekly congratulate their readers upon the appearance in its columns of the first part of a new serial tale entitled "No Name," by WILKIE COLLINS, Esq., author of "The Woman in White." Its opening gives promise of a story of wonderful power and matchless dramatic skill which entranced the readers of "The Woman in White." It is seldom that a periodical is enabled to furnish its subscribers with such a series of attractive tales as have appeared consecutively for the past two years in Harper's Weekly, from the pens of Dickens, Wilkie Collins, and Bulwer. The commencement of this Tale affords a good opportunity for parties residing in the country to form clubs, and obtain Harper's Weekly from the second date of subscription.

The circulation of Harper's Weekly being now over 190,000 copies each week, it is the best advertising medium in the country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1862.

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT ON THE BLOCKADE.

THE American public have read with lively satisfaction the candid and honest speeches of Earl Russell, Mr. W. E. Forster, and the Solicitor-General of England on the subject of the blockade of the Southern ports. The tone of the leading British presses has been so uniformly unjust to the United States, and so notoriously under the control of secessionist emissaries, that there were many here who feared that Great Britain would be as false to her traditions and her laws on the subject of blockades as her people had been on the subject of slavery. These apprehensions have not been fulfilled. Members of the British Government have declared in the most positive terms—what we all knew here long ago—that the blockade of the Southern ports is as perfect as any blockade ever was, and that no foreign power can disturb it without trying in the face of the fundamental principles of international law.

The pleasure with which we record these evidences of official candor in England would have been greater if they had not been followed, in almost every instance, by the expression of opinions unfavorable to the success of the North. It is natural that British statesmen should cling to their cherished hope of seeing this country divided and weakened. But is it wise, is it friendly, to proclaim the wish so constantly to the world? What would be said of a tradesman who was constantly predicting about the bankruptcy of his rival over the way? Would he not be set down as a dirty, mean fellow? Would it not have been better for Earl Russell to have left this sort of thing to Gregory and Ferguson, and other blackguards and boobies?

WHAT TO DO WITH THE NEGROES.

SENATOR DOOLITTLE made substantial progress in the Senate last week with his bill. The other day, that he would never vote for emancipation without colonization, though the Senate, by the casting vote of the Vice-President, has decided in the opposite sense. With the exception of the crazy people down South who are being whipped into fighting by the armies of the Union, every body now agrees that, sooner or later, in one way or another, slavery ought to be abolished on American soil. But the main question thus decided, it is high time that the people began to think of and discuss the questions yet undetermined of the how and the when.

We have two historical precedents—that of Great Britain and that of France. In the year 1834 the British Parliament passed a law emancipating the slaves in the British West India Islands, with compensation ($100,000,000) to the owners; the act was only to take effect in 1838. In 1848 the revolutionary Government of France with a stroke of the pen freed all the slaves in the French Islands: no compensation was granted to the owners, and the act took effect immediately.

These two plans of emancipation were carried under the most diametrically opposite circumstances. Emancipation in the British colonies had been brought before Parliament every year for twenty years, and only succeeded at last through the support of London bankers, creditors of the slave-owners in Jamaica and Barbados, who saw in a parliamentary grant their only chance of collecting the debts due them. The measure was adopted after full deliberation, and five years were granted to the slaves and their owners to prepare for the change. In France emancipation was decreed from the impulse of the moment, without outside pressure from any quarter, and without preliminary notice of any kind to the parties principally concerned.

So far as practical results show, the French scheme succeeded better than the English. The British colonies began to decay after emancipation, relapsed almost into a desert condition, and have only begun to recover very recently. The French colonies have undergone but little change.

It would, however, be rash hence to infer, that immediate and unconditional emancipation works better than the gradual and conditional abolition of slavery. The French planters, deeply in the British colonists mainly in consequence of the lessened and insufficient culture of the white slave-owners. With such resources they refused to accommodate themselves to the new condition of things; haughtily declined to pay wages to the colored people who had been their slaves, and sank into ruin with their estates for want of common sense. Slavery had rotted their hearts and minds out, as it has those of the whites of several of our Southern States; and the British emancipation, for nearly a quarter of a century, was due to their example. The slave-holders of the French islands, on the contrary, with their national activity, adapted themselves at once to the new order of things, paid wages cheerfully to the emancipated slaves, and went on growing tropical products as before.

In neither case was it proposed to expatriate the slaves after emancipation, and both British and French colonies, since the abolition of slavery, so far from seeking to get rid of the negro, have complained loudly of the want of labor. The Jamaica government has actually tried to import free negroes from the United States.

In studying these precedents it must be remembered that the slaves in our Southern States are at least ten times as numerous as the slaves in either the British or the French colonies. They now exceed four millions in number, and soon now living will, in all probability, see the colored race on this continent more numerous than the entire population of the country at the present time.

It is pretty well understood that President Lincoln agrees with Senator Doolittle in advocating colonization of the blacks. This is the Western plan. Illinois has always refused citizens of free color in the State, and the movement generally object as much to free negroes as to slavery. Those who have read "Sewell's Cotton and Free Labor in the Slave States" will understand this prejudice. In Jamaica and Barbados the mulattoes are steadily gaining power and influence, and the end can not be mistaken. The white race must eventually go to the wall. To avoid this result, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Doolittle, Mr. Blair, and those who agree with them, propose to colonize the negroes of our Southern States—to send them to Hayti, or Central America, or somewhere else.

To be effectual this remedy must be thorough. The entire four millions must be exported.

Let us assume that the National Legislature adopts the colonization scheme, and decides to carry it into effect. To carry the 4,000,000 slaves now in the Slave States to a foreign port would require at least 8000 vessels of 1000 tons burden—in other words, all the large sailing vessels in the world for a couple of years. The cost of transportation alone, assuming that the place of destination were in the West Indies or Central America, could not fall short of $100,000,000. It would likewise be necessary to support the 4,000,000 slaves for one year at least one year in their new abode, which could not well cost less than $100,000,000 more. The moment the slaves were sent away the United States would raise the very article has been raised by the British West Indies ever since emancipation—for many years. Cotton, sugar, and rice plantations would go to ruin for want of labor. Prosperous regions would relapse into wilderness, and what is worse, as the new dominant nations of Europe have been driven, into adopting systems of coolie and negro immigration. In the mean time, under the fostering influence of a tropical sun, a negro empire would be rearing at its head menacingly somewhere on our Southern border. This empire would number 10,000,000 souls in 1875, and 30,000,000 in 1900. Would not such a neighbor be more dangerous than any of the wars which we have tried to ward off by adopting the Monroe doctrine?

We have said nothing of the probability that the negroes would object to be exiled, and of the monstrous difficulty of exporting 4,000,000 human beings against their will. This is an obstacle which could be surmounted, and which overcome it would involve much expenditure of money, time, and energy.

We offer no theories on this vital question, and are content to throw out a few facts by the wayside for the consideration of the people. Soon enough it will devolve upon us to decide upon a policy in regard to these negroes. Let us be prepared to act with a full knowledge of past history, present circumstances, and future prospects. It will not do to be led by passion or prejudice in the matter. Our action will determine the weal or woe of many generations of white people on this continent. On the face of it, the problem appears to be one of unparalleled difficulty—one in which the issues to true beings are so constantly obscured by the fanatic teachings of partisans of naked material interest on the one side, and of abstract moral principle on the other. But we shall have to solve it some day.

THE LOUNGER.

HOW WILL YOU DO IT?

It is certainly tiresome to keep on exposing absurdities and errors; but if we were to be satisfied with a simple denial and exposure of untruth, then —not to put too fine a point upon it—the devil would have his own way easily. All the rebellion wants is to be let alone. It is all that treason wants—that any crime wants.

The present error that cries aloud for reiterated correction is the querulous complaint—"What is the use?" "Here we are, tied to a tree-how they make a stand. Don't you see they all run away?" "Is the blockade effective?" "Look at the Virginia Valley—at Newbern—they all go off with the negroes except the old people and the slaves. Come, now, you may look, but you can not conquer. They may hold out, but they can not secure their independence. They can not do it as it is long. Sooner or later you've got to compromise."

Compromise what? What is there to compromise? Here is a crew of rebels, armed, equipped, drilled, intrenched, resolute, who defy the Government of the nation. Either they must succeed in bringing the Government to terms, or the Government must reduce them. If they can compel the Government to agree that they shall enjoy certain conditions, then they are successful, and the Government is overthrown. Suppose that South Carolina agrees to cease active hostility upon condition that she shall have the forts in her harbor, and that the United States will allow her to keep the garland tartlf? Or suppose that Jeff Davis says that he will do what he can to disband the rebel armies, on condition that the Administration will agree that a slaveholder may take and hold his slave anywhere within the Union? In that case Jeff Davis merely dictates terms to a conquered enemy. If you will do this, he says, I will lay down my arms; if not, I will fight.

Besides, practically, Jeff Davis is but a single rebel. He can not lay his own arms; but how can he bind any other rebel? And the administration of our Government may accept terms which the United Administration may repudiate. The war is our only supposed; and only suspended because neither side has conquered.

There can be no compromise, because there are no grounds for a compromise. A compromise belongs to peaceful times. It is a friendly gateway to each other, If you will favor me in this, I will favor you in that. That is a compromise. But if two contending men sit down to a meal, and one says to the other, "If you will give me your arms and go home I will not fire," and the other assents, that is not a compromise, it is a surrender, a bloodless victory. Or suppose, in the midst of the fight in Hampton Roads, the Merrimac had said to the Monitor, "Let us each turn about and go home;" that would be a compromise. But what would be settled by it? Each would only have waited for the other to come out again.

In our war we have to beat absolutely, or to be absolutely beaten.

THE RHODE ISLAND LINE.

"WHEN the charge of the Fourth Rhode Island had been made, and the colors were carried along the whole length of the main battery, General Burnside asked some one what regiment that was. On being told the Fourth Rhode Island, he said, 'I knew it. It was no more than I expected. Thank God, the day is ours!'"

It is just about a year since the election in Rhode Island made William Sprague for the second time Governor of that State. He was a young manthe son of a great cotton manufacturer, from whom he had inherited a large fortune, and from his father also the control of a large political party. He had returned a year or two before from Europe, where, during the Kossuth excitement, and exciting the country, and had been selected as a meritorious and unconsumted candidate for Governor by a convention of democratic members of the Legislature of the State. He was elected; and during the Presidential contest he was among the few of Lincoln men of the palest possible hue. So very little heeded, that when, last spring, he was elected again, over a very able opponent, the result was not at first regarded as a half-Southern triumph, and was so hailed, we believe, by George Sanders, an eminent Democratic doctor of the school which holds Southrich men ought to own poor ones.

Mr. Sprague had military ardor—he was commander of a mounted company in Providence before he was Governor—and when the rebellion immasked itself at Sumter, Governor Sprague of Rhode Island, was the first to telegraph to the President that he had "sixty men and horses, and a thousand men at a moment's warning." Thus he telegraphed himself into a national reputation; and when his words were proved by deeds, he was First and Second regiments of the State, under Colonels Burnside and Bourn—Bourn, who had fought for Rhode Island youth—passed fully equipped to Washington, and stood steadily through the dark day at Bull Run, side by side with the New York regiments, while Governor Sprague dashed about the field among his brave, insensible to fear, and the calm, sagacious, heroic Burnside directed the brigade, then the name of the young Governor became fairly known, and his personal place was secured by all men.

The year has passed and the patriotic resolutions of the little State, symbolized by the prompt dispatch of her Governor at the beginning, has been always at work in the field—for the Fourth Rhode Island youth—passed fully equipped to Washington, and stood steadily through the dark day at Bull Run, side by side with the New York regiments, while Governor Sprague dashed about the field among his brave, insensible to fear, and the calm, sagacious, heroic Burnside directed the brigade, then the name of the young Governor became fairly known, and his personal place was secured by all men.

The year has passed and the patriotic resolutions of the little State, symbolized by the prompt dispatch of her Governor at the beginning, has been always at work in the field—for the Fourth Rhode Island youth—passed fully equipped to Washington, and stood steadily through the dark day at Bull Run, side by side with the New York regiments, while Governor Sprague dashed about the field among his brave, insensible to fear, and the calm, sagacious, heroic Burnside directed the brigade, then the name of the young Governor became fairly known, and his personal place was secured by all men.

The year has passed and the patriotic resolutions of the little State, symbolized by the prompt dispatch of her Governor at the beginning, has been always at work in the field—for the Fourth Rhode Island youth—passed fully equipped to Washington, and stood steadily through the dark day at Bull Run, side by side with the New York regiments at Bull Run, one at Port Royal, one at Hatteras, and two at Newbern; and to-day she has three in the field and in camp in the Burnside district, unless it has moved with M'Clellan. She has sent to the war five regiments of infantry, a regiment of cavalry, besides several batteries. Rhode Island regiments of infantry, a regiment of cavalry, besides several batteries. Rhode Island is not dishonored by his citizens, and Perry Davis may uttered the battle-cry of Rhode Island line, "We have met the enemy, and they are ours!"

And you, brave boys, who have marched and shall return no more—you, passing in a moment from heroic life to heroic death—you shall be the inspiration and the strength of those who remain to complete the victory you helped to win. Scorn shall your names be, and your sweet memory. And many a wandering brother of yours, when heart is half lost with the sickness of home, as in the dear old native State, reads with tears of pride and sympathy the story of your valor, and thanks God that he too is a Rhode Islander.

A TERRIBLE SCHOOLMASTER.

IF the last week's news from Europe indicates the condition of the public mind at the South, it is profoundly gloomy. A loud cry of peril rings through every quarter. Governors, Governor Pettus, of Mississippi, invites volunteers, and announces that the authority shall. Governor Moore, of Louisiana, declares that "an insolent and powerful foe is at the cattle gate." S. Cloppid, the "surgeon general of the Confederate staff"—pretentous name—cries, in an appeal to the soldiers of New Orleans, "Your country is dismayed at seeing us in the field." General Beauregard himself telegraphs that he "will accept all good equipped troops." The Secretary of War, Benjamin, informs volunteer companies of that State when they may report to Governor Charleston Mercury complains that "a large submission document was developed" at Nashville when General Bell arrived. The Governor of North Carolina establishes Police Courts upon the sea-board to have charge of criminals and slaves; to inflict such punishments and to arrest such persons as they may think that the public safety requires.

In Savannah a draft has been made; while the question is asked, in correspondence from Richmond, "Shall the cause fail because Mr. Davis is incompetent?" The Governor of Tuskaloosa must answer this plain question at once, or they will have. Memphis is extremely nervous in response from the army. "The death-like torpor which hangs like a spell over our beleagured country will speedily succumb to the Yankee dynasty," replied at once and forever. * * Will no one speak and break the spell ere we are bound by gyves?" then a conscription will be made to meet the balance of the requisition. The Fayetteville Observer, newspaper in some Mississippi village—declares that "It is now to do, and do at once, or our cause is dead, and we are hopelessly lost." Governor Moore advises the faithful to "imitate the Carthaginian women, who cut off their hair to make ropes for their vessels."

The cry of danger is universal. The rebellion has evidently a sickening sense of incompetency somewhere. The Yankee mudsills whom "Southern gentlemen" were to mow down by the hundreds and who were to turn and run like sheep before the "chivalry" brief of pen and bad whisky, are suddenly found to be men conscious of their cause and of their power. The contempt of Northerners on the part of the "gentlemen" of Mississippi which tians, and of the "chivalry" that whipped women, was dubbed sincere. These "gentlemen" and this "chivalry" were composed of the most ignorant, prejudiced, and brutal people upon the continent. They honestly despised those whom they supposed to be unwilling peddlers, who would sell their souls for a copper. They are now, and forever, undeceived. Henceforth they will understand that men are not cowards even though they do not whip bowie-knife ruffians; nor servility mean even though they do not force other people to work for them without wages.

This war, in a very grim and ghastly way, but very effectually, is destroying the ignorance of the real character of the Northern people which the mass of Southerners have wallowed, and is making many of all parts of the country acquainted with each other. If the Southern "poor whites" learn that to be idle is not to be a gentlem n, and that real worth of every kind comes from real work, their grandsons will not seriously neglect the schooling of this war.

A FACT.

A FIRM in England, which cogs a great deal of property in this city, wrote to its agent very minute details of the disposition he was to make of the property during the time that he should hold the city. The amused agent answered by the next mail that the city was never more quiet, and that the mob was a mere fiction. Upon which Messrs. John Bull & Co. answered with great dignity and indignation, that considering him their agent, calling his attention to the previous instructions, to which he would instantly conform, and adding, that they were and could not be afraid that but he was to sweep away by the sophistries of Northern demagogues as he would be to perform what the mob raised in New York, and that the late Government of the country merely prolonged the appearance of existence by a reign of terror.

The French, according to Hood's traveling John Bull, are a feeble people, who call their masters names, and all their daughters fillies. But there is no absurdity of fiction which English humorists can invent that John Bull does not eclipse by his actual absurdities.

A WORD WITH PENDENNIS.

IN a recent "Roundabout Paper" Mr. Thackeray has his say about us. He is a personal friend of many in this country, and is the author of many thousands who have never seen him, but who have read and who read every word he writes, and thank him for his racy, simple, manly way of talking. About the song that so sadly beset us all, Like Dickens, Thackeray has never quite decided by say, half such hard things about other nations as he says of his own. No blue-book, no report, no statistics of any kind, have ever appalled us by story of the misery and want and despair of the slums of London and Paris like the "Roundabout Paper" on and dishearten a human being more than his tragical revelations of the heartlessness and criminal frivolity of the idlers. These are the most tragic comedies in literature. When the future historian of this age writes, as he must, to have the very form and pressure of the time, do you think he will be coy less aghast than we are now at the entire elimination of this?

In his talk about us, he says what he feels, doubtless, that whoever has been in America "knows what good people are to be found there; how polished, how generous, how gentle, how courteous;" and then he speaks of the pitiful spectacle of the opening year in England when war with the United States was imminent—"a hundred thousand and better in England unlulled by the thought of the coming calamity."

This is fair and friendly. There were plenty of saddened hearts and homes this side the sea by reason of the same prospect. Let us not recriminate here, but pass on.

The author of the "Roundabout Paper," No. 10, devotes the remainder of that paper to the threat of confiscation of British property in this country in case of war. The British nation is threatened, he says, that if we take up arms against us in behalf of their big property in the United States shall be forfeited! He goes on to say that not one British gentleman has been influenced for a moment by the publication of this threat.

Softly, my dear Sir, softly. You are rushing on in the rarest vein of your sarcasm, asserting that we have always had the right to confiscate debts, and have had to pay a great deal more for our loans for that reason; that the "stone ship business is a matter of law;" that we are "pilloried because John Bull preferred to stand off—and a brother of other stuff of the same kind, and, I say, and before you sing out so loudly, and cry foul on that, let us see if you are hurt. If the British nation threatened with confiscation the property held here in case of war? Is it a rod held in terrorem over those brave Britons who never, never, never will be slaves—no, no, no, no, no, as often graphically and gayly shown us, lick the very dust from the shoes of any mortal who happens to be called my lord?

Not at all; nothing of the kind. It is a simple suggestion of a single newspaper—a suggestion not echoed any where—not in the least regarded—suggestion futile and foolish and wicked, because we all perfectly well know, that if there is any thing for which an Englishman will willingly give his money as well as life it is for the sake of his flag. My dear author of the "Roundabout," you have been tying your heaviest gun-cat a man of straw. They make a great noise, for your guns are Columbiads, but really there's nothing there. A mosquito hummed by your ears, perhaps; but a shrieking horde of savages, brandishing the tomahawk, and lead upon your scalp—! Why, you droll Roundabout! put your feet on hot water, and take some cooling drink.

Meanwhile, as you call us that naughty name of swindler, have you ever reflected who especially gave us that reputation? It was no other than Mr. Jefferson Davis, whose efforts upon a larger scale of repudiation were so sensitive. He still owes pay, bounty, and pensions to soldiers of the Western Department was paused. A bill to provide for the public defense, and accepting loans for that object from States, was passed by the House unanimously. A resolution was reported from the Naval Committee authorizing the President to place in active service such vessels as he may deem proper. A bill was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means and passed. The bill for the addition of slavery in the District of Columbia was taken up, and Senator Doolittle proceeded to speak on the subject. The Senate held an executive session, and then adjourned.—In the Senate the entire day's session was taken up in considering the Tax bill. All the previous amendments to the measure were acted upon, but no important amendments were made. Numerous amendments were brought above from motion, and on this a short debate sprung up as to the question of order. Mr. Wilson, of Mass., spoke at length in opposition to it. At the conclusion of his remarks the Senate held an executive session, and then adjourned.—In the House the report on the gross enrcenings was made, the consideration of which was postponed until to-morrow. The Senate bill to provide for the payment of the claims of loyal citizens for stores and supplies furnished to the army of the United States during the present rebellion, was taken up, which occasioned some discussion, and was finally passed. The bill for the organization of the Territory of Nevada was taken up, and passed. The bill for the organization of the Territory of Dakota was taken up, but the session from the Senate branched off from the debate ended for the day on the bill under consideration. Mr. Colfax, Speaker of the House, announced the committees.

Both Houses adjourned over till Monday.

In the Senate, on the 24th, a petition was presented from the Philadelphia Board of Trade, urging a continuance of the present system of commercial relations with the British Provinces, and against a reduction of the duties on tobacco. Bills were referred. The joint resolution in relation to the appointment of Brigadier-Generals of volunteers was taken up, and agreed by Senator Sherbrooke, Senator Wilkinson, Senator Grimes, Senator Collamer, and others, debating slavery to be exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States, and the power of the General Government to emancipate its slaves, the Federal Government having no sovereignty except for the Union and the end of redressing them. The subject was then laid on the table. The bill for the relief of the District of Columbia was taken up. The question was taken on the amendment to extend the relief to persons who have united in a tax vote. The Vice-President voted in the negative, and the amendment was lost. Other amendments were also lost, when the bill was reported to the Senate. Senator Sherman moved that the amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole be concurred in. Senator Trumbull moved that no further exchanges of prisoners of war be made until the 4th of March next. The latter motion was lost over. A bill providing for the payment of the public debt was introduced, and, after having been debated, was referred to Senator Morrill, the commander of the Confederate forces in connection with the Mississippi Squadron, Commodore Rowan, and the officers and men under his command. Resolutions in accordance with the instructions of General McClellan, were referred. A bill to provide for the temporary government of Dakota Territory was reported by the Committee on Territories, and, after having been debated, was laid on the table by a vote of 26 to 21. The bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and several amendments were adopted.

A VICTORY NEAR WINCHESTER.

General Shields had a conflict with the rebels, commanded by Generals Jackson, Ewell, and Johnston, six miles below Winchester, on 23d, concerning nearly three hours, resulting in a complete victory, owing to the large quantity of small-arms thrown over in the flight. The rebels were pursued for several miles by the Federals. It appears that General Jackson was under the impression that General Banks had left Winchester, and was advancing on the road from Strasburg, and was therefore surprised to find the Federal forces in Winchester on the 22d. Several batteries of artillery were captured. The General Shields was wounded in the arm by the bursting of a shell. The enemy immediately commenced a retreat. He was followed up by the main body of General Shield's army, and on the afternoon of the 24th a skirmish took place on the morning of 25th, and ending in the entire defeat of the rebels. On the 26th, 27th, and 28th, pursuit was in the field, while the force of General Shields was in the rear, and on the 28th, 29th, and 30th were heavy—that of the rebels, however, nearly doubling that of the Federals.

ANOTHER IN THE CUMBERLAND MOUNTAINS.

A battle was fought on 30th ult. between the Confederate Mountaineer, about 40 miles from Piketon, or Pikeville. Five companies of the Confederates, under Colonel Garfield, with a comparatively small force, in twenty minutes. The force of the Confederates, General Crittenden, field passed the night in the hostile camp, and then escaped the next day, carried off the stores. The rebels set seven killed: we lost none.

BATTLE IN ARKANSAS.

Our troops have had another brisk fight, and obtained another victory, in Arkansas. Colonel Weer, with a large number of infantry and two steel six-pounders, made an attack on Pocahontas, in Arkansas, on March 7, and was met with a vastly superior force of the rebels under Colonel Greene, Colonel Hardy, M'Culloch, and others. He defeated, killing a hundred, including Colonel M'culloch, and put the rest to flight, pursuing them. Colonel Weer's loss was only twenty-five killed and wounded.

FLORIDA REPOSSESSED.

The whole State of Florida is restored to the Union. The capture of St. Augustine, with its defenses, as set forth in the following official letter from General Sherman, fixes back Florida under the folds of the Stars and Stripes. The place was occupied by the rebels on the 11th, and in the copy of St. Augustine the authorities of the place raised the Union flag on the Town Hall with their own hands. The official report of Commodore Dupont, detailing the whole affair, says: "The American flag is flying once more over the old city, raised by the hands of its own people, who resisted the appeals, threats, and falsehoods of their leaders, and remained steadfast to the last under the repression in the ranks of the flying enemy. This gives us possession of the whole coast from Fernandina to Jupiter Inlet. The Commodore gives full credit to the officers and men of his command for the faithful performance of their duty.

On Wednesday, March 19, in the Senate, petitions in favor of emancipation were presented. The bill concerning pay, bounty, and pensions to soldiers of the Western Department was passed. A bill to provide for the public defense, and accepting loans for that object from States, was passed by the House unanimously. A resolution was reported from the Naval Committee authorizing the President to place in active service such vessels as he may deem proper. The bill concerning the organization of army corps was debated and passed. The bill for the addition of slavery in the District of Columbia was taken up, and Senator Doolittle proceeded to speak on the subject. The Senate held an executive session, and then adjourned.—In the House the entire day's session was taken up in considering the Tax bill. All the previous amendments to the measure were acted upon, but no important amendments were made. Numerous amendments were brought above from motion, and on this a short debate sprung up as to the question of order. Mr. Wilson, of Mass., spoke at length in opposition to it. At the conclusion of his remarks the Senate held an executive session, and then adjourned.—In the House the report on the gross enrcenings was made, the consideration of which was postponed until to-morrow. The Senate bill to provide for the payment of the claims of loyal citizens for stores and supplies furnished to the army of the United States during the present rebellion, was taken up, which occasioned some discussion, and was finally passed. The bill for the organization of the Territory of Nevada was taken up, and passed. The bill for the organization of the Territory of Dakota was taken up, but the session from the Senate branched off from the debate ended for the day on the bill under consideration. Mr. Colfax, Speaker of the House, announced the committees.

Both Houses adjourned over till Monday.

In the Senate, on the 24th, a petition was presented from the Philadelphia Board of Trade, urging a continuance of the present system of commercial relations with the British Provinces, and against a reduction of the duties on tobacco. Bills were referred. The joint resolution in relation to the appointment of Brigadier-Generals of volunteers was taken up, and agreed by Senator Sherbrooke, Senator Wilkinson, Senator Grimes, Senator Collamer, and others, debating slavery to be exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States, and the power of the General Government to emancipate its slaves, the Federal Government having no sovereignty except for the Union and the end of redressing them. The subject was then laid on the table. The bill for the relief of the District of Columbia was taken up. The question was taken on the amendment to extend the relief to persons who have united in a tax vote. The Vice-President voted in the negative, and the amendment was lost. Other amendments were also lost, when the bill was reported to the Senate. Senator Sherman moved that the amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole be concurred in. Senator Trumbull moved that no further exchanges of prisoners of war be made until the 4th of March next. The latter motion was lost over. A bill providing for the payment of the public debt was introduced, and, after having been debated, was referred to Senator Morrill, the commander of the Confederate forces in connection with the Mississippi Squadron, Commodore Rowan, and the officers and men under his command. Resolutions in accordance with the instructions of General McClellan, were referred. A bill to provide for the temporary government of Dakota Territory was reported by the Committee on Territories, and, after having been debated, was laid on the table by a vote of 26 to 21. The bill was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and several amendments were adopted.

A VICTORY NEAR WINCHESTER.

General Shields had a conflict with the rebels, commanded by Generals Jackson, Ewell, and Johnston, six miles below Winchester, on 23d, concerning nearly three hours, resulting in a complete victory, owing to the large quantity of small-arms thrown over in the flight. The rebels were pursued for several miles by the Federals. It appears that General Jackson was under the impression that General Banks had left Winchester, and was advancing on the road from Strasburg, and was therefore surprised to find the Federal forces in Winchester on the 22d. Several batteries of artillery were captured. The General Shields was wounded in the arm by the bursting of a shell. The enemy immediately commenced a retreat. He was followed up by the main body of General Shield's army, and on the afternoon of the 24th a skirmish took place on the morning of 25th, and ending in the entire defeat of the rebels. On the 26th, 27th, and 28th, pursuit was in the field, while the force of General Shields was in the rear, and on the 28th, 29th, and 30th were heavy—that of the rebels, however, nearly doubling that of the Federals.

ANOTHER IN THE CUMBERLAND MOUNTAINS.

A battle was fought on 30th ult. between the Confederate Mountaineer, about 40 miles from Piketon, or Pikeville. Five companies of the Confederates, under Colonel Garfield, with a comparatively small force, in twenty minutes. The force of the Confederates, General Crittenden, field passed the night in the hostile camp, and then escaped the next day, carried off the stores. The rebels set seven killed: we lost none.

BATTLE IN ARKANSAS.

Our troops have had another brisk fight, and obtained another victory, in Arkansas. Colonel Weer, with a large number of infantry and two steel six-pounders, made an attack on Pocahontas, in Arkansas, on March 7, and was met with a vastly superior force of the rebels under Colonel Greene, Colonel Hardy, M'Culloch, and others. He defeated, killing a hundred, including Colonel M'culloch, and put the rest to flight, pursuing them. Colonel Weer's loss was only twenty-five killed and wounded.

FLORIDA REPOSSESSED.

The whole State of Florida is restored to the Union. The capture of St. Augustine, with its defenses, as set forth in the following official letter from General Sherman, fixes back Florida under the folds of the Stars and Stripes. The place was occupied by the rebels on the 11th, and in the copy of St. Augustine the authorities of the place raised the Union flag on the Town Hall with their own hands. The official report of Commodore Dupont, detailing the whole affair, says: "The American flag is flying once more over the old city, raised by the hands of its own people, who resisted the appeals, threats, and falsehoods of their leaders, and remained steadfast to the last under the repression in the ranks of the flying enemy. This gives us possession of the whole coast from Fernandina to Jupiter Inlet. The Commodore gives full credit to the officers and men of his command for the faithful performance of their duty.

OUR DEFEAT AT FORT CRAIG.

Advices from Fort Craig to the 15th of March recent unfavorable news concerning the battle of Fort Craig, on the 21st ult. The Union loss was 63 killed and 159 wounded. Colonel Canby's command was concentrated at Fort Craig. Since the 28th ult., nothing has been heard from them, communication being cut off. As it was supposed that the rebels, after their victory at Fort Craig, would push on to Santa Fe and Fort Union, all the available property of the department and the whole available forces were to be removed to the latter place. The fort is in command of Major Brown, and contains the public property. The rebel forces are going from Mesilla south, and we shall have more definite news next time.

OUR ARMY IN SOUTHERN TENNESSEE.

There is nothing new to report from Savannah, Tennessee. Our troops are now scouring the country, and carrying off small scouting parties of the enemy, and occasionally encountering the rebel cavalry in considerable force. We have three gun-boats and 100 mun-pors. The Army of Occupation is said to be in fine health, with an army.

UNION SENTIMENT IN TENNESSEE.

The Union sentiment in Tennessee is manifesting itself in a very decided fashion since the rebel forces have convinced the inhabitants of that State that the United States Government has at last fitted and means to hold ground. A large body of the citizens of Gallatin is now engaged in organizing a regiment for the service of the rebellion, and adopted a platform for the establishment of a State Government. The people of Nashville have also resolved to hold a meeting, and invite the people of Tennessee. The papers publish an honest and manly address of Andrew Johnson to his fellow-citizens of Tennessee, as Governor of the State, to his fellow-citizens of Tennessee.

TWO MORE MILITARY DEPARTMENTS.

Two new military departments have been constituted by the President, the first to be called the Department of the Ohio, to include Kentucky and Tennessee, and to be under the command of General Buell; the second to be the State as may be occupied by the forces under Major-General Halleck, Tennessee, United States Volunteers. Commanders for the present will be movable, wherever the President may direct. The first will be under the control of the Department of the South, comprising the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, with Hilton Head and forces now under Brigadier-General T. W. Sherman, to be the commander-in-chief of the Department.

GLORY TO WHOM GLORY.

General Burnside, in his official report of the Roanoke victory, says: "I feel that the general commanding-in-chief should be informed that the conduct of the commissariat instructions given me by him before leaving Annapolis, as well as my subsequent intercourse and relations with his subalternes, I only hope that we may in future have the same success in a more important theater of campaign. The only thing I have to regret is the delay caused by the delay of steamers."

HOW THE REBELS PLUD AFTER FRA RIDGE.

As an evidence of the demoralized condition of the rebel army, we have the fact that after the battle on Lookout Mountain, the rebels, retreated with his regiment and baggage, and the rest of the general commanding was in the wagon and train and return to the house, he being the last man to leave the mountain. Some of the rebel regiments threw away all their baggage before fighting, flying from the fidelity with which they carried out his orders, as well as of his quickness of perception. Some of the troops carefully stacked and unguarded in a narrow ravine.

MORE "MONITORS."

On 31st March there were at Cotswold, Winslow, & Co., capitalists, whose funds built the Monitor, received a telegram from their agent in Cincinnati that a thousand iron-coated, swords, on the same plan as governed them in the construction of the Monitor. The new vessels are to be each thirty-five feet longer than the present Monitor, and are to carry two 15-inch guns. The largest proportion of the iron casing will be done at Troy.

JEFF DAVIS.

Jeff Davis, according to reports from the South, is on his way to "Richmond." The Southern papers announce the fact through the medium of a dispatch from Richmond, which says that he will be there on the 1st inst.

The Secretary of the Navy has returned thanks to Lieutenant Commander Rodgers and the survivors of the Essex for their bravery in action with the Merrimac in Hampton Roads.

FOREIGN NEWS

ENGLAND

OUR BLOCKADE IN PARLIAMENT.

The question of the effectiveness and legality of the Union blockade of the Southern ports has been demand in the British Parliament. A Committee of the House of Lords for the production of the correspondence of the Cabinet on the subject.

The speech of the Solicitor-General of England, in the House of Commons on the subject, was a masterly argument of the efficiency of that measure by the Cabinet, as well as of its equity and legality; and Judge Bramwell quite disapproved at home of any interference with the proper exercise of the rights of belligerents. The bill was quite closed. He stated that the present blockade was more effective than any that had ever been established, and that the number of vessels which had attempted to enter or went to sea in the face of it, and that it was more effective than that established by the United States in 1793.

Mr. Gregory's motion was negatived without a division.

IN THE LORDS.

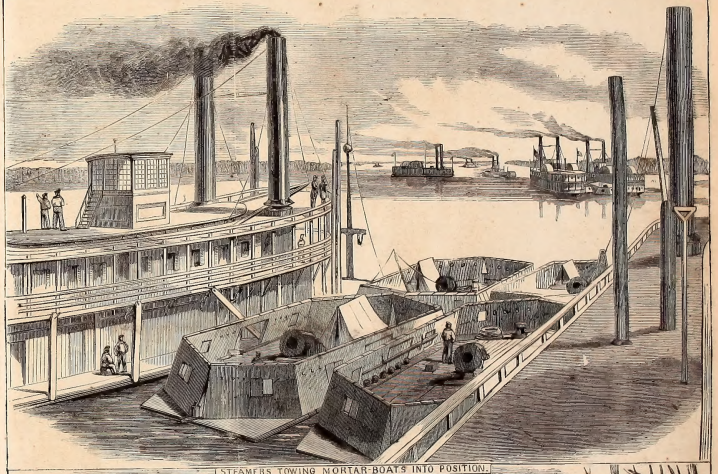
In the House of Lords, on the 19th inst., Lord Stradbroke called the attention of the House to the present state of affairs of the Confederate States, and moved an address for a copy of any correspondence on the subject between the papers presented to the House. He brought forward this motion in order to ascertain the opinion of the Government as to the present position of affairs, England had remained neutral during the question of the blockade.

Lord Russell answered the question that the policy pursued by the Government had obtained the approval of the country, and said that the first the blockade of the Southern ports had occupied the attention o ministers, who had been exceedingly anxious to ascertain the proclamation of a blockade had been made by sufficient authority; and, secondly, whether the blockade had been sufficient to blockade to large an extent of coast. In regard to the first point, the proclamation had been issued, as laid down by Lord Stowell, by the sovereign authority of the State, and was binding on all the subjects, and in respect to the second point, England had recognized the existence of a coast not much inferior in extent to that of Europe. The blockade of these ports had existed the blockading squadrons, much exaggeration existed, many of which would be found to be untrue. Lord Russell cordially acknowledged the gallantry with which the blockade was carried out.

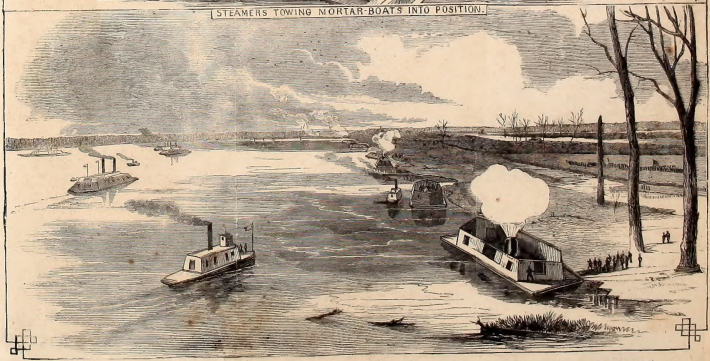
MEXICO.

THE INTERVENTION.

All the English at Vera Cruz, with the exception of about a hundred men, have embarked, and were ready to start for England via Havana and Bermuda. In connection with the expedition to Mexico, the Times of Madrid, of March 1, has the following: "We say it once for all, the three Powers have taken no resolution relative to the internal affairs of Mexico, and there exists no difference of opinion. The object of the expedition is to obtain a clear form of government which will secure to the subjects of the Powers their rights. Maximilian, the Count de Flandre, or any other person, there will be no hindrance on the part of the governments."

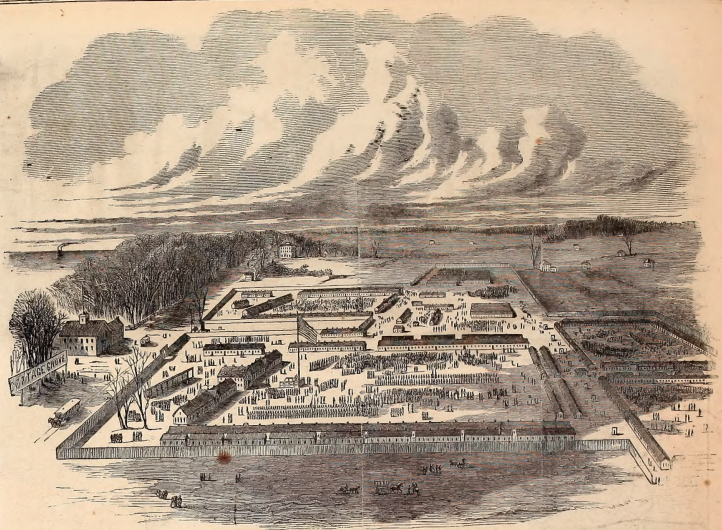


1. Island Number Ten.—2. Rebel Gun-boats.—3. Obionville.—4. Point Pleasant.—5. New Madrid.—6. Battery below.—7. Mortar boats.—8. Union Gun-boats.



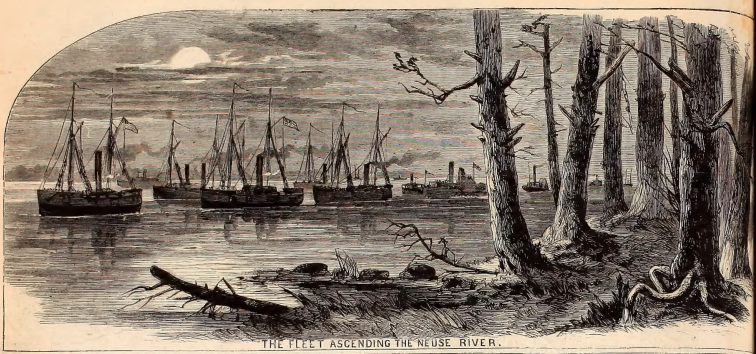
BIRDS-EYE VIEW OF THE ATTACK ON THE REBEL BATTERIES ON AND NEAR ISLAND NUMBER TEN, BY COMMODORE FOOTE'S FLOTILLA.—[SEE PAGE 219.]

THE GUN-BOAT FLEET DROPPING DOWN STREAM TO RECONNOITRE.



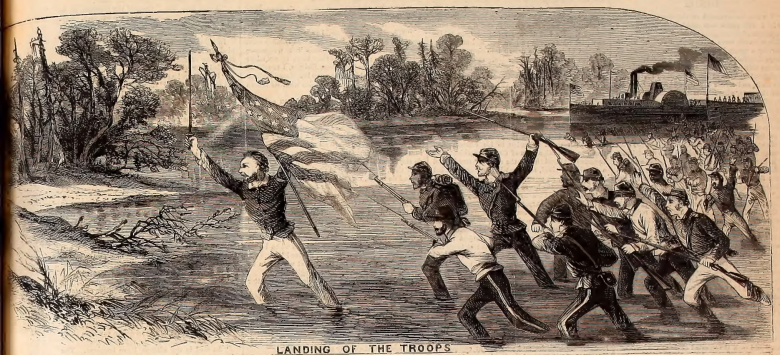
STEAMERS TOWING MORTAR-BOATS INTO POSITION.

BOMBARDMENT OF ISLAND NUMBER TEN BY THE MORTAR FLEET, MARCH 16, 1862.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 219.]



BIRDS-EYE VIEW OF THE COURSE OF THE MISSISSIPPI, AND THE SEAT OF WAR IN TENNESSEE AND THE VICINITY.

CAMP DOUGLAS, NEAR CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, WHERE SEVEN THOUSAND REBEL PRISONERS ARE QUARTERED.—[SEE PAGE 223.]



REBEL PRISONERS AT CAMP DOUGLAS, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.—[SEE PAGE 223.]

THE FLEET ASCENDING THE NEUSE RIVER.

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION.—THE STORMING OF FORT THOM

LANDING OF THE TROOPS

S, AT NEWBERN, NORTH CAROLINA, MARCH 14, 1862.—[See Page 219.]

ADVENTURES OF A TEACHER IN DIXIE.

"I WILL be revenged on the accursed Yankee cur! I will teach him what it is to thwart a Southerner!"

These words were uttered in a sort of undergrowl by a figure just emerged from the shade of a large dwelling. It was that of a man apparently about thirty years of age, active and well built. He glanced upward at the house, then muttered a deep oath, and strode rapidly down the street toward the gate, where he mounted his horse and rode off.

A ride of fifteen minutes brought him to a low, dingy-looking building, which answered the double purpose of a store and hotel for such a weary town as its tired nature forced to seek a resting-place for the night. A motley group assembled in the door listening to an excited individual who was delivering a harangue from the top of a molasses hogshead. His theme was, "The Constitutional rights of the South," "Northern despotism," and "the Military dictation of Abe Lincoln and Bill Seward." But he was unceremoniously cut short by one of the sovereigns, who proposed "Three cheers for Captain Daniels!" as the horsemen rode up. The cheers were given with a hearty vigor: but the Captain dismounted without even acknowledging the salute, and forcing his way through the crowd, entered the hotel. He proceeded directly to the bar and called for whisky. After slaking his thirst he went into an adjoining room, where a dozen or more men were congregated about a long table. At his entrance a large, ruffianly-looking man rose from his seat at the head of the table, and greeted him as follows:

"Well, it is about time you were here, Captain. The boys are getting tired of this kind of a life: they are growing lazy, and want something to keep the fire up. Any thing new stirring?"

The Captain, without making any reply, strode forward and took the vacated chair at the head of the table. Drawing a piece of tobacco from his pocket, he cut off a huge chunk with his bowie-knife, then passed it to the man nearest him on the right. Placing the "chaw" in the corner of his mouth, he gave it two or three turns with his tongue, and then looking around, said,

"What reports to-night?"

"Well, not much," said the man who had vacated the chair. "Joe says that a Yankee passed a visit. He only gave twenty dollars toward fitting us out, and now refuses to fork over any more. The old hound has made considerable out of us Southerners, and now he should be made to shell out liberally. I propose, therefore—"

"Then visit him!" exclaimed the Captain, bringing his fist down on the table with great violence. "And then—" looking Yankee-like at a tobacconist—"he wants visiting too, and that quickly!"

"What has he been doing, Captain?" I reckon of that he was safe enough," said rather an elderly man as he knocked the ashes from his pipe.

"Doing?" thundered the Captain, making a fierce glance at the speaker. "He has been doing enough. He has been tampering with Packer's niggers."

"I always thought that he was an Abolition skunk. Never bought much of whitewashers, anyhow; and as this one's suit is getting to be rather shabby, I go for giving him one made of Southern production," said the man at the Captain's left.

"Give it to him!" "Let her rip!" "Clear out the Abolitionist!" "Hang the nigger stealers!" shouted several.

"If you are agreed," said the Captain, "I suppose the sooner that it is done the better."

"To-night!" "To-night!" "To-night!" was the response.

Then let it be to-night. You will find him down at Packer's. I left him there about an hour ago, and I don't believe that he will leave for an hour or two yet. What is best to do with the cur? Give him a notice to quit—the black snake—tar and cotton—or—" Here the Captain gritted his teeth, and after a slight pause, continued, "Give him stretch hemp down in the hollow?"

"Give him a little snake and tar!" cried one.

"With the cotton rubbed in?" ejaculated another.

"Oh, give him the hemp and done with it!" said a third.

"Let us leave it till we hear what he has got to say for himself," said the old man with the pipe.

"Hear what he has got to say," sneered the Captain, "as if any one here would believe a tobacconist!"

"Abolitionist or not, I go for giving every man a fair chance; and say my turn first and give him what he deserves after," replied the old man in a firm voice.

"Yes, a trial!" "Try him!" "A trial!" "Old Buckskin will be his counsel," interrupted several.

"Let us have some whisky before we try him," said the Captain.

"Ay! That it is! Whisky! Couldn't expect a man to give a fair verdict till he's had his whisky, could you?" exclaimed one of the crowd, raising his head from the table, where he had been drumming on the affairs of the nation, until aroused to consciousness by the magic word "whisky."

The Captain gave an order for a gallon of whisky, which being forthcoming, its bigness with a number of tin cups, he told each man to help himself and gave as a toast,

"The Southern Confederacy!"

While the above scene was being enacted at the hotel, a far different one was taking place at the dwelling the Captain had recently left, and which he was anxious to have his hand visit.

In a pleasantly furnished room overlooking the lawn were seated two young persons. One was the niece of the owner of the mansion, a girl of the young man, the teacher of a neighboring school. The planter was a bachelor, and his niece was the mistress of the house. She was not what would be called a belle; yet she was of pleasing demeanor, and one who improved upon acquaintance. The young man had resided in that vicinity for the past three years, and by his quiet, gentlemanly conduct had made many friends, and of course some enemies. He had always refrained from taking any part whatever in politics, and had never even allowed himself to be drawn into conversation in relation to them. This was the immediate cause he had long been on very intimate terms; but for the young lady he had formed a liking for some of the gay mens than friendship, although he had never made it known to her, not having received sufficient assurance that it would be returned, as now was known, and he was aware that Captain Daniels had long held siege to the heart which he was anxious should be his own. It was during the day, the evening in question the young lady had paid more than usual attention to her appearance, much to the indignation of Captain Daniels, who became convinced that in the schoolmaster he had a formidable rival, and growing restless at what he considered an attempt to give him the cut direct, he quitted the house in high indignation.

It was thus that matters stood. The young man had called for the purpose of saying farewell, previous to leaving for a short period on a visit to a city, which, for very good reasons, he had determined should be his home for the present, and had therefore not mentioned the subject in the presence of Captain Daniels. As he rose to go the young lady observed, in a tremulous tone, "Harry, you have not forgotten your promise?"

"Are you determined, William?"

It was the first time she had called him by that familiar name, and it sent a thrill through every his breast, and it was some moments before he could answer.

"I am, Jane!" He had spoken what he had resolved: considered a forbidden word to his lips, and it startled him, as the bolt boldness, of a burglar's locksmiths, and why not at ceremony? Willie had now crossed the Rubicon, and he vowed no turn back. "I am determined, Jane," he said. "I can not longer remain; for nothing could induce me to accept of office under Lincoln, or taking the oath of allegiance to the Southern Confederacy; and if I should it would be unworthy of your esteem—your love. Is it not so, Jane?"

"Harry!" considered a forbidden word to his lips, and it startled him, as the bolt boldness, of a burglar's locksmiths, and why not at ceremony? Willie had now crossed the Rubicon, and he vowed no turn back. "I am determined, Jane," he said. "I can not longer remain; for nothing could induce me to accept of office under Lincoln, or taking the oath of allegiance to the Southern Confederacy; and if I should it would be unworthy of your esteem—your love. Is it not so, Jane?"

"Harry!" considered a forbidden word to his lips, and it startled him, as the bolt boldness, of a burglar's locksmiths, and why not at ceremony? Willie had now crossed the Rubicon, and he vowed no turn back. "I am determined, Jane," he said. "I can not longer remain; for nothing could induce me to accept of office under Lincoln, or taking the oath of allegiance to the Southern Confederacy; and if I should it would be unworthy of your esteem—your love. Is it not so, Jane?"

"I will not have you prove false to your country, William." But you have been so quiet no one will think you a traitor." "I will not remain," he said. "I can not longer remain; for nothing could induce me to accept of office under Lincoln, or taking the oath of allegiance to the Southern Confederacy; and if I should it would be unworthy of your esteem—your love. Is it not so, Jane?"

"Then visit him!" exclaimed the Captain, bringing his fist down on the table with great violence. "And then—" looking Yankee-like at a tobacconist—"he wants visiting too, and that quickly!"

"What has he been doing, Captain?" I reckon of that he was safe enough," said rather an elderly man as he knocked the ashes from his pipe.

"Doing?" thundered the Captain, making a fierce glance at the speaker. "He has been doing enough. He has been tampering with Packer's niggers."

"I always thought that he was an Abolition skunk. Never bought much of whitewashers, anyhow; and as this one's suit is getting to be rather shabby, I go for giving him one made of Southern production," said the man at the Captain's left.

"Give it to him!" "Let her rip!" "Clear out the Abolitionist!" "Hang the nigger stealers!" shouted several.

"If you are agreed," said the Captain, "I suppose the sooner that it is done the better."

"To-night!" "To-night!" "To-night!" was the response.

Then let it be to-night. You will find him down at Packer's. I left him there about an hour ago, and I don't believe that he will leave for an hour or two yet. What is best to do with the cur? Give him a notice to quit—the black snake—tar and cotton—or—" Here the Captain gritted his teeth, and after a slight pause, continued, "Give him stretch hemp down in the hollow?"

"Give him a little snake and tar!" cried one.

"With the cotton rubbed in?" ejaculated another.

"Oh, give him the hemp and done with it!" said a third.

"Let us leave it till we hear what he has got to say for himself," said the old man with the pipe.

"Hear what he has got to say," sneered the Captain, "as if any one here would believe a tobacconist!"

"Abolitionist or not, I go for giving every man a fair chance; and say my turn first and give him what he deserves after," replied the old man in a firm voice.

"Yes, a trial!" "Try him!" "A trial!" "Old Buckskin will be his counsel," interrupted several.

"Let us have some whisky before we try him," said the Captain.

"Ay! That it is! Whisky! Couldn't expect a man to give a fair verdict till he's had his whisky, could you?" exclaimed one of the crowd, raising his head from the table, where he had been drumming on the affairs of the nation, until aroused to consciousness by the magic word "whisky."

The Captain gave an order for a gallon of whisky, which being forthcoming, its bigness with a number of tin cups, he told each man to help himself and gave as a toast,

"The Southern Confederacy!"

While the above scene was being enacted at the hotel, a far different one was taking place at the dwelling the Captain had recently left, and which he was anxious to have his hand visit.

In a pleasantly furnished room overlooking the lawn were seated two young persons. One was the niece of the owner of the mansion, a girl of the young man, the teacher of a neighboring school. The planter was a bachelor, and his niece was the mistress of the house. She was not what would be called a belle; yet she was of pleasing demeanor, and one who improved upon acquaintance. The young man had resided in that vicinity for the past three years, and by his quiet, gentlemanly conduct had made many friends, and of course some enemies. He had always refrained from taking any part whatever in politics, and had never even allowed himself to be drawn into conversation in relation to them. This was the immediate cause he had long been on very intimate terms; but for the young lady he had formed a liking for some of the gay mens than friendship, although he had never made it known to her, not having received sufficient assurance that it would be returned, as now was known, and he was aware that Captain Daniels had long held siege to the heart which he was anxious should be his own. It was during the day, the evening in question the young lady had paid more than usual attention to her appearance, much to the indignation of Captain Daniels, who became convinced that in the schoolmaster he had a formidable rival, and growing restless at what he considered an attempt to give him the cut direct, he quitted the house in high indignation.

It was thus that matters stood. The young man had called for the purpose of saying farewell, previous to leaving for a short period on a visit to a city, which, for very good reasons, he had determined should be his home for the present, and had therefore not mentioned the subject in the presence of Captain Daniels. As he rose to go the young lady observed, in a tremulous tone, "Harry, you have not forgotten your promise?"

"Are you determined, William?"

It was the first time she had called him by that familiar name, and it sent a thrill through every his breast, and it was some moments before he could answer.

"I am, Jane!" He had spoken what he had resolved: considered a forbidden word to his lips, and it startled him, as the bolt boldness, of a burglar's locksmiths, and why not at ceremony? Willie had now crossed the Rubicon, and he vowed no turn back. "I am determined, Jane," he said. "I can not longer remain; for nothing could induce me to accept of office under Lincoln, or taking the oath of allegiance to the Southern Confederacy; and if I should it would be unworthy of your esteem—your love. Is it not so, Jane?"

"Harry!" considered a forbidden word to his lips, and it startled him, as the bolt boldness, of a burglar's locksmiths, and why not at ceremony? Willie had now crossed the Rubicon, and he vowed no turn back. "I am determined, Jane," he said. "I can not longer remain; for nothing could induce me to accept of office under Lincoln, or taking the oath of allegiance to the Southern Confederacy; and if I should it would be unworthy of your esteem—your love. Is it not so, Jane?"

"Harry!" considered a forbidden word to his lips, and it startled him, as the bolt boldness, of a burglar's locksmiths, and why not at ceremony? Willie had now crossed the Rubicon, and he vowed no turn back. "I am determined, Jane," he said. "I can not longer remain; for nothing could induce me to accept of office under Lincoln, or taking the oath of allegiance to the Southern Confederacy; and if I should it would be unworthy of your esteem—your love. Is it not so, Jane?"

"Then I will go, too!" she exclaimed, and as she spoke her features lighted up with a look of melancholy hue, assumed a fixedness of purpose that plainly told that she was in earnest.

"Jane, Jane!" ejaculated the young man with a look of bewilderment.

"Yes, William, I will have no tie to bind me to this place when you are gone, and my soul has long revolted at this unholy rebellion. My father died early in June, and left me quite under the control old Star-Spangled Banner, and he would not rest easy in his grave if my child should in any manner fance the madness in their desperate schemes to drag the proud emblem of our nation in the dust."

As she spoke she arose from her seat with a bright glow that at that moment rendered her exceedingly beautiful, and the young man clasped her to his bosom and fervently exclaimed:

"My own Irene" Spoken like a true daughter of Columbia!"

After a few moments' pause he continued:

"But your property, Jane, what will become of it?"

"Go!" she exclaimed, as the fire darted from the brunette mild eyes, "why, go with you, to be sure! Think you I will be left behind to persecute by. As for uncle—thank God, he is only an uncle by marriage—for I have long since discovered that a traitor's veins—he is too much engaged in this rebellious war to care for any thing else, and he will not return for a fortnight, at least."

"You would willingly, then, share my destiny whatever it may be?" he said, as he gazed at her tenderly.

"Willingly!" she replied.

"Do you know what you call my fortune is?"

"I care not for your fortune. It is yourself I care for, and know that you possess the noble traits of a true woman, and that is sufficient for me."

"Ah! but Irene, I am poor. My whole fortune is in my own possession, and that is only a few dollars in the world;" and as he spoke he heaved a deep sigh.

"My fortune will do for both; and thank Heaven that the largest portion of it is invested in the U. S. Government."

"But your uncle is your guardian."

"He was my guardian. Last month I became my own guardian, and shall remain so until I choose another. And my next guardian must not be a traitor," she said, smilingly, as she looked up into his face.

At this moment the conversation was interrupted by a loud voice:

"Come in," she said, as she resumed her seat.

The door opened, and in hurried a stalwart negro with the perspiration streaming down his sable cheeks, while consternation was pictured in his countenance. It was Irene's favorite slave.

"Why, what is the matter, Bob? Speak, quick!" she nervously exclaimed, as she arose and approached toward him.

"Oh! missus, excuse us for comin' in, but dey is arter him, and I knowed he tole to come as fast I could to let you know."

"After him! After who?" she ejaculated, as she caught him by the arm.

"Arter Massa Holmes, dere!" exclaimed Bob, pointing toward the young man.

"After Mr. Holmes! What do you mean, Robert?" she exclaimed, while a nervous tremor seized her.

"Why, missus, ye see, I'se war dat yisser round de corner ob de house us Massa Daniels went out, and he whar swarin' to himself 'bout weuguese ob de Yankee, and as I didn't know ob no Yankee 'bout here but Massa Holmes, I taught de name it war him—kase you know, sir, Massa Holmes better dan Massa Daniels, and dat whar de reason why he got mad."

"Love, Holmes! Who told you so?" interrupted Irene.

"Excuse me, missus—nobody tell me so; but I kinder taught so—dat was all—and I couldn't help dat, you know. So I'se tinks de best ting for me to do to keep him out ob trouble, sir, is to let him know dat his company whar a going to be up to de store to-night, kase I need a good many tings, and I'd like him along to de shade and got round behind de house, crept close up by de winder in de room whar dey meet, and dat I heerd Massa Daniels tell 'em dat dey whar to take de Yankee schoolmaster down in de hollow and hang him, kase he was talkin to de nigguhs 'bout gettin' 'em to run away, and dat he whar down here, and dat when dey had him dey whar to come back to de house and tell him. And, missus, dey will be here putty soon, kase I taught I heerd 'em when I cum in de gate. Hush! I do right, missus?"

"Yes, yes! Thanks, Bob. But what is to be done, Jane?" she said, in a resolute tone.

"I tinks, missus, dat Massa Holmes had better get out ob de way mighty soon."

"Good-night, William! You must stay here to-night!" said Irene, as she sprang forward and caught hold of him.

Bob, who was glancing eagerly out of the window, now turned quickly about and said,

"Dey is comin', sir! Dey is comin' up de lawn, and dey'll be round de hull house in a minnet. Has to be quick! Hide in some snug place, kase dey 'll not be hunting people out ob de house. You know, missus, what dey done down at Massa Gordon's tudder night."

At this instant a noise was heard at the front door.

"There! quick, William! My room! Fly! quick!" And as she spoke she pushed him toward the door which Bob had opened, leading to an adjoining room. Irene then shut and closed the threshold she closed and locked the door, putting the key in her pocket.

The noise at the outer door now increased. Bob took up a lighted candle and tardily descended the stairs, taking his time to reach each one for those outside to hear. Reaching the lower landing he slowly unbarred the door, and then, holding the candle up full in the face of the man who had been knocking, said,

"What am de matter dis time ob night wid so much noise? What do you want?"

"I want the schoolmaster," growled the man.

"Well, dis ain't de place to come and make such a noise about de schoolmaster. Go along wid you to his house, and don't make such noise here. Massa Packer'll gib it to you when he com home. See if he don't!"

"None of your jaw, but go and tell the schoolmaster some gentlemen want to see him," replied the man, in a surly tone.

"De schoolmaster ain't here, I tell you. He has gone home a long time ago," answered Bob, with the utmost coolness.

"You lie, you black scoundrel, you!" hissed the man, in a passion. "I saw his shadow in the room as we came up the lawn."

"Dat you, Massa Daniels?

"Yes, it is me," said that personage, stepping forward. "Go and tell Mr. Holmes that he is wanted."

"Massa Holmes ain't here," reiterated Bob, not at all thrown off his guard at the savage demeanor of the Captain. "Tell me what you want, or you can go to de room, Massa Daniels."

"Men, to the rescue!" exclaimed the Captain, not designing to hold further parley.

A number of the band now surrounded the house, illuminating the darkness with their torches, which they now lighted, in order to discover their victim if he should attempt to escape, while others entered the dwelling. Bob, with the Captain at their head, ascended the stairs and entered the room where Irene was.

Irene had by this time recovered her presence of mind, and gazing sternly at the Captain, she said,

"Why this outrage in my uncle's absence, Mr. Daniels?"

"We are but doing our duty. We are in search of an Abolitionist, whom we have good reason to suppose is concealed in this house," he replied. "Search that room," he continued, turning to the men who had entered the room where the young man was concealed.

One of the men tried the door, and finding that it would not open, he said, peremptorily,

"The door is locked."

"That is true, sir, Mr. Daniels!" exclaimed Irene, indignantly, "and I forbid either you or any of your men entering it."

"We are in search of rooms while in the discharge of our duty. You will save trouble by giving up the key." he answered as he held out his hand, as if he expected to receive it.

"You shall not have it," she said, in a firm tone. "Courageous men indeed, to thus endeavor to break upon the privacy of a female!"

"Men, do your duty!" exclaimed the Captain.

The next instant the door was shattered, and two men entered the room. They soon returned, bringing with them the object of their search.

"I see that you are partial as to what men shall enter your room," sneeringly exclaimed the Captain, as he turned toward Irene.

She attempted to speak, but her heart was too full, and she sank powerless in the chair.

"Away with him!" exclaimed the Captain, as he observed Irene drop so listlessly in her seat. Supposing that she had fainted, he became anxious to get away.

In a few moments the whole party were assembled on the lawn. Here they bound their victim, and, after extinguishing a number of the torches, hurried forward.

"Here! here! you Hannah! you Hannah! look out for your missus!" shouted Bob, in a stentorian tone, and then darted out of the house.

Captain Daniels and his band proceeded a short distance up the main road, and then turned off and descended a long hill, at the bottom of which a natural amphitheatre was formed by the surrounding cliffs. The party arriving at this spot, all the torches which had been extinguished were relighted, and a circle formed around the unfortunate victim, which the ruffianly-looking man who had officiated at the hotel during the Captain's absence took his stand in the centre.

"Let the prisoner stand out!"

The young man's fetters were taken off, and he was told to step in front of the judge. He took the position pointed out, and then two of the band ranged themselves on each side of him, each with a pistol leveled at his head, and warned him what to expect if he should attempt to escape. When this ceremony was through the man at the head demanded, in a loud tone,

"What are the charges again the prisoner?"

At this the Captain came forward and said:

"I charge him with being an abolition emissary, and with attempting to induce my slaves to run away from their masters!"

The young man turned and gave a contemptuous glance at the Captain, but did not reply.

"Prisoner, what have you got to say again these charges?" demanded the ruffian judge.

"As God is my witness, I am innocent. The charges are false!" he replied, in a firm voice.

"Oh! we want some other witness in this court! Whar ar your witnesses? Bring 'em on and don't keep the court waitin', you nigger stealer!"

"I have no witnesses; but I deny the charges and challenge proof," exclaimed the prisoner, in the same firm tone.

"It is your place to prove the charges again you false, and not the court's to prove true. So bring on your witnesses," said the judge.

"I have none!" responded the young man, in the same determined manner, as he cast upon him a mixture of sadness in it.

"Gentlemen of the jury!" said the judge, rising and assuming a pompous air, "the case is a plain one. The prisoner is charged with a very heinous crime, which is well known in the country. He was called upon to clear himself and prove the charges upon him false, but has refused to do so. Is there any one here was a goin' to believe an Abolitionist before the word of a good Southern man like Captain Daniels, I'd like to know?" continued he. No man as ever came into court without witness and stood upon his plain clear-cut would be agin the law if he did; for any man as can't prove himself not guilty by good witnesses must of course be guilty. So now, gentlemen of the jury, the onus you dare say that ain't the law? So the case is closed. What is your verdict?"

"Guilty!" "Guilty!" "Guilty!" shouted the crowd.

"Prisoner," said the ruffian judge, "you've heern the verdict of your fellow-citizens, after as fair a trial as I ever seed. Now it is my duty to pronounce the sentence of the court, which is that you be taken to yonder tree, thar strip and get a dozen,' taken and a coat of tar and feathers put on salve for your wounded feelings, after that you will be allowed to stretch hemp for the rest of your natral life. Is that fair?"

A smile of satisfaction spread over the Captain's countenance as he heard the words of the ruffianly villain delivered the sentence which he had dictated.

The prisoner was taken to the spot the ruffian judge had indicated, and was there relieved of his clothing, after which he was bound to a tree and received a dozen lashes. He was then released and warm tar poured over his head and shoulders. While this was going on a number of the band amused themselves by throwing handfuls of cotton at him. When this part of the fiendish orgie was exhausted, a rope was prepared and was placed around the prisoner's neck and the other end was thrown over a limb. The Captain then stepped up close to him and said,

"Have you any word to send to the lady?"

But resolute as was the answer from his victim he turned away, mounted his horse and rode off, followed by a number of his band.

The men whose business it was to execute the prisoner, in their hurry to join their companions, as we as to avoid being overheard by them in the revel at the hotel which the Captain had promised them, only half performed their task, leaving their victim with his feet resting upon the ground, to die from strangulation and exposure.

Three weeks from the night the above scene occurred a soldier in the uniform of the United States matrimony in the city of Cincinnati. The bridegroom had experienced the reverses of the adage, "that it is but a step from the altar to the grave." To him it had been but a step from the grave to the altar. He had been the ruffians by the ruffian's pride death, he had been providentially rescued by a faithful negro. Bob, with the instinct or intuition that he would be of service, had taken a short road to the hollow, and there concealed himself; and as soon as the ruffians had reached a safe distance, he released their victim and conveyed him to a deserted cabin in the woods, and there kindly ministered to his sufferings till he was able to make his escape from that section of the country.

Irene, when she heard the result of Captain Daniels's expedition from Bob, immediately made preparations to leave, and gave out that she intended to visit a relative who resided at some distance, in a neighboring Slave State, and there await the return of her uncle. To Bob she gave a sum of money, telling him to get such articles as were necessary, and accompany Mr. Holmes to Cincinnati, where she would meet them. They set out, and after the marriage ceremony the pretended Bob with his freedom papers as a reward for his conduct.

The young teacher and his bride soon left Cincinnati. After a visit to his native village he committed his wife to the care of friends, and with their blessings he enrolled himself in the army of the Union—was chosen by his comrades as their Captain, and he is now doing battle for God and his Country.

THE IRON-CLAD STEAMER "GALENA."

On page 220 we present an accurate view, with diagrams, of the iron-clad war steamer Galena, which is now ready for her final service in the "Continental Works," Green Point, Long Island—the establishment where the Monitor was constructed. This vessel has generally been spoken of as the "gun-boat Maptor," her hull having been built at Mystic, Connecticut. The word gun-boat very inadequately describes her character, for she is a war steamer of about 1,000 tons, carrying a heavy armament, and constructed to combine speed with a power of resistance greater than any other vessel of her class. In ordinary vessels the strength arises between the timbers which constitute the frame. In the Galena the frame is solid, being composed of timbers 12 by 14 inches at bevel of 16 inches square; over this is laid the external planking, and inside another planking, making a solid thickness up to nearly two feet. Outside of all is the iron armor. This is composed of plates 2 feet long, 16 inches broad, of solid iron, varying in thickness from 1½ to 2 inches. These plates are rolled into such a shape as to form a heavy ridge upon the upper edge, through which the bolts are driven. This flange is covered by a corresponding one on the lower edge of the plate next above, which covers the bolt-heads, and so on from bottom to top. No bolt-heads are consequently seen, the whole side of the vessel presenting a smooth iron surface. There are thus two layers of plates, making the entire thickness of solid iron from 3 to 4 inches. The plates present also depressions and elevations, fitting into each other, so that there is an end view of these plates, showing the manner in which they fit into each other. It has been found by experiment that two plates of iron present a greater resistance to a ball than a single plate of the thickness of both. The bolts, instead of being merely driven into the sides, are screwed home entirely through, and are secured by nuts on the inside, so that should a ball touch opposite the bolt's way, it may be at once tightened with a wrench.

The peculiarity of the model is that the bulk nearest every where exceeds the displacement, directly at the stern, the shape is very like the larger end of a pear. Let us get a view of the bottom sides of the general form of the hull, only we must suppose it to be elongated to five times its breadth—the length of the Galena being 180 feet, and her extreme breadth of beam 36. From the upper surface we must also suppose a portion of stern to be cut off. This flat surface constitutes the upper deck of the vessel; it measures 26 feet at the broadest part; being 10 feet less than will breadth of the vessel at the water-line below. The sides curve from the extreme line to the deck. It will be understood by Figure 1, which represents a section of the vessel cut down amid-ships.

The sides of this rounded form are apparent. A ball striking a flat surface at a right angle —that is, in a direct line—exerts its whole force, and either passes through, or is stopped, or rebounds. Now if it strikes at considerably less than a right angle, it glances off with a lateral direction. It will not, however, go as far in this new direction as it would have done in the former one; the difference between these two directions measures the amount of force actually expended upon the object struck. The curve may, for practical purposes, be considered as composed of an infinite number of plane surfaces, at angles constantly varying; and no plane surface being exactly particular to any particular straight line. Consequently, a ball striking a curved surface will appear to hit this one point, strikes at an angle smaller than a right angle, and glances off, solves, indeed, to diminished force in sufficient to penetrate the object. The chances are millions to one that a ball will not hit a curve at the precise point of the surface which is perpendicular to its direction. Practically, therefore, the Galena can only be hit by a ball at a small angle.

The deck, of which we have spoken, is covered with bomb-proof iron plates. It is on this deck that the fighting-gear upon which the guns are placed. That is below, completely sheltered by this upper deck, which presents nothing, from stem to stern, except a bell-proof pilot-house, and the masts and "rigging." At the bottom of the page is a view of the fighting-deck, with an armament of heavy Columbiads, the calibre of which we are not at liberty to state. The guns are carried by trucks, as will be seen by counting the port-holes. She is pronounced to light head on, "yawing" from side to side, so as to allow her thermantic rudder her best cross. The bows and stern, being the most exposed parts, are protected, in addition to the other armor, by plates of iron. The port-holes are protected by massive iron port-covers, opening in the middle the upper half being lifted up, and the lower half dropped down, when the guns are to be run out. These port-covers are shown in Figure 2, the vessel is brigantine-rigged, the standing rigging being of wire ropes. Figure 3 is an enlarged view of a portion of the sides, showing the interior of the construction. It is believed that the iron best of the Virginia, which crushed through the side of the Cumberland as though it were an egg-shell, would strike as harmlessly upon the Galena as it did upon the Monitor. Figure 5 presents the water-line of the vessel when afloat, showing how little of her side is above water, and consequently how small a mark she presents. Figure 6 shows the position of the Engine-Room, which, it will be seen, is below the water-line. Figure 7 shows the position of the officers' quarters.

The Galena is one of the three vessels whose construction was recommended last September by the Board of Naval Officers, which sat in judgment on another. She was built at Mystic, Connecticut, by Messrs. Smith & Dimon, the builders of the engines. Her iron armor was furnished by the "Rensselaer and Albany Iron Works." The greater part of the iron was put on at Mystic, and the delays were occasioned by transporting the iron by railroad. A month of weather has been spent to the Continental Works on the 22d of February—a week after launching—to be completed. The homeward-bound gallant ship was commanded by J. F. Rowland, of the "Continental Works." The time of passage was 20 days, and the log-book was laid till that when she will receive her armament, is about 175 days.

Her tonnage is 1,000 tons. Her contract price was $250,000. The strength, seaworthiness, light draft, and presumed speed of this new vessel, it is anticipated, will render her of special service in our Navy.

THE BATTLE OF NEWBERN.

WE devote pages 216 and 217 to illustrations of the BATTLE OF NEWBERN—in many respects the most brilliant affair of the war. At this battle, an enemy strongly posted and protected by a line of earth-works a mile long and several cannonaded from, armed with rifled guns of heavy calibre, provided with the best weapons, and thoroughly prepared for battle, were completely routed by General Burnside's force of 12,000.

One of our pictures, from a sketch by our artist, Mr. Arthur Lumley, shows the Twenty-First Regiment of the Troops for the Expedition at Roanoke Island. They were in high spirits and eager for the fight. Lieutenant-Colonel Hawkins commanded them in the Newbern Rivet. This operation is thus described by our special correspondent:

The point at which the troops landed is the month of Slocum's Creek, about twelve miles below Newbern, by water, and considerably more by land. Captain Bennett, the flag-ship of General Reno, was the first to enter the creek, followed by the gun-boats, which led on the advance. The Twenty-first Massachusetts regiment, Colonel Hawkins commanding, was the first to land, however, and was to have landed first, but the water was found to be too shallow for the Minnesota, which General Burnside had intended should have been the first to be run on shore by the pressure of the enemy's fire, which defended the immediate vicinity of the shore, but attack is found to be fast not confined to the right, near the river, where one of the vessels grounded, and could not get in, and was useful in the defense of the breast-work by an enfilading, or, more properly, diagonal fire. Some of the left and right flank of the enemy was consequently here posted, and the fleet of gun-boats opened upon them with shell and shot, and their rapid and accurate firing soon silenced the fire directed upon them.

The Twenty-first Massachusetts, the Second Brigade returned the fire of the enemy vigorously, who, from the rifle-pits and from the covering edges of the woods, were picking off our men with deadly certainty at every shot. The Twenty-first Massachusetts were ordered to the right, to form, and attempted to storm the guns, when repulsed by the fire of the enemy, and were shortly charged from a little ravine or hollow just in the rear of the battery, which the enemy had drove them out, making a few prisoners. Our regulars was but now the Twenty-first Massachusetts, Colonel Hawkins, the New York Fifty-first, Fourth Rhode Island, and the Ninth New Jersey, Fifty-first Pennsylvania, Eighth Connecticut, and Fifty-first New York, under General Foster, also ran aground. The Second Brigade, consisting of the Twenty-first Massachusetts Twenty-first were for in advance of the Twenty-first Massachusetts, and the Fourth Rhode Island, the Ninth New Jersey, Fifty-first Pennsylvania, Eighth Connecticut, and Fifty-first New York, under General Foster, also ran aground. The Second Brigade, consisting of the Twenty-first Massachusetts Twenty-first were for in advance of the Twenty-first Massachusetts, and the Fourth Rhode Island, the Ninth New Jersey, Fifty-first Pennsylvania, Eighth Connecticut, and Fifty-first New York, under General Foster, also ran aground.

The battle itself, which is illustrated on the same pages (the moment chosen for illustration is that when the enemy's centre gives way before the bayonet charge), was fought with the bayonet after the enemy had expended their ammunition), is thus described by the same correspondent:

It was now about half past seven o'clock on the morning of the 14th), and a sharp firing about denoted that our skirmishers had encountered the enemy's pickets. Shortly after, the different regiments resumed their positions in their brigades, and the whole line moved on in order. General Burnside rode forward, and was followed by his staff, consisting of Major Rhodes, a wide field, a shot was fired from one of the gun-boats, which fell about 200 feet in front of the column, and 100 feet of the General and his staff, and exploded with a terrific report, scattering the party with mud.

The Second Massachusetts brigade had advanced by the steps road, rapidly formed his regiments in line of battle on the right of the road, and the Twenty-fourth Massachusetts, Colonel Hawkins, on the left of the road, with the Twenty-fourth Massachusetts, Colonel Upton, next, with its left resting on the road, the Twenty-fifth Massachusetts, Colonel Amory, with right resting on the road, and the Twenty-third Massachusetts, Colonel Russell, on the right of the Eighth Connecticut in reserve. To support this fine right wing of the brigade, the Twenty-first Massachusetts, Colonel Hawkins, was ordered to the right of the line, and had only a few paces to march the field in time to participate in the fight; but, nothing daunted, the regiment moved on to the support. Foster's position was as follows: On the extreme right, the Twenty-first Massachusetts, Colonel Hawkins, from the west, manned by Lieutenants M'Cook, Hammond, Dudley, and Bradford, supported by a small detachment of the Union Coast Guard. In the centre, and near the road, a 10-pounder Parrott gun, under the command of Captain Bonnell, his second mate, Mr. Stead captain of the gun, and Lieutenant Wells, of the marines, on the left Captain Dayton's battery, from the transport Highlander, and on the left of the road, the Twenty-fifth Massachusetts regiment, Colonel Amory, with their right resting over the ramparts and opened very briskly upon the enemy's rifle-pits. The fire of the battery was directed out the entire length of the work, and was continued until the troops had passed the necessary fire with musketry.

The fire was replied to with equal vigor by the brigade, and for a time the battle raged fiercely. As soon as they engaged, let us return to the operations of the Second Brigade, consisting of the Twenty-first Regiment.

The Second Brigade, consisting of the Twenty-first Massachusetts, Twenty-first Connecticut, Fourth New York, Colonel Ferrero; Fifty-first Pennsylvania, Colonel Kennedy, and Fifty-first New York, Colonel Vinton, proceeded along the enemy's right flank. It is somewhat remarkable that the movements of this brigade were followed by the same to those of the fight at Roanoke Island, at the point at which the intrenchments of rebellion was still strongly defended by a series of redoubts and rifle-pits. The reconnoissance previously revealed the fact that beyond these redoubts the breast-work was continued nearly to the river's bank, making the entire length of the defenses about three miles. The operations of our force, however, were confined to that only between the river and the redoubts.

The Third Brigade, under General Parke, took up a position on the Trenton road, with Captain Bryan's brigade.

Such was the disposition of our troops. The engagement regularly opened about eight o'clock, when the First Brigade bore the brunt of the battle. General Foster rode backward and forward, and was under several times exposed to the hottest of the fire. His aide, too, shared the danger, and one of them, Lieutenant Pendleton, narrowly escaped injury, if not death, from a bullet which passed through his coat-sleeve, just grazing his arm. The Massachusetts Twenty-fourth, on the right, had risen to the charge, supported by two of their officers, Major Sherwin and Adjutant Horton, the former by a ball in the leg, which, however, did not disable him. The Twenty-fourth met the Massachusetts Twenty-third, Lieutenant-Colonel Merritt, who was struck by a cannon-ball, which carried away one of his legs, and he lay wounded but firm in a horrible manner. The proportion of officers killed and wounded in the Twenty-fourth was unusually large. The Twenty-seventh Massachusetts were in some reason to the support of the centre, and with another regiment, Connecticut, and a large loss, were withdrawn. The Tenth Connecticut was the same time ordered to their support, and as they fell back took their place; moving forward with great alacrity, and opening the fire. The Tenth was finally compelled to retire through the intervening woods, and to take a position on the right flank. To the First Brigade belongs the credit of having first entered the intrenchments. The Twenty-first had first scaled the walls of the redoubt the brilliant manœuvre of flanking the enemy's right, of which I have now described.

When it became evident that the First Brigade was engaged in the fight in front, the Third, which had been supporting it, was ordered, with the exception of the Eighteenth Massachusetts, to move to the left flank movement. Accordingly the Eighth Connecticut, Fourth Rhode Island, and Fifth Rhode Island regiments, without a short distance into the woods, and defiling to the left came into the rear of the First Brigade, forward come in the rear of the Third Brigade.

The position on the field of operations was immediately under the command of General Reno, and ordered to the left, to the rear of the First Brigade, and to proceed to, and take up a position on the extreme left.

It may be well here to state that when the line of flanking was completed, it was not known that the fort of intrenchment extended beyond, or if it did, much beyond the railroad. The line of flanking was therefore, consequently, of getting in the rear, they discovered not the more advanced line of earth-works, but that of a series of redoubts and rifle-pits, which defended the immediate vicinity of the railroad. Our attack is found to be fast not confined to the right, near the river, where one of the vessels grounded, and could not get in, and was useful in the defense of the breast-work by an enfilading, or, more properly, diagonal fire. Some of the left and right flank of the enemy was consequently here posted, and the fleet of gun-boats opened upon them with shell and shot, and their rapid and accurate firing soon silenced the fire directed upon them.

The Twenty-first Massachusetts, the Second Brigade returned the fire of the enemy vigorously, who, from the rifle-pits and from the covering edges of the woods, were picking off our men with deadly certainty at every shot. The Twenty-first Massachusetts were ordered to the right, to form, and attempted to storm the guns, when repulsed by the fire of the enemy, and were shortly charged from a little ravine or hollow just in the rear of the battery, which the enemy had drove them out, making a few prisoners. Our regulars was but now the Twenty-first Massachusetts, Colonel Hawkins, the New York Fifty-first, Fourth Rhode Island, and the Ninth New Jersey, Fifty-first Pennsylvania, Eighth Connecticut, and Fifty-first New York, under General Foster, also ran aground. The Second Brigade, consisting of the Twenty-first Massachusetts Twenty-first were for in advance of the Twenty-first Massachusetts, and the Fourth Rhode Island, the Ninth New Jersey, Fifty-first Pennsylvania, Eighth Connecticut, and Fifty-first New York, under General Foster, also ran aground.

On page 213 we give three pictures of the affair, from sketches by our artist, Mr. Alexander Simmons. One represents the MORTAR FLEET OF THEIR WAY DOWN THE RIVER in tow of steamers; another THE RECONNOISANCE BY COMMODORE FOOTE, the gun-boats dropping down with the current of the tide; and the third THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE BOMBARDMENT.

SUNDAY'S FIGHT.

The attack commenced on Sunday, 16th. The correspondent of the Chicago Post says:

The contest is opened by a shot from the Benton, firing "stern on" at the Kentucky battery. Soon after, another shot from the Benton in the same bank the enemy's fire shifted its range. Suddenly a shell of flame appeared in the air; it was followed by a shell from the Benton, which burst high in the air, and without effect. The spectators grew anxious. Can it be that, after all our labor and our hopes, the enemy can again escape? Is he fall us? Hark! A fourth of those thunder-rending concussions, and shortly after a fifth. Three smoke is lazily rising. The flames would boil a mile in the rear of the rebel batteries. Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah! Such was the shout that resounded from them, —we can more than overcome the distance. The rebel flag-staff smoke loose from its fastenings, and a splash is seen directly in front of what is presumed to be the magazine. Then a dense column of smoke and fire.

In the course of the afternoon the rebels fired a few shots, but no damage was done.

THE BOMBARDMENT ON MONDAY.

The same correspondent continues his narrative:

The gun-boats weighed anchor at an early hour and moved slowly up and down the stream; now remaining nearly stationary for a time, then moving, traveling, perhaps, a mile to side, as if to fully test their ability to hold themselves in the position assigned them. Meanwhile, the batteries, with the exception of the Pike, Wisconsin, and Ida, have been engaged in the work of throwing shells into the rebel batteries. Occasionally, one was directed at the gun-boats, keeping at distance rode from all danger from the shots of their enemy at a great distance. Not a single gun-boat should be disabled by a successful shot from the fort. The distance was altogether too great to be passed beyond reach of the enemy's fire. The order was promptly obeyed.

At 10.15 o'clock a shell from a mortar was thrown in the direction of the Kentucky battery. It burst high in the air over the enemy's works, and the fragments fell in the rebel camp. Then the mortar-boats commenced firing, the terrific concussion was heard, and this time followed with the shells. The first messenger exploded in the midst of the wood, but a short distance in the rear of the gun which had been pointed at the gun-boats. Then the mortar-boats began to throw shells in rapid succession, and the consternation which distinguishes the explosion of a shell in the midst of an enemy was shown in the manner in which it was discovered. That the fight was initiated for the day, there was "high old times" in the rebel camp. The Confederate shots from the mortar-boats followed, many of them falling short in the water, and the fragments fell in a portion calculated to discomfort the rebels, further than annoy them. Occasionally a shell would burst in the midst of the enemy, a heavy column of smoke would rise, and the whole pack of mortars, with a fury indescribable, and really not conceivable by those who have not witnessed the bombardment of Fort Hound City, stationed about half a mile above Dunbrody's Island, kept up a constant fire. Shell after shell was thrown in rapid succession, and the consternation of our guns, and the accuracy of those having them in charge, the rebels were driven from their intrenchments, and their cheers loud and long, accompanied by waving of hats and handkerchiefs, manifested their delight that the Kentuckians were testify their joy.

The fleet of gun-boats Benton, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, were locked together side by side; the dispatch in the hands of Captain Phelps, and the fleet of five were set upon the left wing. Very frequent firing was given to the guns on the Kentucky shore, and distant shots were thrown into the rebel camp. Meanwhile, the batteries their every movement was closely watched, and the rebels, who had their battery on the extreme point of mast, wrought up by a knowledge that the day was half over, and the fight not decided.

At precisely 1 o'clock the Benton opened fire. The shot was thrown with a precision which was at once followed by one from the St. Louis, which, bursting but a little in the rear of the rebel fort, threw the gunners into a disgusting battery. A shot from the Cincinnati took effect but nearly the same moment, and the rebels were thoroughly demoralized.

The shells now raged faster and more furiously upon our side. Shell after shell was thrown into the rebel camp, and the gunners seemed to be cast upward to the height of the trees in apparent confusion. Sulphurous smoke, Others striking in the water seemed to throw the spray far over the rebel fort, and the concussion was heard in the distance, furiously forward. The commanding fire their grew more and more. The discharge of Dunbrody's guns, and those of the terrific concussions which shook every thing for miles around, and the rebel fort was enveloped in a dense, silly grand. Two shots fell short. One after another three shells burst in the midst of the rebel encampment, and the destruction of each ball and its effect was so plainly visible as if we were standing within the fort.

Later in the day the rebels replied. The correspondent of the Post says:

The rebels now began to fire sluggishly, and given at long intervals. Many of their shots passed high in the air, over the heads of the gunners, and fell harmlessly in the wood. Others, better directed, fell but a few rods in the rear of the fleet, but no damage was sustained. About 5 o'clock a shot from the enemy came through the gun-deck of the Benton, tearing away a portion of the deck, and passing down to the gun-deck rebounded and fell into the water without exploding. The effects of Confederate Fools-ton's guns were visible, and that was probably a quaker. The river is rising steadily, and some of the lower batteries have been overflowed. It is feared that the rebels may be escaping.

On page 213 we give three pictures of the affair, from sketches by our artist, Mr. Alexander Simmons. One represents the MORTAR FLEET OF THEIR WAY DOWN THE RIVER in tow of steamers; another THE RECONNOISANCE BY COMMODORE FOOTE, the gun-boats dropping down with the current of the tide; and the third THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE BOMBARDMENT.

SUNDAY'S FIGHT.

The attack commenced on Sunday, 16th. The correspondent of the Chicago Post says:

The contest is opened by a shot from the Benton, firing "stern on" at the Kentucky battery. Soon after, another shot from the Benton in the same bank the enemy's fire shifted its range. Suddenly a shell of flame appeared in the air; it was followed by a shell from the Benton, which burst high in the air, and without effect. The spectators grew anxious. Can it be that, after all our labor and our hopes, the enemy can again escape? Is he fall us? Hark! A fourth of those thunder-rending concussions, and shortly after a fifth. Three smoke is lazily rising. The flames would boil a mile in the rear of the rebel batteries. Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah! Such was the shout that resounded from them, —we can more than overcome the distance. The rebel flag-staff smoke loose from its fastenings, and a splash is seen directly in front of what is presumed to be the magazine. Then a dense column of smoke and fire.

In the course of the afternoon the rebels fired a few shots, but no damage was done.

THE BOMBARDMENT ON MONDAY.

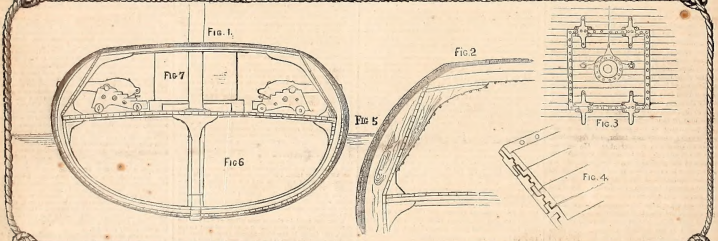
The same correspondent continues his narrative:

The gun-boats weighed anchor at an early hour and moved slowly up and down the stream; now remaining nearly stationary for a time, then moving, traveling, perhaps, a mile to side, as if to fully test their ability to hold themselves in the position assigned them. Meanwhile, the batteries, with the exception of the Pike, Wisconsin, and Ida, have been engaged in the work of throwing shells into the rebel batteries. Occasionally, one was directed at the gun-boats, keeping at distance rode from all danger from the shots of their enemy at a great distance. Not a single gun-boat should be disabled by a successful shot from the fort. The distance was altogether too great to be passed beyond reach of the enemy's fire. The order was promptly obeyed.

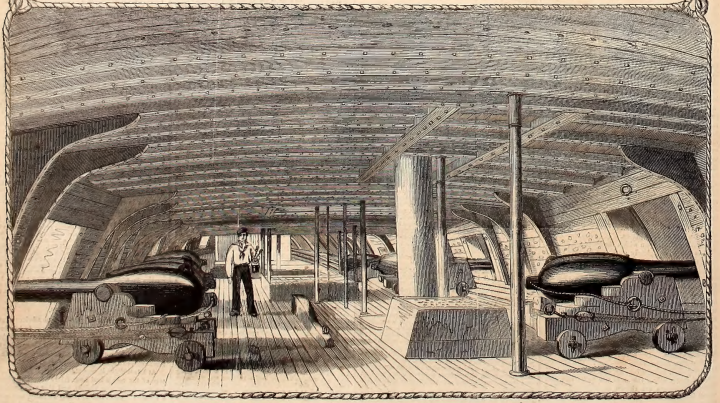
At 10.15 o'clock a shell from a mortar was thrown in the direction of the Kentucky battery. It burst high in the air over the enemy's works, and the fragments fell in the rebel camp. Then the mortar-boats commenced firing, the terrific concussion was heard, and this time followed with the shells. The first messenger exploded in the midst of the wood, but a short distance in the rear of the gun which had been pointed at the gun-boats. Then the mortar-boats began to throw shells in rapid succession, and the consternation which distinguishes the explosion of a shell in the midst of an enemy was shown in the manner in which it was discovered. That the fight was initiated for the day, there was "high old times" in the rebel camp. The Confederate shots from the mortar-boats followed, many of them falling short in the water, and the fragments fell in a portion calculated to discomfort the rebels, further than annoy them. Occasionally a shell would burst in the midst of the enemy, a heavy column of smoke would rise, and the whole pack of mortars, with a fury indescribable, and really not conceivable by those who have not witnessed the bombardment of Fort Hound City, stationed about half a mile above Dunbrody's Island, kept up a constant fire. Shell after shell was thrown in rapid succession, and the consternation of our guns, and the accuracy of those having them in charge, the rebels were driven from their intrenchments, and their cheers loud and long, accompanied by waving of hats and handkerchiefs, manifested their delight that the Kentuckians were testify their joy.

The fleet of gun-boats Benton, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, were locked together side by side; the dispatch in the hands of Captain Phelps, and the fleet of five were set upon the left wing. Very frequent firing was given to the guns on the Kentucky shore, and distant shots were thrown into the rebel camp. Meanwhile, the batteries their every movement was closely watched, and the rebels, who had their battery on the extreme point of mast, wrought up by a knowledge that the day was half over, and the fight not decided.

At precisely 1 o'clock the Benton opened fire. The shot was thrown with a precision which was at once followed by one from the St. Louis, which, bursting but a little in the rear of the rebel fort, threw the gunners into a disgusting battery. A shot from the Cincinnati took effect but nearly the same moment, and the rebels were thoroughly demoralized.

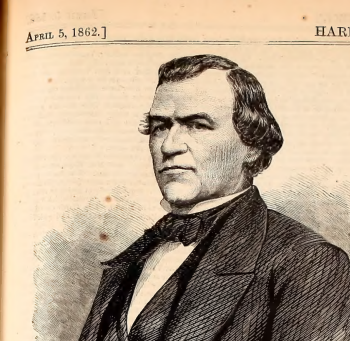


The shells now raged faster and more furiously upon our side. Shell after shell was thrown into the rebel camp, and the gunners seemed to be cast upward to the height of the trees in apparent confusion. Sulphurous smoke, Others striking in the water seemed to throw the spray far over the rebel fort, and the concussion was heard in the distance, furiously forward. The commanding fire their grew more and more. The discharge of Dunbrody's guns, and those of the terrific concussions which shook every thing for miles around, and the rebel fort was enveloped in a dense, silly grand. Two shots fell short. One after another three shells burst in the midst of the rebel encampment, and the destruction of each ball and its effect was so plainly visible as if we were standing within the fort.



Later in the day the rebels replied. The correspondent of the Post says:

The rebels now began to fire sluggishly, and given at long intervals. Many of their shots passed high in the air, over the heads of the gunners, and fell harmlessly in the wood. Others, better directed, fell but a few rods in the rear of the fleet, but no damage was sustained. About 5 o'clock a shot from the enemy came through the gun-deck of the Benton, tearing away a portion of the deck, and passing down to the gun-deck rebounded and fell into the water without exploding. The effects of Confederate Fools-ton's guns were visible, and that was probably a quaker. The river is rising steadily, and some of the lower batteries have been overflowed. It is feared that the rebels may be escaping.



THE NEW IRON-CLAD STEAMER "GALENA," BUILT AT MYSTIC, CONNECTICUT.—[SEE PAGE 219.]

GUN-DECK OF THE NEW IRON-CLAD STEAMER "GALENA."—[SEE PAGE 219.]

HON. ANDREW JOHNSON, MILITARY GOVERNOR OF TENNESSEE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

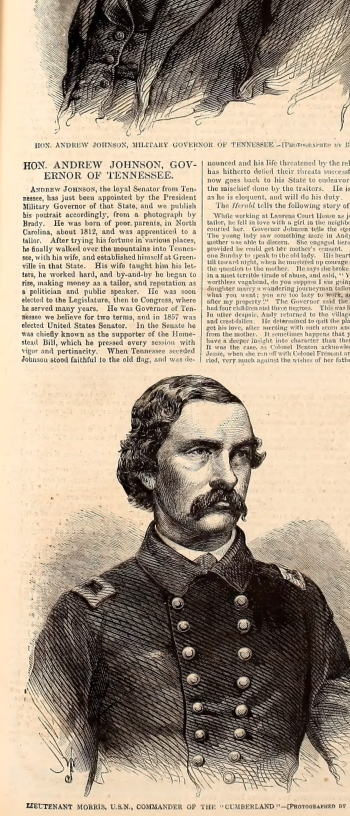
HON. ANDREW JOHNSON, GOVERNOR OF TENNESSEE.

ANDREW JOHNSON, the loyal Senator from Tennessee, has just been appointed by the President Military Governor of that State, and we publish his portrait accordingly, from a photograph by Brady. He was born of poor parents, in North Carolina, about 1812, and was apprenticed to a tailor. After trying his fortune in various places, he finally walked over the mountains into Tennessee, with his wife, and established himself at Greenville in that State. His wife taught him his letters, he worked hard, by-and-by he began to rise, making money as a tailor, and reputation as a politician and public speaker. He was soon elected to the Legislature, then to Congress, where he served many years. He was Governor of Tennessee we believe for two terms, and in 1857 was elected United States Senator. In the Senate he was chiefly known as the supporter of the Homestead Bill, which he pressed every session with vigor and pertinacity. When Tennessee seceded Johnson stood faithful to the old flag, and was denounced and his life threatened by the rebels. He has hitherto defied their threats successfully, and now goes back to his State to endeavor to repair the mischief done by the traitors. He is as brave as he is eloquent, and will do his duty.

The Herald tells the following story of him:

While working at Laurens Court House as journeyman tailor, he fell in love with a girl in the neighborhood and courted her. Governor Johnson tells the story himself. The young lady saw something noble in Andy than her mother was able to discern. She engaged herself to him, provided he could get her mother's consent. Andy went one Sunday to speak to the old lady. His heart failed him till toward night, when he mustered up courage and popped the question to the mother. He says she broke out on him in a most terrible tirade of abuse, and said, "You trifling, worthless vagabond, do you suppose I am going to let my daughter marry a wandering journeyman tailor? I know what you want; you are too lazy to work, and you are after my property!" The Governor said the old woman had her children out there negroes. This was her forte. She continued in a most violent rage, and Andy became frightened and confounded. He determined to quit the place and forget his love, after meeting with such stern and contempt from the mother. It sometimes happens that young girls have a deeper insight into character than their parents. It was the case, as Colonel Deaton acknowledged, with Jessie, when she run off with Colonel Fremont and got married, very much against the wishes of her father and mother. But Miss W—— did not have the same self-will, or the same abiding confidence in her judgment and love that Miss Benton had. She was afraid to encounter that indignation and towering temper which had so effectually moved Andy. We do not know, however, that Andy had courage enough to make the proposition to run off with her. If he did, it was rejected. How different would have been her fate if Miss W—— had taken courage and encountered the frowns of her mother! Instead of being the wife of some poor, plodding, unknown man, as she probably is, she would have been the wife of a Governor and United States Senator, the mistress of extensive estates at Nashville, and a conspicuous ornament of the gay and fashionable society of Washington, as well as the confidential partner of a man who, above all the others of the seceding States, has deserved well and will soon be most honored at the hands of a grateful country.

LIEUTENANT MORRIS, OF THE "CUMBERLAND."



We publish on this page, from a photograph by Brady, a portrait of LIEUTENANT MORRIS, who commanded the Cumberland in the battle with the Merrimac, one of the most gallant heroes of the war.

Lieutenant George U. Morris was born in Massachusetts about the year 1826, and is consequently about thirty-five years of age. He was appointed to the navy from New York in 1846. He received his present commission the 16th of September, 1861. To the beginning of the year 1861 his sea-service under his previous commission was nearly four years, and his total sea-service over ten years. He had been, up to that date, for three years on shore and other duty, and had been fifteen months unemployed. His total service, to the present time, is nearly sixteen years, and he was last at sea in December, 1860. Previous to his being appointed to the Cumberland, on the North Atlantic squadron, he had been on leave of absence. He was for some time on the sloop Cyane, on the Pacific squadron, and returned, as before stated, in December, 1860.

When the Cumberland was in a sinking condition, her decks covered with the dead and the dying, the gallant officer shouted to his crew, "Men, shall we give her another broadside?"

The response was, "Ay, ay, Sir!" And with the last surge of the noble old ship, the water rushing through her port-holes, her guns thundered a final valley at the enemy.

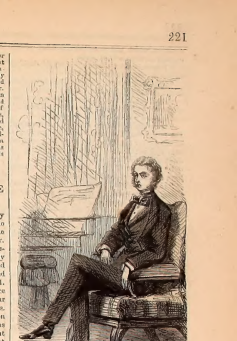
We trust that such heroism as that of Lieutenant Morris, and such signal services as those of Lieutenant Worden, will not go unrewarded. Both are entitled to the highest rank in the service, and we trust that if the present rules of the service do not authorize the President to promote them at once, Congress will remedy the difficulty without delay. The nation can not afford to neglect her heroes.

LIEUTENANT MORRIS, U.S.N., COMMANDER OF THE "CUMBERLAND."—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,



AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "HEAD SECRET," ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN M'LENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER VII.

EARLY the next morning Miss Garth and Norah met in the garden, and spoke together privately. The only noticeable result of the interview, when they presented themselves at the breakfast-table, appeared in the marked silence which they both maintained on the topic of the mercurial gentleman's absence. Mrs. Vanstone was evidently indebted to her husband and to her youngest daughter for all that she heard of the evening's entertainment. The governess and the elder daughter had evidently determined on letting the subject drop.

After breakfast was over, Magdalen proved to be missing when the ladies assembled as usual in the morning-room. Her habits were so little regular that Mrs. Vanstone felt neither surprise nor uneasiness at her absence. Miss Garth and Norah looked at one another significantly, and waited in silence. Two hours passed, and there were no signs of Magdalen. Norah rose as the clock struck twelve, and quietly left the room to look for her.

She was not up stairs, dusting her jewelry and disarranging her dresses. She was not in the conservatory, not in the flower-garden; not in the kitchen, teasing the cook; not in the yard, playing with the dogs. Had she by any chance gone out with her father? Mr. Vanstone had announced his intention, at the breakfast-table, of paying a morning visit to his old ally, Mr. Clare, and of teasing the philosopher's sarcastic indignation by an account of the dramatic performance. None of the other ladies at Combe-Raven ever ventured themselves inside the cottage. But Magdalen was reckless enough for any thing, and Magdalen might have gone there. As the idea occurred to her Norah entered the shrubbery.

At the second turning, where the path among the trees wound away out of sight of the house, she came suddenly face to face with Magdalen and Frank: they were sauntering toward her arm in arm, their heads close together, their conversation apparently proceeding in whispers. They looked suspiciously handsome and happy. At the sight of Norah both started, and both stopped. Frank confusedly raised his hat, and turned back in the direction of his father's cottage. Magdalen advanced to meet her sister, carelessly swinging her closed parasol from side to side, carelessly humming an air from the overture which had preceded the rising of the curtain on the previous night.

"COME," SHE SAID, "GIVE ME A KISS, NORAH, AND MAKE IT UP."

"Luncheon-time already!" she said, looking at her watch. "Surely not?"

"Have you and Mr. Francis Clare been alone in the shrubbery since ten o'clock?" said Norah.

"Mr. Francis Clare! How ridiculously formal you are! Why don't you call him Frank?"

"I asked you a question, Magdalen."

"Dear me, how quick you took this morning! I'm in disgrace, I suppose. Haven't you forgiven me yet for my acting last night? I couldn't help it, love; I should have made nothing of Julia if I hadn't taken you for my model. It's quite a question of Art. In your place I should have felt flattered by the selection."

"In your place, Magdalen, I should have thought twice before I mimicked my sister to an audience of strangers."

"That's exactly why I did it—an audience of strangers. How were they to know? Come! come! don't be angry. You are eight years old, dear dear Norah; you ought to set me a example of good humour."

I will set you an example of plain speaking. I am more sorry than I can say, Magdalen, to meet you as I met you here just now!"

"What next, I wonder? You meet me in the shrubbery at home talking over the private theatricals with my old playfellow, whom I knew when I was no taller than this parasol. And that is a glaring impropriety, is it? Heaven help us, how fussy we have become since I was away! Is it a crime to be found in the shrubbery with a gentleman?"

"Don't evade my question. I repeat it—an audience of strangers. How were they to know? Come! come! don't be angry. You are eight years old, dear dear Norah; you ought to set me a example of good humour."

"I will set you an example of plain speaking. I am more sorry than I can say, Magdalen, to meet you as I met you here just now!"

"What next, I wonder? You meet me in the shrubbery at home talking over the private theatricals with my old playfellow, whom I knew when I was no taller than this parasol. And that is a glaring impropriety, is it? Heaven help us, how fussy we have become since I was away! Is it a crime to be found in the shrubbery with a gentleman?"

"I am in earnest about this, Magdalen—"

"Not a doubt of it. Nobody can accuse you of ever making a joke."

"I am seriously sorry—"

"Oh, dear!"

"It is quite useless to interrupt me. I have it on my conscience to tell you—and I will tell you—that I am sorry to see how this intimacy is growing. I am sorry to see a secret understanding established already between you and Mr. Francis Clare."

"Poor Frank! How you do hate him, to be sure! Why can't the earth has be offered to you?"

Norah's self-control began to show signs of failing her. Her dark cheeks glowed, her delicate lips trembled, before she spoke again. Magdalen paid no attention to her until she put them to her sister. She tossed it high in the air and caught it. "Once!" she said—and tossed it up again. "Twice!" she said—and caught it higher. "Thrice—!" Before she could catch it for the third time Norah seized her passionately by the arm, and the parasol dropped to the ground between them.

"You are treating me heartlessly, she said.

"For shame, Magdalen—for shame!"

The irrepressible outburt of the reproved nature, forced into open self-assertion in its own despite, is, of all moral forces, the hardest to resist. Magdalen was startled into silence. For a few moments the two sisters—so strangely dissimilar in person and in character—faced one another without a word passing between them. For a moment the deep brown eyes of the elder and the light grey eyes of the younger looked each into other with steady, unyielding scrutiny on either side. Norah's face was the first to change. Norah's head was the first to turn away. She dropped her sister's arm in silence. Magdalen stooped and picked up her parasol.

"I try to keep my temper," she said, "and you call me heartless for doing it. You always were hard on me, and you always will be."

Norah clasped her trembling hands fast in each other. "Hard on you?" she said, with mournful tones—and sighed with bitterness.

Magdalen drew back a little, and mechanically dusted the parasol with the end of her garden cloak.

"Yes!" she resumed, doggedly. "Hard on me, and hard on Frank."

"Frank!" repeated Norah, advancing on her sister, and turning pale as suddenly as she had turned red. "Do you talk of yourself and Frank as of sister interests were One should say Magdalen! if I hurt you do I hurt him? Is he so near and so dear to you that?"

Magdalen drew farther and farther back. Arrejig from a tree near caught her cloak; she turned petulantly, broke it off, and left the tree on the ground. "What right have you to question me?" she broke out on a sudden. "Whether I like Frank, or whether I don't, what is that to you?"

Norah looked at her sister in silence. Look what you will, in every high place there is an Ai, a Voice beyond the reach of all the greatest intellects in this world to pull him down. Overcome all social system complacent Impudence—and Impudence—and Impudence—and Lack of Intelligence with total impunity—and knots of rebels, in answer to every form of protest. See how well all do in the long run. One of these days that audacious assertion will be practically constructed and will, while nature system of modern society will come down with a crash.

"God forbid!" cried Mr. Vanstone, looking about him as if the crash was coming already.

"Why do you say that?" asked Mr. Clare. "There is my theory in few words. Now for the remarkable application of it, which this letter suggests. Listen to a fact of a lesson."

"You don't mean that Frank has got another fortune?" cried Mr. Vanstone.

"Here is this perfectly hopeless booby, Frank, pursued the philosopher. "He has never done any thing in his life to help himself, and, as a necessary consequence, Society is in a conspiracy to carry him to the top of the tree. He has hardly had time to throw away that chance you gave him before this letter comes and puts the ball at his feet for the second time. Why this cousin (who is intellectually fit to be at the tail of the family, and who is therefore, as a matter of course, at the head of it) has been good enough to remember my existence, and has offered his influence to serve my eldest boy. Read his letter, and then observe the sequence of events. My rich cousin is a booby who thrives on landed property; he has done something for another booby who thrives on Politics, who knows a third booby who thrives on Commerce, who can do something for a fourth booby, thriving at present on nothing, whose name is Frank. So the mill goes. So the cream of all human results is piled up in this successive order. Now I shall pack Frank off to-morrow. In course of time he'll come back again on our hands like a mad shilling—and chances will be that he is used as a necessary consequence of his meritorious existence. Success will go on, and, as I live to see it, no more may you—it doesn't matter; Frank's future is equally certain either way—just him and his destiny, he clutching, and you please, and let him drift: he'll end in being a general, a bishop, or a minister of state, by dint of the great modern qualification of doing nothing whatever to deserve his place." With this summing up of his son's worldly prospects Mr. Clare tossed the letter contemptuously across the table, and poured himself out another cup of tea.

Mr. Vanstone read the letter with equal contempt and pleasure. It was written in a tone of somewhat distasteful civility. The only practical advantages which it placed at Frank's disposal were beyond all doubt. The writer had the promise of using his influence to procure for an ordinary kind—with a great Mercantile Firm in the City, and the letter concluded with a polite hint once in favor of Mr. Clare's eldest boy. Frank would be received in the office on a very different footing from the footing of an ordinary clerk—he would be "pushed on" at every available opportunity—and his first "good thing" the House had to offer, either at home or abroad, would be placed at his disposal. He possessed fair abilities, and above the average diligence—assuming them, his fortune was made; and the sooner he was sent to London to begin, the better for the interests of all concerned.

"Wonderful news!" cried Mr. Vanstone, returning the letter. "I'm delighted—I must go back and tell them at home. This is fifty times the chance that mine was. What the deuce do you mean by shaking the Society? Society has behaved uncommonly well, in my opinion. Where's the fault?"

"Lurking," said Mr. Clare. "It is one of the intolerable peculiarities of fools that they always lurk. I haven't seen a fool yet without lurking. If you meet with him any where give him a kick, and say I want him."

Mr. Clare's opinion of his son's habits might have been expressed more publicly as to the fact but as to substance, it happened, on that particular morning, to be perfectly correct. After leaving Magdalen to walk back unaided to the shrubbery, at a safe distance, on the chance that she might relent, Frank had lurked in the shrubbery and join him again. Mr. Vanstone's appearance, immediately on Norah's departure, increased the encouragement which Frank had already determined him on returning to the cottage. He was thus fortunately present, not only at the time of father's clutches, totally unprepared for the pending announcement, in that formidable quarter, of his approaching visit to London.

In the mean time Mr. Vanstone had communicated the contents of Mr. Clare's letter to Magdalen, and afterward, on getting back to the house, to his wife and Miss Garth. He was too unobservant a man to notice that Magdalen's manner, uncommonly startled, and Miss Garth unaccountably grave, at his announcement of Frank's good fortune. He dined on about the usual time, suspiciously, until the luncheon-bell rang—and then, for the first time, he noticed Norah's absence. She sent a message down stairs, after they had assembled at the table, to say that a headache was keeping her in her own room. When Miss Garth went up shortly afterward to communicate the news to Norah, Norah appeared, strangely enough, to feel very little relieved by hearing it. Mr. Francis Clare had gone away on a fortnight's visit to London, and had come back. He might come back again, and probably would, for any of Norah's people. She said no more on the subject than this: no reference except her to what had taken place in the shrubbery. Her unconquerable reserve seemed to have strengthened its hold on her since the morning of the meeting. She met Magdalen later in the day, as if nothing had happened: no formal reconciliation took place between them. It was one of Norah's peculiarities to shrink from all reconciliations that were openly avowed—and to take her shy refuge in reconciliations that were silently felt. Magdalen saw plainly, in her look and manner, that she had offended her sister and lost power. Whether the motive was pride, or sullenness, or distress of feeling, or despair of doing good, the result was not to be mistaken—Norah had resolved on remaining passive for the future.

Later in the afternoon Mr. Vanstone suggested a drive to his eldest daughter as the best remedy for her headache. She readily consented to accompany him—and Magdalen accompanied them as usual, that Magdalen should join them. Magdalen was unwilling to be found. For the second time that day she had wandered into the grounds by herself. On this occasion Miss Garth—who, after adopting Norah's opinions, had passed from the one extreme of overlooking Frank altogether, to the other extreme of believing him capable of planning an elopement at five minutes' notice—volunteered to set forth immediately and do her best to find the missing young lady. After a prolonged absence she returned unsuccessful—with the strongest persuasion in her own mind that Magdalen and Frank had met by accident in another somewhere, but without having discovered the smallest fragment of evidence to confirm her suspicions. By the time the carriage was at the door, and Mr. Vanstone was unwilling to wait any longer. He and Norah drove away together, and Mrs. Vanstone and Miss Garth sat at home over their work.

In half an hour more Magdalen composedly walked into the room. She was pale and depressed. She received Miss Garth's remonstrances with a weary inattention; replied carelessly that she had been wandering in the wood; took down some books from the open organ; sighed impatiently, and went away to stairs to her own room.

"I think Magdalen is feeling the reaction after yesterday," said Miss Garth, significantly.

"It is just as well," said Mrs. Vanstone, "that theatrical amusements are all over she is fretting for more."

Here was an opportunity of letting in the light of truth on Mrs. Vanstone's mind. Miss Garth favorable to be missed. Miss Garth questioned her conscience, saw her chance, and took it on the spot.

"You forget," she rejoined, "that a certain neighbor of yours is to pay you a visit to-morrow. Shall I tell you the truth? Magdalen is fretting over the departure of Francis Clare."

Mrs. Vanstone looked up from her work with a gentle smiling surprise.

"Surely not?" she said. "It is natural enough that Frank should be attracted by Magdalen—but I can't think that Magdalen returns the feeling. Frank is not at all unlike her; so quiet and undemonstrative; so dull and helpless, poor thing! in some things. He is handsome, I know; but he is so singularly unlike Magdalen that I can't think it possible—I can't indeed."

"My dear good lady!" cried Miss Garth, in great amusement, "do you really suppose that people fall in love with each other on the score of similarities in their characters? In the vast majority of cases they do just the reverse. Men marry the very last women, and women the very last men, whom their friends would think it possible they could care for. Have you ever heard of the phrase that is oftener on all our lips than 'What can have made Mr. Brown marry Miss Jones, I mean?' or, 'How could Mrs. So-and-So throw herself away on that man?' Has all your experience of the human world not taught you that girls take perverse fancies for men who are totally unworthy of them?"

"Very true," said Mrs. Vanstone, compliantly. "I forgot that. Still it seems unaccountable, dear Miss Garth—"

"Unaccountable, because it happens every day?" retorted Miss Garth, good-humoredly. "I know a great many unaccountable people who reason against plain experience in the same way as you do. Unaccountable to the majority, I deny in the evening that there is any romances for writers or painters to work upon in modern life. Unaccountable," Mrs. Vanstone, if you take my word for it—thanks to those wretched theatricals—Magdalen is going to run away with Frank, that a great many young ladies have gone before her. He is quite unworthy of her; he is, in every possible respect, her exact opposite; she is not one of those modest women who want a man to look up to, and who make themselves ridiculous (though she may not think it herself) in a man she can hero-peek. Well! one comfort is, there are far fewer of that class of women, now, to be had than Frank. It's a mercy he is going away about we have more women to them, and before any serious mischief is done."

"Poor Frank!" said Mrs. Vanstone, smiling compassionately. "Why he is not to blame that he was in jackets and Magdalen in short frocks. She's letting you him up yet. He may do better this second time."

Miss Garth looked up in astonishment.

"And suppose he does better?" she asked. "What then?"

Mrs. Vanstone cut off a loose thread in her work, and laughed outright.

"My good friend," she said, "there is an old fable—not quoted which has a great deal of truth in it—about a hen who hatched ducks instead of her own chickens before they are hatched." Let us wait a little before we count our."

It was very easy to silence Miss Garth when she was speaking under the influence of a strong conviction, but very difficult to silence her. She resumed her work, and looked and thought unutterable things.

Mrs. Vanstone's behavior was certainly remarkable under the circumstances. Here, on one side, was a girl—with great personal attractions, with rare pecuniary prospects, with a social position which might have justified the best expectations—the neighboring squire and the heir apparent to the neighboring squire and the heir apparent to a penniless idle young fellow, who had failed at the first start in life, and who, even if he succeeded in his second attempt, must be for years and years at the prospect of a position which was, to say the least of it, far from desirable; by no means certain, judging her by her own words and looks, that a marriage between Mr. Vanstone's daughter and Mr. Clare's son would be considered to be an unhappy event—and of the intimacy between the two young people as the parents on both sides could possibly wish for! It was perplexing in the extreme. It was almost as unintelligible as that past mystery—that forgotten mystery now—of the journey to London.

In the evening Frank made his appearance, and announced that his father had mercifully determined to let him leave Combe-Raleigh by the parliamentary train the next morning. He mentioned this circumstance with an air of sentimental resignation, and listened as Mr. Yancey's boisterous rejoicings over his new prospects with a mild and mute surprise. His gentle melancholy of look and manner greatly assisted his personal advantages. In his own effeminate way he was more handsome than ever that evening. His soft brown eyes wandered about the room with a melting tenderness; his hair was beautifully brushed; his delicate hands hung over the arms of his chair with a languid grace. He looked like a convalescent girl, however, on any previous occasion, had he practiced more successfully the social art which he habitually cultivated—the art of casting himself as society in the character of a well-bred lineman, and conferring an obligation on his friends' ears by allowing them to sit under him. It was undeniably a dull evening. All the talking fell to the share of Mr. Yancey—to no earthly purpose. Mrs. Yancey was habitually silent; Sarah kept herself prudently in the background; Magdalen was quiet and undemonstrative beyond all former precedent. From first to last she kept rigidly on her guard. The meaning looks that she cast on Frank flashed at him like lightning, and were gone before any one else could see them. Even when she brought him his tea, and when, in doing so, her self-control gave way under the temptation which the woman can resist—the temptation of touching the man she loves—even then she held the saucer so dexterously that the hot liquid only fell on Frank's self-possession was far less steadily disciplined; it only heated as high as the boiling-point. When he rose to go—when he felt the warm, clinging pressure of Magdalen's fingers round his hand, and felt her look at him—then she slipped into it at the same moment, he became confused and flustered. He might have betrayed Magdalen and betrayed himself but for Mr. Yanstone, who innocently covered his retreat by following him out, and giving him a slap on the shoulder all the way. "God bless you, Frank!" cried the friendly old man, when they got to the gate in a very audible key. "Your fortune's waiting for you. Go in, my boy—go in and win!"

"Yes," said Frank, "I will win." But he was rather difficult to go in and win at first. Of course, as you have always told me, a man's best pose is to count on his excellent health, and to talk about them. At the same time, I wish I didn't feel quite so loose as I do in my figures. I am discouraging to feel loose in one's figures.—Oh, yes; I'll write and tell you how I get on. I'm very much obliged by your kindness, and very sorry I couldn't succeed with the engineering. I think I should have liked engineering—on the whole. It can't be helped now, can it? Thank you again. Good-by!"

So he drifted away into the misty commercial future, as aimless, as helpless, as gentlemanlike as ever.

REBEL PRISONERS AT CHICAGO.

We publish on page 215, from a sketch by Mr. True Williams of Chicago, a picture of the Rendezvous at Camp Douglas, where the first seven hundred prisoners taken at Fort Donelson, comprising Alabamians, Mississippians, and Texans, were sent there soon after their capture, and are now held there. The Chicago Tribune thus describes their appearance:

Parties who were fortunate enough to obtain entrance to Camp Douglas yesterday forenoon might have seen standing, sauntering in the rain, in the mud, and on the parade-ground, a collection of men wearing all the colors of the rainbow, and dressed in all the styles of the tailor's art. There were eight hundred rebel prisoners, who had been brought from Cairo bareheaded for a warmer country, and their feet were all exposed to the cold weather of a northern climate; hence the prisoners looked pale, and actually had a chilled look. Many of them had not more than the proportion of their barracks. It was a matter for consideration. A week ago these men were fighting under the regnat flag at Donelson. To-day they stood exposed, yet not entirely unprotected, to the cold rain, and crowded hundreds of miles from their homes and scenes of disastrous battle.

A more unhappy appearing set of men it would be difficult for the reader to imagine. Occasionally a face appears we are in the habit of seeing upon our public roads but would suffer somewhat, being out of place in the midst of fields and complexion. It may have been from exposure to the weather, but the most of the faces we saw were of a red appearance, suggestive of fresh blood and bad whisky, and were setting of it as they stood. Others were ragging and unfragmentary wounds to a degree to excite their curiosity. The majority, however, stood gazing about the place, perfectly willing to be looked at, and were also willing to answer all questions put to them by their numerous visitors. These visitors were mostly ladies, and of the fairer sex. In fact, these men, and those who had been captured in the southern portion of the grounds known as Buckett's Camp, appeared to be satisfied with their lot, and were free to say they had been better treated than Unionists, or more comfortably housed and better fed than they expect was they would be at Camp Douglas on their return.

The officers of the Confederate prisoners are just as uniformed at all, lacking all the characteristics of industry, bravery, or artillery service, in being wholly unmilitary. In color, cut, fashion, and material, the officers have quite a haberdasher color, cut in regular sack style, and others fashionable, like those of our soldiers, as jackets or frocks. The pants are as diversified in color. Many of them have no trowsers at all, and supply their place with linen blankets, hunting-cap, coverlets, pieces of carpet, coffee sacks, etc., etc. Their knapsacks consist of about all colors and sizes, ranging well with their coats and hats. The same remarks apply equally well to the cannoneers and other secessionists, so half dozen of which seem to have been made at the same manufactory.

ADVERTISEMENTS

SODA-WATER APPARATUS, new and Second hand, slavery description. Druggists, Confectioners, and Soldiers, send for an illustrative and descriptive circular and price-list at WILLIAM GEE'S, No. 7 and 7 New Haven Railroad Buildings, corner of Elm and Franklin Streets, New York.

AGENTS, Army Traders, and the Speculating Class wanted, who can spread the country with one of the most saleable articles. Price lists sent free. Address HUBBARD BROS., NEW YORK.

You must Notice,

That the name of the firm of W. Forsyth & Co. is changed to that of W. FORSYTH, SON & NEPHEW, as before mentioned. Business continues the same, and all Certificates with the name of W. Forsyth & Co. attached are good, and will be redeemed by us alone, with the same promptness and faithfulness as heretofore, on their being returned to us.

100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

Splendid List!!

Of Articles to be Sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting-case Watches	$60.00 each
200 Ladies' Gold Watches	40.00 each
300 Ladies and Gents' Silver Watches	25.00 each
5000 Vest and Neck Chains	5.00 to 10.00 each
5000 Gold Lockets, Medallions, &c.	5.00 to 10.00 each
2000 " " "	3.00 to 5.00 each
1000 Gutta-Percha Brooches	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Gold Lava and Florentine Pins	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Cameo Pins	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Ear Drops	4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Gold Pencil Cases	3.00 to 5.00 each
3000 Watch Keys	3.00 to 5.00 each
5000 Fob and Vest Slides	3.00 to 5.00 each
4000 Sets of Bosom Studs	2.50 to 6.00 each
5000 Sets Sleeve Buttons	2.50 to 6.00 each
7000 Plain Rings	2.50 to 5.00 each
7000 Stone Set	2.50 to 5.00 each
5000 Mourning	2.50 to 5.00 each
10000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry	5.00 to 10.00 each
5000 Gold Pens, 14 Carats and Warranted	$5.00 each
(with Silver Mounted Holders.)

All of the above will be sold for One Dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one is worth, will be placed in envelopes and sealed. These envelopes will be sent by mail, as ordered, without regard to choice. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and get the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding Certificate, Postage, and writing and directing. Persons, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the certificate is sent. Five Certificates will be sent for one dollar and twenty-five cents; Eleven for two dollars; Thirty for five dollars.

AGENTS.—Those acting for Agents will be allowed ten cents on every certificate sold, and a handsome gift to any remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for each certificate sold, and remit to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used in our correspondence, in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. D. WHEELOCK & CO.,
209 Broadway,
P. O. Box 5079, New York.

N.B. We wish it distinctly understood that all articles of Jewelry are sold for Cash, and satisfaction can be returned and the money will be refunded.

A Certain Cure for Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, &c.

Laurie's Chinese Pill Pills.

This wonderful remedy is chiefly composed from the essence of a plant that grows in the ice districts of China, in the sea of Kamtschatka, and by learned Chinese physicians as an antidote to the effects of eating opium, &c., was discovered by Dr. Adam Laurie, M.D., who, while attached to the French and British Embassies at Hong Kong, had by him introduced into Europe and America.

These pills take no effect as a cathartic, but act specifically on the blood and nervous system, are a speedy and infallible remedy for NEURALGIA, TIC-DOULOUREUX, St. VITUS' DANCE, DYSPEPSIA, LIVER COMPLAINT, NERVOUS HEADACHE, SEA-SICKNESS, HEART-BURN, LOSS OF APPETITE, and all diseases of the nervous system, and may be taken with perfect safety by the most delicate lady or tender child.

Price One Dollar per box of forty pills, or large boxes of a hundred for Two Dollars. Sent post free, by mail, on receipt of remittance, or obtained of the following Agents:

GEO. BULTEN,
General Agent for the United States, 99 Broadway, N.Y.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.

HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BRACELETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR LOCKETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR RINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR VEST CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR NECK CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF SETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF PINS.
THE GENERAL HEAD-QUARTERS FOR EVERYTHING IN THE LINE OF JEWELRY.
THE GENERAL HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL.
208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

WATCHES.

10,000 for sale, at Wholesale prices. Enclose stamp for descriptive circular. H. B. TAYLOR, 209 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS MAKE MOST MONEY, and give entire satisfaction, by selling our "PRIZE STATIONERY." SAMPLE PACKAGE FREE. Circulars free. P. HASKINS & CO., 50 Beekman St., N. Y.

Wedding Cards and Note Papers at the LOWEST PRICES. Engraving, Embossing, 209 Broadway, cor. Duane Street, N. Y. Samples by mail.

Best Thing for Agents.

Sutcliff's Superior Blacking! Gift Packages contain more poetry and better gifts than any in market. Send stamp for Circular. Call for sample to

C. W. SCOFIELD, Bookseller, Geneva, N. Y.

Useful and Economical.—Hegeman & Co.'s Bonbons, which formerly covered Pulse, Grease Spots, &c., and cleans Ribbons, Silks, &c., equal to new without injury to the most delicate fabric, only 25 cents per bottle. Sold by Druggists. Be sure and get the genuine. Depot, HEGEMAN & CO., Chemists and Druggists, New York.

A New Edition of

Harper's War Map
Now Ready.

Price Six Cents.

Sent by mail on receipt of price.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

"MOUSTACHES and WHISKERS in 40 days." The GREAT SECRET and many others in a new BOOK, mailed for 20c. Eight for $1. Address U. S. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

AGENTS HAVE YOU SEEN THISTLE & CO.'S NEW UNION PRESS STATIONERY PACKAGE? If not send STAMP for our CIRCULAR, and GET THE BEST AND CHEAPEST IN THE MARKET.

THISTLE & CO., 139 NASSAU STREET, N. Y.

GRAND OPENING
OF
PARIS CLOAKS AND MANTILLAS,
On Wednesday, April 2nd,
BEING THE FIRST IMPORTATIONS, FOR SPRING,
OF THE
United States Cloak and Mantilla Store,
304 and 306 CANAL STREET.

Geo. Carey has the honor to announce the arrival of his first importations of

PARIS AND LONDON
CLOAKS AND MANTILLAS,
personally selected by Mr. W. R. Mackenzie from the leading Magazines in those cities, and who has spared neither care nor expense in making his search after novelty combined with useful excellence.

The guarantee of my own manufacture will be found worthy the attention and examination of Ladies, being for the most part

EXCLUSIVE IN STYLE, UNIQUE IN MANUFACTURE, AND POPULAR IN PRICES.

Ladies are invited from my view my display, which will enables to the advantages of my customers and the popularity and renown of the

United States Cloak and Mantilla Store,
304 and 306 CANAL STREET, NEW YORK.

GEO. CAREY.

N. B. Remember Wednesday, April 2nd, 1862.

Commercial Travelers and Agents Wanted to Sell our
25 Cent Portfolio Package.

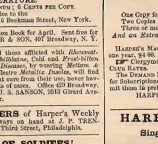
Contents—18 Sheets Note Paper, 18 Envelopes, 1 Pencil, 1 Pen, 1 Penholder, 1 Blotting Pad, 100 Recipes, 1 War Hymn, 5 Engravings, 1 New Method for Computing Interest, 1 Package Gold Pens, 1 Package Steel Pens, 1 Patent Lead Pencil, 1 Package Needles, 1 Package Pins, 1 Handkerchief, 1 Set Cuffs, 1 Set Silk Purse, 1 Set Cuffs and Collar, 1 Ornamental Pillow Case, 1 Parlor Garden, and One Beautiful Article of Jewelry. $10 a day can be realized. Send stamp for Circular of wholesale prices.

WEIR & CO., 43 South Third Street, Phila., Pa.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT to HIRE AGENTS to sell my Patent Comfort at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and cheap Sewing Machine. Address (with stamp) S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agents for U. WELLS & CO., 119 FRANKLIN St., New York. Sold by druggists everywhere.

THE ALBION,
A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER,
DEVOTED TO
NEWS, POLITICS, CRITICISM, AND GENERAL LITERATURE.



PRICE $3 PER ANNUM; 6 COPIES PER COPY. Send for a Specimen Copies to the ALBION OFFICE, 16 Beekman Street, New York.

Le Bon Ton Publish Book for April. Sent free by mail for 25 cents. Address LE BON TON, Box 5643, N. Y.

Rheumatism.—All those afflicted with Rheumatism, Gout, Neuralgia, Chilblains, Colds and Diseases of the Skin, and all Nervous Affections, should use DR. DE ROSNE'S Patent Galvanic Rheumatic Armlets. Thousands have been relieved by their use, never having yet failed in hundreds of cases. Office 429 Broadway. Agent for Philadelphia, J. S. SANSON, 1013 Girard Avenue. Send for a Circular.

BACK NUMBERS of Harper's Weekly and Magazine always on hand at J. F. TRENWITH'S, No. 303 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Beaufort, and all places occupied by Union forces, should be sent to the care of SANDDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Soldiers charged low rates.

A MOST POWERFUL ARM, WHICH CAN BE carried constantly about the person without inconvenience or danger. Weight five inches, and carries the ball the length of the barrel. It is the most compact, safe, and powerful Pocket Revolver ever made; weighs only eight ounces, charged with cartridges, which can be purchased in hardware stores, drug stores, and gun stores everywhere. Will penetrate one inch of plate at one hundred and fifty yards. ITS Patent Extracting Cylinder,
Retail price, Plated Finish, with 100 cartridges, $12 50
Do. Silver Finish, " " " 15 00
Trade supplied. F. W. MOORE, 426 B'way, N. Y.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Marriage Cards and Envelopes, by A. DELAHEST, Engraver, 192 Broadway. Seals and stamps.

Chapped Hands, Face, Lips, &c.—CRITTEN DEN AND PREVENTIVE.—HEGEMAN & CO.'S CAMPHOR ICE, with GLYCERINE, will keep the skin soft in the coldest weather. Sold by Druggists everywhere. Depot, HEGEMAN & CO., Chemists and Druggists, New York. Sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents. HEGEMAN & CO., Nos. 141, 199, 511, and 795 Broadway, New York.

To Sutlers and Others.
Send for trade discount.

ANDREWS' YEAST POWDERS, put up in cans, with full directions for immediate use. Bread, biscuit, and flapcakes, beautifully light and wholesome, can be made in two minutes! Warranted superior to all others. Will keep good in any climate. For sale by Grocers and Druggists, who will procure them for you, or send an order to THOS. ANDREWS & CO.,
139 and 141 Cedar Street, N. Y.

BRODIE'S
Stock of Spring
and
Summer
MANTILLAS,
Now Ready for Wholesale Cash Buyers,
at the
OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street, New York.

ENTERPRISING AGENTS ARE DOING well selling DOWSE'S FAT HEARTH and TURNER for Hand-Sewing, and other articles of domestic. Profits are large. Samples sent free on receipt of the price (50 cts.). Send for circular and terms to trade and terms. A. B. DOWSE, 421 Broadway, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES? If so, send 25 cents to prove them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without injury. Sent to any part of the U. S. Free, sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Bound Volumes
AND Back Numbers
OF
Harper's Weekly
Always on hand.

Price of Volumes in Cloth	$5 50
" " "	7 50

Beautifully and substantially bound.
HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, N. Y.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

"The Adventures of Philip" will probably be completed in May. It will be succeeded by a serial story from the pen of a favorite Writer, for which engagements have been made.

Mr. G. Hamilton Sommerville, who is now traveling in Europe, will furnish a series of articles, illustrated by himself, describing the Manners and Scenery. These will be commenced in an early Number. Mr. Lossing will continue the series of papers upon events in the American History, which have not been treated in detail by our standard historians. The Editorial Table will be under the management of Mr. WYNN, who will comprise anecdotes and reminiscences of most of the men who have made a figure in the world, and a representative position in our Literature and Science.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE will continue to be the permanent depository of the best Literature of the day, irrespective of "schools," and other leading English Magazines. It will endeavor to present its readers with a class of matter more than any other American periodical of similar class.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year each,	2 50

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

The Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.

The DOMESTIC NOTES of the United States will be received at the SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE, and every effort made to transmit them in preference to Book Notes.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

A Thrilling Story,
Entitled,

NO NAME

By Wilkie Collins,
AUTHOR OF
"The Woman in White,"
Richly Illustrated by John McLenan,

Was commenced in the Number for March 15 (No. 273) of

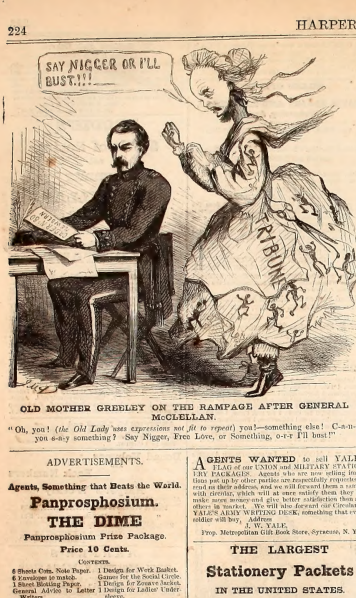
HARPER'S WEEKLY,

And will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Two Copies for One Year	4 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.



HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V. for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861, of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $2 50 each, are now ready.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

OLD MOTHER GREELEY ON THE RAMPAGE AFTER GENERAL McCLELLAN.

"Oh, you! (the Old Lady uses expressions not fit to repeat) you!—something else! C-a-n-'t you s-h-y something? Say Nigger, Free Love, or Something, o-r-r I'll bust!"

THE HAND CLOSING.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Agents, Something that Beats the World.

Panprosphosium.

THE DIME

Panprosphosium Prize Package.

Price 10 Cents.

CONTENTS.

6 Sheets Com. Note Paper. 1 Design for Work Basket.
6 Envelopes to match. Games for the Social Circle.
1 Sheet Blotting Paper. 1 Design for Evening Jacket.
General Advice to Letter Writers. 1 Design for Ladies' Under Sleeve.
95 Ways for Making Money. 1 Design for Traveling Dress
Advice for Ladies' Toilet. 25 Valuable Recipes.
1 Design for Boy's Gaiter. 1 Calendar for 1862.
1 Design for Girl's Basque. A Piece of Valuable Jewelry.

Nothing like it ever compiled. Nothing like it ever dreamed of. Agents can make nearly one hundred per cent. Send a stamp for a circular.

W. H. THOMES & CO.,
181 Nassau Street, New York.

AGENTS of ACTIVITY and ENERGY can make from $5 to $20 per day by selling the new IMPROVED STATIONERY RECEIPT BOOK AND ENVELOPE in the market. Our STATIONERY is SUPERIOR, and our Jewelry consists of FORTY VARIETIES manufactured with ARTISTIC TASTE.

We put in each package a beautiful and life-like engraving of

GENERAL GEORGE B. McCLELLAN, 6x10.

75 Valuable Recipes. 6 Sheets Ladies' Billet Paper.
6 sheets Commercial Note Paper. 6 Buff Envelopes.
6 Sheets Ladies' Note Paper. 1 Fine Steel Pen.
1 Fine Pencil.
6 White Union Envelopes. 1 Sheet Blotting Paper.
1 Accommodation Pencil.
6 Ladies' White Union Envelopes. 1 Accommodation Pencil.

ALSO A VALUABLE PIECE OF JEWELRY.

For further particulars send for one of our circulars, which we mail free.

S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

The Sin., or Navy Size, carries a Ball weighing 38 to the lb., and the No. 48 or 36 Revolver, a Ball of 48 to the lb. By recent experiments made in the Army, these Revolvers were pronounced the best and most effective weapons in use. Also,

Ballard's Patent Breech-Loading Rifle.

This arm is entirely new, and is universally acknowledged to be the nearest to perfection of any Breech-Loading Rifle ever made. Length of barrel 24 inches, weight of Rifle 7 pounds. Size of Calibre adapted to Nos. 32, 36, and 48 copper waterproof Cartridges. Every particular call or send for a Circular to

MERWIN & BRAY, Sole Agents,
No. 245 Broadway, N. Y.

THE DIAPHRAGM FILTER. Sold by A. MCKENZIE, Pharmacist, 665 6th Avenue, N. Y.

The Wide World!

Published weekly in Boston. Rare, spirited, absorbing in Stories, Essays, Editorials, Fun, Poetry, Designs, and General Intelligence. Always bright, smart, genial, and companionable.

Sold by all News Dealers. 4 cents.

AGENTS WANTED to sell YALE'S FLAG of our UNION and MILITARY STATIONERY PACKAGES. Agents who are now selling Imitation put up by other parties are respectfully requested to send us their address, and we will forward them a sample with circular, which will at once satisfy them they can make more money and give better satisfaction than any other in market. We will also forward our Circular of YALE'S ARMY WRITING DESK, something that every soldier will buy. Address

L. W. YALE,
Prop. Metropolitan Gift Book Store, Syracuse, N. Y.

THE LARGEST

Stationery Packets

IN THE UNITED STATES.

MINER'S

UNION

STATIONERY PACKET

CONTAINS

24 Sheets of Paper.
24 Envelopes.
5 Steel Pens.
1 Copper Erroducum Pen.
1 Accommodation Pen Holder.
1 Superior Lead Pencil.
1 Pocket Almanac for 1862.

PRICE 25 CENTS.

Dealers Supplied at $12 50 per Hundred.

HENRY MINER,

Nos. 71 and 73 Fifth Street,

PITTSBURGH, PA.

To Consumptives.

THE Advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption—is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure Cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he conceives to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing.

Parties wishing the prescription will please address

REV. EDWARD A. WILSON,
Williamsburgh,
Kings County, New York.

"WHAT CAME AFTERWARD?" by T. S. Arthur, and "BATTLE-FIELDS OF OUR FATHERS," by Victoria F. Townsend, two Serial stories, now appearing in ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE. For sale by News Agents.

Price 15 cents a number.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE. MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES.

Price (Silver) $2. Sent by mail, post paid, $1. Mailed free. F. D. BOWEN, Box 220, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED.—THE WASHINGTON WRITING CASE.

Something entirely new and beautiful, designed for the MILLION.

It is made of WOOD, and neatly covered with Morocco Paper, is in the shape of a perfect Desk, and a splendid present for young LADIES, or any one, and just the article every SOLDIER needs, and contains every thing for writing. Price 25 cents. Circulars free.

JOHN H. TINGLEY,
Bookseller and Stationer,
193 Fulton Street, N. Y.

Agents! Agents!! Agents!!!

Send a stamp for the Circular of the Multomicron, Multomicron, Multomicron.

SOMETHING UNAPPROACHED and UNAPPROACHABLE. Never before seen, heard, or thought of. Moneycoining and money-saving to all Agents of vim and brains. Send stamp for Circular.

S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

For Sale or to Let.

The premises No. 209 and 211 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, formerly occupied by Messrs. L. J. Levy & Company. For Terms, &c.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS,
New York.

SENT BY EXPRESS

EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices, Made to Measure at $20 per doz. Or SIX FOR TEN DOLLARS.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN, With fine Linen Bosom, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in retail stores for $2 50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $36 00 PER DOZEN.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $20 per dozen are rebellious. Here is the cost of one dozen of the above:

20 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 18 c. per yd.. $3 60
7 yards of fine Linen at 50c. per yard.. 3 50
Making and cutting.. 6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 75c.. 1 75
Profit.. 1 75

Total.. $20 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and directions of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. Those who are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure, I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

INVALID.—You will get the Recipe for a safe cure for Consumption, Coughs, Colds, &c., by sending to Dr. Ashes, 331 Pearl Street, N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

Gold Pens Repointed—Equal to New,

On receipt of 25 cts. in money or stamps. Orders by Mail promptly attended to. Gold Pens and Silver Extension Cases $1 50. E. S. JOHNSON, 18 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

BEADLE'S DIME BOOKS.

Beadle's Dime Biographical Library.

EACH ISSUE COMPLETE—100 PAGES.

Major-Gen. Geo. B. McClellan;

Comprising his services in Western Virginia, on the Ohio River and Northern Oregon Exploring Expeditions; Army Commission to Europe, etc.

Beadle's Dime Cook Book.
Beadle's Dime Recipe Book.
Beadle's Dime Book of Etiquette.
Beadle's Dime Letter-Writer.
Beadle's Dime Guide to Dreaming.
Beadle's Dime Speaker, Nos. 1 & 2.
Beadle's Dime Dialogues, Nos. 1 & 2.
Beadle's Dime Chess Instructor.
Beadle's Dime Family Physician.
Beadle's Dime School Melodist.
Beadle's Dime Song Book, Nos. 1 & 2.
Beadle's Dime Song Book, Nos. 1 to 5.

Ten Cents Each. For sale by all Booksellers and Newsdealers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address

BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

THE SOLDIERS'

BULLET-PROOF VEST.

Proved and Approved by a Board of Officers at Washington.

It will Save the Lives of Friends.

Forwarded to any address in our Army by Express, at charges paid, on receipt of $20 per patent and $2 for all over vests. Write.

Messrs. ELLIOTT, 292 Broadway, NEW YORK.

To all wanting Farms.

NEW SETTLEMENT OF VINELAND.—30 miles from Philadelphia by Railroad. Good lands only, highly productive for Wheat, Corn, Grass, Fruits, and Vegetables—good market—delightful climate—where farming is profitable, especially those times, and where good Business openings can be found. Large numbers are settling. Society and Farms from $15 to $20 per acre only.—Village 3 and 4 acre Lots for sale. Many years' time given. Address SOLON ROBINSON, Ag. Ed. of the Tribune, and Author of Hot Corn, Sunnyside, Uncle Tom's Cabin, and many other Books, resident on farm and Manager,

CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland P.O., Cumberland County, New Jersey.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Have Just Published:

A STRANGE STORY. A Novel. By Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Bart., Author of "What will He do with It?" "My Novel," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," &c. &c. Illustrated by American Artists. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

PILGRIMS OF FASHION. A Novel. By EMMA CORNWALLIS. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MAYHEW'S BEN FRANKLIN. Young Benjamin Franklin; or, The Right Road through Life. A story to Show Boys Bound to Succeed. The Principles comprised in a Printer's Boy to be the Best Assistant, and of the American Apprentice to be a Good Citizen, a Smart Soldier, and Wise Statesman. By HENRY MAYHEW, Author of "London Labour," "The Wonders of Science," "Young Benjamin Franklin," &c. &c. With Illustrations by John Gilbert. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. A Treatise specially designed for Young Men. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The Mother at Home," "The Child at Home," "Life of Josephine," "Napoleon at St. Helena," "History of the French Revolution," &c. 18mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

STREAKS OF LIGHT; or, Fifty-Two Facts from the Bible for Fifty-Two Sundays of the Year. By the Author of "Rose Douglas," "Jessie Graham," "Ernest Wilmot Trent," and "More about Jesus." Illustrations. 18mo, Muslin gilt, 45 cents.

NOTICE TO QUIT. A Novel. By W. G. WILLS, Author of "Tina Pandolfini," "Eva," Paper, 75 cents.

THE OKAVANGO RIVER: A Narrative of Travel, Exploration, and Adventure. By CHARLES JOHN ANDERSSON, Author of "Lake Ngami." With Steel Portraits of the Author, Numerous Wood-cuts, and a Map, not contained in the English Edition, showing the Regions explored by Andersson, Cumming, Livingstone, and Du Chaillu. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Half Calf, $4 00.

IDA PFEIFFER'S LAST TRAVELS AND ALTOGETHER. One Lady's Travels in the Pacific Islands; with a Visit to Madagascar. With an Autobiographical Memoir of the Author. Translated by H. W. DULCKEN. Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25. (Uniform with Ida Pfeiffer's "Second Journey Round the World.")

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VI.—No. 276.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAJOR-GENERAL BUELL.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 284.]

BRIGADIER-GENERAL SHIELDS.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 285.]

BOMB-PROOF SAND-BAG BATTERY AT NEWBERN, NORTH CAROLINA, TAKEN BY GENERAL BURNSIDE'S TROOPS.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 284.]

ADVERTISEMENT.

☞ The Publishers of Harper's Weekly congratulate their readers upon the appearance in Number 272 of the first part of a new serial tale entitled "No Name," by WILKIE COLLINS, Esq., author of "The Woman in White." In opening gives promise of the same wonderful power and multifarious dramatic skill which entranced the readers of "The Woman in White." It is seldom that a periodical is enabled to furnish its subscribers with such a series of attractive tales as have appeared consecutively for the past two years in Household Words, from the pen of DICKENS, WILKIE COLLINS, and DARLEY. The commencement of this Tale affords a good opportunity for parties wishing to subscribe to form clubs, and obtain Harper's Weekly at the reduced rate of one cent.

The circulation of Harper's Weekly being now over 225,000 copies each week, it has both a wider and more select field than any country. Price, per line, inside 50 cents, outside 75 cents.

See terms for Clubs, etc., on page 239.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1862.

THE COMMAND OF THE ARMY.

THE indignation of an outraged public has compelled the New York Tribune and its confidants to cease their abuse of the Major-General commanding the army; but not to stop leading politicians at Washington and a large section of the public continue to complain that matters are not ordered according to their notions, and to insinuate in very intelligible terms that the war would be much better conducted if another officer—and we say General Fremont?—were at the head of the army.

We desire to be classed among the admirers of the genius, energy, and fortitude of Major-General Frémont. To us it seems, as to others, that injustice was done him in the publication, if not in the making, of Adjutant-General Thomas's Report. He certainly crossed the Osage with his army, which Thomas positively declared he could not do. And it is fortunate for him that the waste and corruption in his Department were not more flagrant than in other Departments. At the same time, no one will have taken the pains to keep posted on the current events of the day and on the course of public opinion, can deny that Fremont's management in Missouri was not a success, and that his reputation as a military leader does not stand high among the people of the West. The loss of even his appointment to the command of the army would a decline of one per cent. on the stock exchange. It may have been his conviction that the landing events of his "hundred days" in Missouri were the defeat at Springfield, the death of Lyon, and the surrender of Lexington. But his speech at St. Louis, in which he confessed that his removal had shaken his faith in democratic institutions, and the open sympathy of his followers—men in his confidence and under his control—that they would obey orders from no General but him, were not calculated to make they were faults, for which he must make amends, and which he must efface from the public memory before he can regain the confidence of the people. His present command, we are happy to add, will afford him an opportunity of retrieving those errors; it ought to afford him that.

With regard to the course pursued by Major-General M'Clellan, there is but one principle which can be safely adopted by good citizens, and that is, to trust him until the proofs of his incapacity are so flagrant as to be obvious to every one. His position and his responsibility may render it incumbent on him to keep his plans secret. It is useless to attempt to vindicate himself from the charges of the civilian critics, he would be affording to the enemy information which would be serviceable. The public must be much in the movements of our armies which seems unintelligible and unwise to persons ignorant of the force and of military movements. But shall we imitate the savages who batter down steam-engines and tear their constructors to pieces because they don't understand them?

We do not pretend to have divined General M'Clellan's plan of operations; but we can see, as every one can, that since he assumed the command of our armies we have met with but one reverse—Ball's Bluff—and General Stone, the commander of that day, is in Fort Lafayette, charged with treason. We have won a dozen substantial victories, and the progress of our armies since we began to move has been steady, has been steady, incessant, and unchecked. The chief strong-holds of the rebels — Columbus, Bowling Green, and Manassas, Nashville, Memphis selected, fortified at great pains and expense, and constituting a strong strategic line—have been occupied by our forces without a battle, and a man or a gun. In Virginia our movements seem to proceed on a deliberately prearranged plan. Manassas, Evansports Charlestown, and Mathias Point, Centreville, Banks takes Leesburg, and Hooker crosses the Potomac; M'Dowell camps at Manassas, and Banks moves on to Winchester; Heintzelman turns up at Big Bethel, as Sumner occupies Warrenton Junction, Banks advances to Strasburg, and Hooker occupies Aquia Creek and Shipping Point. All this looks like method, especially when it is remembered that Burnside, on the coast, and Schoepf (?) on the other, are within striking distance of the only two lines of railway by which the rebel army in Virginia can escape to the Gulf States. We claim no strategic knowledge or military science. But to a civilian eye this looks like system, and such successful combination as would be called "a forced game" at chess. Surely the mind which has devised these results deserves to be trusted a little longer. So far as we can judge, no General of modern times ever enjoyed the confidence, courage, and, to use his own words, "adaptation of means to ends," than Major-General M'Clellan.

One thing is certain. In this, which is the greatest stake in this contest is Abraham Lincoln. He has the power of removing M'Clellan from his command when he pleases, and he has the best means of knowing whether he is fit for the rank he fills. Can we not afford to rely upon him?

THE LAST DITCH.

THE great defect of the Americans, writes a traveler from Timbuctoo, is weakness in the back-bone.

Here are a parcel of men and women going about wringing their hands and saying, What shall we do if the rebels continue to hold out after M'Clellan has beaten them? What if they go to their mountains after we have taken their sea-ports and the Mississippi, and continue to disturb the Union flag?

Reitly these are questions which don't concern us at all. When we have got our forts and batteries, and troops and ships, and munitions, and raised the blockade, what happens in the interior will not matter much. We shall not harass ourselves if people called rebels will themselves Confederates. They may call themselves cannibals if they like; and judging from the reports from Manassas, the name would be inappropriate. If they try to eat any body or commit robbery or murder, we shall have to punish the guilty. But otherwise, why disturb them?

These notions of "an unconquerable people," of "dying in the last ditch," of burning one's house, and destroying one's property, are mere newspaper gabble. No people in the world voluntarily destroy themselves or surrender their pride's sake. In every war there comes a time when men prefer their wife and babies to political theories. We say this because the rebels well, they will be readier for submission than we to specify the terms.

THE NEGRO QUESTION IN KENTUCKY.

THE Legislature of Kentucky, by a very large majority, has pronounced in favor of the disfranchisement of any citizen of that State who advocates the emancipation of the negroes. The majority was not large enough—two-thirds—to give to the expression of opinion the force of a law. But in a purely philosophical point of view it was enough. A generation since, Kentucky came within two or three votes of being a free State. Such a proposal now is a thing involves ostracism. Such has been the effect of cotton culture, and of the rapid increase of the negro population.

We should like to have a fresh vote on this question taken in a Legislature newly elected by the people of Kentucky. Now that the grave Legislature was chosen, the rebels were contending for the mastery of the State. Possibly the subsequent progress of the Union army may have effected a change in public sentiment; though, we confess, we hardly dare think so.

Thus we trust the Kentucky Legislature seems the most discouraging event of the day.

THE LOUNGER.

MOB LAW

THE papers which think that Mr. Wendell Phillips was served right when he was mobbed in Cincinnati on the same papers think that the speech of Mr. Yancey at the Cooper Institute, just before the election of 1860, a very eloquent oration, and profoundly worth public attention. In that speech Mr. Yancey told us that slavery was a grand thing, and that if we submitted to measure it by circular Mr. Lincoln slavery could not think of submitting to such an indignity, and must necessarily break up the Union. There was no talk about action upon or rioting upon the occasion. It was simply a purely able effort to carry the election under threat of revolution.

When treason was struggling to make good what Mr. Yancey so eloquently threatened in Cincinnati that he was an abolitionist and a Union man (the telegraph said disunionist, but that is the opprobrious term of Secessionists), and he was mobbed for saying so. "Served him right!" cry the papers that had so lauded a brave and quick an ear for Mr. Yancey.

Now let us have a fair understanding of this matter. Mr. Yancey was an open dissembler, as was Mr. Phillips. Mr. Yancey was for disunion because the dominance of slavery in the Government was threatened. Mr. Phillips, because he thought the Government hopelessly committed to the protection of slavery. One thought that the Government was going to be just, therefore he was for secession. The other thought that it was unjust, therefore he opposed it.

Under the Constitution, and by the manhood of every man in the land, both were equally entitled to express their convictions, and to make as many converts as they could. Under the Constitution, in a time of peace, if a man thinks that a monarchy is better than a republic, that polygamy is better than Christian marriage, that twice two make seven, and that a circle is evidently a square, he has the fullest right to say so to as many persons as wish to hear, and every soldier and every gun in the service of the nation is pledged to the protection in the exercise of that right. In time of war, however, up a military platform of security, may arrest, of course at its own peril, a man who merely preaches treason. But whether in peace or war, the mob has no rights, and no one man will execute it.

It is easy to understand that a people whose brave defenders stand upon the battle-field will feel such impatience of those who defame them that they may break through the forms of law and threaten the defamer with a summary penalty, as was shown by the mob that mounted the office of a newspaper in New York last April. But no man of common sense for a moment defends such an outbreak. There may be a better justice in making a man taste the poison with which he has tried to destroy other men; but when justice is denied it to be supplied. If Mr. Yancey or Mr. Breckinridge Wood should preach treason in New York or elsewhere, at this moment, it is possible that the Government would seize them as it seized Mr. Schnible. But the Government is the judge. If it does not exist, it ought not to shoot the man who tries to do it. If Mr. Phillips preaches treason the day is the same, and the same unlawful act of the Government is not laid upon him, the mob that hounds him is the tool of treason and traitors.

And who invented it? The mob of Richmond was an effort to seize treason. It was engineered doubtless by men who had been applauding Mr. Jeff Davis to-morrow if they could. It is applauded by men who applauded Yancey—by men who were for a moment that a man who would destroy this Government for the sake of Slavery is a more tolerable character than he who would have rendered it for the sake of Liberty. And the men and papers that commend this riot and anarchy, having taken the functions of courts and juries unperiled, are the newspapers and the politicians who claim to be especial conservative and law-and-order-loving men! To serve and favor slavery which is the direct personal enemy of every laboring man in the country, is applaud anarchy They are as blind as they are vicious.

THE TWO PARTIES

IS the great contest which has seen Liberty and Destruction which is now waged in this country, party spirit will inevitably play a prominent part. The enemies, or unconscious friends, of constitutional liberty will sympathize as party men. When the utmost resistance of the North is first impressed, it is evident that such Union men as Senator Carlile of Virginia and Senator Davis of Kentucky will be inclined to make terms with their own party friends of the rebellion as Mr. Ben Wood and Mr. Vallandigham. Ought not this fact to make such men in this Government hesitate? Is a party to which all the secret and silent adherents of disunion attach themselves a party which could possibly promise peace to the country in the future? Can Mr. Davis cleave to a party which holds the ground realized by a proper respect for constitutional deliet, without supporting all that Jeff Davis has ever claimed?

There are really but two parties in the country at this moment. There is the party of absolutism and war, which has for the integrity of the nation must be preserved at every cost, but who differ as to the means as to which the end should be touched; and there is the party of disloyal men who are either openly in arms, or who secretly support those in arms, or who declare that they are not untouched, however much they may be used against the Government, they will virtually aid the rebellion.

There are very few men in the country who do not belong to one or the other of these parties. In these two the working political organizations of the future are to arise. The question that will divide them is slavery; and slavery will be the dividing question of all parties in the country until it should have overcome the disloyalty even of the laboring man, whether white or black;" that men have no natural rights, and that therefore for the strong to crush and oppress the weak is not injustice.

The party of slavery is intrenched in ignorance and prejudice, and the practical difficulty of dealing with a vicious system of society. The party of liberty is strengthened by universal intelligence—by experience of the necessary consequences of slavery, which are war, taxation, and anarchy — and by the very advantages of liberty, which are general prosperity, intelligence, and civil security. The practical business of the party of liberty will be the inhuman and revolting doctrines and practices which it must logically assert and defend: the weakness of the party of liberty will be the difference of opinion as to methods, and the bitterness which such difference always breeds.

Virtually, of course, we have all made the election between these parties. Those of us who think that the prejudices of despotism and the dark ages are to be weeded out of this nation belong already to the party of liberty, of civilization, of America, of peace, progress, and prosperity. Those of us who believe that there is no necessary antagonism, in a nation of laborers, between a system which respects and one which degrades labor, who suppose that the laborers of the Free States are going to look on quietly and see the homes of their children in the West preoccupied by slaves, and who think it wise to maintain an overwhelming force to check restrained by law of nature, and whom it must be necessarily criminal to teach or to treat as human, belong already to the party of despotism, ignorance, and anarchy.

THE "NASHVILLE."

CERTAINLY, if Captain Pegram were on our side, we should give him dinners, and invite him to receive the freedom of the city. Shall, then, the Nashville rivals the Sumter. She dances in and out under the very noses of our guns. They shall her and send out the ship's boats. She lies alive blithely in Liverpool or Southampton, and a week after she sails, as comfortably lying there, the news we send of her burning or her capture will set all Europe laughing. It is a joke; we may as well own it, and laugh. Certainly crying won't help it. Moreover, we need not say that it is no matter of law in the matter. We insist that we don't care whether Europe laughs or not, for we do care. The very ferocity with which we assure each other that we are entirely independent of foreign criticism betrays us; just as the wrath with which the English newspapers scoff at ruins that they confess have been forborne, betrays the jealousy and the ill feeling which animate them.

The truth is that our Navy has been utterly inadequate to its task. It has done well. It has taken Port Royal, Fort Pulaski, Roanoke, and Fort Hleary the new Navy, were glorious victories. But the Nashville, the Jeff Davis, the Winchester, and the Merrimac upon her first appearance, can not but be mortifying to us; not because they and their crews are not entirely brave themselves, but because they show a skillful audacity which is the admiration even of our enemies, and they also show the utmost use of the means at the rebels' command.

On the other hand, the mortification ought not to blind us to the fact that such things are not very serious in themselves, and that every day contributes to make us readier to meet them. We have to guard a thousand miles of coast, with intricate inlets, and numerous points of assault by the enemy. They have one or two swift steamers, and they choose their point of entrance all along the line. Occasionally one of them escapes, and laugh at our old-fogy sailing ships. For instance, the Nashville ran the vessel Burnside had left the mouth of Beaufort harbor, leaving the bark Gemsbok and the "sloop steamer" Cumbridge. In the voyage of the 17th the rebel stole quietly out, showed her heels to the two ships, which showed theirs to her, but in a very few minutes she was safely at sea.

Naturally one question presents itself, and it may be answered even before it is asked here. Since it was known that the Nashville was at Beaufort, and that Burnside was threatening it, why were no measures made to have one or two steamers constantly on the watch to capture or destroy the Nashville. Probably there was no available steamer, and to have made one available she may have been only at the expense of leaving some other essential point unguarded.

These, is doubtless, a general feeling that Mr. Welles is not the secretary of the Navy we need, and ought to be removed. That may be, but it is idle to hold him responsible for every naval misfortune. If Mr. Welles is to be made directly responsible for the escape of the Nashville, then General M'Clellan must bear the blame of Bully Bluff. The only question is, whether the Secretary did all that could be done, under the circumstances, to suppress the Nashville. Probably there is not a newspaper in the country ought to have supplied plenty of proper vessels for the purpose. Why? It is not the province of the law whether the Navy forsakes force enough for our occasions. If Mr. Welles is to be charged with the escape of the first outbreak of the Merrimac, should be enough to unseat any Secretary.

POLITICS IN THE DARK.

In this country there can never be occasion or excuse for political assassination. Where it does exist, they are necessarily treasonable either in spirit or in purpose. They are ruled by a few men, who by means of the secret vote, and by stealth, and the objects of the society, for which the by a blind oath, and by mysterious signs known to the few leaders. In a despotism it may often be necessary for the friends of liberty to meet secretly to perfect measures for resistance. But in a republic like ours the public welfare can only be defended by the public opinion, and every conspiracy is a conclave of persons who practically seek to make themselves oligarchs.

Such is the political object which can be honestly desired by any honest American citizen that can not be more securely attained by frank debate than by hidden means, which appeal to fear and prejudice and mystery. Such objects may, indeed, be attained by mysterious agencies, but only as the temple is rended in like manner. The state is ordermed by intrigues, and sinks inevitably into a despotism or a condition of anarchy worse. The countries in which such societies flourish are those which are governed by the worst governments.

The difficulty of the "American" movement, as it was called a few years since in this country was this taint of secrecy. The American people upon the whole, wish to see fair play; and they had a very summary answer to this new party—"Dark-lanterns have nothing to do with politics." The "American" or "Know-Nothing" phenomenon was a conspiracy against liberty, and a secret conspiracy against foreign citizenship. Now, if it had been a conspiracy of any man or body of men that the naturalization laws needed revision, it was a perfectly legitimate matter of political argument and action. But there was no need of going into a dark closet to talk about it. And the moment you invited people into the closet, they said, instinctively, "Either this is a mean object, or else you wish to excite me, by the mystery of the closet, so that I shall not fairly judge. If you've any thing to say, speak out. Don't mumble and wink and make signs."

The novelty and the adroit management gave the party an apparent success. But when it was found that Americanism, minus the revision of the naturalization laws, was only opposition to foreigners, selfishness, private disappointment, ambition, and humbug, it disappeared as suddenly as it arose. It had a success of curiosity, as the French say. A great many of the worthiest citizens, who laughed at the lantern, for various reasons voted with the party. The extinction of such a party was natural, both because it evaded the real question upon which the country was divided, and because its machinery was cumbrous and repulsive. It inevitably had an air of being ashamed of itself. And so must any secret political organization have.

The Knights of the Golden Circle was also a secret political society. Its intention was the ascendancy of the aristocratic principle in the Government, and its methods were peaceable so long as Privilege held the power. It cherished designs upon Mexico and Cuba, hoping to get by piracy and massacre the increased territory which it could not secure by lawful means. Then it prepared the revolution at home which it could not achieve abroad.

That this society was secret was presumptive proof that it was treasonable and the enemy of every honest man. The form under which it survives is an association in favor of aristocracy, and the advantage of a few. It is essentially un-American, and necessarily dangerous to the peace and prosperity of the land. Its means are lawless violence: its end the ruin of the country.

POOR DELAWARE!

The loyal, honorable, self-respecting citizens of the stanch little State of Delaware must contemplate with profound humiliation the performances of their Senator, Saulsbury. The members for slavery in the old times were sagacious and skillful, as well as insolent and truculent, but Senator Saulsbury is only childish. It is a public shame, for the Senate is a national body. In the beginning of this session he introduced a proposition for an armistice between the rebels and the Government, which was lost in the laughter of the Senate and the derision of the nation. A few days since, when the bill for emancipation in the District was under consideration, Mr. Senator Saulsbury proposed an amendment that the liberated slaves should be divided among the Northern and Western States. There is something so silly in the suggestion that it is hard to believe that it was gravely offered in the Senate of the United States. But it was offered, and it came to a vote: and to complete the puerile and pitiful business every Senator voted against it, including Mr. Saulsbury!

We used to pity Texas when Wigfall performed. But he was at least an amusing clown. When the gravest question comes to debate, as it does now, how little Delaware must chafe when she sees who is speaking for her and putting her upon record!

A DILEMMA.

Dear Mr. Lounger,—I read my paper faithfully every morning to know what to believe and say, but this morning I am plunged in perplexity. I want to know whether to be alarmed by the prospect of the Merrimac's coming out, and I opened my paper, but it leaves me entirely in the lurch. Please tell me what to do. I send you the extracts from my newspaper. In one column I read:

"The Merrimac is about to run out of Norfolk again; and though the Navy Department assures us with a solemn nod that every thing is in readiness for her, it must be said that the previous utterances of that Department have not been so strictly verified as to afford any great confidence in its present assurances."

In the parallel column I read:

"Whatever mischief the monster is to do will be done in Hampton Roads, where, warned at last, the Navy Department has made proper arrangements to receive and handle her. There is not the most trifling ground for misapprehension."

If you will send me word whether to be frightened or not you will greatly oblige your friend and admirer, Tilly Slowboy.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

In pulling down an old wash-house in the garden of Mr. Smith, the workmen discovered the remains of a decayed waistcoat marked W. C. It is supposed to have belonged to William the Conqueror.

Mrs. Blobbins has arrived in town, and is residing at the Green Pig Hotel until she can suit herself with a housemaid.

We are authorized to contradict the rumor that Mr. Glugg has met with a serious accident. He merely fell over the door-mat and dislocated his spectacles.

A project is on foot for presenting a testimonial to M. Blondin, on the part of the visitors to the Crystal Palace, in proof of their admiration of his noble conduct in not tumbling off the rope and breaking his neck, as an inferior artist might have done.

By the recent census it appears that the majority of the inhabitants of Poppleby-in-the-Mire are idiots. There was reason for believing this, some years ago, when they petitioned Congress to prevent eclipses.

A wealthy inhabitant of Kensington has offered a prize of £5 for the worst poem upon the Great Exhibition of 1862. Betting is strongly in favor of the author of Proverbial Philosophy, but the author of the Victories of Love has many friends—on this occasion.

A new comedy, by the writer of As Fresh as Paint, has been read. Green Room report states that it is worse than his last piece, but this we believe to be impossible.

As Mr. Bumble, the respected landlord of the Cucumber's Arms, Wapping, was crossing the street near his own residence the other night, he was run up against by a fiend in human form and knocked into the gutter. The police are upon the traces of the miscreant; but that such a thing could happen is a comment upon the boasted civilization of the nineteenth century.

We deeply regret to hear that the incautious use of fire-arms has again resulted in a melancholy catastrophe. On Tuesday night last, Mr. Timothy O'Leary, of Ireland, but lately residing at No. 3½ Snitch Court, St. Giles's, hastily and in a fit of impecuniosity shot the moon, and the landlord is not likely to recover.

"Pray, Madam, what do you charge for recovering an umbrella?" said Michael O'Flaherty, from Tipperary, the other day, walking into an umbrella shop. "Let me see it," was the reply. "Ah, faith! and that's just what I want to do, for I've lost one, and I see you offer to re-cover them at a very small charge, so I was just thinking I would get you to recover mine." The shopkeeper was instantly immersed in a fit of the deepest speculation.

Men dying make their wills—but wives
Escape a work so sad;
Why should they make what all their lives
The gentle dames have had?

A debtor severely questioned as to the reason of his not paying a just debt replied, "Solomon was a very wise man, and Samson a very strong one, but neither of 'em could pay their debts without money."

A long-ago discarded lover consoles himself with the reflection that his loved one is married to a lawyer, has ten children, and the measles.

At the commencement of the sporting season the following important information was exhibited at Lord Camden's seat, near Sevenoaks: "This is to give notice that Lord Camden does not mean to shoot himself or any of his tenants till the 14th of September."

"How far is it from here to Ryde?" demanded a gentleman of a poor tired pedestrian. "I don't know how far it is to ride," answered the poor man, "but it is a precious long way to walk!"

Don't join in the rush to hold office, for generally holding office is not worth a rush.

When the purse is empty, and the kitchen cold, then is the voice of flattery no longer heard.

If sleep flies from you, don't go in hot pursuit of it; lie still, and it will probably come and kiss you.

Wanted, by an attorney, a clerk to engross other people's attention.

Barry Cornwall says, "Come, let me dive into thine eyes." If his love had "swimming eyes," very good; but, at all events, our advice to the young woman is, for divers reasons, don't let him do it. He might go over a "cataract."

We have artificial teeth, artificial hair, eyes, calves, hips, noses, and artificial morality. We believe that some young ladies must wear artificial heads, as we read of a young lady whose "head was turned" by a young man.

A waggish speculator, one of a numerous family in the world, recently said, "Five years ago I was not worth a penny in the world; now see where I am, through my own exertions!" "Well, where are you?" "Why, a thousand pounds in debt!"

The Irish beggar who, on being refused alms, swung his crutch on the toes of the gouty gentleman whom his prayers moved not to charity, exhibited true humor when he said to the enraged owner of the suffering foot, "Bless your Honor! if your heart was as tender as your toes, you'd have given me the ten-penny!"

Why is a fool like a needle?—He has an eye, but he has got no head; and you can't see his point.

The Falsest of False Utterers.—One who coins lies.

When is a house not a house?—When it is a-fire.

If a "still tongue proves a wise head," then the wisest of mortals must be dumb persons.

Husbands are probably the most ill-used of all classes of persons in the world—except wives.

Style!—What every coxcomb fancies he has attached to his gait.

When may a chair be said to dislike you?—When it can't bear you.

The geological character of the rock on which drunkards split is said to be quartz.

"Polly, dear," said a loving husband to his spouse, who was several years his junior, "what do you say to settling at the Cape?" "Oh, I'm delighted with the idea! You recollect when Morgan went out there he was as poor as we are, and he died in three years worth two thousand pounds!"

Any one who has lain all night upon a shelf, with an irresistible conviction that the house was dancing a polka, to the imminent danger of pitching him off, can form an idea of a first "night's rest" in the berth of an ocean steamer.

A man having been told that the price of bread had been lowered, said, "This is the first time I ever rejoiced at the fall of my best friend."

An enraged parent had jerked his provoking son across his knee, and with great vehemence was operating on the urchin's person, when the young one dug into the parental legs with his venomous little teeth. "Hollo! what're ye bitin' me for?" exclaimed the father. "Well, dad, who beginned this 'ere war?" retorted the urchin.

He is but a poor general, who, like a drum, is made only to be beaten.

Why is a wise man like a pin?—Because he has got a head and comes to the point.

When do broken bones begin to make themselves useful?—When they begin to knit.

The English boast of a man so benevolent that he used to hold an umbrella over a duck in a shower.

Young ladies are like arrows—they are all in a quiver till the beaux come, and can't go off without them.

"Yes, ma'am, that's a crack article," said a shopkeeper to a lady purchaser. "Oh, mercy," cried she, "if the thing is cracked I don't want it."

The young lady who gives herself away loses her self-possession.

They debate strange questions down East. The last was, "What is the difference between the Bridge of Sighs and the size of a bridge?" The next is to be, "The difference between a fac-simile and a sick family."

If a lady yawns half a dozen times in succession, young man, you may get your hat.

A little boy, a few days since, while coming down stairs was cautioned by his mother not to lose his balance. His question which followed was a puzzler: "Mother, if I should lose my balance, where would it go to?"

The man who carries all before him—the wheel-barrow-man.

Timing each other.—They have a story about a drunken captain who met a private of his regiment in the same condition. The captain ordered him to halt, and endeavoring in vain to assume a firm position on his feet, and talk with dignified severity, exclaimed, "Private Smith, I'll give yout'l four o'clock to gissober in!" "Cap'n," replied the soldier, "as you're (hic) a sight drunkernlam, I'll give yout'l fiver'clock to gissober in!"

"That was very greedy of you, Tommy, to eat your little sister's share of cake!" "You told me, ma, I was always to take her part," said Tommy.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

☞ For an account of the Battle of Winchester, see page 235.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, March 25, in the Senate, the bill in relation to administering the oath of allegiance to American citizens in foreign countries was reported back by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The debate on the bill for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia was then resumed, and Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, made a speech in favor of the proposition. Senators Saulsbury, Powell, Kennedy, and Harlan participated in the debate. Senator Saulsbury introduced an amendment that the negroes, when freed, shall be divided among the Free States.——In the House, the Senate bill providing for the settlement of the accounts of the crews of the ships-of-war Cumberland and Congress was passed. The Pacific Railroad bill was made the special order for Tuesday next. In Committee of the Whole the consideration of the Tax bill was resumed.

On Wednesday, March 26, in the Senate, at the suggestion of ex-President Pierce, Senator Latham offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling upon the Secretary of State for correspondence between Mr. Seward and President Pierce having reference to the conspiracy organized against the Government by the Knights of the Golden Circle. Senator Chandler said that to his certain knowledge the Knights had succeeded in getting a large number of the worst traitors into the Union army. A resolution of thanks to General Burnside and Commodore Rowan was referred. Debate on the resolution relative to the emancipation of slaves, and the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, occupied the remainder of the session.——In the House, the Tax bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole.

On Thursday, March 27, in the Senate, the Naval Committee were instructed to inquire whether there was any laxity on the part of the officers of the blockading squadron on the coast, especially at Charleston, and whether there was any foundation in the statement of the British Consul at that port, that armed troop ships of the Confederate States have been allowed to go in and out of the port of Charleston, and no attempts been made to stop them. The joint resolution in favor of extending pecuniary aid to the States that may emancipate their slaves was taken up, and Senator Henderson, of Missouri, made a speech in its favor. The Naval Appropriation bill was then taken up. Senator Hale, from the Naval Committee, offered an amendment appropriating $783,294 for the completion of the Stevens floating battery. Debate ensued, but without taking the question the Senate went into executive session, and subsequently adjourned.——The House was occupied in discussing the Tax bill in Committee of the Whole. Among the amendments adopted was one taxing anthracite coal fifteen cents per ton, and cotton one cent per pound after the first of May next.

On Friday, March 28, in the Senate, Senator Wright, of Indiana, introduced a bill providing for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. A motion to take up the resolution declaring that no more brigadier-generals shall be appointed, unless for gallantry in action, was disagreed to. The Naval Appropriation bill was then taken up, the question being on an amendment appropriating $783,294 for the completion of the Stevens floating battery, which was adopted, with the condition that Mr. Stevens shall not be repaid the money he has expended on the battery unless she prove successful, and also that the appropriation is not to be used unless the Secretary of the Navy is of the opinion that it will secure to the public service an efficient steam-battery. An amendment appropriating $13,000,000 for the construction of iron-clad vessels of war was adopted; also an amendment appropriating $250,000 for casting heavy ordnance at the Washington Navy-yard. The bill was then passed, and the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Naval Committee reported a joint resolution of thanks to Captain John Ericsson, for the enterprise, skill, energy, and tact displayed by him in constructing the iron-clad steamer Monitor, and the great service rendered by her to the country recently in Hampton Roads. The resolution was adopted. The consideration of the Tax bill was then resumed in Committee of the Whole. Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, March 31, in the Senate, a joint resolution appointing Theodore Woolsey, of Connecticut, Regent of the Smithsonian Institution, in place of C. C. Felton, deceased, was adopted. A resolution calling on the Secretary of War to furnish the report of Brigadier-General Mansfield relative to the engagement between the floating batteries Merrimac and Monitor was also adopted. A bill providing a Territorial Government for Arizona was introduced. Senator Fessenden presented joint resolutions from the Maine Legislature in favor of extending pecuniary aid to the States for the emancipation of their slaves; also cordially approving of the President's Message, and declaring that Maine will cheerfully furnish her quota of the amount; also asking Senators to vote for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. The bill for the abolition of slavery in the District at Columbia was then taken up, and Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, made a long speech in its favor.——In the House, the Senate bill remitting duties on arms imported by States or contractors was passed. A resolution from the Committee on Elections, declaring S. F. Beach not elected to the House from the Seventh Congressional District of Virginia, was adopted. The remainder of the session was spent in Committee of the Whole on the Tax bill.

GENERAL SUMNER'S ADVANCE.

A portion of General Sumner's division drove a large body of rebels from the Warrenton Junction on 28th. A reconnoissance made beyond the railroad junction at this point was pushed as far as the Rappahannock River, the enemy's cavalry retreating before them, and burning the bridge over the river in their flight. Our troops shelled them at the bridge, but did not prevent them from destroying it. Much more damage could have been done to the enemy while conveying their sick and wounded across the river, but humanity forbade it.

GENERAL HEINTZELMAN'S ADVANCE.

A reconnoissance was made on 27th from Newport News as far as Big Bethel, where the rebels were discovered to be posted to the number of 1500. Upon the approach of our troops they vacated the place without showing fight, and Big Bethel is now occupied by the Union soldiers.

EXPECTED BATTLE NEAR CORINTH, MISSISSIPPI.

According to intelligence received from Memphis, a large force of the rebels are concentrated at Corinth, Mississippi, where Generals Beauregard, Clark, Polk, and Cheatham, are all located. They are said to have 70,000 men there.

General Buell, who has command of his army in person, had arrived at latest accounts (29th March) within fifteen miles of Corinth, Mississippi.

The Union troops have possession of Florence and Tuscumbia, Alabama, and Iuka, Mississippi. The two latter places are on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, Tuscumbia being about midway between Chattanooga and Memphis.

General Grant, with a force not far from 40,000 men, is understood to be at Savannah, Tennessee, so that we must have near 100,000 men threatening Corinth.

THE CAMPAIGN IN ARKANSAS.

Van Dorn and Price, according to the telegraph, have gathered their shattered forces, and retreated entirely across the Boston Mountains. They are now at Van Buren and Fort Smith, 35,000 strong, receiving supplies from Memphis and Little Rock, via the Arkansas River. It is probable that Van Dorn will act in conjunction with Beauregard at Corinth to hold the line of the Cotton States. Reinforcements were slowly joining the rebels. The Union army of General Curtis had fallen back to Keitsville to secure forage, and were camped at the head of Cross Hollow, where it is plenty.

BEAUFORT IN OUR HANDS.

Beaufort has been taken by General Burnside, and no property whatever has been burned. Fort Macon has neither been blown up nor abandoned, but is still held by the rebels, from 300 to 500 strong; the place is invested, however, and the garrison must soon surrender.

THE FIGHT AT ISLAND NO. 10.

The firing at Island No. 10 was continued on 28th with great spirit by the rebels. It was evident that the guns were of very heavy calibre. They were observed to be cutting away the trees and mounting fresh guns, showing every indication of a protracted defense. Several rebel gun-boats, partially clad with railroad iron, were reported to be advancing down the river, but there was no expectation that they could pass the powerful batteries of General Pope.

JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA, RESTORED TO THE UNION.

The citizens of Jacksonville, Florida, have passed a series of resolutions, strongly repudiating the rebellion, protesting against the despotism which has crushed them down, destroyed their property, and deprived them of their rights and liberties. They hail the occupation of the Union army as a deliverance, proclaim their allegiance to the Government of the United States, and call for a reconstruction of the State Government of Florida, under the Constitution. After the capture of Fernandina by our troops, a body of the rebels went from there to Jacksonville and wantonly destroyed a number of saw-mills, warehouses, the railroad dépôt, a fine hotel, and several other buildings, the property in all valued at half a million of dollars.

FATAL AFFAIR AT MOSQUITO INLET, FLORIDA.

A dispatch to the Navy Department from Commodore Dupont reports the result of an expedition from his fleet into Mosquito Inlet, Florida, by the Penguin, Lieutenant F. A. Budd, and the Henry Andrew, S. W. Mather commanding, in which both these officers were killed, together with six seamen, and seven others were wounded. The object of the expedition was to capture any vessels lying there, which were supposed to contain arms transhipped from British vessels from Nassau, and to protect from incendiarism large quantities of live-oak timber, cut and ready for shipment.

After making a survey of the inlet in their boats, the two commanders, on their return, landed in the vicinity of some abandoned earth-works near a dense grove, from which a heavy fire was unexpectedly opened upon their men, killing Lieutenant Budd and Acting Master Mathers, and the number of men above stated. The rebels who made this attack were a portion of the garrison who abandoned St. Augustine on the approach of our troops. On the following morning (the 23d ult.), upon the arrival of Commander Rodgers, the place was found to be evacuated, but the bodies of the two officers were delivered up under a flag of truce by a rebel officer, Captain Bird, who came from a camp at some distance.

NASHVILLE BEING PUT STRAIGHT AGAIN.

A telegram from Chicago, dated March 25, says:

Governor Johnson has put newspapers under military rule, and suppressed one or two. He has issued a proclamation of a conciliatory character. He says that he desires to win the people back to the Union, but shall deal rigorously with treason. Mr. Etheridge has made a speech, in which he said that slavery would be abolished, if we could not conquer them any other way. The new government was to go into operation this week. Warning has been given that any one uttering treason will be arrested. The Union feeling is gaining ground. Business is pretty much resumed. All the stores are again opened, and prices have been much reduced.

THE "MERRIMAC" READY FOR ANOTHER FIGHT.

Information has reached Fortress Monroe by fugitive negroes, and some deserters from the rebel army, to the effect that the Merrimac has been brought off the dry dock at Norfolk, her crew put on board, and guns of heavier calibre than she had before have been mounted on her. The rebel steamers Jamestown and Yorktown are also said to be considerably increased in the strength of their armament, and are ready to accompany the Merrimac in her next attack on the Monitor. The former is said to have a fifteen-inch rifled gun on board, carrying 300 pound conical shot with steel points. Deserters state that she suffered terribly in the engagement with the Monitor, and returned to Norfolk in a sinking condition. It is stated as a fact, that the second time she bored her iron prow in the Cumberland she could not extricate herself, and that, fortunately for her, the prow broke off, or she would have gone down with the Cumberland.

THE NEW REBEL CABINET.

A dispatch dated Richmond, March 23, says:

The new Cabinet of President Davis has been formed. The Senate confirmed his appointments this morning, as follows:

Secretary of State—J. P. Benjamin, of Louisiana.
Secretary of War—George W. Randolph, of Virginia.
Secretary of the Navy—S. R. Mallory, of Florida.
Secretary of the Treasury—C. G. Memminger, of South Carolina.
Attorney-General—Thomas H. Watts.
Postmaster-General—Mr. Reagan, of Texas.

IRON-CLAD VESSELS.

The Secretary of the Navy has sent a communication to the Senate Naval Committee, in which Mr. Welles goes at some length into the question of iron-clad ships, and urges on Congress the necessity of giving close and careful attention to this department of warfare. He asks for $500,000 to extend the grounds and build furnaces in the Washington Navy-yard. He also wants $30,000,000 for the construction of iron-clad vessels, heavy ordnance, plating, etc.

PERSONAL.

The Spanish Government has refused to receive the rebel Commissioner, Mr. Rost.

There appears to be some doubt as to the death of Captain Buchanan, the commander of the rebel battery Merrimac, who was reported killed in the action with the Cumberland at Hampton Roads. The Star, a paper published at Easton, Maryland, within five miles of Captain Buchanan's home, says that his family has received intelligence from Norfolk that he only met with a slight wound in the thigh, and that he is recovering.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

A DEBATE ON THE PIRATES OF THE "SUMTER."

A discussion took place in the British Parliament on the 17th inst. relative to the arrest of the Lieutenant of the rebel steamer Sumter, and an ex-United States Consul, at Cadiz, by the United States Consul at Tangier. Mr. Layard, the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in reply to a question from Mr. Griffith, stated that these parties had not been released, as he was before led to believe, and had stated to the House, but that they were placed on board the United sloop-of-war Ino, by the American Consul, contrary to the wishes of the Moorish Government and the British Consul at Tangier, and were now on their way to America as political prisoners. The British Consul, Mr. Hay, had refused to interfere directly in the matter, and his course was approved by the Government. Mr. Layard, in concluding his explanation, said, that, for the sake of justice, of humanity, of the right of affording asylum to persons accused of political offenses—a claim preferred by the weakest and recognized by the strongest Powers—he might be permitted to express an earnest hope that when the circumstances came to the knowledge of the President of the United States he would order the release of the prisoners.

VIEWS AT NEW MADRID AND POINT PLEASANT.—From Sketches by Mr. A. Simplot.—(See Page 235.)

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION—TROOPS LANDING BELOW THE REBEL FORTS NEAR NEWBERN, NORTH CAROLINA.—Sketched by Mr. A. Wiser.—[See Page 231.]

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION—BOMBARDMENT OF NEWBERN, NORTH CAROLINA.—Sketched from the "Vidette" by Mr. A. Wiser.—[See Page 231.]

TERRA MOTO.

I HAD been traveling on horseback across the plains of Columbia, accompanied only by a copper-skinned Creole fellow, who went with me half over the continent, who boiled my camp-kettle, saddled my horse and his own mule, waited on me in every and any fashion, and would, I believe, have stabbed me if I had called him a servant. He called himself a guide, and was really a good fellow for one of those peppery half-breeds. The sun was going down with a dip and a plunge, and the snow-tipped crests of the Andes were all blushing with rose-colored light, when we caught the first glimpse of Wilson's hacienda. It was a pretty house of white stone, with portico and verandas, and a flat morisco roof, and in front of it a green lawn, with fountain and flower-garden. Close by were the numerous huts where the farm laborers and herdsmen lived: these were built of light wood and thatched with cane. All the huts, as well as the stables, barns, and outbuildings, were surrounded by a strong stockade, which also ran round the master's house for fear of Indian attacks. Beyond was the huge corral, in which the cattle were penned, and where the horses were driven for security from wild beasts and savages. Wilson, the owner, was a great cattle farmer. We had been passing for a long time through his herds of oxen, luxuriously browsing on the ocean of grass which the broad plains presented to the eastward. To the west, as I said before, lay the Andes, towering up into the very sky, and at a great distance I could see the gilt weathercock of the church of San Juan de los Llanos, a little town ten miles off. There was no other town near, and to the eastward the plains rolled away, unbroken, toward the remote Atlantic. I had heard from some muleteers that I should find an English settler hereabouts, and I was not sorry to have an opportunity of conversing again with a fellow-countryman. So I rode up to the house, through the open gate of the stockade, and presented myself as a guest, after the free and easy fashion of the wilderness. I need hardly say that there are no inns in the country, except in sea-ports, but I never found the poorest herdsman unwilling to set before me his parched corn and jerked beef, and to set aside for my use the snuggest corner of his grass-thatched hovel. But whereas I had reckoned on nothing better at Wilson's hacienda than the rough and ready hospitality of a bachelor, I met with an agreeable surprise. Two English ladies, both young and pretty, came out into the porch to greet the stranger. They were the emigrant's wife and sister, and with them came two playful children, the loveliest little fairies I ever saw. As for the owner of the house himself, I never saw a finer or more manly young man, nor one that I was prouder to hail as a countryman. I was received with the most genuine kindliness. If I had been a dear old friend or a blood relation the Wilsons could not have given me a heartier welcome. And I, who had ridden up to the hacienda meaning to ask and accept shelter for a single night, remained for two months the guest of that kindly household, who would not part with their visitor lightly. The time did not hang heavy on our hands. We were up at dawn, the most enjoyable time in that latitude, and had a thousand things to do until the blazing sun drove us in. Wilson was a wonderful horseman, and as for the lasso, he had learned to throw it so skillfully that he actually surpassed his instructors, the Spanish vaqueros and peons, bred as they were to the art. Indeed, the oldest veterans of the Llanos, brown or white, admitted that the English heretic was a match with the bolas, or the loop, for the most renowned rider in Columbia, while in battle with the savages he had given a hundred proofs of courage. He told me his story, a simple one enough. He had come out to South America, rich in nothing but bodily strength and mother wit, and had made an honorable fortune by dint of sheer work. I believe his father had been a clergyman, and had died poor; but on this subject he said little. He was fond of telling of his early hardships as an emigrant, how he bought and sold, how he fought Indians and fevers, until he was wealthy enough to claim as his wife the girl whom he had left in her English home, far away, waiting faithfully for him to return and fetch her to the new dwelling across the seas. Mrs. Wilson had not had to wait very long, after all, for the betrothed lover had been more fortunate than is always the case when there is a long engagement.

"But you see," said Wilson, modestly, "I was a fair judge of cattle and pastures, and so forth, and luckily I settled where I am. I may say that my lines have fallen in pleasant places, and my fortune, which consists almost wholly in live stock, has quintupled itself in six years."

So honest William Wilson had been able to go back within a reasonable time to England, to wed his wife and bring her to her transatlantic home, and with her had come his sister, for whose maintenance he had hitherto provided, even while struggling his hardest. The family were prosperous, and their prosperity was well deserved, for they were popular with even the most jealous of that heretic-hating population among whom they dwelt. Wilson was perfectly happy, and would not have changed places with a king. He laughed at my hints that after all Columbia was hardly a country adapted for the safe residence of delicate ladies and children.

"Safe! Why not?" he would ask. "Oh the savages! Well, there's little to fear just at present from my old plagues, the Indios bravos. We haven't heard the war-hoop in real earnest since the year before I went over to be married. Now and then a few loping red-skins do make a dash at the beasts, but we seldom lose more than a hoof or two of them."

I said something about the danger of over-security, adding:

"I don't wish to be an alarmist, Wilson, but even in my very limited experience of the Llanos I have seen something of the horrors of Indian warfare. If I were in your place—besides a natural anxiety for the safety of wife and sister—I should never look at the golden hair of those little cherubs that are hunting the butterfly yonder without seeing, in fancy, the scalping-knife of the ruthless savage glittering over them. Near the sea, now—"

"Confound it, man, don't croak in that way!" cried my host, with unusual abruptness, and an angry look. But he relaxed into a smile directly afterward, and added: "I beg your pardon, Royston. I know your advice was most kind, and well intended, but I can not accept it. Why should we move? As for revolutions, they only affect the cities and high-roads, and we are out of the way of pronunciamentos and military massacres. Earthquakes! There hasn't been a shake strong enough to break a wine-glass since I've been in the country. Plenty of little shudders Mother Earth gives. You remember how Mary laughed the other night when the tiny shock came, as she was playing the piano, and spoiled the tune? Those shocks frightened the womankind at first, but now they care not a rush for them. So you perceive that in going coastward we should actually run into danger, political and geological."

I was worsted, but not convinced.

On another occasion, when there had been a slight nocturnal alarm—a mere dash made by a party of mounted savages at the corral, which contained not only horned beasts but a valuable manada of horses and a string of mules—I ventured to hint to Wilson that such neighbors might some day prove an overmatch for his precautions. My entertainer was coming back from a bloodless victory and fruitless pursuit. He was half dressed and bareheaded, mounted on a horse without a saddle, just as he had started, rifle in hand, to lead half a dozen of his Spanish herdsmen against the marauders. He laughed good-humoredly at my forebodings.

"What a Cassandra you would have made, Royston!" said he, as he dropped to the ground from the back of his panting and heat-stained horse. "I haven't forgot my Virgil quite, you see. But, seriously, these affairs are child's play. The Indians have lost their old confidence. Ah! you should have seen the great raid they made upon us seven years back, before a stone of that house was reared, and when we had but a miserable timber barrack, the thatch of which they soon set on fire with their fire-tipped arrows. We had not that strong stockade, but merely a breast-work of turf and boughs, and round it swarmed five hundred of the painted yelling brutes, under their grand Cacique, White Eagle. Ah! he was a man, that chief! The Cāyquas will never get such another leader for their border forays. His son, spotted Jaguar, who commands them now, isn't fit to stand in his shoes—though, to be sure, he never wore such superfluities."

"But how did you manage?" asked I, with genuine interest. "Did the soldiers come to your help, or had you to fly to the town of San Juan?"

Wilson looked quite sheepish: he was one of those bold, bashful fellows who have an absolutely nervous dread of any thing that could be construed into a boast. He merely said it was an old story not worth telling, and strode off to go to bed again.

I found, however, on the next day, a more communicative narrator, in the person of José, the saladèro, or butcher of the farm—a man who boasted himself a pure Spaniard, Castilian, and "old Christian," by which he meant to disclaim the possession of any drop of Moorish or Hebrew blood. He was a tough, gray-headed old fellow of sixty-five, about the oldest and most experienced Llanero of all the settlement, although a broken limb, ill set, had spoiled his riding forever. Lame as he was, the old man had fought in many an Indian affray, and he had an almost exhaustless stock of stories. He was a very important member of the little commonwealth, since on the judicious use of his keen knife depended, in a great measure, the value of the hides exported. Every great cattle farm has its salada, presided over by an expert slaughterman, who kills numbers of oxen, not for meat alone, but for the sake of the hides and tallow, which South America so largely exports; and this hero of the pole-axe is called always "saladêro," to distinguish him from the town butcher, or "carnero."

I found the old man among his cherished piles of shaggy ox-hides, and with very little trouble elicited from him a full account of the memorable foray in which the wild Indians had besieged the hacienda.

"Holy St. Jago!" he began, "that was a peril indeed. A thousand of the barbarians broke into the civilized territory divided into two great bands, the most numerous of which was led by White Eagle, the terror of the frontiers. They came sweeping forward, burning and destroying, harming the land like a devouring fire, and leaving but blood and ashes where eight-and-twenty flourishing farms had stood. At last the White Eagle beset us here. Demonios! shall I ever forget the war-cry with which the savages came on, fringing the horizon with a long line of plumed heads and painted bodies, and long lances that had drunk the heart-drops of many whites? But Señor Wilson, our master—ah! what a man was he in the day of danger? The Cid could not have made a gallanter defense, I can tell you, Señor Inglese."

And then he proceeded to relate, in glowing language, the repeated and furious assaults on horseback and on foot, the stratagems, the surprises, which took place in the course of a siege that lasted three days and nights. He drew a graphic picture of the flaming arrows which set the thatch on fire; of the blood-thirsty yells of the savages; their frenzy at being thus baffled by a handful of men ("We were but eight guns," said José, proudly), and the cool courage and Herculean strength which Wilson had displayed in repeated hand-to-hand encounters. At last the famous Cacique of the Cāyquas, White Eagle—at whose belt hung seventeen fresh scalps, hideous trophies of that merciless war—had fallen by Wilson's hand, in a desperate effort to force the breast-work.

"And then they ran, Señor Inglese: the saints be with us, how they ran! They made but one bound, each man, to the back of the horse that was nearest him, and galloped away, leaving all the ground strewed with shields and bows, and plunder, and dead heathens. Santissima! the slain infidels made a mound that you may see to this day, all over turf and hemlocks, within the present stockade. And, Señor, the coward citizens of San Juan never stirred a finger to help us, though they saw the fire and heard our guns. I never go into their town since without snapping my fingers, in token of the contempt in which I hold them."

"And do you feel safe now?" asked I.

"St. Michael! yes," answered the slayer of cattle. "We have tamed the pride of the heathens, so that they come now to pilfer, not to scalp and slay, and bear off captives, as of old. We have the stone-house now with lead over the roof, that no flaming arrows can set on fire. We have a stockade that defies the tomahawk, and a ditch that no horse can leap. Better than all, Sir, we have eighteen guns, for eight we had at the great fight; and even when all the men are out at the distant huts, there are sure to be ten herdsmen at home, counting myself; and then there is our master, Don Wilson, brave as Ruy Diaz, and strong as the blessed St. Hercules."

So old José was quite comfortable as to the future.

A few days afterward I saw Wilson's face grow uncommonly grave. Drought was the thing he had feared above all others; and drought, so fatal to the cattle-farmer, had begun. That is a rainless land—at least rain is very rare, so near the equator: the vapor condenses on the Andes as snow, but a shower is more of a rarity. Now the numberless rivers and streams—some fed by the melting of the mountain snows, some dependent on the heavy rains that fall in the tropical regions further north and south—keep the grass of the prairie succulent and green. But, for the first time since Wilson's occupation, stream after stream began to run dry; deep pools were changed into mere slimy pits; the grass grew withered and brown. Very soon the horses, mules, and cattle began to suffer, and next many of them died, or got so thin that they were obliged to be killed. Here was a calamity indeed; and daily it got worse. The emerald plains assumed a rusty and burned appearance, and water grew so scarce that the cattle were obliged to be driven away, far off, to the banks of big rivers that would not readily run dry. Here again there was a new danger, for these remote pastures were exposed to the maraudings of the savages, and were full of jaguars, wolves, pumas, and other beasts of prey. To guard against these, most of the vaqueros and peons were sent with the cattle, leaving but six men, besides Wilson, myself, and my man Diego, to look after the house. Ruin now stared the settler in the face; the complaints of the increasing drought were heard far and wide; my host's temper became less genial and joyous, and he began to pass his days in moody silence. I would have taken my leave, but for very shame sake I could not. I had shared, you see, the prosperity of these hospitable folks, and it would never do to prove a mere fair-weather guest by deserting them in misfortune. Two rifles were a welcome addition to the garrison of the farm, now that so many men were away with the herds beside the rivers.

One day as we were sitting and smoking, after supper, in the cool veranda, silent as usual, Wilson suddenly spoke.

"I'm becoming a sulky, inhospitable bear," said he, "and you are a good fellow, Royston, not to leave me in the lurch. But I'm afraid, downright afraid, of ruin. Not for my own sake; it's for the sake of my poor little ones, Lily and Lucy, that I flinch from loss as I do. I wanted them to be heiresses, you know, and to live happily and have enough, at home in England, when I'm no longer alive to care for their wants, poor pets—and now, if this lasts a month, I shall be almost a beggar."

In came a mulatto servant, Pedro by name, rolling his eyes, and showing every sign of perturbation.

"Señor Wilson," said the man, "the well is dry."

"Which well, booby?" asked his master, with a snappishness quite foreign to his habits; "and why do you stand glowering at me in that fashion?"

"Alas, noble Sir, it is the old deep well that was sunk in the time of the infidel Incas of Peru. Never has it failed before to supply us with plentiful water, cool as the snow of Andes, but now—"

"Now it has stopped. Well! I suppose the brook yields water yet, and you must fill your buckets there, and be sure you get it above the place where it is muddy with the trampling of the horses."

The mulatto lingered and wanted to say more, but Wilson abruply dismissed him.

I had just settled my head comfortably on my pillow that night, and was dropping off into a doze, when I was disturbed by the entrance, on tip-toe, of my follower Diego, with a candle in his hand, and an expression of mysterious importance in his shrewd brown face.

"Señor Inglese," said he, "one word. To-morrow morning permit me to saddle your honor's horse, and my mule, and let us take our leave. Caramba! it will be high time."

I asked him what he meant.

"Diego does not like the drying up of that well, Señor. It is a portent. It means no good. Old José, who is the most knowing of all the vaqueros, says it never happened before, never but in 1827, when the great earthquake was."

"The deuce!" exclaimed I. "You don't surely mean to say it is a sign of a coming earthquake. Pshaw, man, Mr. Wilson assures me they are never worse hereabouts than those trifling shocks we have felt ourselves, mere flea-bites."

Diego shook his head. He observed that Mr. Wilson was a foreigner; that the English were as obstinate as pigs—no offense to present company; that old José had seen the great convulsion of 1827; and that then, and then alone, had the "well of the Incas" run dry. Diego spoiled my night's repose, but when I spoke to Wilson in the morning he had a hearty laugh at my follower's prognostications.

"Nonsense," said he; "the natives of this country are always haunted by fears of earthquakes and savages, and if I had listened to them I should have passed a delightful existence. I wish I could guarantee the cattle from thieves, four-footed and biped, as easily as I can insure you against being swallowed up alive. Nevertheless, if you have any apprehensions—"

I assured him I had none. That day and the next were awfully sultry and oppressive: not a breath of cool air from the Andes. The weight and stillness of the atmosphere were depressing to the spirits. The very hum of the buzzing insects had something melancholy in it. The children, usually so gay, lost all their buoyancy of spirit, and ceased to make the house ring with their merry laughter. We were all dull and stupid, and the servants went about with most hang-dog faces, while Diego looked reproachful and José didactic. On the second evening little Lily Wilson, the eldest child, came running to call papa and mamma, Mr. Royston, Aunt Mary, every body, to look at the beautiful fire in the sky. Out we went, and sure enough there was a fantastic belt of fire visible in the western sky, over the white tops of the hoary Andes. Now it seemed to cling to the mountains like a burning girdle, now to soar above them and flutter like a pennon, and now to glide like a tremulous pillar of light between earth and heaven. The children clapped their little hands with delight.

"A meteor, no doubt," said Wilson; "and finer than any I ever saw before. I never did see one in this latitude. I wonder if it has a special meaning."

His wife hung trembling on his arm, and whispered something in his ear. He laughed—with rather a forced merriment, I thought—and bade her dismiss idle fears. Just then up came Old José, clanking in the great vaquero boots he always wore, though his lameness prevented his riding. The old fellow was pale, but resolute.

"Master, I leave you."

"Leave me! You, José!" Wilson spoke in profound surprise.

"Señor patron, I have eaten your bread a long time, but life is dearer than bread. I would not have turned my back in battle, Señor, as you know. But there is a worse foe than the bloody-minded Indian—a foe that even you, brave Englishman, can not match. And from that enemy I flee at day dawn, master, across the mountains, where a cripple like myself must limp his way on foot. I have broken my engagement, and here," chinking down a bag of silver, "are the duros I owe you."

"I never thought," said Wilson, passionately clenching his fist, and drumming on the ground with his heavy foot, "that you, Old José, would have abandoned me in this cursed cowardly way."

The swarthy cheek of the old Spaniard reddened.

"Cowardly!" said he. "Señor, take back the word. Old José does not merit to be thus addressed. He fought by your side when the spears were thick as grass-blades by the river; he leaves you now that Heaven has blinded you. Señor!"—he raised his voice—"in 1827 perished in this valley my whole kith and kin, father and mother, sister and brother—here where I stand they died all, and I escaped by the blessing of the Madonna alone. And then, two days before the earth gaped for human lives, there glared a fiery flag in the sky, as to-night. It is a warning. Heretics may mock if they will. It is a warning to Christian men."

He turned on his heel, cast a sad look at his employer, at the ladies, and especially at the golden-haired children he had so often dandled on his knee, hobbled out, and was gone. An hour after, while Wilson was chafing and striding about the room like a caged lion, the whole of the servants, all save two impassive Indians of the full-blood, came to give warning. We had a sad evening. But ere I had finished undressing Mrs. Wilson tapped at my door, and told me with irrepressible joy that she had persuaded her husband to take the whole family, as soon as possible, across the mountains to the comparatively safe country on the Pacific sea-board. There they could remain until the danger was past, or the signs had proved futile.

"Isn't it kind of William, anxious as he is about the cattle away on the Negro?" said the pretty young matron, as she tripped away down the corridor. "Of course, Mr. Royston, you go with us? And my dear little ones! We shall sleep in peace."

I had ugly dreams that night. Dreams of anacondas and nameless man-devouring monsters that glared at me with eyes as inscrutable as those of the Egyptian Sphinx. I woke feverish and languid. Wilson, to my surprise, seemed quite ashamed of his own compliance with the wishes of his wife.

"Going to the sea, like a parcel of poltroons," said he, "and all because of a set of stories any old woman might be ashamed of! Strange, too, to see that José so unmanned: I saw the old rogue with three strapping Indians upon him at once, and he faced them boldly, and brained two with his axe before I relieved him of the third. Well! women rule us all. So I've sent off one of the men to San Juan town to see about litters and pack-mules, and we'll start to-morrow. You go with us, Royston, I hope? We'll have some shots at the condors west of the pass."

So it was settled that next day, when the equipages were ready, we should go, and the house should be shut up and left to take its chance of Indian assault. That was a dreadfully hot, still day

—the air as heavy as lead. Every body was gloomy, in spite of repeated efforts to be cheerful. And yet when the hour for the siesta came, nobody, not even the children, seemed to care for sleep. All were restless and ill at ease. Suddenly Wilson exclaimed:

"Royston, come out, will you? Hang the sun! I can't kick my heels indoors any more. Let's get our nags, and have a gallop over the Llanos."

Before long we were mounted: I on my black horse from the south, Wilson on a splendid sorrel mustang, with very evident marks of the Arabian blood derived from the Spanish jennets. We had our rifles slung, and heavy Mexican lances in our hands—an indispensable precaution on those prairies. And Wilson had his lazo at his saddle-bow, as well as the bolas which he always carried.

"There's a brindled bull astray," said he, "that has puzzled the vaqueros; perhaps I shall get a sight of him, and if I get the noose over his horns I'll forgive him if he gets off again. And then there's a flock of pronghorns, you know, our American antelopes, driven in by thirst. Shy as they are, we may get a crack at them. Come along!"

And he spurred out of the corral. I followed, and we were soon careering, side by side, over the boundless sea of grass. The brisk motion did us good, and stimulated our nerves a bit; and my companion shot an antelope, and slung him behind his saddle, and we hit on the tracks of the lost bull. After a sharp gallop we suddenly reined up. There lay the poor bull on the parched plain—dead, but still warm. It had died of thirst. A dozen ugly vultures rose screaming from the carcass. They had been pecking at the eyes and protruding tongue.

"Pah!" cried Wilson, "I hate the vulture very name, but they are useful scavengers. Come along. Poor brindle! we have come too late to save the truant."

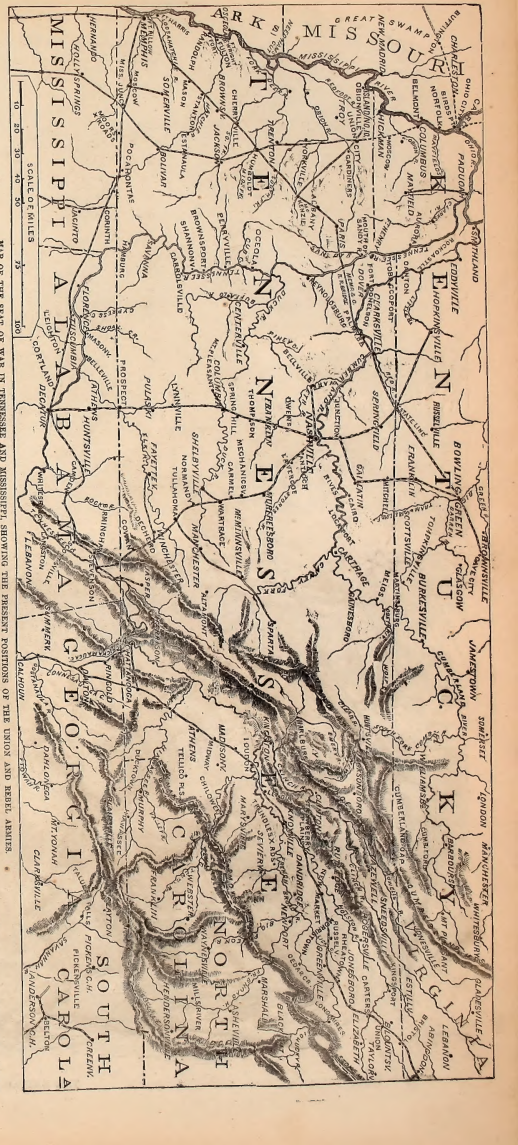
We rode homeward. Once or twice Wilson saw some shadows, far off, against the extreme horizon, and pronounced them to be mounted Indians.

"The dogs are after no harm; most likely chasing game that is running for the rivers, mad for the want of water," said he.

At last we reined up our horses on the edge of the low hill, carpeted with blossomed shrubs, which overlooked the fair white house and sweet shady garden which formed Wilson's home.

"How pretty!" I exclaimed, involuntarily.

"Can you wonder," said Wilson, "that I am anxious not to leave it to the torch of the savage? What on earth are you about?"

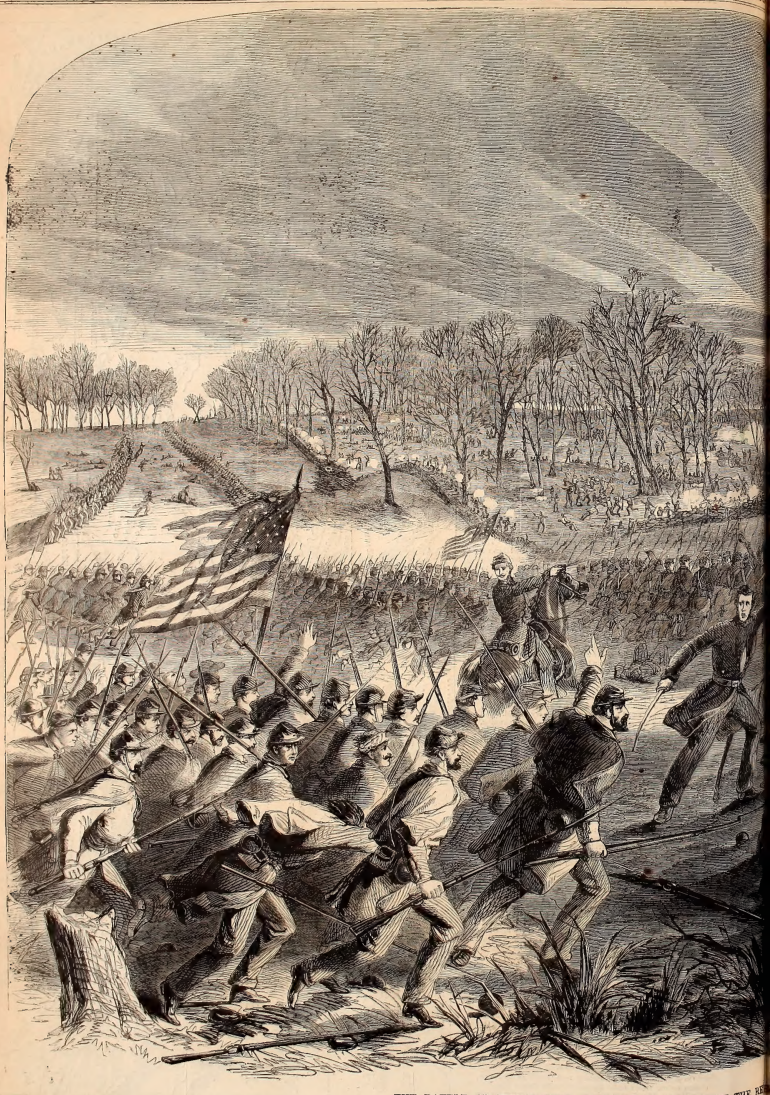


It was not I that was doing any thing remarkable. It was my horse that began to shiver, and to snort and pant, and spread his nostrils to the air, and show every sign of distress. I sprang to the ground.

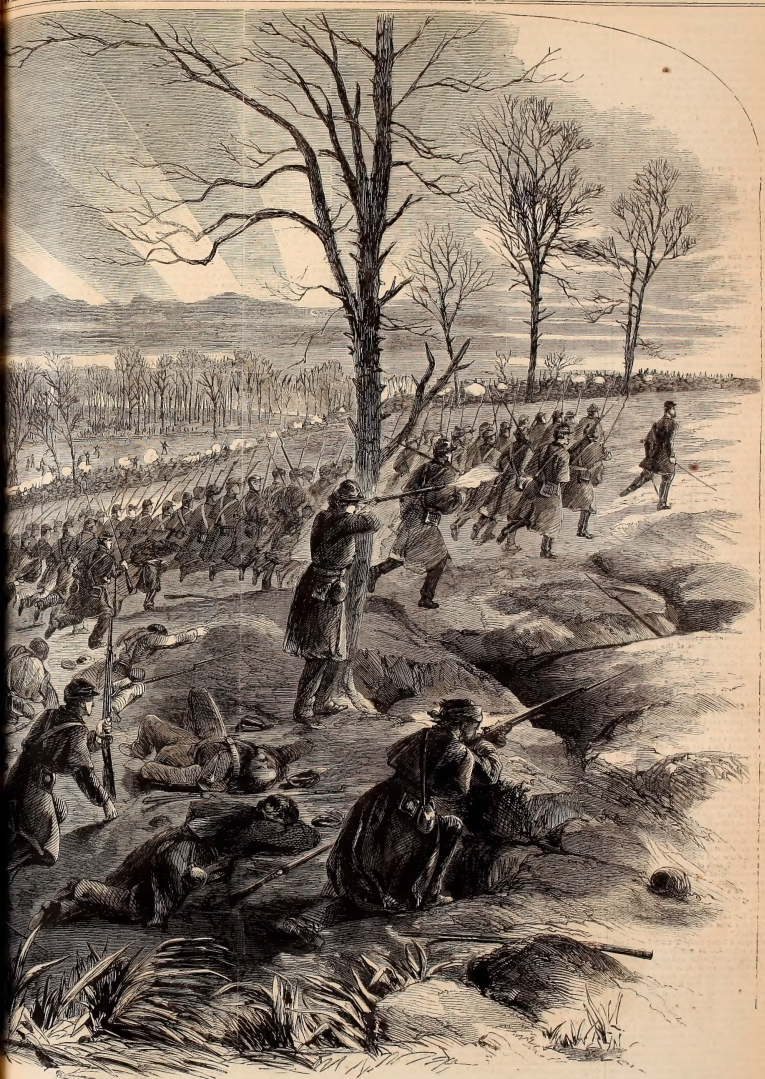
"What ails the brute?" cried Wilson. "By Heaven! mine is trembling, too, in every limb."

And he, too, dismounted. The horses, dark with heat drops, with flanks quivering, limbs shaking, showed every sign of extreme terror. They pressed whining, close to us. We also trembled till they could hardly stand. What was that? A groan, deep and thrilling as if it came from the agony of Nature herself—a sound as of a tortured Titan on the rock—came moaning sullenly past. It deepened: it swelled into a roar. The horses were down, cowering like frightened spaniels. And then we felt the solid earth heave and swell like surging water beneath us, and a swift shiver made the ground reel, and we dropped to our hands and knees. The earthquake! All was come in its terrors. What was that in the valley beneath? A great fissure was gaping in the earth, like the mouth of some devouring monster, stretching, widening fast—fast—quicker than I can describe it. We saw the dark chasm yawn like huge jaws hungry for prey. Then another black came: we were prostrate, sickened, and giddy. The moans of the horses at our side were the only sounds audible. Crash! I saw the dust rise thickly where the huts of the herdsmen had fallen in. I saw the stout stockade give way like straws in a whirlwind, and the horses and the few cattle left, crushing huddled up together. But the house stood firm, with its fair white walls of hewn stone, though the trees around were snapping and breaking, the shrubs torn up, the ground bursting as if a mine had exploded. There were loud shrieks. I saw the fluttering garments of women, the fairy figure of the two children in the verandah, the outstretched arms, the wild gestures, and I heard the despairing cry for aid. But fast toward the house extended the dreadful chasm, yawning, widening, splitting asunder the firm earth with giant force: its huge jaws opened as if to devour the home and its inmates. The sight gave new strength to the husband and father. He sprang up, though his feet could hardly cling to the heaving ground. I caught his arm and held him fast.

"Let me go!" he cried; "they call me. Let me go, or—"



In his madness, in his bitter despair, he would have struck me with his hunting-knife had I not released him. And yet by that momentary restraint I saved his life, worthless as the boon may have seemed to him, for in the next instant we were both flung helpless to the ground by a more violent shock. I glanced up: I saw the house quiver and reel; I saw the chasm open and swallow it up, with all its living inmates, and I pressed my hands upon my eyes to shut out the horrid sight. When the last shock passed away I looked again. The fissure had closed, all but a narrow rift, nearly choked with broken fragments of the ruins. Trees, bushes, earth, and stones lay heaped about in confusion. Nothing was unaltered. A few instants had changed the face of all familiar objects. Wilson lay beside me, senseless and livid. The horses were still in their agues-fit of fear. Two men only were standing unharmed where the huts of the herdsmen had stood. They were my guide and the Indian peon. Poor Wilson! he lay long ill of a brain-fever at San Juan de los Llanos, and when he recovered he was a broken man. The bodies of the dear ones he had lost were never seen more by mortal eye. His despair has done the work of years upon him, has made him what you see. The hand is wailing its last tune. Shall we walk? And, old fellow, just one more cigar!



THE BATTLE OF NEWBERN.

On page 229 we reproduce two of the sketches sent us by our artist, Mr. Angelo Wiser, with the Burnside Expedition. One of them represents the LANDING OF OUR TROOPS below the forts of Newbern, our gun-boats shelling the woods; the other, the BOMBARDMENT OF NEWBERN by the gun-boats, showing a distant view of the burning city. We gave a full account of the battle in our last paper, to which we refer.

On page 225 we show a BOMB-PROOF BATTERY AT NEWBERN, taken by our troops under General Burnside, from a sketch by Mr. Wiser. The battery is so strong, and the shelter for the gunners so thorough, that it seems incredible that our gallant fellows should have taken it with so little loss.

THE BATTLE OF WINCHESTER—DECISIVE CHARGE UPON THE RE

LS AT THE STONE WALL.—Drawn by Mr. A. Waud.—[See Page 235.]

DAYBREAK.

The dawn is breaking, day is waking,
The sun is sending forth
Its million rays of light and beauty
To gladden all the earth;
And with each ray a surge of voices,
Like the rushing of the sea,
Is pouring forth the glorious anthem,
"God has made His people free!"

Wild echoes thunder from each hill-top,
And rumble through each rocky glen;
While lake, and stream, and rushing river
Fling back with joy the glad refrain;
And from each town and crowded city,
Wherever man may be,
Again peals forth the glorious anthem,
"God has made His people free!"

From each Southern vale and hamlet
Tuneful murmurs gently roll,
Then gushes forth in tender pathos
The sweetest music of the soul;
The hearts that beat 'neath dusky bosoms
Thrill as the brightening morn they see,
And sing, like sound of rippling waters,
"De Lord hab made His people free!"

Thus the glad sound shall ever onward
Reverberate from sea to sea,
And every nation, land, and people
Shall join the exultant jubilee,
"Glory to God, for He is mighty,
Peace and good-will to man shall be;
And evermore, while time endureth,
Our God shall keep His people free!"

Lowell, April, 1862.

GENERAL BUELL.

We publish on page 225 a portrait of General D. C. Buell, who has been created a Major-General of Volunteers for his brilliant campaign in Kentucky and Tennessee.

General Buell is a native of Ohio, in which State he was born about the year 1818. He graduated at the Military Academy at West Point in 1837, and served as Second Lieutenant in the Third Infantry. He obtained the rank of First Lieutenant in June, 1846, and accompanied his regiment to Mexico. In September of the same year he was breveted Captain for gallant and meritorious conduct at Monterey. He accompanied General Scott's army, and again distinguished himself at Cerro Gordo, Contreras, and Churubusco; was severely wounded at the latter fight, and breveted Major for gallantry there. On his return home he was appointed Assistant Adjutant-General, and served in that capacity in various parts of the country. On the outbreak of the war Major Buell was active in organizing the army at Washington. On General M'Clellan's appointment to the chief command he placed General Buell in command of a division, which soon became so perfect in discipline and drill as to elicit general remark. Soon afterward it was deemed best to supersede General Sherman in the command of the army in Kentucky, and General Buell was appointed in his stead. His subsequent career is fresh in the memory of the public, and the triumphant success of his plans without the shedding of blood, the expulsion of the enemy from Kentucky, and the recovery of Tennessee, proclaim him a General of the first ability.

KIT BUTLER FROM BOONVILLE.

Some ten years ago, when travelers in Oregon suffered very severely from attacks of Indians, I was one of a party passing through that wild and unknown State, in my way to California. After a month's ride from the Willamette Valley, we diverged westward from the great emigrant trail, and found ourselves camped one evening on the trail to Crescent City, at its intersection by Deer Creek, an offshoot of the Illinois River. Our party consisted, besides myself, of two lethargic Germans, a feeble-minded young artist lately from London, and a stark taciturn hunter from Missouri. During our long journey I had tried to be companionable with each of my fellow-travelers in turn, and at last had fallen back on Kit Butler, the Missourian, with whom I gradually established terms of a smoking, not a speaking intimacy. On the evening of our encampment on Deer Creek, supper having been eaten and the horses picketed before setting the guard, each of us betook himself to his own private relaxation. This was for the German, sleep; for the artist, self-examination by help of a small glass on a comb-handle; for Kit and me, the resolving of ourselves into a vigorous smoking committee. When we had been smoking for some little time, Kit suddenly addressed me: "Mate," he said, "this hoss don't kinder fancy this har camp, he don't."

To my eyes a better camping-ground could not have been selected. It was pitched on a flat prairie, where "wood, water, and grass" were each at hand, while, at the same time, there was no cover for lurking Indians nearer than the creek—a long rifle-shot distant. But Kit, I observed, had his eye, miles and miles away, on a thin, spiral column of smoke.

"An Indian camp-fire!" I exclaimed.

"And Rogue River too near," Kit growled.

I understood him. We were camped not far from the Rogue River, and it was likely enough the fire had been lit by an outlying party of the Rogue Tribe, who had earned their sobriquet from being notoriously the most rascally Indians in all Oregon. The night, however, passed without an alarm. In the morning, the Germans' cattle, already half foundered, were found to be so badly galled by careless saddling that it was agreed we should halt for four-and-twenty hours to give the poor brutes a chance of recruiting.

Kit, who never descended to argument, made a wry face at this plan, and, catching up his rifle, prepared, as was his custom, for a hunt. I went with him, and after some hours we got within range of a herd, and shot for supper a small elk or wapiti deer. On nearing camp again we saw that our party had been joined by a young Indian lad. Equipped in a suit of dressed deerskin, with a good deal of Indian finery about him, he stood in an easy attitude by the camp fire, while our artist sketched him, and the Germans were looking on lazily. This admission of the Indian into camp was against all prairie laws, as it has been found that such visitors are invariably spies, and "trouble" is pretty sure to come of their visits. Kit, therefore, throwing down the venison, burst angrily into the group:

"I found him by the creek: I only wanted to draw him," explained the startled artist, dropping his sketching block and brush.

"Draw him!" Kit shouted, "I'll draw a bead on the young spy's carcass if he don't make tracks in less than no time. Mate!" said the ireful hunter to me, as the frightened red-skin darted across the plain, "jest fix your shooting-irons right, for we'll have 'trouble' afore long. This coon knows nought of Injuns, he don't."

Impatient to get away from our present camp, I was not sorry when the day drew to a close and we began to prepare supper. While I chopped some wood for the fire Kit cut up the carcass of the elk we had shot in the morning, and kneaded the flour for bread in the "prospecting" tin. When I had made up the fire, there was no water for the coffee. As usual, our companions had been loafing about, aiding little or nothing in the indispensable camp duties. Somewhat annoyed, I bade one of the loafers take our tin sauce-pan down to the creek to fill it. Of course there was a discussion of the lazy as to who should be at the trouble of performing this slight service. In the end, one of the Germans took the sauce-pan up, and, with an ungracious expletive, departed on his errand. My fire blazed away brightly. Kit's cake, propped up before it with a stone, was baking in the usual primitive prairie fashion, and the venison steaks, cut up into little chunks, threaded on to a peeled wand, were twirling over the embers. Still the German had not returned with the water. As, in spite of our hails, he did not emerge from the hollow of the creek, which had a steep bank considerably higher than a man, his fellow-countryman was dispatched to see what he was doing. When he in his turn had disappeared down the bank, I noticed that Kit, who sat on the ground twirling the spit, let it fall into the fire, and seemed to listen anxiously to a sound that reached only an ear quick as his. But shortly an awful shout arose. It was a heart-rending appeal for help, and I should have certainly responded to it by rushing down to the creek, but that powerful grasp of Kit, who had now risen from the ground, withheld me. Again, and this time fearfully prolonged, the cry of a man in his extremity arose, and we saw the second German struggling desperately from the creek. Even from the distance at which we stood we could perceive that during the few moments of his absence he had passed through a terrible ordeal, for his clothes, where not torn completely away, hung in strips about his person, and exposed the naked flesh, crimson with many slashes, telling that the cruel and silent knife had been at work on him. For a moment this ghastly figure extended its arms piteously toward us and uttered another cry, but fainter than before. It was his last effort. Apparently seized from behind by an unseen hand, the unfortunate man tottered for a moment, then threw up his arms, sank back, and disappeared down the creek. Kit was the first of the witnesses of this shocking tragedy to break silence. "Injuns!" he cried; but his explanation was superfluous, for as he uttered it a crowd of red-skins jumped forth from the creek, and charged down upon us with pealing whoops.

"Look to the cattle, or we'll all be rubbed out, by thunder!" shouted Kit, as we caught up our rifles. His warning was just in time. No white man's horse can brook the Indian whoop, and all those of ours that had hitherto been grazing quietly about, with their lareats dragging, galloped wildly over the prairie in full stampede, and were irrecoverably lost. Only three horses remained to us. They had luckily a short time before been hitched up to a tree near at hand. Before these terrified brutes could break away we had sprung to their heads, and effectually secured them by doubling their lassos. At first, panic-struck by the appalling sight I had just witnessed, and the critical position in which we were placed, I entertained the idea of flinging myself on to the back of one of the horses and flying for my life, but the hunter restrained me. "Do as I do, mate," he said, with an admirable coolness that completely reassured me; and in obedience to his example I took cover behind the horses, and leveled my rifle across their backs point-blank at the approaching rout of red-skins. These, who were armed chiefly with bows and arrows, observing our demonstrations, and knowing that we were not to be taken by surprise, or without a certain loss to themselves—conditions utterly opposed to all Indian ideas of warfare—gradually faltered in their pace till they came to a stand-still, and then broke and fled back to the cover of the creek in great confusion.

There being now breathing-time, I remembered the artist. Strange to say, he was nowhere to be seen; but Kit, who seemed to divine the reason of my puzzled looks, pointed up the tree beneath which we stood. I looked aloft, and dimly amidst the foliage of the cedar I descried a dangling pair of Bluchers that seemed familiar to me. They were the artist's. "Come down!" I shouted; "the Indians are gone." But my request met with no response, unless an irritable movement of the dangling boots was meant for a negative. Again I hailed them, when, as if to put an end to all further argument, they ascended higher among the branches, and were lost to sight. "Guess the scared critter's best up the cedar," said Kit, adding suddenly, as he glanced over the prairie, "Hurrah! Now, mate, saddle up right smart." And while I rapidly equipped the horses, to my astonishment he busied himself in casting upon the fire all the property lying about the camp, with the sole exception of our own rifles and revolvers. "If yon varmint git us they'll only git mean plunder," he said, grimly contemplating his work of destruction.

"The Indians in the creek, you mean?" I asked.

The hunter shook his head, and pointed southward.

Following the direction of his arm, I made out through the fast fading twilight a band of horsemen galloping right down upon us. They were mounted Indians. As doubtless they were acting in concert with those on foot in the creek, it was plain that our position was no longer tenable. I perceived that Kit was of this opinion, for he was now hastily examining our three remaining horses. They were young American cattle that I had bought on the Columbia as a speculation for the Californian market. Two of them were light, weedy-looking fillies; but the third, a powerfully-made chestnut stallion, with white feet, was by far the best of the lot.

"You will take the chestnut, he is the only horse at all up to your weight," I said to Kit, who was a seventeen stoner at least.

"Thankee, mate," he replied; "'tis kind of ye—yes, 'tis, to give up the best hoss; but I wish 'twar my ole spotted mustang. Don't kinder consate them white feet, and that eye ain't clar grit, it ain't!"

A few minutes were now wasted in endeavoring to persuade the artist to descend the tree and take the third horse; but either on account of intense fear, or a conviction of the security of his "cache," he still made no sign. As the horsemen were now fast closing in upon us, and the footmen in the creek began to show themselves, as if with a design of cutting off our retreat, we were compelled unwillingly to leave this impracticable votary of "high art" to his fate. So, mounting our horses, and driving the third one before us, we put out on the back trail.

"Hold hard, friend!" said my comrade, as the fresh young filly I rode stretched out in a slashing gallop. "If 'twur only twenty mile of good pariera from this to Van Noy Ferry thut we've got to make to save our skins, we'd throw out yon varmints right smart; but reck'lect this pariera gives out in six mile more, and we've as many mile over bad mountain range afore we git down to the open agin, that'll give these fine breeders goss!"

With horses well in hand we had ridden some little distance, when a loud whoop in our rear proclaimed that the Indians had reached our camp, but whether the demonstration proceeded from disappointment at the destruction of their anticipated prize, or rejoicing at the capture of our companion, the failing light did not permit us to judge. Soon we heard them again in pursuit. Darkness now set rapidly in, but riding as usual in Indian file, our horses accustomed for several weeks to follow the trail, picked it out with the greatest ease. As we came to the end of the prairie I was delighted to see a full moon rising over the mountains, so that we should now have light to guide us in our flight—a great chance in our favor. Kit had relapsed into his accustomed taciturnity, and beyond paying great attention to the sounds in the rear, by which he seemed to regulate our pace, he betrayed no interest in any thing. Knowing that all depended on our horses holding out, as we clattered up the first long mountain slope, I ranged alongside of him and examined their conditions. My own filly, though pretty heavily weighted, was as yet perfectly fresh, her stride was easy and elastic, and I felt she was warming well to her work. But an unpleasant sensation came over me as I noticed that Kit's chestnut was already bathed in a profuse sweat.

Now that we were fairly in the mountains our real troubles began. Three days since we had crossed this range, and having shortly before made the passage of the great Cañon Creek, a terrific pass, the trail had not appeared more dangerous than usual. But then we had leisure and daylight to aid us; now, the white metallic light of the moon, which brought out in startling distinctness each crag and rocky point it fell upon, left many dangerous bits of our path in deep obscurity; yet we were compelled to pass over them in full career, for our pursuers now began to push us to their utmost. At intervals, above the clatter of our horses' iron-shod hoofs, the mountains behind us echoed with their whoops, and were replied to from the heights around by the peculiar cry of the white owl, proceeding, as we were aware, from red sentinels, who were able to observe each turn of the chase, and thus urged their comrades still to follow. Urged by their wild riders to the top of their speed, the hardy, unshod little mustangs of our enemies scrambled after us over the dangerous trail with a cat-like facility of foothold not possessed by our own cattle. To add to our embarrassments, our third horse now began to show a desire to stray from the trail, and forced us often to lose ground by swerving to head him back again. In fact, it was all we could do to hold our own, and, desperately as our desperate need required it, we pushed on. The steep mountain-side, the other day painfully ascended, was now dashed furiously down; the edge of the precipice, usually traversed so gingerly, was spurred fiercely over, unheeding the appeals of our terrified horses, who quivered and snorted in very fear. Without drawing bridle we spattered through the mountain torrent that ran down the deep gulches, and took flying the smaller streams. When the last weary mountain-crest was topped, and we descended again to the wooded plain beneath, I should have felt myself comparatively safe had it not been for the deplorable condition of our horses. As Kit had foreseen, the mountain-range had fearfully tried them. Though my mare, with the instinct of good blood, still answered when I made a call on her, I felt she was getting fast used up; but the chestnut was in a still worse plight; his drooping crest and laboring stride told the extremity of his distress. We had just arrived at the ford of State Creek, a small arm of Rogue River, when Kit's chestnut suddenly staggered, and then plunged headlong to the ground. "Four white legs and a white nose, cut his throat and throw him to the crows!" exclaimed his rider, bitterly repeating the old saw as he vainly endeavored to raise him. Meanwhile I had ridden forward and caught the loose horse. Kit mounted him in silence, and together we entered the ford; but just before we reached the opposite bank he dismounted, and standing knee-deep in the water, put his rein into my hand.

"Mate," he said, "we're bound to part comp'ny, if we don't want to go under. Take both animals and make tracks for Van Noy; this coon 'll look out for hisself, somehow. Good-by t'ye!" And he set off wading down the creek.

I brought my horses to his side in a moment.

"No, no, Kit," I said, deeply touched by his generous proposition; "fight or fly, whichever it is, we'll keep together."

"Don't rile me, young fellar," he replied, in a voice that he vainly endeavored to render harsh, and abandoned for a tone of earnest entreaty. "I tell 'ee we must part now; it can't be fixed noways different. That thur light animal 'ud burst up under my weight long afore we made Rogue River, and yourn ain't got two mile run left in him—he ain't. Now, look h'yar, if yew want to save our skins, take both them animals—it 'll throw the Injuns off my trail—and ride hard for Van Noy. Rouse up the boys thar, and tell 'em Kit Butler from Boonville's cached in the timber by State Crick, and the red-skins are out. Guess they'll be round with their shooting-irons, and bring me in right away. Hurrah now, boy!"

A moment's reflection convinced me that Kit's plan was the only one that could possibly save us; but it was with a bitterness of heart such as I had never felt before that I shook his loyal hand—I could not speak—in token that I bade him farewell. If I acted wrongly in abandoning him, God knows that my own reflections, as I put out on my lonely trail, were almost punishment enough.

But, in reality, Kit's chances of escape were not far from being as good as my own. The plain, especially by the creek, was well wooded, so that our separation took place entirely without the knowledge of the Indians, who, though they would certainly find the foundered chestnut, would naturally conclude that its rider was away on the fresh horse. Neither would they gain any information from the hunter's tracks, for, of course, he had taken the precaution to wade some distance down the creek before he cached in the timber, and water leaves no trail. But I could not reason on all this then. I could only remember that I had left the last and best of all my comrades behind me, and that if evil came to him I should be held accountable. Deeply plunged in such maddening reflections, I had not ridden far when the report of a rifle in my rear almost caused my heart to stand still.

The Indians, then, had discovered Kit's cache. I pulled up my horses and turned round with the desperate determination of rejoining him at any hazard, when all at once I remembered, in impotent despair, that, with the exception of my bowie-knife, I was unarmed. On parting, Kit had taken possession of my rifle and revolver, remarking that, while they might be of use to him, I should ride lighter without them. All a pretext! I saw it now when too late. The noble-minded fellow had guessed that if I heard him engaged with the Indians I should return, and had thus taken measures effectually to prevent me. Utterly distraught on making this discovery, I remember little more of my ride to Van Noy Ferry. Though I rode like a madman, I must yet have acted with the soundest discretion. My horse was afterward found dead about two miles up Applegate Creek, by which the trail ran after leaving State Creek. At that point I must have mounted the second horse, and swam the creek, instead of following it up to Rogue River. Then I crossed the country in a northeasterly direction, and thus, by cutting off an angle, considerably shortened the distance. But of all this I only distinctly remember pricking along my failing horse with my bowie-knife, as the lights of the ferry came into view, till he also gave in and fell, throwing me over his head and inflicting on me no trifling injuries; and that wet, bruised, and bleeding, but still with the one fixed, irrevocable idea pervading my weakened senses, that Kit was in deadly peril for my sake, and that he must be saved, I burst into the midst of the ferry-men as they sat round their fire in their log-hut.

"Kit Butler, from Boonville!" shouted one of the rough backwoodsmen, the captain of the ferry, in reply to my wild appeal for help. "By thunder! he's jest my fust cousin; how kim yew to quit, mister, when he war in sich a tarnation fix, eh?"

"Talking won't get him out of it, man," I replied, impatiently; "either come along with me at once to help him, or give me a rifle and fresh horses and let me do what I can myself."

"We'll go—don't you fear, mister," he said, more graciously; "yon darned red-skins ain't goin' to wipe out the smartest mountain boy in all Oregon. And no 'muss' round! H'yar yew—Pete—Dave—Zack—lay hold of your shootin'-irons, boys, and git the animals out of the corral."

"Ay, ay, Cap!" was the ready response; and with astonishing quickness we were all armed and mounted on sturdy mustangs, riding hard to the rescue.

As we splashed through Applegate Creek Ford we heard a shot to the front, followed shortly by another. "Hurrah, boys!" shouted our leader; "thar goes old Kit! He ain't wiped out jest yet, nohow. Guess it'll take a caution o' red-skins to whip him. He'll make 'em see snakes and black ones at that."

In a few minutes more we debouched on to the north bank of State Creek, but not an Indian was visible. The noise of our approach had effectually scared them; they had not cared to stand the brunt of a charge of half a dozen white men. As we swept up the creek dear old Kit stepped out of his cover, his hands and face black with powder, and his forehead bleeding, but only from the splinter of a bad cap.

"You're welkim, boy!" he said, as we shook hands; "'twar getting hot, though I peppered one or two of the varmints. They got on my trail right smart when yew quit; but they ain't got me this time, I reckon."

Prudence forbade our small party from attempting the mountain-passes that night to learn the fate of our comrades, but early the next day we reached Deer Creek.

As we had anticipated, we found the two Germans dead in the creek, where the fatal ambush had been laid for them. Of the artist we could find no traces, but on our return to the ferry we found him there. Though unhurt, his plight was ludicrously doleful. The Indians had discovered him in the cedar, and it would have fared ill with him but that the sketch of the young Indian was found on his person, drawn so accurately that all his captors recognized it. Believing from this circumstance that he was a great "medicine" man whom it would be dangerous to injure, they stripped and released him.

THE BATTLE OF WINCHESTER.

WE publish on pages 232 and 233 a large picture of the BATTLE OF WINCHESTER from a sketch drawn by our special artist, Mr. A. R. Waud; and on page 225 a portrait of the hero of the day, General Shields. The Herald correspondent furnished that paper with the following graphic account of the battle:

On Saturday afternoon, March 15, at about a quarter past two o'clock, our advanced pickets on the Strasburg road discovered the rebel cavalry under the madcap Ashby about half a mile beyond them, reconnoitring the woods on both sides of the turnpike, and steadily advancing. Our pickets consisted of a few men of the Fourteenth Indiana infantry at that point, and they fell back half a mile to the hamlet of Kernstown, four miles from Winchester. The rebels, observing our pickets fall back, were confirmed in the belief that our forces here did not exceed five thousand men. They then gave chase. Coming up with our men, Ashby cried at the top of his voice, "There they are, boys; now give them hell!" Steadily did the troopers advance as our men wheeled to aim and fire. That fire sent many of them reeling from their saddles, and threw the rest into such confusion that before they could again be rallied for a charge our gallant little band of infantry was beyond the reach of their power, without having lost a man killed or wounded. Meanwhile skirmishing progressed on other points along our advanced line, and our pickets were every where rallying on our reserves. General Shields hearing of the advance of the rebel cavalry, supposed it to be a manœuvre of Ashby alone for the purpose of watching our movements. As they were approaching so boldly and so closely, however, he ordered four advanced companies of infantry, engaged in protecting the supply train, to rally to the support of the more advanced pickets, and try to hold the rebels in check till he could move down the division. These four companies were made up of one from the Maryland First, one from the Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania, one from the Forty-sixth Pennsylvania, and one from the Twenty-eighth New York. Their regiments had already marched under General Williams. A battery of artillery was also ordered forward, and General Shields, after ordering out the division, rode to the front, accompanied by his staff. While engaged directing the fire of the artillery and the defense generally, a shell from the rebel battery of four guns, which now began to play on us, burst near him, and a splinter from it struck him in the left arm, just above the elbow, fracturing the bone and creating a painful wound. His Adjutant-General, Major Armstrong, who was standing near, remarked, "General, you are wounded in the arm." "Yes," replied the gallant Shields, "but say nothing about it." He then gave a fresh order to the artillery, and continued on the field till he satisfied himself that all was right. A man belonging to Captain Robinson's company of Ohio artillery and a horse were killed on this day by the enemy's guns; but these were all the casualties that occurred on our side till the skirmish of the first day was ended. The wound of General Shields caused a pang throughout the entire division, and it is remarkable that he should have been the first man struck on our side. Our division began to arrive in force on the field toward dark, and the rebels perceiving this did not push their advance, but halted about three miles from Winchester for the night, lighted their camp fires and bivouacked, while our army lay between them and the town. It was generally believed that a general engagement would take place on the next day (Sunday), and the expectants were not disappointed. That night was one of terrible suspense on both sides. No one knew what the rebels delayed their advance for, while it was our policy to postpone a battle, in view of the preponderating force of the enemy, in order to allow reinforcements to arrive from the division of General Williams, the rear-guard of which had already advanced ten miles toward the Shenandoah.

Morning explained the reason of the enemy's halt. About ten o'clock reinforcements of five regiments of infantry and two batteries of artillery were announced arriving from Strasburg, under General Garnett, by the vociferous and prolonged cheers which proceeded from their lines. The attack was not now long delayed. The enemy advanced his army, which now consisted of sixteen regiments of infantry, numbering 11,000 men; five batteries of artillery, with a total of twenty-eight field-pieces, and three battalions of horse, under Ashby and Stewart. His line of battle extended about a mile on the right of the village of Kernstown, and a mile and three-quarters on the left of it, and the village lay on the road between the rebel right and centre. There is a mud road branching from the turnpike a mile or so from Winchester, to the right of the road as you go to Strasburg. This road passed through the left of the enemy's centre, and was one of their points of defense. Beyond that there is a grove of trees, and farther a ridge of hills with a stone wall running along its summit about breast-high. This was the rebel line of offense and defense on the right of our line. Our most advanced regiment was the Eighth Ohio, of General Tyler's brigade, and on it the rebels made a furious onslaught about half past ten o'clock A.M. on Sunday, with the intention of turning our right flank. The Ohio Eighth met them gallantly, withering them like autumn leaves before the breath of winter by their deadly fire of rifles. Five several times did the enemy emerge from the woods and from behind their stone parapet with vastly superior numbers, and try vainly to accomplish their object. Our left wing, consisting of the Thirteenth Indiana, Seventh Ohio, and a battery of the Fourth Regular Artillery, under Captain Jenks, had a feint made on it while the real attack of the enemy was being directed against our right wing. The feint on the left was a heavy fire of artillery posted on both sides of the village and the turnpike, which, however, did trifling damage. Our battery replied, silencing those of the enemy, though the firing was well maintained for a long time on both sides. Our centre consisted of the Fourteenth Indiana, the Eighth and Sixty-seventh Ohio, and the Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania, and two artillery batteries belonging to the First Ohio Artillery, and the cavalry, consisting of the First Michigan and First Ohio, were drawn up in the rear. The whole of our cavalry amounted to no more than 800 men, and this arm played a very unimportant part in the action on either side. Our right wing was made up of the Fifth and Eighth Ohio regiments, and a battery of the First Virginia Regiment. The reserves consisted of the Twelfth Indiana, the Thirty-ninth Illinois, and a squadron of the Michigan Cavalry. General Shields was unable to appear on the field in person, and the command in the field devolved upon Acting Brigadier Kimball, who led our centre; and our right was commanded by Acting Brigadier-General Tyler, while Colonel Sullivan directed the operations on our left. The battle raged along the whole line with great fury from eleven A.M. till half past two P.M., when General Shields, who received accounts of the progress of the fight on his couch, ordered the right, where the contest raged the hottest, to charge upon the enemy. That was an awful charge. The left of the enemy prepared desperately to repel our gallant troops, but their rush was as irresistible as the tide in the Bay of Fundy. Previous to this time our line of battle had been somewhat changed. The Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania reinforced our right, and also a battery of artillery. Our whole force now engaged was about 6000 men, while that of the enemy was at the lowest estimate 8000. The rebels had also changed their line, and extending both their wings, presented a concave front to our army. They had also reinforced their left wing, and the charge to be made by our right was all-important in its consequences. On it at three o'clock depended the fate of the entire battle. The gallant Tyler led the charge, sword in hand, at the head of the line. The rebels fired from the woods with artillery and small-arms, while our men advanced against their murderous showers of lead and iron, returning few shots, and reserving their fire. Up to this time the armies had not been much nearer to each other than three hundred yards, unless in some few instances. The wood was soon cleared at the point of the bayonet, our men discharging their pieces at twenty and even five yards' distance from the rebels, and then dashing at them with the bayonet. The rebels fought well, however. They contested the ground foot by foot, and marked every yard of it with blood. Retiring behind their stone wall on the ridge, our men jumped over after them, and drove them along in the greatest confusion and with fearful slaughter upon their centre. The panic communicated. Kimball ordered a charge along the whole line, and for a short time the fighting was most desperate. The roar of the cannon was no longer heard, unless in occasional bursts of fitful explosions, and the rattle of musketry was more boisterous than ever, and sounded like the noise made by a very close thunder-clap, except that it was sharper and continuous. The rout of the rebels had fairly commenced, however, and two of their guns and four caissons were now ours, and though many of them turned and fired again and again at our pursuing host, many more threw away muskets and bayonets without hesitation. Darkness and the extreme fatigue of our troops, however, saved the enemy for the time, and we retired about two miles, and bivouacked till next morning. At daybreak General Shields ordered the rebel position to be attacked, and the enemy, after replying by a few shots from his artillery, continued his retreat. Meantime General Banks, who had been at Harper's Ferry, arrived, and taking command of the troops in person, continued the pursuit with about 10,000 men beyond Strasburg, cutting off many stragglers, and pressing the enemy very sorely.

Our artist thus describes his picture:

The rebel position was a parallelogram, inclosed by a stone wall on two sides and a rail fence and thicket of trees on the other. In the picture the front of the wall is seen crossing the ground from right to left, the thicket being visible in the distance on the rise. In front of this wall our troops had to advance across a field of wheat for 400 yards, exposed to a galling fire, but with invincible courage they carried it, the rebels retreating in a panic as soon as the wall was reached.

One or two was bayoneted, and there was a fist-fight for a moment between one of them and a soldier of the Union force—the rest fled in confusion, hotly pursued by Tyler's brigade; and two guns, hitherto masked, opened upon our men from a small clump of trees seen in the centre of the lot. These were quickly captured by a brave few, headed by Major Schreiber, of Banks's staff, and then the rout was complete, night only saving the rebels from the fierce pursuit to which they were subjected. Most of the men killed at the stone wall were shot in the head, some of the bullets passing through two men before their work of death was over. The precision of the Union men's fire was unprecedented in the annals of modern warfare.

GENERAL JAMES SHIELDS, of the United States Volunteers, the hero of the battle, is a native of Ireland, but a citizen of Illinois, where he lived for many years. At the outbreak of the Mexican War he offered his services to the Government, and rose to the rank of Brigadier-General of Volunteers. He accompanied General Scott on his expedition, and for gallant and meritorious conduct at Cerro Gordo was breveted Major-General of Volunteers. In the Valley of Mexico he commanded a brigade in which the New York and the South Carolina regiments fought side by side. He was severely wounded at the Battle of Chapultepec. After the war General Shields retired into private life; but in 1849 he was elected Senator from Illinois, and filled the post till 1855. He then removed to California, where he was residing when the rebellion broke out. He was offered service in the army and instantly accepted it, and now commands the division which was led by the late General Lander.

The following letter from General Shields, to a friend in Washington, gives the General's informal account of the battle of Winchester:

HEAD-QUARTERS GENERAL SHIELDS'S DIVISION,
WINCHESTER, VIRGINIA, March 26, 1862.

I will give you a brief account of our late operations. My reconnoissance beyond Strasburg, on the 18th and 19th inst., discovered Jackson reinforced, in a strong position, near New Market, within supporting distance of the main body of the rebels under Johnston. It was necessary to decoy him from that position. Therefore I fell back rapidly to Winchester on the 20th, as if in retreat, marching my whole command nearly thirty miles in one day. My force was placed at night in a secluded position, two miles from Winchester, on the Martinsburg road. On the 21st the rebel cavalry, under Ashby, showed themselves to our pickets, within sight of Winchester.

On the 22d all of General Banks's command, with the exception of my division, evacuated Winchester, en route for Centreville. This movement and the masked position of my division made an impression upon the inhabitants, some of whom were in secret communication with the enemy, that our army had left, and that nothing remained but a few regiments to garrison this place. Jackson was signalized to this effect. I saw their signals and divined their meaning. About five o'clock on the afternoon of the 22d Ashby, believing that the town was almost evacuated, attacked our pickets and drove them in. This success increased his delusion. It became necessary, however, to repulse them for the time being. I therefore ordered forward a brigade, and placed it in front, between Winchester and the enemy. I only let them see, however, two regiments of infantry, two batteries of artillery, and a small force of cavalry, which he mistook as the whole force left to garrison and protect the place.

In a little skirmish that evening, while placing the artillery in position, I was struck by a fragment of a shell, which broke my arm above the elbow, injured my shoulder, and damaged me otherwise to such an extent that I have lain prostrate ever since. I commenced making preparations for any emergency that might occur that night or the next morning. Under cover of the night I ordered an entire brigade (Kimball's) to take up a strong position in advance. I pushed forward four batteries, having them placed in a strong position to support the infantry. I placed Sullivan's brigade on both flanks, to prevent surprise, and to keep my flanks from being turned; and I held Tyler's brigade in reserve, to operate against any point that might be assailed in front. In this position I awaited and expected the enemy's attack next morning. My advance brigade was two miles from the town, its pickets extending perhaps a mile farther along the turnpike leading to Strasburg.

About eight o'clock in the morning I sent forward two experienced officers to reconnoitre the front and report indications of the enemy. They returned in an hour, reporting no enemy in sight except Ashby's force of cavalry, infantry, and artillery, which by this time had become familiar and contemptible to us. General Banks, who was yet here in person, upon hearing this report, concluded that Jackson could not be in front possibly, or be decoyed away so far from the main body of the rebel army. In this opinion I, too, began to concur, concluding that Jackson was too sagacious to be caught in such a trap. General Banks therefore left for Washington. His Staff officers were directed to follow the same day, by way of Centreville. Knowing the crafty enemy, however, I had to deal with I omitted no precaution. My whole force was concentrated, and prepared to support Kimball's brigade, which was in advance.

About half past ten o'clock it became evident we had a considerable force before us; but the enemy still concealed himself so adroitly in the woods that it was impossible to estimate it. I ordered a portion of the artillery forward, to open fire and unmask them. By degrees they began to show themselves. They planted battery after battery in strong position, on the centre and on both flanks. Our artillery responded, and this continued until about half past three o'clock in the afternoon, when I directed a column of infantry to carry a battery on their left flank and to assail that flank, which was done promptly and splendidly by Tyler's brigade, aided by some regiments from the other brigades. The fire of our infantry was so close and destructive that it made havoc in their ranks. The result was the capture of their guns on the left and the forcing back of their wing on the centre, thus placing them in a position to be routed by a general attack, which was made about five o'clock by all the infantry, and succeeded in driving them in flight from the field.

Night fell upon us at this stage, leaving us in possession of the field of battle, two guns, and four caissons, three hundred prisoners, and about one thousand stand of small-arms. Our killed in this engagement can not exceed one hundred men, wounded two hundred and thirty-three. The enemy's killed and wounded exceed one thousand. The inhabitants of the adjacent villages carried them to their houses as they were removed from the field of battle. Houses between the battle-field and Strasburg, and even far beyond, have since been found filled with the dead and dying of the enemy. Graves have been discovered far removed from the road, where the inhabitants of the country buried them as they died.

General Banks, in his pursuit of the enemy beyond Strasburg afterward, found houses on the road twenty-two miles from the battle-field filled in this manner, and presenting the most ghastly spectacle. The havoc made in the ranks of the rebels has struck this whole region of country with terror. Such a blow had never fallen on them before, and it is more crushing because wholly unexpected. Jackson and his stone-wall brigade, and all the other brigades accompanying him, will never meet this division again in battle.

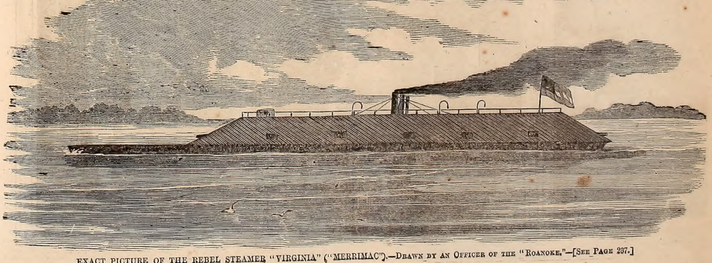
GENERAL POPE'S ARMY AT NEW MADRID.

WE devote page 228 to illustrations of GENERAL POPE'S ARMY AT NEW MADRID, together with a portrait of GENERAL POPE—the whole from drawings by our special artist, Mr. Alexander Simplot.

General John Pope was born in Kentucky, about the year 1822. He entered the Military Academy at West Point in 1838, and graduated in 1842 as Second-Lieutenant of Topographical Engineers. He was in the Mexican war, and at Monterey so distinguished himself that he obtained his First-Lieutenancy. Again at Buena Vista he won laurels and the brevet rank of Captain. He was still a Captain when the rebellion broke out, and was one of the officers appointed by the War Department to escort President Lincoln to Washington. He was loyal, and was soon after the inauguration appointed to a command in the Northwest. For some time he served gallantly in Northern Missouri, under Generals Frémont and Hunter. General Halleck gave him command of a separate expedition in December. He started from Commerce, Missouri, with a well-appointed command of some 12,000 men, and marched over to New Madrid, then occupied by the rebels. He took the place, now holds it, and has erected batteries all along the west bank of the river for fifteen miles.

The following extract from his official report will serve to explain our illustrations:

I arrived before New Madrid with the forces under my command on Monday, the 3d inst. I found the place occupied by five regiments of infantry and several companies of artillery. One bastioned earth-work, mounting fourteen heavy guns, about half a mile below the town, and another irregular work at the upper end of the town, mounting seven pieces of heavy artillery, together with lines of intrenchments between them, constituted the defensive works. Six gun-boats, carrying from four to eight heavy guns each, were anchored along the shore, between the upper and lower redoubts.

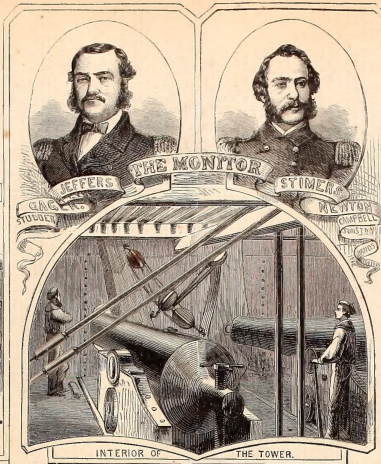


The country is perfectly level for miles around the place, and as the river was so high that the guns of the gun-boats looked directly over the banks, the approaches to the town for several miles were commanded by direct and cross fire from at least sixty guns of heavy calibre.

As soon as I found that it would be necessary to await the arrival of our heavy guns, I determined to occupy some point on the river below, and establish our small guns, if possible, in such position as to blockade the river so far as transports were concerned, and to cut off supplies and reinforcements for the enemy from below.

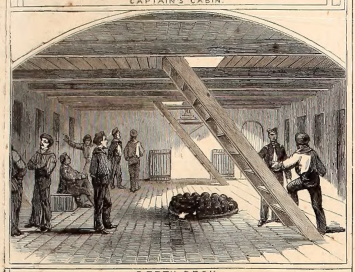
Point Pleasant, twelve miles below, was selected as being a rich agricultural region, and being the terminus of the plank-road from the interior of Arkansas. I accordingly threw forward Colonel Plummer, Eleventh Missouri, to that point, with three regiments of infantry, three companies of cavalry, and a field battery of 10-pound Parrott and rifled guns, with orders to make a lodgment on the river bank, to line the banks with rifle-pits for a thousand men, and to establish his artillery in sunk batteries of single pieces between the rifle-pits.

On 11th the siege guns arrived, and on the night of the 13th the rebels evacuated New Madrid.



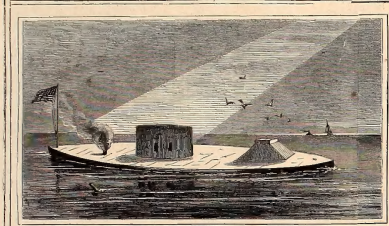
General Pope has since been endeavoring to cross the river in order to get in the rear of the rebels.

EXACT PICTURE OF THE REBEL STEAMER "VIRGINIA" ("MERRIMAC").—DRAWN BY AN OFFICER OF THE "ROANOKE."—[SEE PAGE 237.]

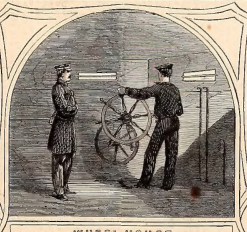


CAPTAIN'S CABIN.

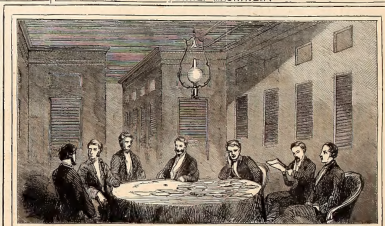
INTERIOR OF THE TOWER.



ENGINE-ROOM

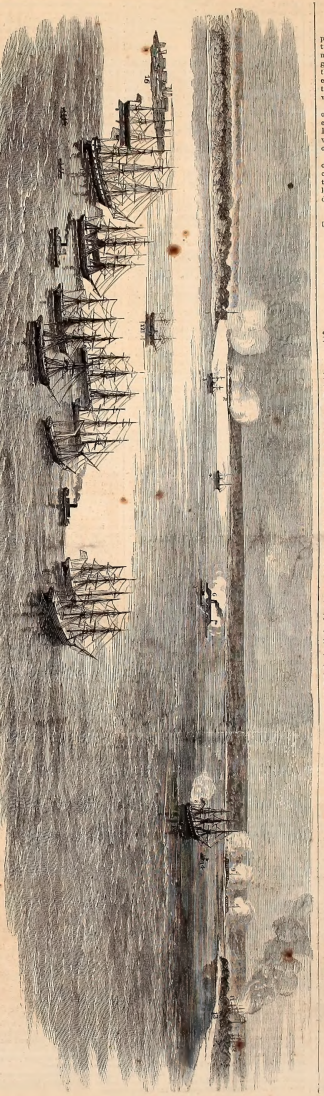


BERTH DECK.



TURRET MACHINERY

READY FOR ACTION.



WHEEL HOUSE

WARD-ROOM

THE "MONITOR" AS SHE IS—INTERIOR AND EXTERIOR.—SKETCHED BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—[SEE PAGE 237.]

THE BATTLE BETWEEN THE "MONITOR" AND THE "MERRIMAC," IN HAMPTON ROADS, MARCH 9, 1862.—[DRAWN BY SERGEANT CHARLES WORRET, TWENTIETH REGIMENT NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS.]

1. Bowen's Point Battery, 20 Guns.—2. Congress Island Battery, 45 Guns.—3. Yorktown.—4. Jamestown.—5. Monitor.—6. Merrimac.—7. Large Rebel Camp.—8. Minnesota aground.—9. Fox Point Battery.—10. Rocket Point Battery.—11. Bursting of the Columbiad.—12. The Cumberland sunk.—13. Newport News Point and Camp.—14. St. Luciens.—15. Hampton.—16. Big Bethel.—17. Fortress Monroe.—18. Steamboats.

THE FIGHT AT HAMPTON ROADS OF MARCH 9.

For future reference we publish on this page a picture of the BATTLE OF HAMPTON ROADS between the Monitor and the Merrimac, from a sketch made at the time by Sergeant Worret, of the Topographical Engineers. This sketch was taken at the time the fight was going on, and is accurate in every particular. As a faithful representation of the most remarkable naval fight of modern times, we think our readers will be glad to see it.

On the preceding page we give a page of views of the INTERIOR OF THE "MONITOR," from sketches drawn by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis. They will be seen with pleasure every where. They were shown by Mr. Davis to the officers of the Monitor, and approved by them.

We likewise give, on page 236, an exact picture of the Merrimac, drawn very carefully by an officer of the Roanoke. It will be seen that the picture differs somewhat from those heretofore published. The beak or prow is not seen, being under water.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "HEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN McLENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER IX.

THREE months passed. During that time Frank remained in London, pursuing his new duties, and writing occasionally to report himself to Mr. Vanstone, as he had promised.

His letters were not enthusiastic on the subject of mercantile occupations. He described himself as being still painfully loose in his figures. He was also more firmly persuaded than ever—now when it was unfortunately too late—that he preferred engineering to trade. In spite of this confession; in spite of headaches, caused by sitting on a high stool and stooping over ledgers in unwholesome air; in spite of want of society, and hasty breakfasts, and bad dinners at chop-houses, his attendance at the office was regular, and his diligence at the desk unremitting. The head of the department in which he was working might be relieved to, if any corroboration of this statement was desired. Such was the general tenor of the letters, and Frank's correspondent and Frank's father differed ever them as widely as usual. Mr. Vanstone accepted them, as proofs of the steady development of industrious principles in the writer. Mr. Chirk took his own characteristically opposite view. "These London men," said the philosopher, "are not to be trifled with by halves. They have got Frank by the scruff of the neck—he can't wriggle himself free—and he makes a merit of yielding to sheer necessity."

The three months' interval of Frank's probation in London passed less cheerfully than usual in the household at Combe-Raven.

As the summer came nearer and nearer, Mrs. Vanstone's spirits, in spite of her resolute efforts to control them, became more and more depressed. "I do my best," she said to Miss Garth; "I act an example of cheerfulness to my husband and my children; but I dread July." Norah's secret misgivings on her sister's account rendered her more than usually serious and uncommunicative as the year advanced.

Even Mrs Vanstone, when July drew nearer, lost something of his elasticity of spirit. He kept up appearances in his wife's presence, but on all other occasions there was now a perceptible shade of sadness in his look and manner. Magdalen was so changed since Frank's departure that she helped the general depression instead of relieving it. All her movements had grown languid; all her usual occupations were pursued with the same weary indifference; she spent hours alone in her own room; she lost her interest in being brightly and prettily dressed; her eyes were heavy, her nerves were irritable, her complexion was altered visibly for the worse—in one word, she had become an oppression and a weariness to herself and to all about her. Steadily as Miss Garth contended with these growing domestic difficulties, her own spirits suffered in the effort. Her memory reverted oftener and oftener to the March morning when the master and mistress of the house had departed for London, and when the first serious change for many a year past had stolen over the family atmosphere. When was that atmosphere to be clear again? When were the clouds of change to pass off before the returning sunshine of past and happier times?

The spring and the early summer were away. The dreaded month of July came, with its airless nights, its cheerless mornings, and its sultry days.

On the fifteenth of the month an event happened which took every one but Norah by surprise. For the second time, without the slightest apparent reason—for the second time, without a word of warning beforehand—Frank suddenly reappeared at his father's cottage!

Mr. Clare's first question to frail his son's return, in the old character of the "bad shilling;" and closed again without uttering a word. There was a portentous composure in Frank's manner which showed that he had other news to communicate than the news of his dismissal. He answered his father's sardonic look of inquiry by at once explaining that a very important proposal for his future benefit had been made to him that morning at the office. His first idea had been to communicate the details in writing; but the partners had, on reflection, thought that the necessary decision might be more readily obtained by a personal interview with his father and his friends. He had laid aside the pen accordingly, and had resigned himself to the railway on the spot.

"HE MIGHT MARRY ME."

After this preliminary statement, Frank proceeded to describe the proposal which his employers had addressed to him, with every external appearance of viewing it in the light of an intolerable hardship.

The great firm in the City had obviously made a discovery in relation to their clerk, exactly similar to the discovery which had formerly forced itself on the engineer in relation to his pupil. The young man, as they politely phrased it, stood in need of some special stimulant to stir him up. His employers (acting under a sense of their obligation to the gentleman by whom Frank had been recommended) had considered the question carefully, and had decided that the one promising use to which they could put Mr. Francis Clare was to send him forthwith into another quarter of the globe.

As a consequence of this decision, it was now, therefore, proposed that he should enter the house of their correspondents in China; that he should remain there, familiarizing himself thoroughly on the spot with the tea-trade and the silk trade for five years; and that he should return, at the expiration of this period, to the central establishment in London. If he made a fair use of his opportunities in China, he would come back, while still a young man, fit for a position of trust and emolument, and justified in looking forward at no distant date to a time when the House would assist him to start in business for himself. Such were the new prospects which—to adopt Mr. Clare's theory—now forced themselves on the ever-reluctant, ever-helpless, and ever-ungrateful Frank. There was no time to be lost. The final answer was to be at the office on "Monday, the twentieth;" the correspondents in China were to be written to by the mail on that day, and Frank was to follow the letter by the next opportunity, or to resign his chance in favor of some more enterprising young man.

Mr. Clare's reception of this extraordinary news was startling in the extreme. The glorious prospect of his son's banishment to China appeared to turn his brain. The firm pedestal of his philosophy sank under him; the prejudices of society recovered their hold on his mind. He seized Frank by the arm, and actually accompanied him to Combe-Raven in the amazing character of a visitor to the house!

"Here I am with my lout," said Mr. Clare, before a word could be uttered by the astonished family. "Hear his story all of you. It has reconciled me, for the first time in my life, to the anomaly of his existence." Frank ruefully narrated the Chinese proposal for the second time, and attempted to attach to it his own supplementary statement of objections and difficulties. His father stopped him at the first word, pointed peremptorily southeastward (from Somersetshire to China), and said, without an instant's hesitation, "Go!" Mr. Vanstone, basking in golden visions of his young friend's future, echoed that monosyllabic decision with all his heart. Mrs. Vanstone, Miss Garth, even Norah herself, spoke to the same purpose. Frank was petrified by an absolute unanimity of opinion which he had not anticipated; and Magdalen was caught, for once in her life, at the end of all her resources.

So far as practical results were concerned, the sitting of the family council began and ended with the general opinion that Frank must go. Mr. Vanstone's faculties were so bewildered by the son's sudden arrival, the father's unexpected visit, and the news they both brought with them, that he petitioned for an adjournment, before the necessary arrangements connected with his young friend's departure were considered in detail. "Suppose we all sleep upon it?" he said. "To-morrow our heads will feel a little steadier; and to-morrow will be time enough to decide all uncertainties." This suggestion was readily adopted, and all further proceedings stood adjourned until the next day.

That next day was destined to decide more uncertainties than Mr. Vanstone dreamed of.

Early in the morning, after making tea by herself as usual, Miss Garth took her parasol, and strolled into the garden. She had slept ill; and ten minutes in the open air before the family assembled at breakfast might help to compensate her, as she thought, for the loss of her night's rest.

She wandered to the outermost boundary of the flower-garden, and then returned by another path, which led back past the side of an ornamental summer-house commanding a view over the fields from a corner of the lawn. A slight noise—like, and yet not like, the chirruping of a bird—caught her ear as she approached the side of the summer-house. She stepped round to the entrance, looked in, and discovered Magdalen and Frank seated close together. To Miss Garth's horror, Magdalen's arm was unmistakably round Frank's neck; and, worse still, the position of her face at the moment of discovery showed, beyond all doubt, that she had just been offering to the victim of Chinese commerce the first and foremost of all the consolations which a woman can bestow on a man. In plainer words, she had just given Frank a kiss.

In the presence of such an emergency as now confronted her Miss Garth felt instinctively that all ordinary phrases of reproof would be phrases thrown way.

"I presume," she remarked, addressing Magdalen with the merciless self-possession of a middle-aged lady, unprovided for the occasion with any kissing remembrances of her own—"I presume (whatever excuses your effrontery may suggest) you will not deny that my duty compels me to mention what I have just seen to your father?"

"I will save you the trouble," replied Magdalen, composedly. "I will mention it to him myself."

With those words she looked round at Frank, standing trebly helpless in a corner of the summer-house. "You shall hear what happens," she said, with her bright smile. "And so shall you," she added for Miss Garth's especial benefit, as she sauntered past the governess on her way back to the breakfast-table. The eyes of Miss Garth followed her indignantly; and Frank slipped out, on his side, at that favorable opportunity.

Under these circumstances, there was but one course that any respectable woman could take—she could only shudder. Miss Garth registered her protest in that form, and then returned to the house.

When breakfast was over, and when Mr. Vanstone's hand descended to his pocket in search of his cigar-case, Magdalen rose, looked significantly at Miss Garth, and followed her father into the hall.

"Papa," she said, "I want to speak to you this morning—in private."

"Ay! ay!" returned Mr. Vanstone. "What about, my dear?"

"About—" Magdalen hesitated, searched for a satisfactory form of expression, and found it. "About business, papa," she said.

Mr. Vanstone took his garden hat from the hall-table—opened his eyes in mute perplexity—attempted to associate in his mind the two extravagantly dissimilar ideas of Magdalen and "business"—failed—and led the way resignedly into the garden.

His daughter took his arm, and walked with him to a shady seat at a convenient distance from the house. She dusted the seat with her smart silk apron before her father occupied it. Mr. Vanstone was not accustomed to such an extraordinary act of attention as this. He sat down, looking more puzzled than ever. Magdalen immediately placed herself on his knee, and rested her head comfortably on his shoulder.

"Am I heavy, papa?" she asked.

"Yes, my dear, you are," said Mr. Vanstone, "but not too heavy for me. Stop on your perch, if you like it. Well? And what may this business happen to be?"

"It begins with a question."

"Ah, indeed? That doesn't surprise me. Business with your sex, my dear, always begins with questions. Go on."

"Papa, do you ever intend allowing me to be married?"

Mr. Vanstone's eyes opened wider and wider. The question, to use his own phrase, completely staggered him.

"This is business with a vengeance!" he said. "Why, Magdalen: what have you got in that harum-scarum head of yours now?"

"I don't exactly know, papa. Will you answer my question?"

"I will if I can, my dear; you rather stagger me. Well, I don't know. Yes; I suppose I must let you be married one of these days—if we can find a good husband for you. How hot your face is! Lift it up, and let the air blow over it. You won't? Well—have your own way. If talking of business means tickling your cheek against my whisker, I've nothing to say against it. Go on, my dear. What's the next question? Come to the point!"

She was far too genuine a woman to do any thing of the sort. She skirted round the point, and calculated her distance to the nicety of a hair's-breadth.

"We were all very much surprised yesterday—were we not, papa? Frank is wonderfully lucky, isn't he?"

"He's the luckiest dog I ever came across," said Mr. Vanstone. "But what has that got to do with this business of yours? I dare say you see your way, Magdalen. Hang me if I can see mine!"

She skirted a little nearer.

"I suppose he will make his fortune in China?" she said. "It's a long way off, isn't it? Did you observe, papa, that Frank looked sadly out of spirits yesterday?"

"I was so surprised by the news," said Mr. Vanstone, "and so staggered by the sight of old Clare's sharp nose in my house, that I didn't much notice. Now you remind me of it—yes. I don't think Frank took kindly to his own good luck; not kindly at all."

"Do you wonder at that, papa?"

"Yes, my dear; I do, rather."

"Don't you think it's hard to be sent away for five years, to make your fortune among hateful savages, and lose sight of your friends at home for all that long time? Don't you think Frank will miss us sadly? Don't you, papa?—don't you?"

"Gently, Magdalen! I'm a little too old for those long arms of yours to throttle me in fun.—You're right, my love. Nothing in this world without a drawback. Frank will miss his friends in England; there's no denying that."

"You always liked Frank. And Frank always liked you."

"Yes, yes—a good fellow; a quiet, good fellow. Frank and I have always got on smoothly together."

"You have got on like father and son, haven't you?"

"Certainly, my dear."

"Perhaps you will think it harder on him when he has gone than you think it now?"

"Likely enough, Magdalen; I don't say no."

"Perhaps you will wish he had stopped in England? Why shouldn't he stop in England, and do as well as if he went to China?"

"My dear, he has no prospects in England. I wish he had, for his own sake. I wish the lad well, with all my heart."

"May I wish him well too, papa—with all my heart?"

"Certainly, my love—your old play-fellow—why not? What's the matter? God bless my soul, what is the girl crying about? One would think Frank was transported for life. You goose! You know, as well as I do, he is going to China to make his fortune."

"He doesn't want to make his fortune—he might do much better."

"The deuce he might! How, I should like to know?"

"I'm afraid to tell you. I'm afraid you'll laugh at me. Will you promise not to laugh at me?"

"Any thing to please you, my dear. Yes; I promise. Now then, out with it! How might Frank do better?"

"He might marry Me."

If the summer scene which then spread before Mr. Vanstone's eyes had suddenly changed to a dreary winter view—if the trees had lost all their leaves, and the green fields had turned white with snow, in an instant, his face could hardly have expressed greater amazement than it displayed when his daughter's faltering voice spoke those four last words. He tried to look at her, but she steadily refused him the opportunity: she kept her face hidden over his shoulder. Was she in earnest? His cheek, still wet with her tears, answered for her. There was a long pause of silence; she waited—with unaccustomed patience, she waited for him to speak. He roused himself, and spoke these words only: "You surprise me, Magdalen; you surprise me more than I can say."

At the altered tone of his voice—altered to a quiet, fatherly seriousness—Magdalen's arms clung round him closer than before.

"Have I disappointed you, papa?" she asked, faintly. "Don't say I have disappointed you! Who am I to tell my secret to, if not to you? Don't let him go—don't! don't! You will break his heart. He is afraid to tell his father; he is even afraid you might be angry with him. There is nobody to speak for us, except—except me. Oh, don't let him go! Don't for his sake—" she whispered the next words in a kiss—"don't for Mine!"

Her father's kind face saddened; he sighed, and patted her fair head tenderly. "Hush, my love," he said, almost in a whisper; "hush!" She little knew what a revelation every word, every action that escaped her, now opened before him. She had made him her grown-up play-fellow from her childhood to that day. She had romped with him in her frocks, she had gone on romping with him in her gowns. He had never been long enough separated from her to have the external changes in his daughter forced on his attention. His artless, fatherly experience of her had taught him that she was a taller child in later years, and had taught him little more. And now, in one breathless instant, the conviction that she was a woman rushed over his mind. He felt it in the trouble of her bosom pressed against his; in the nervous thrill of her arms clasped round his neck. The Magdalen of his innocent experience a woman—with the master-passion of her sex in possession of her heart already!

"Have you thought long of this, my dear?" he asked, as soon as he could speak composedly.

"Are you sure—?"

She answered the question before he could finish it.

"Sure I love him?" she said. "Oh, what words can say Yes for me as I want to say it! I love him—!" Her voice faltered softly, and her answer ended in a sigh.

"You are very young. You and Frank, my love, are both very young."

She raised her head from his shoulder for the first time. The thought and its expression flashed from her at the same moment.

"Are we much younger than you and mamma were?" she asked, smiling through her tears.

She tried to lay her head back in its old position, but as she spoke those words her father caught her round the waist—forced her, before she was aware of it, to look him in the face—and kissed her, with a sudden outburst of tenderness which brought the tears thronging back thickly into her eyes. "Not much younger, my child," he said, in low, broken tones—"not much younger than your mother and I were." He put her away from him, and rose from the seat, and turned his head aside quickly. "Wait here, and compose yourself; I will go indoors and speak to your mother." His voice trembled over those parting words, and he left her without once looking round again.

She waited—waited a weary time; and he never came back. At last her growing anxiety urged her to follow him into the house. A new timidity throbbed in her heart as she doubtingly approached the door. Never had she seen the depths of her father's simple nature stirred as they had been stirred by her confession. She almost dreaded her next meeting with him. She wandered softly to and fro in the hall, with a shyness unaccountable to herself—with a terror of being discovered and spoken to by her sister or Miss Garth, which made her nervously susceptible to the slightest noises in the house. The door of the morning-room opened while her back was turned toward it. She started violently as she looked round and saw her father in the hall; her heart beat faster and faster, and she felt herself turning pale. A second look at him, as he came nearer, reassured her. He was composed again, though not so cheerful as usual. She noticed that he advanced and spoke to her with a forbearing gentleness, which was more like his manner to her mother than his ordinary manner to herself.

"Go in, my love," he said, opening the door for her which he had just closed. "Tell your mother all you have told me—and more, if you have more to say. She is better prepared for you than I was. We will take to-day to think of it, Magdalen; and to-morrow you shall know, and Frank shall know, what we decide."

Her eyes brightened as they looked into his face and saw the decision there already, with the double penetration of her womanhood and her love. Happy, and beautiful in her happiness, she put his hand to her lips, and went without hesitation into the morning-room. There her father's words had smoothed the way for her: there the first shock of the surprise was past and over, and only the pleasure of it remained. Her mother had been her age once; her mother would know how fond she was of Frank. So the coming interview was anticipated in her thoughts; and—except that there was an unaccountable appearance of restraint in Mrs. Vanstone's first reception of her—was anticipated aright. After a little the mother's questions came more and more unreservedly from the sweet, unforgotten experience of the mother's heart: she lived again through her own young days of hope and love in Magdalen's replies.

The next morning the all-important decision was announced in words. Mr. Vanstone took his daughter up stairs into her mother's room, and there placed before her the result of the yesterday's consultation, and of the night's reflection which had followed it. He spoke with perfect kindness and self-possession of manner, but in fewer and more serious words than usual; and he held his wife's hand tenderly in his own all through the interview.

He informed Magdalen that neither he nor her mother felt themselves justified in blaming her attachment to Frank. It had been, in part perhaps, the natural consequence of her childish familiarity with him; in part, also, the result of the closer intimacy between them which the theatrical entertainment had necessarily produced. At the same time, it was now the duty of her parents to put that attachment, on both sides, to a proper test—for her sake, because her happy future was their dearest care; for Frank's sake, because they were bound to give him the opportunity of showing himself worthy of the trust confided in him. They were both conscious of being strongly prejudiced in Frank's favor. His father's eccentric conduct had made the lad the object of their compassion and their care from his earliest years: he (and his younger brothers) had almost filled the places to them of those other children of their own whom they had lost. Although they firmly believed their good opinion of Frank to be well founded—still, in the interest of their daughter's happiness, it was necessary to put that opinion firmly to the proof, by fixing certain conditions, and by interposing a year of delay between the contemplated marriage and the present time.

During that year Frank was to remain at the office in London; his employers being informed beforehand that family circumstances prevented his accepting their offer of employment in China. He was to consider this concession as a recognition of the attachment between Magdalen and himself, on certain terms only. If during the year of probation he failed to justify the confidence placed in him—a confidence which had led Mr. Vanstone to take unreservedly upon himself the whole responsibility of Frank's future prospects—the marriage scheme was to be considered from that moment as at an end. If, on the other hand, the result to which Mr. Vanstone confidently looked forward really occurred—if Frank's probationary year proved his claim to the most precious trust that could be placed in his hands—then Magdalen herself should reward him with all that a woman can bestow; and the future which his present employers had placed before him as the result of a five years' residence in China should be realized in one year's time by the dowry of his young wife.

As her father drew that picture of the future the outburst of Magdalen's gratitude could no longer be restrained. She was deeply touched—she spoke from her inmost heart. Mr. Vanstone waited until his daughter and his wife were composed again; and then added the last words of explanation which were now left for him to speak.

"You understand, my love," he said, "that I am not anticipating Frank's living in idleness on his wife's means? My plan for him is that he should still profit by the interest which his present employers take in him. Their knowledge of affairs in the City will soon place a good partnership at his disposal—and you will give him the money to buy it out of hand. I shall limit the sum, my dear, to half your fortune; and the other half I shall have settled upon yourself. We shall all be alive and hearty, I hope"—he looked tenderly at his wife as he said those words—"all alive and hearty at the year's end. But if I am gone, Magdalen, it will make no difference. My will—made long before I ever thought of having a son-in-law—divides my fortune into two equal parts. One part goes to your mother; and the other part is fairly divided between my children. You will have your share on your wedding-day (and Norah will have hers when she marries) from my own hand, if I live; and under my will if I die. There! there! no gloomy faces," he said, with a momentary return of his everyday good spirits. "Your mother and I mean to live and see Frank a great merchant. I shall leave you, my dear, to enlighten the son on our new projects, while I walk over to the cottage—"

He stopped; his eyebrows contracted a little; and he looked aside, hesitatingly, at Mrs. Vanstone.

"What must you do at the cottage, papa?" asked Vaughan, after having vainly waited for him to finish the sentence of his own accord.

"I must consult Frank's father," he replied. "He must not forget that Mr. Clare's consent is still wanting to settle this matter. And as time passes, and we don't know what difficulties he may not raise, the sooner I see him the better."

He gave that answer in low, altered tones; and rose from his chair in a half-reluctant, half-resigned manner, which Magdalen observed with secret alarm.

She glanced inquiringly at her mother. To all appearance Mrs. Vanstone had seen nothing of the change in him also. She looked anxious and uneasy; she turned her face away on the sofa-pillow—turned it suddenly, as if she was in pain.

"Are you not well, mamma?" asked Magdalen.

"Quite well, my love," said Mrs. Vanstone, shortly and sharply, without turning round. "Leave me a little—I only want rest."

Magdalen went out with her father.

"Papa!" she whispered anxiously, as they descended the stairs. "You don't think Mr. Clare will say No?"

"I can't tell beforehand," answered Mr. Vanstone. "I hope he will say Yes."

"There is no reason why he should say any thing else—is there?"

She put the question faintly, while he was getting his hat and stick; and he did not appear to hear her. Doubting whether to repeat it or not, she accompanied him as far as the garden, on his way to Mr. Clare's cottage. He stopped at the lawn, to point out the best track to the house.

"You have nothing on your head, my dear," he said. "If you want to be in the garden, don't forget how hot the sun is—don't come out without your hat."

He walked on toward the cottage.

She waited a moment, and looked after him. She missed the customary alacrity of his step; she saw his little Scotch terrier, who had run out at his heels, barking and capering about him unnoticed. He was out of spirits: he was strange-ly out of spirits. What did it mean?

OMNIBUS AND COUPE.

We were school-fellows once, Madame!
In many a thing I excel you. Yet in this:
Our hands were in girlish friendship knit,
Our hearts with unselfish love were lit.
When we talked of the future we were one,
In a common channel our dreams would run,
Of Love as pure as the purest gold,
Of Friendship that never was bought or sold,
Till we found, along on the stream of Time
Fast linked together as rhyme with rhyme.
But I ride in an omnibus down Broadway,
While you dash by in your grand coupé.

You married, I hear, a millionaire,
Your house is fine and your jewels are rare;
Misty with lace or rich with shawls,
You longed for nothing your heart had thought bulls.
When men address you, they speak in tune;
To hold your fan is a precious boon;
And it seems as if fortune were well satisfied
That it does not perfume the very wind
That blows about you, and soften down
To nunes the roar of the noisy mind.
But I am not envious to see you gay;
And happy, and rich, in your grand coupé.

I married Charlie, your husband's clerk,
Whose life was duty, honor, and work.
And we somehow contrived, on a humble way,
To be very happy, and free, and gay;
For my husband was honest, and brave, and kind,
With a delicate heart and a generous mind.
And the gifts he gave me, though few and cheap,
Were set in a frame-work rich and deep—
A frame-work of Love that never grows old,
But was clear as diamond and solid as gold:
So I do not envy in any way
Your wealthy husband or grand coupé.

Your husband every day, Madame,
Drives down to business well-fed and calm;
But my Charlie is off where the muskets shine,
And the picket stretches its sleepless line,
And the sullen ring of the distant gun
Tells of a battery lost and won.
It was hard to part while our love was new,
But the cruelest battle is—one should I do?
So I kissed his lips, and I bade him go,
And strike for our banner one hearty blow;
And I'm prouder of him, in his honest gray,
Than you of your husband and your coupé.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Our Speciality!

The following Goods, of our own Importation or Manufacture, we offer in Quantities as desired:

200 Tons of SODA ASH, different brands and tests. 2000 Kegs of Bicarbonate DI CARB. SODA, 1/2 & 1/4 each. U. S. CREAM TARTAR, crystals or pulv., partially pure. TARTARIC ACID, all pure. CITRIC ACID. SAL-ERATUS, over style of bales, packages, and tests. 150 Tons of Newcastle, or Domestic SAL SODA. CONCENTRATED LYE, Pittsburgh, 1 quart cans. CRYSTAL SODA, 100 Tons in 6 cwt. packages. SOAP POWDER. Prepared POT ASH. Also the Celebrated EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER. Send on order to

THOMAS MERRYWEATHER & CO.,
For 15 years at 186 and 188 Cedar Street, New York.

Look

In Harper's Weekly of April 5th, No. 275, page 215, and notice that the name of the firm of W. Forsyth & Co. is changed to J. H. Winslow & Co. All Certificates with the name of W. Forsyth & Co. attached are good, and will be redeemed by us as fast as sent in. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
P. O. Box 3582. 32 Nassau Street, New York.

AGENTS WANTED.—Ladies will find a profitable and pleasant employment in selling our highly illustrated editions of "The Most Splendid Book" yet. "The American Flag," &c., &c., each 50 cents, with the words, and 25 cents without. Liberal terms. Price 25 cents each. Liberal discount to Agents. Send 10 cents in stamps for specimen.

JAMES O. GREGORY, 46 Walker Street, N. Y.

Grand Opening!!!

BRODIE'S
Stock of Spring
and
Summer
MANTILLAS,

Now Ready for Inspection

at his

OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street,
and
His Palace of Fashion,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Corner of 23d Street,

New York.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.

HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BRACELETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR LOCKETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR RINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR VEST CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR NECK CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF SETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF PINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR MINIATURE PINS OF ALL THE LEADING PATTERNS. Also, in particular,
No. 1 HANDSOME MANUFACTURING JEWELER,
268 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

WATCHES.

10,000 for sale, at Wholesale price. Enclose stamp for descriptive Circular. J. L. Ferguson, 398 Broadway, N.Y.

Useful and Economical.—Hegeman & Co.'s Bonnet Frames, Bonnet Shapes, Crapes, Crapines, Veils, &c., and Gauze Gloves, Ribbons, Sashes, &c., sewed to new without ripping, by the Hegeman Sewing Machine, for only 25 cents per bottle. Sold by Druggists. Be sure and get the genuine. Prepared by Hegeman & Co., 79 Fulton St.

WANTED.—I want a good number of men in every State, by the month, or will allow 100 per cent. with exclusive right to sell. Goods in the highest state of perfection, staples. All coming or sending to me, RESIDENCE, Box 2320, Boston, Mass., will be waited on at once. Parties wishing to profitably employ their traveling expenses without retarding their journey.

EMPLOYMENT.—Agents Wanted in every Town and County to enter into a respectable and permanent business. For particulars address

DR. I. H. WARNER,
No. 214 Fulton St. New York.

THE HOME MELODIST

Contains nearly One Hundred Favorite Songs, which, in another form, costs twice as many dollars, will be sent, postage free, on the receipt of Fifty Cents.

DITSON & CO., Boston.

ENTERPRISING AGENTS ARE WANTED to sell the celebrated Wilcox and Silver Family Sewing, and other new articles of ready sale. Liberal terms. Samples sent free on receipt of the price (25c.). Send 3-cent stamp for price-list and terms. A. H. DOUGHTY, 343 Broadway, N. Y.

Rheumatism.—All those afflicted with Rheumatism, Gout, Neuralgia, Chilblains, Cold and Frost-bitten Feet, and all Nervous Derangements, should address Dr. Cu's Patent Galvanic Electro Metallic Insoles, will find immediate relief and permanent cure from their use, never having yet failed in hundreds of cases. Office 429 Broadway, New York. Send for pamphlet. J. S. SANDS, Patentee and Sole Agent.

Every Man his own Printer.

ADAMS PRESS CO., 13 Park Row N. Y.

Catarrh!—GODDARD'S REMEDY for this disease is the first and only one that cures it. Send postage stamp for his Pamphlet, at 647 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS MAKE MOST MONEY, and give entire satisfaction, by selling our PRIZE STATIONERY AND JEWELRY PACKAGES. Circulars free. J. FLAMMS & CO., 36 Beekman St., N. Y.

A Certain Cure for Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, &c.

Laurie's Chinese Life Pills.

This wonderful remedy is chiefly composed from the essence of a plant that grows in the tea districts of China, the use of which, as prescribed by learned Chinese physicians, is said to confer the blessing of "long life." Sold, as we discovered by Dr. Adam Laurie, M.R.C.S., while situated in the Province of Szechuen in Northern China, and by him introduced into European practice.

These pills take no effect on a cathartic, but are specifically on the blood and nervous centres, and are highly valuable remedy for Liver Complaint, DYSPEPSIA, ST. VITUS' DANCE, HYPOCHONDRIA, LASSITUDE, LANGUISHING, DEPRESSION OF SPIRITS, HEADACHE, IRRITABILITY, EXCITEMENT, and all diseases from impure blood or nervous derangement, and may be taken with entire safety by the most delicate lady or tender child.

Price One Dollar per box of forty pills, or large boxes of one hundred pills, Five Dollars. Sent by mail, free, on receipt of remittance; or obtained personally from

GEO. DELF LAURIE,
General Agent for the United States, 429 Broadway, N. Y.

Is your Life Insured?

NEW AND MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. OF BOSTON & NEW YORK, ORGANIZED 1850.
CAPITAL, TWO MILLIONS. SURPLUS, ONE MILLION.

This Co. is strictly for mutual protection, entirely beneficent in all its workings and tendencies. It is the oldest purely Mutual Co. in the United States, and eminently successful. The Insurance Commissioners class it as the leading Co. in surplus and economy. All over actual cost returned to each insured. Interesting documents mailed free. JOHN HOBART, Agent for the Co.,
No. 110 Broadway, New York City.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

The Six, or Navy Size, carries a Ball weighing 38 to the lb., and the Five, or Pocket, a Ball weighing 60 to the lb. By recent experiments made in the Army, these Revolvers have proved the best and most effective in weapons in use. [ibs.

Ballard's Patent Breech-Loading Rifle.

This arm is entirely new, and is universally acknowledged to be the nearest to perfection of any Breech-Loading Rifle now in use. Length of barrel 24 inches, weight of rifle 7 pounds. Size of Calibre adapted to Nos. 32, 35, and 44 copper rimmed Cartridges. For particulars call or send for a Circular to

MERWIN & BRAY, Sole Agents,
No. 245 Broadway, N. Y.

To Officers in the Army and Navy.
REVOLVERS!!

Best Cartridge Revolver yet invented. 6in. Barrel, 56 Balls to the pound. Send for Drawing and Circular to WM. IRVING, 50 Cliff Street, N. Y.

REVOLVER.

A MOST POWERFUL ARM, WHICH CAN BE carried concealed by the person without inconvenience or danger. Length five inches, scarcely more than that of the barrel. It is the most compact, cut, and powerful Pocket Revolver ever made; weighs only eight ounces, charged with six balls, and can be carried in a hand-satchel, pocket, or belt. Price, 5 inch, $10 and eighth. We will penetrate one inch of pine at one hundred yards. Address ELLIOT ARMS COMPANY,
Retail price, Plated Frame, with 100 cartridges, $16 00
" Blued " " " 14 00
Trade supplied. T. W. MOORE, 426 Hewitt, N. Y.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Bridal Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 183 Broadway. Seals and stamps.

Commercial Travelers and Agents Wanted to Sell Our
25 Cent Portfolio Package.

Contents—18 Sheets Note Paper, 18 Envelopes, 1 Penholder, 1 Pen, 1 Pencil, 1 Blotting Pad, 100 Recipes, 1 War Hymn, 5 Engravings, 1 New Method for Computing Interest.—Packages Indelible Undershirt Designs for Ladies, 4 for Under-Sleeves, 2 for Under-Skirts, 1 for Corner of Handkerchief, 1 for Cuffs, 1 for Silk Purse, 1 for Child's Sack, 1 for Ornamental Pillow Case, 1 Parisle Garden, and One Beautiful Alphabet of Fancy Letters. $10 a day can be realized. Send stamp for Circular of wholesale prices.
WEIR & CO., 93 South Third Street, Phila., Pa.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS in every County at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and Novel Sewing Machine. Address (with stamp) S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

A New Edition of

Harper's War Map

Now Ready.

Price Six Cents.

Sent by mail on receipt of price.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of all denominations, for sale. Apply to

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Wedding Cards and Note Papers at J. EVERDELL'S celebrated Engraving Establishment, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane Street, N. Y. Samples by mail.

A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agents E. C. WELLS & CO., 115 Franklin St., New York. Sold by druggists everywhere.

BRONCHITIS and Kindred Diseases. $1.15 per bottle.—Being the result of nearly twenty years' study and investigation by DR. W. W. HALL, Editor of "Hall's Journal of Health," 24 a year, 25 Irving Place, New York.

The ALBION,

A WEEKLY LITERARY JOURNAL, Established in 1822,

AND

NEWS, POLITICS, CRITICISM, AND GENERAL LITERATURE.

Price 6¾ cts. Annual Subscription, $3 Cents per Copy.

Send for Specimen Copies to the

ALBION OFFICE, 19 Beekman Street, New York.

EMPLOYMENT. A New Employment. The Franklin Sewing Machine Co. want a number of Agents. A liberal salary and expenses paid. Commission allowed. Address, with stamp, Harris Brothers, Boston, Mass. Only this and no other address.

Memento of the Rebellion.—Seven different Rebel Notes and Shinplasters sent, post-paid, to any address on receipt of 50 cts. Five each of the seven different Notes and Shinplasters sent on receipt of $1. Trade supplied at $2 per 100 or $18 per 1000. Address S. C. UPHAM, 303 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

AGENTS, Army Traders, and the Speculating Community are invited to our Gold Watches and cheap jewelry of the most reliable variety. Price lists sent free. Address HUBBARD BROS., NEW YORK.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Alexandria, Washington, Hilton Head, Beaufort, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent, at half rates, via ADAMS'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Subject charged low rates.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Oriental wash forces them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face; contains no dye or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

$1 24 PHOTOS, postage prepaid. ATWATER'S PATENT PRESS AND BOOK for Copying Business Letters instantly and perfectly. Thousands testify. Agents wanted. Profits, sales, and satisfaction good. Send stamp for particulars. E. ATWATER, Box 116, Providence, R. I.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS. GEO. R. TAYLOR, 652 Broadway, New York. Send for a Circular.

Subscription Books for Canvassers and Agents.

G. P. PUTNAM'S Publishing Agency,
321 Broadway, New York
To Canvassers, Book Agents, and Others.

The following Books, by CANVASSERS, at Twenty-Five Cents each, EXCLUSIVELY for Canvassers and Agents, will be found well adapted your attention.

That a large sale of these Works can be secured by an active and energetic canvass in every City, Town, and Village in the country, there is no doubt. Every intelligent person desires to procure the clear and great speech in the National Life. The

REBELLION RECORD

is the work best adapted to give to every one the only complete and reliable History to be found. The will contain faithful portraits of all Heroes, elegantly engraved on steel, of the Generals, Military and Naval Heroes, Statesmen, Orators, and the Martyrs of the Rebellion, with succinct and reliable Biographies of each; and will form, when complete, a work of great value and interest. Two hundredth Quarto Volumes of Twenty Numbers in each, a work of permanent value and interest.

HEROES AND MARTYRS

Agents are wanted in every City, Town, and Village in the country, to whom liberal commissions will be allowed, to whom applications for Agencies must be made.

All applications for Agencies must state if they are at present engaged in canvassing for any other work.

Apply, by letter or otherwise, to

G. P. PUTNAM'S Publishing Agency, 321 Broadway.

* * Specimen Numbers of either will be sent on receipt of Twenty-Five Cents.

$5 — SOMETHING NEW — Agents wanted $5 to make $50 to $100 a month, selling our newly-patented articles. Address stamp for circulars. Sample by mail, $1. Satisfaction guaranteed. Samples 25c. each. Extras stamp. HALL & CO., 181 Fulton Street, N. Y.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . . . 2 50
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Eight Subscribers.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, for $6 00.

☞ Specimen and Teachers supplied at the lowest Cash Rates.

The Bound Notes of the United States will be received for Subscriptions. Our Office Regulations are requested to be set them in preference to Bank Notes.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

A Thrilling Story,

Entitled,

NO NAME.

By Wilkie Collins,

AUTHOR OF

"The Woman in White,"

Richly Illustrated by John McLenan,

Was commenced in the Number for March 15 (No. 279) of

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

And will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
One Copy for Six Months 1 00
Ten Copies for One Year 15 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

Harper's Weekly will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it.

Harper's Weekly is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V., for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861, of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in cloth, price $5 00 each, are now ready.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

SECRETARY WELLES (reading from a Fortnight old). "The Rebel Steamer NASSAU ran the Blockade at Beaufort on Thursday last. Well, I declare! this is too bad! Really, if George doesn't send me the New York Papers more regularly, I'll have to Subscribe for them myself."

JOHN BULL. "Well, Friend BOXER, that looks like a Good Blockade. I don't think there's any use trying to break it."

THE PROPHET RUSSELL COMING OUT AT THE LITTLE END OF THE HORN

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Agents

Will find profitable employment in every City, Town, and Camp, by engaging in the sale of

(Beadle's Dime Biographical Library, No. 11.)

The Life of

Major-General

GEO. B. McCLELLAN,

Comprising his services in Mexico; on the Red River and Northern exploring Expeditions; on the Army Commission to Europe; together with a complete History of the Campaign in Western Virginia.

190 Pages Complete.

Price 10 Cents.

For sale by all Booksellers and News Dealers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. Address

BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.

James Parrish,
Shirt Manufacturer,
323 CANAL STREET, near Broadway, New York.
SUPERIOR SHIRTS made to measure, $18, $21, and $24 per dozen.
☞ Family supply store of Bosoms, Collars, and Wristbands for shirt making, at reduced prices.

THE DIAPHRAGM FILTER, Sold by A. MCKENZIE, Printer, 109 4th Street, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED to sell YALE'S FLAG of our UNION and MILITARY STATION-ERY PACKAGES. Agents who are now selling imitation put up by other parties are respectfully requested to send us their address, and we will forward them a sample with circular, which will at once satisfy them they can make more money and give better satisfaction than any others in market. We will also forward our Circular of YALE'S ARMY WRITING DESK, something that every soldier will buy. Address

E. W. YALE,
Prop. Metropolitan Gift Book Store, Syracuse, N. Y.

AGENTS CAN MAKE
from $10 to $20 per day by selling
Rickard's Multomicroon.
Send for a Circular. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, New York.

"WHAT CAME AFTERWARD" by T. S. Arthur, and "BATTLE-FIELDS OF OUR FATHERS," by Virginia F. Townsend, two Serial Stories, now appearing in ARTHUR'S HOME MAGAZINE. For sale by News Agents.
Price 10 cents a number.

To all wanting Farms.

New Settlement of VINELAND, 20 miles from Philadelphia by Railroad. Good farms and highly productive for Wheat, Corn, Grass, Fruits, and Vegetables — good market—delightful climate—schools forming in profusion, especially these times, and where good business openings for all kinds of trades and professions are settling. Such good Farms from $25 to $50 per acre only. Village lots and 10 acre Lots for sale. Pamphlets, containing a report of EDSON CLEVELAND, Jr. Esq. of the Tribune, and other useful information, sent free. Address

CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland P.O., Cumberland County, New Jersey.

AGENTS.
P. P. P. P.
Panprosphosium Prize Package.
Price Ten Cents.

The Dime Prize Package contains 16 articles, all new and original, with a piece of valuable Jewelry in each package. Sent for a Circular. Agents can make 100 per cent. profit. H. HUTCHLEY & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

INVALID.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all Lung Affections, by sending to H. Addis, 281 Pearl Street, N. Y. The acute ly free. Write for it. It has cured thousands.

To Consumptives.

THE Advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks, by a very simple remedy after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption—is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copied the prescription used, free of charge, with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure Cure for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he considers to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing.

Parties ordering the prescription will please address

Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON,
Williamsburgh,
Kings County, New York.

AGENTS of ACTIVITY and ENERGY can make from $5 to $20 per day by selling the only VALUABLE PRIZE STATIONERY RECIPE PACKAGE AND ENVELOPE in the market. Our STATIONERY is SUPERIOR, and our Jewelry consists of FORTY VARIETIES manufactured with ARTISTIC TASTE.

We put in each package a beautiful and life-like engraving of GENERAL GEORGE B. McCLELLAN, with 25 Valuable Recipes. 6 Sheets Ladies' Billet Paper.
4 sheets Cap, Note Paper. 8 Buff Envelopes.
8 Sheets Ladies' Note Paper. 2 Fine Steel Pens.
6 White Union Envelopes. 1 Fine Pencil.
6 colors Indelible Ink. 1 Sheet Blotting Paper.
6 Lilac White Union Envelopes. 1 Pen-holder.
ALSO A VALUABLE PIECE OF JEWELRY.
For particulars send for circulars, mailed free.
S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE!
MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 25c. IN SILVER.
Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free.
F. C. HOWES, Box 228, Boston, Mass.

Military Books.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, Importer, and Bookseller of Military and Scientific Books, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y. Catalogues sent free by mail on application.

For Sale or to Let.

The premises Nos. 809 and 811 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, formerly occupied by Messrs. L. J. Levy & Company. For Terms, &c.,
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS,
New York.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices.
Made to Measure at $20 per doz.
OR SIX FOR TEN DOLLARS.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosom and warranted a good fit.
as sold in retail stores for $9 to $12.
ALSO, THE CELEBRATED "WARD" SHIRT CAN BE MADE, SET AND FINE DRESS.

F. S.—Those who think I can not make a good fitter for $3 per dozen are mistaken. I have in the past made them $30 per shirt.

Six yards of the New York Mills Muslin at 18 c. per yd. $0 80
7 yards of fine Linen, at 66c. per yard..... 4 62
Making and cutting..... 1 50
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 75c..... 1 75
Profit..... 2 33
Total..... $10 00

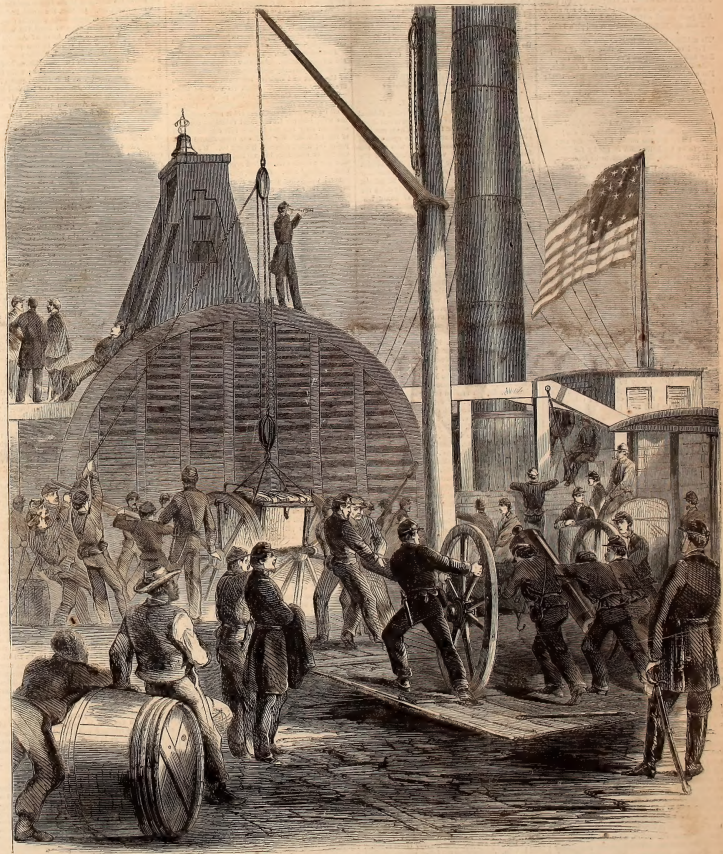
Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices and drawings of different styles of shirts sent free to any one everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that one can not take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the shirt is not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between Walker and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.



STATIONERY and Jewelry Packages. One hour in the morning at home or anywhere else can be employed elsewhere. For particulars address, with stamp enclosed, L. & ANDREWS, 119 Nassau St., Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VI.—No. 277.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

SHIPPING ARTILLERY AT ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 239.]

A SOLDIER'S LETTER, AND A WOMAN'S ANSWER.

HOSPITAL, April —.

I WRITE with a great deal of pain, dear girl—
I've not been able before since the fight—
And my brain is still so much in a whirl,
That I can tell you but little to-night.

The wounded leaders start—'tis not very bad,
Or at least it might be worse; so I said,
When I thought of you, "I'm sure she'll be glad To know that I'm only wounded—not dead."

I've lost my left arm—there! now you know all!
A Minié ball shattered it, and I fell;
The last that I heard was our Captain's call,
Until—the next I knew, I was in hell.

I've had throughout the most excellent care,
And am getting finely, the surgeon says;
So well, indeed, that the prospect is fair
For a homeward trip before many days.

But I've something else, dear Mary, to say,
And I'll say it if I can—let me try!
I've thought of it well—there's no other way—
You're released from your promise to my suit!
You'll think me foolish at first; then you'll think
Of the loose, armless coat-sleeve at my side;
And your pretty and sensitive heart will shrink
From the thought of being a cripple's bride.

'Tis a bitter struggle to give you up,
For I've loved you more than ever of late;
But duty is duty, and I'll perform the cut,
And I'm calm, though my heart is desolate.
I'm coming home, and of course we must meet
My darling, this once, one hour I implore—
Let us still be friends—for that will be sweet,
Since now, alas! we can be nothing more.

SWEET HOME, April —

My Robert, how brave and noble you are!
Too brave and too noble, I know, for me;
But you've too little faith in me by far
If you believe that I want to be free.
I'm not released from my promise—no, no!
I was never so sacred to me before;
If you could but know how I've longed to go
And watch by your side, you'd doubt me no more.

I read your name in the terrible list,
But the tears came back that morning to my eyes
And a fearful pain, that I could not resist,
Crushed my heart till I only longed to die.
The blessed truth, my husband, came to me,
And I felt, as you in your letter said,
A feeling of shame, and all my pain
That Robert was only wounded—not dead.

Oh, darling! to think you have suffered so,
And I all these long, weary miles away;
You've needed me very often, I know,
While I could do nothing but hope and pray.
But hardest of all is the bitter thought
That you have been suffering so much for me,
Poor Robert! your manly letter has brought
A stronger struggle—joy and misery.

But you're coming home to my arms and heart!
You're right—I am proud and sensitive too;
But I'm only so when we are apart,
And now—all only be proud of you!
You're coming home to happiness and rest,
And I wait the moment of blissful calm,
When I shall be held as I pressed to your breast,
By a Patriot-Hero's one strong arm!

BLEECKTON, MASS., April, 1862.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1862.

ON TO RICHMOND!

IT is at last safe to say in print what every one has been whispering for his neighbor for several days past—that M'Clellan has started on his march to Richmond. The military censor at Washington seems to be pitiable in the last that Major-General M'Clellan started from Old Point Comfort at the head of his army on 6th, and that on 7th he was before Yorktown. At the time this paper reaches the public eye he may be nearer the rebel capital than will be pleasant for the writer. That he will be, while the insurgent States which can delay his progress more than a few hours.

The keys of the so-called Confederate States are Richmond and New Orleans. When we have taken these our task will be done. It is idle to suppose, as some weak-minded or ill-intentioned persons do, that the rebels will go on forever resisting after the struggle has become hopeless. The question of what people, holding three millions of slaves, can not live in mountain fastnesses, caring sweet potatoes. They will never back out and hoodwink us, and then, and if they can not get them except by submitting, they will submit. If Marion had had a hundred thousand men, besides women and children, to take care of, he never could have lived in the swamps and haunted the British. There will be Marions now—Captain Jack Morgan, for instance—who will flourish as partisan leaders, slave-holding Rover Hoods, until they are hunted down. But the rank and file of the Southern people will submit and become loyal as soon as we make it perfectly apparent to them that the struggle is hopeless, and that they must choose between starvation, with the dangers of servile insurrections, on the one side, and plenty with loyalty on the other. There always comes a period when the argumentum ad ventrem is irresistible even with the most obstinate and pugnacious animals.

THE ANNIVERSARY OF SUMTER.

WE publish on pages 248 and 249 a large allegorical picture representing the UNRISING OF THE NORTH, after the Bombardment of FORT SUMTER. This was necessarily a most anxious array of that momentous and fatal day. The artist writes us the following note explanatory of his picture:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

DEAR SIR,—In my design of the "UNRISING OF THE NORTH" I first endeavored to illustrate the excitement and love of country developed throughout the Free States immediately after the bombardment of Sumter.

For Sumter is seen in flames, the fire of smoke and battle rises and gradually obscures the sun ("Quenching the dark days just one year ago; the former leaves the glow in the heavens, the latter the gloom. On the latter eastward goes Bunker Hill Monument, linking the patriots of our fathers with those of to-day; the coming sunlight dissipates the mists of compromise; and the cheerful light contrasts with the portentous darkness on the Southern horizon.

The hosts even of New England swarm over the hills, joining their brothers of the Middle States—swelling, as we meet, the mighty current setting in from the far off States of the Pacific and from Western Sea-board, and, as everywhere, while night the Stars and Stripes in defiance of Liberty and the Union! etc., etc. Very truly yours,

C. PARSONS.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NINETEENTH APRIL.

EIGHTY-SEVEN years ago this morning General Warren sent Dr. Joseph Warren into the towns about Boston with the news that the British were coming. The patriots in Boston hung lanterns upon the old north spire, and a single one—two lights—in the gloom already light knew what it meant, and the farmers took down their muskets. The British soldiers marched from Boston. And the news flew before them through the darkness, and Middlesex farmers by awake that night. At dawn there was a file of troops reached the village of Lexington. The church bell rang a strange, untuned peal. Drums were beaten to call together the men. The citizens assembled upon the green. In the gray morning light they saw the British troops drawn up either in sight of their homes. The red coats came running at the double-quick and halted. Pitcairn fiercely commanded the beginning of the work. They stood fast. He threatened them. They did not falter. Then he fired in their faces, and then and gave the loud order, "Fire!" There was a scattering response, then a steady, deadly volley. Resistance was useless. It was not attempted. Those who fell rose no more, they retired. Seven of them were killed, and wounded. It was day by sunrise, and the swearing British troops pushed on. Concord occupied.

Already the news that had flown before the march had reached and roused the town of Acton, near Concord. The minute-men marched at daybreak, 16th April, 1775, under command of Captain Isaac father of four children, who kissed his wife goodby, and said, "Polly, I must go." At nine o'clock the British arrived and searched for military stores to destroy. Between nine and ten there were four or six hundred countrymen near the old bridge. They had orders to advance, but not to fire unless attacked. The British regulars were under way that led to the bridge. The British began to take up the planks. The Americans advanced steadily. Then the British fired. Davis fell the first rebel fire. It was three hours since he had left his wife. That afternoon she was carried home and laid in her bedroom. He complained was little altered, and pleasant in death." Buttrick (it is the honored name of the leading man of Concord) cried, "Fire, fellow-soldiers, for God's sake fire!" Two of the British fell, and several were wounded. In two minutes the battle of Concord was over, and, as the inscription upon the monument reads, "Here the British first fell before the arm of the Revolution which gave independence to these United States."

It was eighty-seven years ago. Eighty-six years afterward the sons and grandsons of the patriots of Concord were recruited to repeat the bell, as their fathers were, in the dusk of morning—who had gathered upon the village green, and the drums were beaten to call them, and the fife tune, marched on the 19th of April through the streets of Baltimore, hastening from their quiet homes and fields to defend the Government which had been secured by that earlier bloodshed. With the Revolutionary blood flowing in their veins they were beset in the gloomy streets. Like their fathers they were unprepared for battle. They stood fast. The pitiless storm around them were not more pitiless than the stony hearts of the foe they trampled in the dust. Like their fathers they fired, and two of the heroic band fell, as in the earlier day. The anniversary of the city, like the green sod of the Concord valley, was consecrated by their blood. They died, but love, and honor, and deathless renown, and the memory of their deed, like the blood of those heroes sprang from the ground in every one hundred thousand armed men, who stood today from the Chesapeake to the mouth of the Columbia city of death to the utmost point of the Gulf, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific the legacy of good old cause of peaceful liberty, for which brave men gladly die.

History and the love of a nation blend the two centuries in their remembrance of this day. The one the spring-day of our independence, the other of our assured liberty. The first nineteenth of April showed that we could be a nation: the last proved that we are so. For martyr blood is not shed in vain. Justice does not falter, nor the world turn back: and the cause that all Americans naturally love was never so lovely as to-day when this anniversary returns.

FOR THE SOLDIERS.

HOT weather and hot work are coming. The time is when not only the strategy of Generals and the bravery of soldiers, but the health of all our men in the field is to be tested, is at hand. The time also in which our faith at home, our patient endurance of the necessity of labor and sacrifice, must be proved to be true, has also arrived. The sanitary care which, by the constant benevolence of all patriotic citizens throughout the country, is administered by the unwearying attention of the Sanitary Commission, has followed our soldiers to the camp, received the wounded, cheered, and soothed them in the final hour, all this must now continue with unremitted energy, although the first gush of feeling is gone.

During the last nine months the Commission and its auxiliaries have distributed clothing, and distributed half a million dollars' worth of hospital stores. In the hospitals and on the battle-field, the medical profession, has marshaled bands of nurses, has erected invalid soldiers' homes in Washington, has inspired three hundred of the most faithful, intelligent, and practical men in all the States as advisers, has collected statistics of the most valuable character, has organized depôts of supplies and methods of swift succor—and all this, the most arduous and engrossing work, without any subject to jealous criticism, and employing agents at its own expense.

Four thousand sons. The results it has achieved are its justification, and now it appeals again to the public sympathy and co-operation upon the eve of the great and decisive campaign. The eyes are nearly exhausted. Shall its work be relinquished? The Government can not and will not be the work of the Sanitary Commission. It gives it all its sympathy and what aid it may render in the way, but only the Government functions are one, and they can not include this careful regard of the soldiers. We all know what official sympathy is; even Napoleon's, it used to be. We do not quarrel or complain, but we had all rather know that our wounded soldiers were in other than the merely official care. Besides, upon the health and general well-being, upon the morale of the troops depends their efficiency, and the Commission has doubtless preserved thousands of brave men to fight for themselves and us.

Shall this essential work languish or fail? The appeal is to every man and to every woman in the land. Sacrifice and service are what each one should a volunteer force larger than the great standing armies of the world, and has followed them with thoughtful care. At the beginning of this unparalleled of arms, will not falter in the moment of exhausting effort, but triumphantly accomplish the task it has so nobly begun.

DEMAGOGY.

THE appeal to the prejudice of one part of the population of this country against any other is so directly destructive of the spirit and fact the attempt should every where be marked. When a candidate for the Mayoralty appealed, last autumn, to the lowest passions of the most ignorant who hated negro-shops and live by robbery, he revealed at once his own despair of his cause and the true character of the man to whom respectable citizens, a few years since, publicly besought by letter to stand for Mayor. The same thing was true of every speech he has felt that no civil right whatsoever could be safe in the hands of such a magistrate. He tested his audience and was overwhelmed with the intelligence of the people, but upon the blind passion of a crowd of ignorant voters whose passions he sought to inflame. The result of the election showed the popular estimate of the man, and the people appreciated the course he had taken.

There are newspapers which are trying the same method in regard to the question of the slaves who are freed by the advance of the army. They strive to excite the meanest hatreds in order to produce ignorance, and to persuade them that only what can be involved. They represent the free colored people as a race to be "put down," worthless, thieving mass of persons. The falsehood of these statements it is useless to controvert, because truth is not the object of the men who make them.

It is instructive, nevertheless, to know, as Senator Wilson said in reply to Senator Davis, of Kentucky, who had the effrontery to repeat the slander which should only be found in base mouths and malignant hearts, that in the District of Columbia the free colored people, although under the hopeless ban of belonging to a hated and enslaved race, support themselves, as a class, by their own thrift, support their churches and schools, provide for their own poor, bury their dead, and help support schools for the education of white children whence their own are excluded. Could there be a more striking spectacle for God and man than a party of intelligent men belonging to a powerful, prosperous, proud nation, of thirty millions of people trying to keep their race under by millions of an unfortunate race, and using every art of falsehood and fraud to secure success, instead of considering by what means every man can wisely be lifted into the enjoyment of the rights with which God endowed all men?

Especially in this country, where, if any thing is settled by public opinion, it is that freedom and not slavery is to be the national policy, and consequently that slavery is to be ended, lawfully and peacefully if we all good counsel hope, however by venomous appeals seeks to avert the inevitable development of our civilization and common sense, is the enemy of every decent man and honest citizen.

OUR CAUSE.

THE historian Bancroft was once asked to what period he proposed to continue his history. His reply was, "Our history is complete down to the formation of the Constitution. Since then our story is that of a political system which is yet in course of experiment." The profound sagacity of the reply is shown by the experience of last year. We are now in the very centre of the experiment. For our system could not be said to be permanently established until it had suffered the shock of civil war. That shock it is now sustaining, and every sign indicates that the event will prove the intrinsic superiority of the system.

But the London Times is of another opinion. The English Foreign Secretary utters words as we as two Powers; and the Times follows the lead by the assertion that the present condition of this country proves that the United States is dissolved. Such a statement is of course only twaddle, for it is not supporting fact of the question. But the Times proceeds to some remarkable political generalizations, which it as false as it is feeble.

"This is a time of reaction," it says, "for which democracy has to thank itself." And it then illustrates the reaction by the progress of events in the kingdom of Italy, and the intervention in Mexico. But if any fact is established and illustrated by recent political history, it is that the consent of the nation is the only sure foundation of any government. Not only is Louis Napoleon the elected Emperor of the French, but his whole policy shows his deference to the rights and the power of universal suffrage. The great Italian hero our day, was not fifty years old when he died, but he had already seen close at hand the unity of Italy. The sole obstacle to the union of Austria has been lifted, by the will of the Italian people and their own free choice. Even Kossuth, wisely obedient to a national instinct, from Tuscany, Parma, Modena, a great part of Lombardy, and Naples; while Rome is not yet nominally, as it is in fact, one of the Italian kingdom, only because the political is another and more complicated question. In other words, the separate Austrian provinces of Italy have cast off their foreign master, and are united under their own constitutional queen.

Instead of an age of reaction, it is emphatically the age of universal suffrage, and the doctrine of constitutional liberty and national unity is the one cardinal conditions of peaceful civilization and progress. And our own struggle is the most striking and the most popular system is the strongest possible, since it can victoriously cope not only with a more formidable domestic rebellion than any other contemporary government could withstand, but with the covert hostility of every rival power in the world.

ANTI-DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

THE last evening upon the District emancipation bill suggests once more the retrospect of the political patrimony of St. Peter, or the states of the church, and especially the political history of the anomalous and foolish political communities. For as there is no valid reason why the chief Bishop of a church should be a province specially subject to his temporal sway, so there is none why the national Government of a republic should be seated in a little territory of which the inhabitants are virtually disfranchised.

The inconvenience of the situation and of the case makes the national metropolis an unhealthy village, and the power of the people over the officers of Government, with the throngs of official dependents, and inhabited by the diplomatic body. In every other part of the civilized world the diplomatic corps carries with it the refinements and delights of the chief city of the country. It is no wonder that Washington, one of the most beautiful sites for a monument of dreary exile for a foreigner. To come to Americans is hard, but to live in Washington—hoc opus.

The inevitable consequence is, not only that the District suffers for proper legislation, but that what is the business of all the States is in that direction the interest of none. Hence the National Government is surrounded by belittling influences. Instead of contact with the great centres of national interest and feeling, which could be found in the national capitals—such as the French Government finds in Paris and the English in London—it breathes the air of a village, and talks with the great nation by the telegraph, or the mail, or through committees. The people of the other nations smile at the free exploitation and centralization when the seat of government is in a foreign city—an overshadowing power like that of Paris over France. But the natures of our system obviates such a fear with us. In the other nations the fear that the capital subjugate would arise among the chief cities of the various States; but however large any country may be, and however divided, there is always a capital city, and that is the natural capital.

It would certainly be difficult to give any better original reason why the capital of the United States should be in a village upon the Potomac, than why the seat of the French Government should be at Pau in the Pyrenees. Tradition, time, and the luxury engrafted upon the institutions of the latter are secondary, but influential, considerations now. The costly Capitol, at once a mere and a shame, the other huge and ill-considered buildings, the political habit of the world which typifies our Government as the Colossus of Washington, and the national association of the capital with the District all these are reasons for the present situation.

But when the war is over, and the causes of alienation are removed, and there is national peace in fact, as well as in form, let us hope that something may be done to emancipate the Government from the District of Columbia.

A COMMON ERROR.

IT may be hardly necessary to warn any person who reads the papers that he must not rely too implicitly upon the report of what happened yesterday, not because of any intention to misrepresent, but of the general difficulty of knowing exactly the facts. But when the report is of something that happened in another country many years ago, when the object of the representation is the gratification of a malignant purpose, and when the vehicle of the report is a work as notoriously unaccuracy and untrustworthy, every reader ought to remember that he is probably reading the grossest falsehoods.

The stories that are usually told of the revolt in St. Domingo are of this latter kind. They are the most stupendous and malicious falsehoods. And as the question is one in which we are all practically interested, it is quite worth while for us to know the facts, which are not accessible except to special study, for the reason that the subject is the occasion of such strong partisan views.

After the French Revolution of 1789 began, St. Domingo was convulsed by civil wars between the whites and the mulattoes, in which the slaves, which belonged to both parties, had for a long time no share, and in which the atrocities committed by the whites, and officially recorded, are beyond belief.

At length the slaves, who saw the whites and mulattoes ferociously fighting, the one party for equal rights, the other for exclusive privilege, revolted and rose. The rising was terrible, but it was not the result of emancipation, for they were not freed; it was the consequence of slavery.

During this anarchy upon the island Spain and England began to contest its possession with France. France was in danger of losing it altogether, when the French Commissioners, in August, 1793, liberated the slaves. In the following June the French Convention confirmed the emancipation. Immediately there was method in the action of the blacks and comparative order. Toussaint l'Ouverture at once raised the French standard. The treaty of Basle, in 1795, secured the Spanish part of the island to France. In 1798 Toussaint, appointed Commander-in-Chief, drove out the English, recalled the fugitive planters, gave them their old slaves for hired laborers, and the island became once more peaceful, prosperous, and happy, as every state must be where justice is the fundamental law.

In 1802 Napoleon sent a great army to St. Domingo, seized Toussaint by treachery, carried him to Europe, where he died in prison among the Jura Mountains, re-established slavery in all the French colonies except St. Domingo, which he wished first to subdue, then to enslave, and in which the "horrors" again broke forth, consequent upon the effort to re-enslave. In 1804, however, the French were finally expelled from the island.

Let it be constantly remembered, then, that "the horrors of St. Domingo" began three years before the slaves were emancipated, and began because they were not liberated. They ceased with freedom, and they revived with the attempt to restore slavery. The truth is precisely the reverse of the common statement. The trouble of insurrection springs from slavery, and not from liberty. This fact is recognized by the laws of all slave communities, which imply that the slaves are natural and probable enemies. In Sparta, long ago, there was a periodical slaughter of the slaves. In all our Slave States to-day the laws respecting colored persons, free or slave, are shocking to humanity but essential to the system.

The point for us all to remember, as men and citizens, is that it is always more dangerous to the public peace to treat men as brutes than as human beings. And although it is perfectly true that, politically speaking, the citizens of one State in this Union have nothing to do with the domestic institutions of the others, yet when those others, instead of confining their institutions to themselves, seek at the point of the sword to impose them upon the nation, the nation, with a commendable and natural regard to its own existence, will certainly take care that henceforth those institutions shall be limited to the States, and that every falsehood told to prevent or perplex that result shall be exposed, and the motives of the utterers of falsehood made plain to the simplest mind.

INFAMY.

There are persons whom no temptation should persuade to emerge from the obscurity into which, by the consent of their country, they have recently or long since fallen; persons whose hopeless fate it is to be pilloried in history; since history must name them, and can only name with scorn. They are persons who for no merit, but from the very obscurity of mediocrity, have been raised to high public positions, despised by those whose tools they were, and shunned by those who resisted their bad designs. They stand conspicuous, as a man upon the gallows stands; but they have no love, no respect, no sympathy. No man would be glad to welcome them in his home, nor to call his children by their name. For a few years they may have dazzled the public eye by an inexplicable success; but their career, ended before their lives, deludes no ingenuous youth and allures no noble ambition. Their names become gradually the synonyms of dishonor and contempt. Theirs is a fate so pitiful that whenever they stir obscurity, and remind living men that they are not dead, those men do not willingly mention them, but leave them to the charitable forgetfulness of their contemporaries and the tragical fidelity of history.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SOMETHING "IN NUBIBUS."

A short time ago we were distressed to read that Saturn had lost his rings! Whether that steady-going old star had dropped them at one of his periodical Saturnalias, or whether he was obliged to part with them under a temporary financial pressure, our telescopic mind is at a loss to say; but we are sure our readers will rejoice with us at learning that Saturn has got his rings back again. They shine as brilliantly as ever (in fact, many of the diamonds are to the full as big as stars, and sparkle not less lustrously), and from their increased brilliancy we draw the bright reflection that Saturn may probably have only sent his rings to be cleaned; or it may be, since Saturn is the wearer of the belt, and consequently is the Champion of the Celestial Ring, that his love of fair play made him take his rings off, insomuch as he had been challenged to have a round or two with some refractory star, who was out sky-larking. We wish Professor Airey would throw a light on this misty subject, for we are forced to confess that at present it is terribly clouded in obscurity.

Second Sight.—A pair of spectacles.

A Figurative Policeman.—A policeman giving evidence at Bow Street against a woman accused of robbing a pawnbroker, assured the magistrate that, on telling the prisoner the nature of the charge on which he captured her, she "turned away from him and swallowed a bed-tick, a pair of stays, two brass candlesticks, a smoothing-iron, and a bellows!"

Magistrate. "Nonsense! Have you lost your senses?"
Constable. "Your Worship, 'tis the tickets of them, I mane, she swallowed."

The following recipes are said never to fail:

To Destroy Rats.—Catch them, one by one, and flatten their heads in a lemon-squeezer.

To Kill Cockroaches.—Get a pair of heavy boots, then catch your roaches, put them in a barrel, and get in yourself and dance.

To Catch Mice.—On going to bed put crumbs of cheese in your mouth, and lie with it open, and when a mouse's whiskers tickle your mouth, bite.

"This is a grate country," as the poor debtor said when he looked through the bars of his prison.

An exciseman calling at the house of a good-humored landlady at Shrewsbury, she consulted him about some liquor that had been deposited in her cellar without a permit. At the words "without a permit," the exciseman rushed below, and found himself up to the middle in water, which the flooding of the Severn had forced into the cellar.

FRANCE AND MUMBO JUMBO.

Mumbo Jumbo reigns in Rome,
Feared beyond the salt-sea foam,
By his subjects scorned at home:
They laugh at Mumbo Jumbo.

Mumbo Jumbo governs there,
Guarded in St. Peter's Chair,
Romans France compels to bear
The yoke of Mumbo Jumbo.

Mumbo Jumbo Frenchmen rules
By the help of priestly tools,
For in France too many fools
Believe in Mumbo Jumbo.

Mumbo Jumbo frightens France,
Or Napoleon would advance,
And withdraw his countenance
Away from Mumbo Jumbo.

Mumbo Jumbo then would flee,
Or in Rome but own a See,
Capital of Italy
Exempt from Mumbo Jumbo.

Miss Jones says that the reason why she preferred the Sewing Machine that she bought is that the best feller in the world is attached to it.

At a representation of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," a young coxcomb hummed so loud certain airs of the opera as to annoy all his neighbors. An amateur, who sat beside him, unable to bear it any longer, said aloud, "What a fool!" "Do you mean me?" said the troublesome fellow to him. "No, Sir, I complain of Mario, who prevents my hearing you."

Hooke had a recipe of his own to prevent being exposed to the night air. "I was very ill," he said, "some months ago, and my doctor gave me particular orders not to expose myself to it; so I come up every day to Crockford's, or some other place, to dinner, and I make it a rule on no account to go home again till about four or five o'clock in the morning."

"What is the difference, lovey, between export and transport?" "Well, my duckey, if you were aboard of yonder outward-bound craft, you would be exported—I, transported."

Time is money. How willingly would some exchange it for cash!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, April 1, in the Senate, a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on the Conduct of the War to collect evidence in regard to the barbarous treatment of the Union officers and soldiers by the rebels after the battle of Bull Run, and whether the rebels have enlisted Indians in their service. Senator Sumner said it was evident we were in conflict with a people lower in the scale of civilization than ourselves, and he wanted record made for history. The debate on the bill providing for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia was then resumed. Senator Wright spoke in opposition, and Senator Fessenden in favor of the proposition.——In the House, a memorial from the Illinois Constitutional Convention, in favor of the early enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, was referred to the Military Committee. Mr. Hutchins asked leave to introduce a preamble and resolution setting forth that General Hooker, commanding on the Lower Potomac, had issued an order permitting certain slave-owners of Maryland to enter his camp and search for fugitive slaves, and requesting the Committee on the Conduct of the War to inquire whether such order is not a violation of the Article of War recently passed by Congress, forbidding any officers to return fugitive slaves to their masters. Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, objected to the reception of the resolution, and it was therefore not received. The remainder of the session was devoted to discussing the Tax bill in Committee of the Whole. Mr. Colfax moved to strike out the section levying a tax on advertisements; but the committee refused. The section was, however, modified so as to assess the advertisement tax on the amount received for the same instead of the amount charged, while the tax is reduced from five to three per cent.

On Wednesday, April 2, in the Senate, Senator Latham read the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Ex-President Pierce relative to the treasonable designs of the Knights of the Golden Circle. A resolution was adopted calling on the Secretary of War for information as to what fraudulent drafts had been accepted by Floyd while at the head of the War Department, and what amount is now outstanding. The House resolution in favor of extending pecuniary aid to States desirous of emancipating their slaves was then taken up, and, after a brief discussion, adopted by a vote of 32 to 10. The debate on the bill providing for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia was then resumed, and continued till the adjournment.——In the House, most of the session was spent in Committee of the Whole on the Tax bill, the clauses relative to stamp duties, expresses, and goods entered at custom-houses being under consideration.

On Thursday, April 3, in the Senate, a bill giving twelve months' extra pay to the widow, child, or nearest relative of the officers and seamen of the ships-of-war Cumberland and Congress was passed. Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, offered a resolution, which lies over, instructing the Military Committee to report what further legislation is necessary to prevent army officers from aiding the return or having control over fugitive slaves, and to punish them therefor. Senator Davis, of Kentucky, offered a resolution declaring "that the war shall not be prosecuted in any spirit of conquest or subjugation, but to defend the Constitution and preserve the rights of the several States unimpaired, and that the United States will prosecute the war until this is secured." This resolution was also laid over. The bill abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia was then taken up. The substitutes of Senators Clark and Dwight were rejected. A substitute, providing for the gradual emancipation of the slaves, with compensation to their owners, and the submission of the question to the people of the District, was also rejected by a vote of ten yeas to twenty-five nays. The original bill coming up, Senator Collamer, of Vermont, offered an amendment that the owners of persons held to service shall put upon file the name and a description of the person liberated by the bill within twenty days after making a claim for payment, or within such time as the commissioners may limit, under the penalty of forfeiture of the claim, and that the clerks of the Court shall issue certificates of manumission to the persons liberated. The amendment was adopted. Senator Doolittle, of Wisconsin, offered an amendment appropriating $100,000 to aid in the voluntary emigration of the persons liberated by the bill and other persons of color in the District of Columbia, to Hayti, Liberia, or other country. This was agreed to by a vote of twenty-seven to ten, and the main question being taken, the bill passed by a vote of twenty-nine yeas to fourteen nays. The announcement of the result was received with applause from the galleries.——In the House, the President was requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate any information which may be received at the Department of State showing the system of revenue or finance now existing in any foreign country. The consideration of the Tax bill was then resumed in Committee of the Whole, the clauses relative to inland insurance, mortgages, stamp duties, the tax on railroad passengers, medicines, and incomes being under consideration. All the sections of the bill have been acted on excepting the two relating to appropriations and allowances and drawbacks.

On Friday, April 4, in the Senate, Senator Hale gave notice of a new rule which he proposed to offer—that during the existing rebellion the majority of the Senate may fix the time when debate on any subject shall cease, and the Senate shall then vote on the question without further discussion. The remainder of the session was devoted to District of Columbia business.——In the House, the consideration of the Tax bill was resumed in Committee of the Whole. An amendment, offered by Mr. Blair, of Missouri, proposing to tax slaves two dollars per head gave rise to an animated discussion; but it was rejected by a vote of 47 to 62. The bill was then reported to the House by the Committee. The amendments were ordered to be printed.

Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, April 7, in the Senate, the Chairman of the Military Committee made a report authorizing the transfer of the appropriation for fortifications to the building of iron-clad gun-boats. The bill providing for the confiscation of the property of rebels was taken up, and Senator Trumbull made a long speech in its favor. Senator Harris gave notice that he should offer a substitute for the bill, and made some remarks thereon.——In the House, Mr. White offered a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee of nine members to inquire, and report as early as practicable, whether any plan can be proposed and recommended for the gradual emancipation of all the African slaves, and the extinction of slavery in Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri by the people or local authorities thereof, and whether such an object is expedient and desirable; and that they further inquire and report whether the colonization of such emancipated slaves on this continent or elsewhere is necessarily a concomitant of their freedom, and how and what provision should be made therefor; also, that they inquire how far, and in what way, the Government can and ought equitably to facilitate this object; and that they further be authorized, if in their judgment expedient, to extend their inquiries as to the other slaveholding States, and report thereon. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 67 to 59. A resolution instructing the Ways and Means Committee to report a new Tariff bill was, on motion of Mr. Stevens, laid on the table by a vote of 88 to 35. A bill establishing a uniform bankrupt law was reported by the Judiciary Committee. The Internal Tax bill was then taken up, and 73 sections passed upon by the House.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S ADVANCE.

General M'Clellan advanced with his army from Hampton on 4th April in the direction of Yorktown. On 6th he made a careful examination of the rebel works at Yorktown, and found them to be very strong and the approaches difficult. The water batteries at Yorktown and Gloucester have been considerably increased. It is evident that siege trains and mortars will have to be employed before assaulting the place, and although its capture is certain, a siege of two or three days may be necessary. All the important works before Yorktown have been already taken by our troops, and the greatest enthusiasm prevails among them. Supplies are being rapidly received from Shipping Point, which was taken possession of by our army on Sunday. A dispatch from General Wool states that the rebel General Magruder has 30,000 men at Yorktown.

THE BATTLE OF PITTSBURG.

A terrible battle has taken place in the Southwest. A dispatch dated Pittsburg, via Fort Henry, April 9, 3.20 a.m. says:

One of the greatest and bloodiest battles of modern days has just closed, resulting in the complete rout of the enemy, who attacked us at daybreak Sunday morning.

The battle lasted without intermission during the entire day and was again renewed on Monday morning, and continued undecided until four o'clock in the afternoon, when the enemy commenced their retreat, and are still flying toward Corinth, pursued by a large force of our cavalry.

The slaughter on both sides is immense. We have lost in killed and wounded and missing from eighteen to twenty thousand; that of the enemy is estimated at from thirty-five to forty thousand.

This statement of the loss is probably exaggerated. On Sunday the advantage seems to have been undetermined; but on that evening General Buell arrived with fresh troops, and attacked the enemy at daybreak on Monday 7th. The battle raged fiercely all day. The dispatch above quoted thus describes the victory:

About three o'clock in the afternoon General Grant rode to the left, where the fresh regiments had been ordered, and, finding the rebels wavering, sent a portion of his body guard to the head of each of five regiments, and then ordered a charge across the field, himself leading, as he brandished his sword and waved them on to the crowning victory, while cannon-balls were falling like hail around him.

The men followed with a shout that sounded above the roar and din of the artillery, and the rebels fled in dismay, as from a destroying avalanche, and never made another stand.

General Buell followed the retreating rebels, driving them in splendid style, and by half past five o'clock the whole rebel army was in full retreat to Corinth, with our cavalry in hot pursuit, with what further result is not known, not having returned up to this hour.

We have taken a large amount of their artillery, and also a number of prisoners. We lost a number of our forces (prisoners) yesterday, among whom is General Prentiss. The number of our force taken has not been ascertained yet. It is reported at several hundred. General Prentiss was also reported as being wounded. Among the killed on the rebel side was their General-in-Chief, Albert Sydney Johnston, who was struck by a cannon-ball on the afternoon of Sunday. Of this there is no doubt, as the report is corroborated by several rebel officers taken to-day. It is further reported that General Beauregard had his arm shot off.

THE "MERRIMAC."

The latest intelligence of the position of the Merrimac is that she was still taking in coal at the Norfolk Navy-yard on 5th. It was reported that the renowned Captain Hollins was to take command of her. Other reports say that she will be commanded by Commodore Pegram. She has two new guns on board. She will be accompanied by the Yorktown, Teaser, Jamestown, and four other gunboats. The correspondent of the Charleston Mercury says of her:

"The Merrimac is now in the dry-dock for repairs. Her iron plates are said to have withstood, with the most complete success, the effects of the terrific cannonading of the enemy, some of the sections only being riven. Her smoke-stack and ventilators were riddled by the enemy's balls so as to give them the appearance, as our informant describes them, of huge nutmeg graters. We are glad to learn from the Norfolk Day-Book that the large gun recently cast in Richmond for the Merrimac has been placed in its position on board of that vessel. It throws a solid shot weighing 360 pounds.

"The shot is of wrought iron, long, and has a steel point. This point is not conical, as in the common rifle cannon-ball, but shaped like that of the ordinary instrument for punching iron. Recent experiments show this to be a very ugly weapon, even against thick iron plates. The gun for this new projectile, with the two Armstrong guns, put aboard the Merrimac since she returned from Newport News, gives her one of the most formidable batteries in the world, in addition to her being perfectly shot and shell proof."

GENERAL BANKS DRIVING THE REBELS.

On 1st April General Banks's forces advanced upon the rebels in the neighborhood of Woodstock, drove them through it, they meanwhile fighting as they retreated. The rear-guard of the latter was constantly engaged with the advanced-guard of the former; and during their retreat the rebels set fire to the bridges and succeeded in destroying several of them. At Edenburg they made a stand, but our forces gaining the best of the contest the rebels again retreated.

ISLAND NUMBER TEN.

The rebels at Island No. 10 surrendered on the night of 7th to Commodore Foote, with all the men, guns, and other property at the position.

General Halleck telegraphs as follows:

General Pope has captured three generals, six thousand prisoners of war, one hundred siege-pieces and several field batteries, with immense quantities of small-arms, tents, wagons, and horses. Our victory is complete and overwhelming. We have not lost a single man.

BURNSIDE IN NORTH CAROLINA.

A report reached Fortress Monroe on 5th that the rebels had warned General Burnside to abandon Newbern within six days or take the consequences, and that the General replied that he would soon meet the enemy at Goldsboro' and at Raleigh, and there settle the question of evacuation. The latest from Beaufort states that Fort Macon still holds out, but that formidable preparations are being made by our troops to shell it within a few days, in which event its reduction will become inevitable.

AFFAIRS IN FLORIDA.

Our forces at Jacksonville, Florida, are momentarily expecting an attack from the rebels, consisting of two Mississippi regiments and one of Florida guerrillas, with a troop of horse and a battery of artillery. Brigadier-General Wright, commanding our troops at that place, is confident of being able to sustain himself and protect the town and the inhabitants, the majority of whom are Northern men and loyal citizens. Deserters represent the condition of the rebel forces as desperate, being entirely out of food and relying upon foraging for subsistence.

IN NEW MEXICO.

The news from New Mexico, dated the 18th ult., represents Colonel Canby still shut up at Fort Craig, and Fort Union, the strongest defense on the Western frontier, occupied by a force of fourteen hundred men. The rebels, twenty-four hundred strong, were at Albuquerque, about half-way between Forts Union and Craig. It was reported that the rebel Generals Baylor and Steele were advancing with eighteen hundred Texans on Fort Union. If possible the garrison at the latter fort would attempt to relieve Colonel Canby, and repossess Albuquerque and Santa Fé, now held by the rebels.

AFFAIRS NEAR FORT PULASKI.

Commodore Dupont and Commander Gillis report officially the abandonment by the rebels of the formidable batteries on Skidaway and Green Islands. They succeeded, however, in removing their artillery before leaving the fortifications. The works were taken possession of by our troops. The evacuation of the Thunderbolt fort, which is only five miles from Savannah, would almost indicate that a very strong defense would not be made to the Union advance upon that city. Skidaway battery was situated on the island of the same name, and commanded the approach by the Augustine River. The island is about twelve miles from the city, and was connected with the main land by bridges. Fort Pulaski is now surrounded by our forces, and the rebels have offered to evacuate, if allowed to march out with the honors of war. This proposition has been peremptorily refused by General Sherman, who demands an unconditional surrender.

GENERAL FREMONT'S DEPARTMENT.

From Western Virginia we learn that the rebels are retreating before our forces under General Milroy, who has advanced from Cheat Mountain, and now holds Camp Alleghany, lately evacuated by the rebels. The rebels have also fallen back from Monterey and Huntersville, and seem to be moving toward Staunton, where they will have a chance of escape by railroad.

ROUT OF REBELS AT UNION CITY.

On 31st March, Colonel Buford made a descent upon Union City, with the Twenty-seventh and Forty-second Illinois regiments and a part of the Fifteenth Wisconsin, accompanied by a detachment of cavalry and artillery from Hickman, commanded by Colonel Hey, and, after a forced march of thirty miles, fell upon the rebel encampments at seven o'clock in the morning, dispersing the entire force stationed there, under the rebel commanders Clay and King, consisting of both cavalry and infantry. The enemy fled in every direction. Several of them were killed and a number taken prisoners. A large amount of spoils was captured, including 150 wagons, filled with commissary and quarter-master's stores. The rebel force were supposed to number 700 infantry and between 700 and 800 cavalry.

TWO MORE MILITARY DEPARTMENTS.

Two new military departments have been created. The first comprises that portion of Virginia and Maryland lying between the Mountain Department (General Frémont's) and the Blue Ridge, which is to be called the Department of the Shenandoah, to be under command of General Banks. The other is to be designated the Department of the Rappahannock, and will comprise the portion of Virginia east of the Blue Ridge and west of the Potomac and the Fredericksburg and Richmond railroad, including the District of Columbia and the Patuxant. General M'Dowell is placed in command of this district.

NO MORE TROOPS WANTED.

Orders have been issued by the War Department recalling all officers now on recruiting service to their regiments at once, and notifying all Governors of States that no new enlistments or levies will be received until further orders from the Department, the force now in the field being considered sufficient to put down the rebellion and bring the war to a speedy termination.

ELECTION IN RHODE ISLAND.

Governor Sprague and the present incumbents of the State offices in Rhode Island were re-elected on 2d without opposition. In the Legislature in grand Committee, the Democrats and Constitutional Union Party will have a majority of about 36.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

RECEPTION OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The London journals uniformly sneer at or abuse President Lincoln's emancipation message. The Morning Post treats it as a puerile and vain scheme. It says it can only be accounted for as being the last resource of a Government which feels it is engaged in a struggle which, if continued, must involve it in ruin, and which it would make any sacrifice short of submission to arrest.

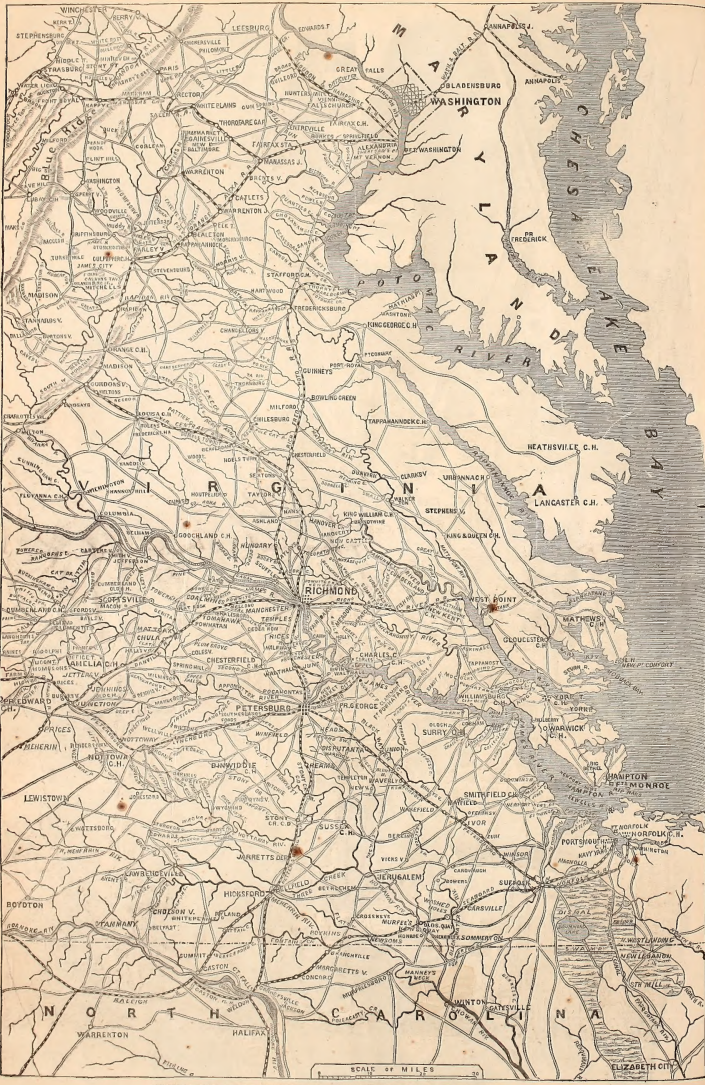
THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

The United States Minister in London has received a letter from Secretary Seward, advising him to announce to the British Cabinet the approval of our Government of the project of an Atlantic telegraph to Newfoundland. Lord Palmerston's reception of the deputation from the Atlantic Telegraph Company is regarded as very favorable.

SPAIN.

THE MEXICAN INTERVENTION.

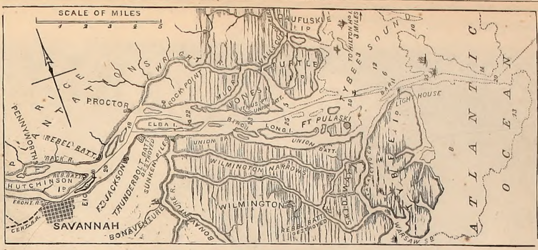
The Spanish Government has ordered General Prim not to treat with the Mexicans till the allied troops are in Mexico City.



TRANSPORTS EMBARKING TROOPS AT ALEXANDRIA, VIRGINIA.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 255.]

CITY OF NORFOLK, VIRGINIA.—[SEE PAGE 255.]

FEDERAL TROOPS AT HAMPTON, VIRGINIA.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS.—[SEE PAGE 253.]



GENERAL MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR IN VIRGINIA, SHOWING THE ROAD TO RICHMOND.

APPROACHES TO SAVANNAH.

The accompanying Map shows clearly the approaches by water to Savannah, which is situated on the south bank of the Savannah River, about eighteen miles from the Atlantic Ocean by the channel of the river, as indicated by a line on the Map. The depths of the channel, at low tide, are given in feet, the outer dotted line representing eighteen feet. It will be seen that Fort Pulaski commands the bar and channel of the river, also other water approaches, which, however, are shallow. From Hilton Head Island the United States forces passed through Cooper River, Wall's Cut, Mud and Wright rivers, into the Savannah River, and built forts on Jones and Bird's islands, which cut off supplies by water from Savannah to Fort Pulaski. Another base of operations is Warsaw Sound, south of Tybee Island, from which light-draught vessels pass into Wilmington Narrows, and thus command the land approaches to Fort Pulaski. The land being low and marshy, the cannon and mortars of the Union gun-boats have a range for miles over the banks of the streams. A wooden road has been made over the miry land of Jones Island, from the end of Wall's Cut to Venus Point, where has recently been built a strong battery commanding the river, and putting a stop to the operations of "Commodore Tatnall's Mosquito Fleet." The naval firing between Commodore Tatnall and Captain Davis was when the boats of the former were in the Savannah River, and those of the latter in Wilmington Narrows.

Sunken piles prevent our boats passing from Wilmington Narrows to the Savannah River. The Skidaway and Thunderbolt batteries, built by the rebels, have been destroyed by our gun-boats.

MAP SHOWING THE POSITION OF FORT PULASKI, AND APPROACHES TO SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

1. Mississippi River.—2. New Orleans.—3. Algiers.—4. Lake Pontchartrain.—5. Point aux Herbes.—6. Fort Pike.—7. Rigolets.—8. Fort Macomb and Menteur Pass.—9. Pine Island.—10. Lake Borgne.—11. Pearl River, boundary between Louisiana and Mississippi.—12. Malheureux Islands.—13. Shieldsborough.—14. St. Joseph's Island.—15. Cat Island.—16. Ship Island, in possession of the Federal Government.—17. Mississippi City, in possession of the Federal Government.—18. Biloxi, in possession of the Federal Government.—19. Pascagoula.—20. Horn Island.—21. Mobile.—22. Fort Morgan.—23. Fort Pickens.—24. Pensacola.—25. Gulf of Mexico.—26. Chandeleur Islands.—27. Chandeleur Sound.—28. Black Bay.—29. Fort Dupre.—30. Mouths of the Mississippi.—31. Fort Jackson.—32. Fort Philip.—33. Fort Livingston.—34. Barataria Bay.—35. Fort Leon.—36. Woodville and Canal.—37. Lake Lery.—38. Proctorville and Fort.—39. Fort Bienvenue.—40. Bayou Bienvenue.—41. New Orleans and Lake Pontchartrain Railroad.—42. New Orleans and Jackson, Mississippi, Railroad.—43. Carrollton.—44. Lake Washa.

BALLOON VIEW OF THE VICINITY OF NEW ORLEANS, LOOKING TOWARD THE GULF OF MEXICO.

THE GREAT UPRISING OF THE NORTH—AN ANNIVERSARY PICTU

E—APRIL 12, 1862.—Drawn by C. Parsons, Esq.—[See Page 242.]

WHICH GOT THE WORST OF IT?

There is a point at which the rising and the falling grades in society meet and unite—usually with some turbulence, as when things acid and alkaline are presented to each other. Family pride humbles itself to wealth, and wealth seeks, by a union with family pride, to obtain social recognition. The question is, admitting the common sentiment of incongruity in such unions, which party has made a sacrifice? which, in plainer words, has got the worst of the bargain? The representative of a decaying family, or the representative of a healthy and vigorous family? A case in point, by way of illustration, may help the mind to a conclusion; though it must by no means be taken as covering the ground.

Two men arrived in this country at the beginning of the present century, the one rich and the other poor. They were from England, and their families resided in the same neighborhood. Both were in the prime of life. The man of wealth was named Bernard Leister; the poor man, Jacob Ward. Leister bought ships, and entered into trade. He had large warehouses in New York, where the goods brought in by his ships were deposited. For the position of porter he needed a trusty man—one who, having access to his varied stores of merchandise, might be thoroughly trusted; and who, also, had sufficient intelligence to receive and deliver, and return accurate memoranda to the counting-room. A person had been recommended and tried, but proved incompetent; a second was competent enough, but failed in the high essential of integrity, and was dismissed.

"Oh for an honest man!" the merchant had ejaculated when, as the words parted his lips, Jacob Ward came in.

"Ah, Jacob! How are you?" said Mr. Leister, recognizing in a friendly way his poor fellow-countryman. Ward removed his hat as, in a respectful tone, he answered,

"Very well, thank you, Mr. Leister."

"Can I do any thing for you, Jacob?" asked the merchant.

"Yes, Sir, I think you can. I wish to send five pounds to my sister."

A slight change was visible in Leister's face—a going out of the pleased expression, as though some uncomfortable recollection had come into his mind.

"And I thought," continued Jacob Ward, "that maybe you could draw a draft on London or Liverpool."

"Yes, Jacob, I can furnish a draft. For five pounds, did you say?"

"Yes, Sir."

"To whose order shall it be drawn?"

Jacob gave his sister's name, and Mr. Leister directed a clerk to fill up first, second, and third bills of exchange for the sum desired. While the bills were preparing, Mr. Leister said:

"Well, Jacob, what are you doing?"

"I'm gardener for Mr. Wykoff, Sir."

"Ah! Mr. Wykoff is a very fine man."

"Indeed and he is, Sir."

"What are your wages?"

"Fourteen dollars a month, Sir, and found."

"That is, you get your board in addition to your wages?"

"Yes, Sir."

"You should be in a better place, Jacob," said Mr. Leister.

"I don't complain, Sir. Mr. Wykoff is a kind master, and never finds fault."

"That is because you do your duty, as your father did before you, Jacob. Your father was an honest and a faithful man, and I've always heard you well spoken of."

"Thank you, Mr. Leister. I try to do right, and then, as my father used to say, leave the rest to God."

The merchant had ejaculated, "Oh for an honest man!" and the honest man stood before him. "Faithfulness runs in this blood," he said within himself. "You might have trusted the father with uncounted gold."

"What would it cost you for boarding in the city, in case a desirable situation were to offer?" asked Mr. Leister.

"Good board can be had for $10 a month," replied Ward.

"You know something of figures?"

"A little; father sent me two years to school."

"You could weigh goods in receiving or delivering, and keep the account?"

"Yes, Sir. That's easy enough."

Leister mused for a little while, and then said:

"Jacob, I think you're the man I want. We had to send our porter away yesterday. The place is still vacant, and if you will come, it is open for you. Wages $30 a month. What do you say?"

"I couldn't leave Mr. Wykoff on such short notice, Sir. He's been very kind to me."

"If I make it all right with Mr. Wykoff, what then?"

"I'd rather take your offer, Sir, than stay where I am. I never cared much for gardening."

Mr. Wykoff, though regretting to part with so faithful a man, would not put any hinderances in his way; and Jacob Ward the gardener became Jacob Ward the porter, in which position, honest and faithful, he remained for years, his mind growing all the while, and his business knowledge increasing.

He married, two years after entering Mr. Leister's store, the daughter of a cedar cooper, who, though poor, had a clear family record. "Honest" was the father's sobriquet among his neighbors. The daughter's education was limited; but she had good sense, a warm heart, and right principles.

After being ten years in the service of Mr. Leister, holding the position, as stated, during most of the time, and receiving for the whole period an average income of about five hundred dollars a year, Jacob, who had saved nearly two thousand dollars, started in business for himself as a retail grocer. From this period he held steadily a prosperous career; not, at first, accumulating very rapidly, but always accumulating. The close of every year saw him better off than in the beginning. Gradually his business enlarged, new connections were formed, and, as means increased, he ventured on more extended operations. From a retail dealer he became an extensive wholesale merchant, having his warehouse on Pearl Street.

Meantime his family and that of Mr. Leister moved in widely different spheres, and their children were being educated and trained in a widely different manner. The Leisters were in the best society in the city—among the "exclusives," as they are sometimes called, whose very blood chills in the familiar presence of what they understand by the term "common people." Whatever money would procure for the sons and daughters in the way of education, and whatever polish of mind, and ease, and elegance of exterior were to be gained by intercourse with refined and cultivated people, were theirs. They were of the élite. On the other hand, the children of Mr. Ward came into early association at school, and in the common ways of life, with those who moved in their own sphere; but, from an innate quality, and a finer-grained material, developing into more graceful forms, and taking a better polish. They were carefully taught good principles at home, and the value of active industry. Their mother was a true woman, with an instinctive refinement of soul that shrunk from the coarse and basely common; and her children, taking something of this from her, were the more easily led and influenced.

From the two rooms, in a small house standing away in the suburbs, the family of Mr. Ward had passed to the occupancy of upper or lower stories of various-sized dwellings in different parts of the city, until at length they were able to take an entire house to themselves, and furnish it moderately well. As sons and daughters grew older, and wealth increased, the natural desire to make as good an appearance as others was felt. So an elegant residence, in the best portion of the city, was finally taken, and four or five thousand dollars expended in furnishing.

Now came the question, "Who have we here?" The sons and daughters of Mr. Ward, who had all enjoyed good educational advantages, and who, so far as manner and bearing were concerned, showed in no unfavorable contrast with those who claimed to be superior, made their appearance during the summer seasons at Saratoga, and other points of fashionable resort. They were also seen at public entertainments, and now and then in friendly association with certain persons who, holding by family relations an undisputed social position, were never afraid of losing caste through any familiar recognitions of people who might not happen to have a pedigree wholly acceptable to the superfine. With them the "What are they?" went farther than the "Who are they?"

Wealth, particularly in our country, even where the individual is of small account mentally and morally, is almost sure to receive invitations to accept of uppermost seats and chief places; and it crowds in upon old exclusive circles with a pressure that always makes way at some point, however the few claiming to be "born and bred" to the genuine aristocratic manner sneer and protest. Mr. Ward had become a substantial citizen, that is, a man of large wealth; his family lived elegantly, and kept a carriage. The sons and daughters were well educated, and accomplished. It was no difficult matter, therefore, for them to gain admittance into the "best society." We use the term conventionally, of course.

A period of thirty years works great social changes in America. Families rarely hold their places for so long a time. Luxury, self-indulgence, and the enervating effects of idleness, in most cases so deteriorate individuals of the second generation, that they are pushed aside by the more earnest and ambitious, or sink into poverty and obscurity, the result of thriftlessness, extravagance, or dissipation. Often on these decaying branches some fairer shoots remain, that seem to concentrate all that was sweet and refined in the old stock. Though admired in their own circle, recognized as of the best blood, and holding still an entrée to "good society," they rarely form alliances in the grade to which they belong—loss of wealth interposing as a barrier. Family pride limps sadly in this world, if there be not money to sustain its pretensions. Now and then it happens that, by virtue of some spiritual chemistry, these fair shoots from a decaying trunk retain only the purer and nobler essences of the soul, having rejected the gross, the mean, and the selfish. But too often they are only beautiful to the eye, having bitterness within. It is with these that newly-acquired wealth, which, in looking back to old affiliations, sees too often only what it regards as common and mean, in many instances seeks to unite itself. At this point the rising and the falling families of Jacob Ward and Bernard Leister came finally in contact; for Leister had permitted extravagant, selfish, unprincipled sons to involve him in a way that brought ruin on his fortunes. From the wreck he had managed, dishonorably, to save a sufficient sum to maintain a fair social appearance, and to live in the enjoyment of many luxuries. But his family was known as a decaying one, in which no hopeful vitality remained. The older sons, after having ruined their father, lingered helplessly about home, idly wasting their lives, until fair opportunity offered for each to lift some ambitious daughter of a rich plebeian into the envied upper circle.

The oldest son of Mr. Ward married the daughter of a merchant, whose family had risen side by side with his own, and the union was acceptable to both families. It proved congenial and happy. The oldest daughter became the wife of her father's clerk, a bright, active, honorable young man, who had been in the store from a boy. There was slight demurring to this on the part of some of the younger members, who were beginning to look above the sphere in which they had moved; but it was quickly silenced under the father and mother's cordial approval. The marriage had good promise, which did not fail.

Twice had the second son of Mr. Ward and the youngest daughter of Mr. Leister met in social circles. Each was attracted to the other. This youngest daughter was beautiful, graceful, and winning in her manners, and quite a belle, but only a belle—for the fact of her father's loss of wealth was known, and scions of the best families did not see advantage in a graft upon the one she represented. The second son of Mr. Ward was handsome, well educated, sensible, honorable, and with a purpose in life. He had some faint remembrance of their humbler days, and fancied looking forward much better than looking backward. The third meeting between young Ward and Miss Leister was attended by marked revelations of interest on both sides, mutually and pleasurably recognized. This led to a call upon the young lady. We give an incident of this call.

Mr. and Mrs. Leister, with two of their daughters, the youngest and the oldest, sat together one evening in their accustomed moody silence, when a servant handed in a card for Miss Eleanor, the youngest of the girls.

"Is he in the parlor?" asked the young lady, a sudden sparkle in her eyes.

"Yes, Miss."

"Say that I will be down in a few moments;" and she left the room to make some changes in her dress, without replying to her mother's question, "Who is it?"

On coming back, an hour after, the question was repeated by Mrs. Leister.

"His name is Mr. Ward," answered the girl.

"What Ward?" Her father almost started at the name, and put the interrogation sharply as he drew himself erect and looked, with knitted brows, at his daughter. The manner surprised and a little disconcerted Eleanor; but she answered, in a confident way,

"He's the son of Jacob Ward, the merchant."

Mr. Leister sprung to his feet, and, with strong excitement of manner, ejaculated,

"The low-bred hound! How dare he intrude himself here!"

Eleanor's face grew pale, she looked strangely at her father, and began to tremble.

"The son of Jacob Ward!" exclaimed Mrs. Leister, in surprise and contempt.

"Of my old porter! Faugh! Has it come to this?" Mr. Leister strode about, crossing the room two or three times. "Has he been here before?" He stopped in front of his agitated child, and glared down upon her almost fiercely.

"No, Sir," she answered.

"You have met him before?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Where and when?"

"I met him at Mrs. Clarendon's."

"Did the Clarendons invite him to their house?"

"I met him there, Sir, and was introduced by Mrs. Clarendon herself."

"Worse and worse!" ejaculated Mr. Leister. "There's no protection, no security, in society as it stands to-day. Money and dress are passports to any circle. Mrs. Clarendon introduced you to this low-born and low-bred fellow? I'm amazed! What could she have been thinking about?"

"Most likely," said Mrs. Leister, "she was ignorant of his origin."

"It's her business to know all about the people she invites to her house," replied Mr. Leister, still greatly disturbed.

Eleanor, who was shocked and bewildered by all this, sat for a little while in a shiver of excitement, which, gradually passing off, left her with a pale face, fixed, drooping eyes, tensely shut lips, and a statue-like stillness of person.

"Eleanor!" Mr. Leister stopped a second time in front of his child and uttered her name sternly.

She turned her head slightly, but did not look up.

"Do you hear?" There was an angry throb in his voice.

The startled girl lifted her eyes with a quick, half-frightened glance.

"Now mark what I say! If this fellow comes here again you are not to see him. Remember that! And further, if he attempts to thrust himself upon you at any time or in any place, you are to push him aside with the contempt he deserves. Do you understand?"

Eleanor's eyes had fallen to the floor, and she was again moveless as a statue. To the last sternly-spoken interrogation she answered nothing—did not give back even the feeblest sign.

"Girl! what does this mean?" Her unresponsive silence baffled while it maddened him. Still there came no reply.

"If you dare to see him again I will disown you! I will, by—!" An oath leaped madly from the father's lips.

"Bernard, in Heaven's name be calm!" said Mrs. Leister, now interposing.

"Be calm!" he cried back, fiercely. "Calm in the presence of a thing like this! Do you know what it means? Ha! I'll tell you what! It means the mixing of our blood with the vile current running in that low-born fellow's veins! Look at her! Look at her face! Can't you see what it means?"

At this moment Eleanor started up and left the room hastily, not heeding the peremptory command of her father to remain.

A scene, parallel in a degree to this, though different in spirit, transpired on the same evening in the family of Jacob Ward. The young man who had called on Miss Leister did not feel inclined, on leaving her, to look for recreation any where else, but returned directly home, coming in toward ten o'clock.

"Where have you been, George?" asked one of his sisters.

"Guess?" he answered, smiling, and yet showing enough seriousness in manner to provoke his sister's curiosity.

"To see the young lady you were so charmed with at Mrs. Clarendon's?" she inquired, with an arch look.

"Perhaps."

"Aha! Caught!" And the girl laughed merrily, as heart-free girls will laugh sometimes.

"Who is it?" inquired Mrs. Ward, looking toward her daughter.

George raised his finger and glanced at his sister with a mock show of warning; but she answered:

"A Miss Leister."

"What Miss Leister?" asked Mr. Ward, in so grave a tone, that both George and his sister turned toward him in some surprise. No reply coming immediately, he said:

"Not a daughter of Bernard Leister?"

"Yes, Sir. His youngest daughter."

Mr. Ward shook his head and looked serious.

"She's a lovely girl," said the sister, in vindication of her brother's taste.

"That may be," answered the father, "but the blood isn't good."

"Mr. Leister stands among our best families though reduced in means," said George.

"No matter what his position or standing, my son, the blood is not good," answered Mr. Ward, calmly, but firmly.

"You know something about him?"

"I do—all about him. We were boys together in England. From a child up Bernard Leister was bad. As a boy, he was selfish, overbearing, aggressive—a terror to the weak in all our neighborhood. His father's reputation was stained in some way—I never heard how; but I know that he was held in low esteem by every one. At his death, which took place after Bernard was of age, the son came into the management of his father's property, and so managed it as to absorb nearly every thing, leaving his two sisters in such limited circumstances that one of them was obliged to take employment for several years as a governess. With the money obtained by cheating his sisters, Leister came to this country, where he invested his means and took social rank as a merchant and man of cultivated mind. I have seen a great deal of him, my son, and know him thoroughly, and don't want to see his vile blood mingled with mine. It will corrupt the purest stream. Look at his worthless, spendthrift, and, I might say, vicious sons—I would hide my head in shame were I the father of such boys. Look, too, at the circumstances of his failure in business; how he managed, in fraud toward his creditors, to retain sufficient property on which to live in ease and idleness for the rest of his life. Your father, George, was once a porter in Mr. Leister's store; but, humble as his early position in life, he holds his rank from nature, as born of parents whose honor was stainless—of parents who loved truth and right—and he would think his blood debased if it ever met the current that flows in this man's veins. Qualities of soul, my son, are transmitted from father to child. Beware, then, into what family you go seeking an alliance. I speak plainly, for I see by your countenance that Miss Leister has won from you more than a passing glow of admiration; and I am not surprised, for I have observed her often in company with her mother. She has a handsome, sweet face."

"And is a sweet girl, father," said the young man.

Mr. Ward shook his head and looked very grave.

"I can not believe that so pure a face can veil a bad heart," said George.

"I do not say her heart is bad, my son. Far be it from me to judge so harshly. If I judged from her face alone I should conclude that she had a good heart. But there is an unchangeable law of transmission—of cause and effect. Under the action of this law the quality of the father's mind must be inherited by the child. I do not mean by this that the child of a bad father can not become a good man or woman; but I mean by it that an inclination to the evils indulged by parents will be inherited by the child, and that such inclinations, unless repressed, weakened, and removed, will always have more or less influence on the life and character. It is, therefore, never a safe experiment for a young man or a young woman to marry into a family where the moral record is not good. And it is not good in the present case."

So it stood with the fathers on both sides. But young hearts draw together with a magnetism that usually obeys its own laws. The argument of blood had no force with either the youth or maiden when they stood face to face and looked into each other's eyes. And it happened, as it usually happens in such cases, that opposition only drove them nearer together and more rapidly developed the latent sentiment of love. The passionate threats and denunciations of Mr. Leister and the calm reasons and remonstrances of Mr. Ward were alike ineffectual. The lovers pledged themselves to eternal fidelity. Mr. Leister proved inexorable; but Mr. Ward, when he saw how it really was with the young people, yielded like a sensible man. The marriage took place in a private way—clandestine, in fact, so far as Eleanor's family was concerned, several members of which, one of the young men in particular, acting afterward in a way to outrage public feeling, and draw upon them the condemnation of all thinking people.

The alienation, so far as the Leisters were concerned, was of short duration. Now that the disgrace was consummated, it was advisable to make the best of it; for was not Jacob Ward a man of large wealth, and his sons, now in business with their father, going on with him in the work of rapid accumulation? It was meet that a decaying and thriftless family should accept with some grace an alliance with a vigorous and growing one. But the Wards did not care to hold any close intimacy. The insolence and outrage of all social decencies that attended the marriage could not be forgotten, and would not be forgiven; and so the coldly courteous advances of the Leisters were repelled, and they stood apart, in mutual pride, each with a latent feeling of contempt for the other that did not lessen with time.

"Was there a mistake on either side?" "Which got the worst of the bargain?" We can not answer your questions. There was pain, humiliation, grief, on the part of both the young man and his bride in passing through the troubles that attended their marriage. Out of these Eleanor emerged through transference from the old to a new family circle, in which the heart's warmth was an all-pervading atmosphere, and into a sphere of life where truth, honor, virtue, self-denial for others, and the highest moral aims were the inspiring motives. In this new atmosphere latent germs of good put forth tender leaves: there was a budding and blossoming toward higher things, and fruits of good living came in time. All this, with her husband's help, in whom, not with her husband ever conscious of his mistake, if such a mistake were made.

And yet the world will think with us, taking the blood, it might have been different.

TO A BIRD SINGING IN THE WOODS.

O Tanesay! upon the beechen bough,
Shake the glad wings, and utter
All things around thy dwelling now
Bud freshly in the spring.

Through new-op'd leaves of brightest green
The golden sunlight breaks;
The fern-leaves o'er the streamlets lean
The star primroses wake.

And over all the sunshine flows,
And over all the song,
Sole breaker of the woods' repose,
Floats as we pass along.

Thou hast no past, no future, bird!
Sing on in unclouded glee;
From me shall come no harsher word
To mar thy minstrelsy.

Sing clear and shrill! 'tis good to list
Thy song of gladness;
And in this weary world to wist
That some rejoice like thee!

Some who can dwell in simple trust
Mid this day's leaves and flowers;
Nor taint their beauty with the dust
Of other by-gone hours.

JOHN SAYRE'S CONFESSION.

"THAT'S no use talking to me, Cooper. I'm an old man, but I'm not to be fooled, I kin tell ye. We've talked this thing over 'bout enough. The time's come now for something to be done, and, by ginger! I hope every blamed Yankee'll be drug squar ass on the country."

"Why you have they done, Doctor, that you want to drive 'em out. These same Yankees are the working bees of the South. They ain't lazy, are they?"

"Lazy! I wish to thunder they was. It's my opinion they're a mighty sight busier'n they have any business diffikilty. They're the built time a snoopin round, up stars an' down stars, an' in my lady's chamber, to see what they kin find to make a fuss in dime on."

"That's no fault, Doctor, so long as they're honest. You don't mean to say they're not honest, do you?"

"Honest! What d'ye call honest? Kin a man be honest tha'll steal niggers? Answer me that, ou I'll talk to ye."

"No, perhaps not. Maybe not if he trades in them either."

"There ye go agin with your carsed abolition ideas. It's my opinion, George Cooper, that old Tennessee ain't big enough to hold you. If you vally yer hide it's like enough it'll be safer for you outside the State limits."

"I'm much obliged to you, Doctor, for the advice, but I think I shall stay in Nashville yet a while. I've been connected with this town nigh six years, and I don't believe any body's going to trouble me now because I don't happen to be of the same opinion as themselves."

"Ye don't, eh! Well, Sir, there's been smarter fellers nor you toted around on a rail, and treated free to tar and feathers for yer views. I'll give ye till my advice to you to get some dirt betwixt you an' Nashville jist as soon as ye kin git ready, and take that white-faced sister of yourn along too."

A smile had been upon the face of George Cooper until the last few words, but it vanished in a moment, and a flush lit up his features and sparkled in his eye. Controlling his indignant feelings spirit was at work checking his tongue, and possibly laid hand toward the speaker, was very apparent. He looked him steadily for an instant in the eye, until that of the old man quailed, and then with a slight gesture of contempt turned aside, passed out toward the road, unhitched his horse, and drove away.

George Cooper was a Massachusetts man. Six years before he had settled in Nashville to follow a mercantile career, and success had crowned his labor. Three years before, his young and only sister, Mother, George Cooper had brought to a new Southern home an only sister, Clara, a type of Northern beauty, pure and pale, but still possessing the Northern traits of industry and activity. Around this sister his love clung with a devotion that admitted no compromise. He could bear the slurs and half-uttered threats of Doctor John Sayre on himself, but when a word was whispered that Clara he was ready to have offered up the offender to indignation or expiration of breath.

We have said that some strong controlling spirit was at work checking his tongue and possibly his hand. We will explain.

Doctor John Sayre was a physician of the old Southwestern school. It would no doubt have puzzled Doctor John to have shown a diploma, had he been obliged to collect his fee by process of law. He had settled in Tennessee in the early days when a little learning went a long way, and a soap pill was swallowed without much relish. He had been a careful man, having married a plantation with fifty negroes, to say nothing of the encumbrance of a wife, within five miles of Nashville, which, after careful nursing—the plantation, not the wife —of quarter of a century, had not decreased in value. At the time of our writing Doctor John Sayre found himself a widower with one son, Willis Sayre, and about one hundred thousand dollars of the world's goods to take care of. There was one little of story in which Doctor John was lighted beyond all others, medicine included, which was, that the Abolitionists were at work all over the South through the Southern press and by Southern demagogues, all tending to the theory that the product of his plantation was the best in the whole world, and must be had, at whatever risk and cost.

"Look'e here, Sir!" Doctor John would argue, "do you see that thar head o' cotton? Well, I've come, Sir, wine that ar article will fetch double what it fetched ten years ago, and that's a distance distance by ginger! It'll come, Sir, jist as soon as these byar States con-clude to sep-arate from yer sacred dickens, yer Abolitionists, and Northern scum. North. They kin do it, Sir, and, by ginger, they will do it!"

"But, Doctor," some political economist would answer, "don't you know that the great trouble with the cotton-raising yield just now is that the article is too high, and that they are trying, with might and main, to find some place upon the face of the earth where it can be cultivated cheaper by substituting free labor."

"Free labor sounds Doctor John; "free labor can't make cotton, Sir. An' if they could, Sir, d'ye mean to say that free labor is cheaper'an niggers? The idee is pre-pos-te-rous, strong, Sir."

"I mean to say, Doctor, that you Southern planters are at the present time selling your cotton more for your labor than Northern farmers, and running more risks at it."

"The thing's impossible, Sir!" says Doctor John, with a mighty thump on the table; "it can't be proved."

"See here, Doctor, what do you give for a first-class field hand?"

"Fifteen hundred dollars, Sir," says Doctor John, with slight exultation.

"Very well. You account on that money by Southern rule, or in fact by any rule, would be 10 per cent, or one hundred and fifty dollars per annum. You lumm him for twenty-five dollars, still risking five hundred dollars; this costs you fifteen dollars per annum. You clothe him, that costs you twenty-five dollars a year; and then you have to doctor and get enough under other tribes we won't name, but set them down at five dollars. Now, you see, that one field hand for 4 comes to exactly $200. Besides which you lose the work of Master Cuffee when he is too sick or lazy. Now, Doctor, the Northern farmer can't afford to the labor market and buys his stout, able man, for exactly one dollars per month, and takes it out in the exercise or ride upon him. He has no hard nothing in my calculation about feeding, but it is well understood that everybody has to be fed. Now, I'll just column Doctor and see if I'm right; one hundred and twenty against two hundred."

"The thing's all wrong, Sir!" the Doctor will shout with another mighty thump, by the way of emphasizing it. "By ginger, Sir, you can't buy niggers, Sir! and make 'em stick to me too, Sir!"

It would have been a cold blow to Doctor John to have told him that his plantation had actually built such strong hopes that he would inherit, with the plantation, a wife and children possessing much his bitter hatred of Yankees, was at heart exactly his opposite; and yet the father had strange suspicions that all was not right between his daughter with his son's political proclivities. Argument never arose between them, for Willis was too wise for that; but there was no lack of these among the neighbors who could hint to the old man enough to fill him to bursting with bile.

There were also those who did not hesitate to speak evil against the young Northerner, and when Clara Cooper great changes had come to pass with Willis Sayre, and that he was strongly given to praise his sister in many companies as the model measure of Southern rights was urged; and some even went so far as to accuse him of the rank heresy of Unionism.

There was no denying the fact that Willis Sayre was charmed with the society of the fair young sister of Clara Cooper. Before she had arrived at her Tennessee home Willis and George had been warm friends, but after her coming the former became a subject of their conversation, until it seemed to Willis, when they did meet, that he was greeting an old friend, or one whom he had loved in the past. It was not strange that from such antecedents love should spring, and it had sprung, grown, and flourished in spite of the opposition of Doctor John.

All this is key to the last injunction of Dr. John Sayre to George Cooper, that he should "get some dirt betwixt you an' Nashville," and "take the Lord'll let ye; and take that white-faced sister of yourn along too." All this was working in the ear and the temper of Cooper, as he rode on from the plantation to Nashville, and through all the day he knew that the Doctor was working in quiet manner, if he could judge from the anxious looks of his servants, and the fact that at no other time she glanced at his face. George Cooper was sufficiently posted in the operations of Vigilance Committees since the breaking out of September.

At last came the fall of Donelson, the stronghold of rebel Tennessee, and the crash shook the land. One of the first that sprang over the line of works was Willis Sayre. Those who were with him said that his wild shout for the "Union and Old Tennessee" did more toward quickening the flying feet of the rebels than any thing else. That night, when the work was done, and hands were grasped over the camp-fire in hope for the future, and friendly greetings for the football games over the soil from which they had been obliged to flee, George and Willis were dreaming of the days of last year before, when they had gone forth without knowing whither their steps tended. Within a few days they would be once more in Nashville, George to attempt the recovery of the property he had been obliged to surrender to rack and plunder, and Willis to find the old plantation on which he was born, and his father, perhaps, a fugitive.

Scouts were coming in from all directions, and small parties returning from reconnoitring expeditions, bringing in sometimes prisoners, sometimes captured provisions or material.

"Major," said a sergeant, touching his cap, "we have a squad of scouts that we've just brought in, an old man and four soldiers. The old man swears that he's trooper that he's a non-combatant—whatever that is—but we thought it best to bring him along, though he tried mighty hard to get off. We've also caught him down below here in an empty wagon, under guard, until we made our report."

"Come, Willis, let us stretch our legs a little on Old Tennessee again. Let us go down and examine our prisoner. Perhaps we may get something new."

Hardly a minute had passed after the sergeant the white canvas tops of the army wagons were glistening in the moonlight, and the one containing the prisoner was driven up by the guard mounted over it. As they approached they could hear the voice of the prisoner in high altercation with the guard.

"What's yer general, I says my complaints to him, and say that I'm a non-combatant. By ginger! did mention to him that Doctor John Sayre of Nashville, Tennessee, is hyar, an' pertests that he is being held a prisoner of war. I'm a gentleman, d'ye see. Tell him that."

There was no mistaking that voice, even had the name not been announced, and George and Willis stood astounded and listened to the harangue of the pseudo-prisoner. At last George, motioning Willis to keep in the back-ground, advanced toward the wagon, knowing that he could trust to the uniform for concealment.

"Here's the 'general,' squire!" was the greeting of the sergeant, pointing out the Major to the prisoner.

"Ah! general, I'm glad to see ye," was Doctor John's rather forced response. "I reckon ye may have picked me up to-night, and, by ginger, they talked of leaving me right out o' hand. I told 'em I was a gentleman an' a non-combatant, but they didn't seem to mind that."

"You ought to have hurrahed for the Union. They would have understood that," was George's brief answer.

This was a bitter joke for Doctor John, but he swallowed it with a ghastly smile, and returned some more to what he stated, with,

"Why, d'ye see, general, I'm a non-combatant, and can't according to that to made a prisoner of war."

"Are you a Union man?" was George's poser; which John Sayre dodged with,

"D'ye see, general, I wasn't taken with arms in my hands."

"Are you willing to take the oath of allegiance?"

"It won't do, general, d'ye see, to keep me prisoner, and send me up North, general, in that case I shn't be home in time to put in a crop."

"Are you willing to take the oath of allegiance?" repeated George.

The Doctor gulped heavily, and thrust his head well out through the several-cornered aperture in the back of the wagon, and then went on,

"I would to tod, general, by ginger! to keep from that oath if I could struggle to get off, and be a prisoner, when it is jist comin time for crap."

"Once more, and the last time, Are you willing to take the oath?" said George, in a very decided tone.

"Well, stranger—general, I mean—by ginger, yes!"

"Very well then, you shall have your liberty, Doctor, and go home. Release the prisoner, men. I'll take him to the quarters and swear him myself."

Willis, Doctor John, and Doctor Cooper then took their way, the two first keeping the capes of their overcoats well up about their faces, the latter quiet and silent. When they were out of other hearing George came close beside the Doctor.

"Doctor, there is one oath more in the terms upon which I shall give you liberty."

"What is it?" asked the Doctor, in an anxious tone, trying hard to peer into the muffled face beside him.

"It is most content to the marriage of your son to my white-faced sister."

The Doctor grasped as though he had been shot, and was speechless.

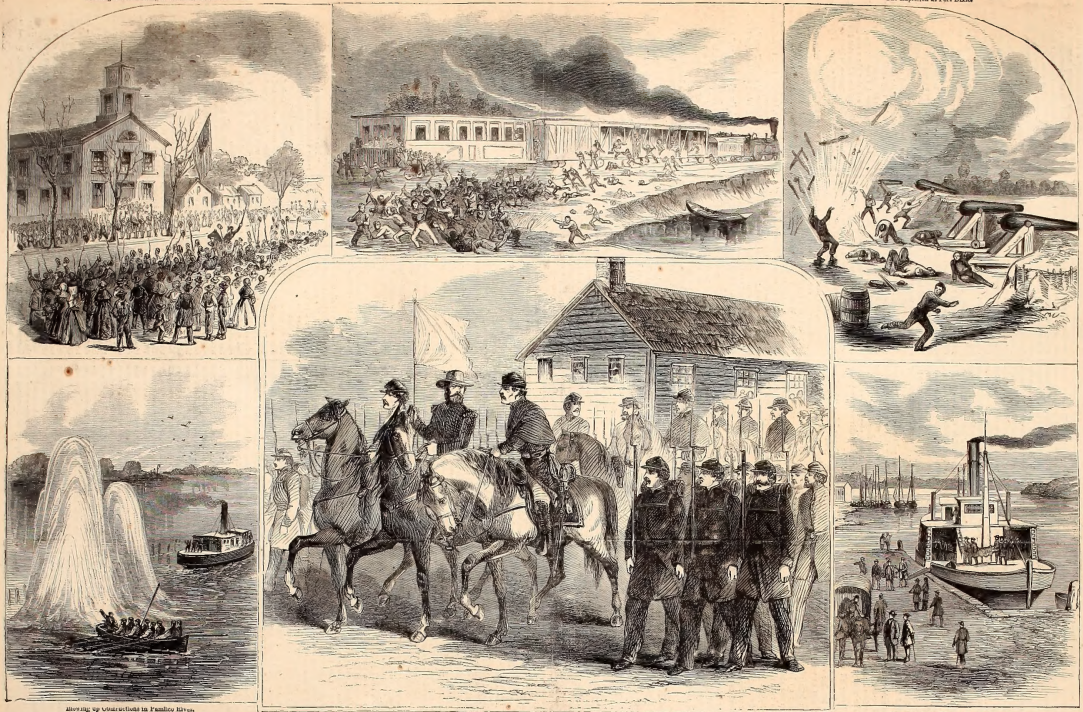
"You had better do it, father," said Willis, coming out into the front and dropping the cape from his face. "Cooper's commanding officer to-night, and must be obeyed."

"Wa'al, by ginger! this is a con-spi-ra-cy!" shouted Doctor John, half in fright, half in astonishment.

"Better keep quiet, Doctor," was George's caution; "I can assure you there's no secret nothing can save you from Clara's and mine's union at the end of the war. I must be sure that you are sound on your loyalty before I can consent to that."

"Oh, well! go on," groaned Doctor John: "ye has jist de as ye please, but, by ginger! I'll never kin consent to have any to do with the cussed thing either one way or t'other."

Without a word more, Doctor, for the oath, and then 'onward to Nashville."



A few days later and George, Willis, and the Doctor were in Nashville, gathering together the wreck of Cooper's property, to which they are much assisted by Doctor John's anti-Union friends, for, as the Doctor argues, since I've got to have this gal for a daughter-in-law, I might as well look out for the main chance. The Doctor also begins to confess that he likes Yankees better as he sees more of them, though he has not yet admitted that the charm lies in liking a man better after you have fought with him, especially when you have got the best of him.

There will be a wedding in Nashville this spring, as soon as troops are sufficiently settled to allow Clara to return.

Hoisting the Union Flag at Washington, North Carolina.

Flight of the Rebels at Newbern.

The Explosion at Fort Dixie.

Rebel Cavalry entering Newbern on the Road to Trent.

Shelling up Contrabands in Pamlico River.

Removal of the Wounded to Newbern Hospital.

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION—SCENES AT NEWBERN AND WASHINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA.—SKETCHED BY MR. ANDREW WEBER.—[SEE PAGE 254.]

PARSON BROWNLOW, THE EXILE FROM TENNESSEE.

PARSON BROWNLOW OF TENNESSEE.

HEREWITH we publish a portrait of the famous PARSON BROWNLOW of TENNESSEE, whose escape out of the hands of the rebels is the subject of so much comment. The following sketch of the Parson's life has been prepared by one of his friends:

William G. Brownlow was born in Wythe County, Virginia, August, 1806. His parents were poor, and, as soon as he was about ten years old, Mary Cone lost her husband, and his father was a relative of General Hise, in Rockbridge County. After the death of his father he lived with his mother's relations, and was raised to hard labor until he was some eighteen years old, when he served a regular apprenticeship to the trade of a house-carpenter.

His education was imperfect and irregular, even in those branches taught in the common-schools of the country. He entered the Traveling Ministry, in 1826, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and travelled two years without a fixed location, and was a member of the General Conference held at Philadelphia. He was unfitting for his energy, and avoided himself of the advantages of the Methodist Itinerancy to study and improve his education, which he did to all the English branches.

Mr. Brownlow is about six feet high, and weighs about 175 pounds; has had as fine a constitution to stay out ever had. He has no gray hairs in his head, and does not look a man of thirty-five years. He has had the strongest voice of any man in East Tennessee, where he has resided for the last thirty years, and consequently an interesting family. He has been speaking all that time, taking a part in all the controversies of the day.

He is the author of several books; but the one which has had the largest run is one of over four hundred pages, being a vindication of the Methodist church against the attacks of Rev. J. A. Graves, in Nashville. Brownlow's work was published by the Southern Methodist Publishing House, and considering the 100,00 copies have been circulated in the South and West. It is a work of great severity, but truth is severe.

In 1838 he was engaged in a debate upon the Slavery question, in Philadelphia, with Rev. Mr. Ross, of New York, in which he defended the institution of Slavery with masked utility, exhibiting a familiarity with the subject and the vexed question in all its bearings. The debate, a volume of some four hundred pages, is for sale by J. Harper & Co.

He is known throughout the length and breadth of this land as the "Fighting Parson," but seems to more perseverance, or more highly esteemed by his neighbors. Few men are more churchdoughnut few, of his size in the land.

He never was so much in the course of a year.

He is quite a politician, though he has never been an office-seeker or an office-holder. He commenced his political career in Tennessee in 1835, by writing a series of letters of John Quincy Adams as against Andrew Jackson. He has been all his life a Whig, and Clay was his idol. He never was his standard-bearer in political orthodoxy. He paper, but the largest circulation of any political paper in Tennessee, and exercised a controlling influence in the politics of the State.

The correspondent of the Louisville Journal, who met him at Nashville, received from him the following account of his sufferings under the rule of the secessionists:

Shortly after the persecution of the secession enemies compelled the Parson to suspend his publication of the Whig he was prevailed upon by his friends, who, more than himself, feared for his personal safety, to accept an invitation of the residence of the rebel authorities to grant him a safe-conduct to the North, and set himself in communication with the Secretary of War at Richmond. The result was, that in the last days of November the military commander at Knoxville received instructions to provide us an escort, under which Brownlow was to be taken to the nearest Federal lines. Accordingly he commenced his journey, in his involuntary visit to the North, and was clear ready to start when, notwithstanding his agreement with Brownlow, he was arrested by the civil authorities upon the charge of having, when hard upon certain editorials in the Whig. He was taken to the county jail, thronged at that time with Unionists, and commenced an experience of it participated in the bridge-burning in the early part of November, and confined as a hostage for the good behavior of the Union people, with the very distinct intimation that whether both met their provision, nor was there much for all to be down at one time. The fare of the prisoners was of the coarsest "such," to speak with the Parson, "as no gentleman would think good enough to feed his dog upon." To be short, the treatment of all the prisoners was as harsh and inhuman as ever disgraced the Austrian dungeons in Italy. It told even severely upon the health of the Parson, and after a month he was stricken down with typhoid fever. Permission was granted by the rebel prosecuting attorney, he was removed to still private residence. Here he was laid up for nearly eight weeks, and was released on his promising by solemn oath to visit no secession soap him did not stop. His house was surrounded day and night by guards. His friends were never allowed to visit him, and the members of his family were not permitted to leave the premises except under guard. Not say this all. Up to inside and threats were offered by the rebel military whenever opportunity offered. At one time a company of cavalry that had been in the battle of Fishing Creek, and were loudly reported coming down from Knoxville, and getting the house when the Parson's wife was looking out of his windows, one of the troopers rode up to her, and, insultingly asked, "Are you not ashamed to be the wife of a d—d traitor and a traitor to Lincoln?" Whereupon the lady retired indoors as soon replied: "I am glad that I am not the wife of a miserable coward that has ever run a battle-field."

Feeling strong enough to travel, about three weeks ago the Parson again rode to Knoxville, completing of his last faith with which he had been treated, and remaining the Secretary of War of the propriety of a safe-conduct to the Federal lines. A week elapsed, when the post commander at Knoxville received a dispatch directing the Parsonto be released from confinement, and to be taken to the nearest Federal outpost over the same route con venient to him, and under an escort of his own choice. In pursuance to this order the Parson left Knoxville some twelve days since, accompanied by his doctor, and escorted by Lieutenant Colonel Carter, of the Union Army, and a company of cavalry. The party proceeded by rail, via Chattanooga, to Bridgeport, Jackson County, in the north ern part of this State. Here they were detained two days by Sergeant Cawley, who refused to allow them to cross the large quantity of forage and beef stored in the town, and had orders from General Buckner not to allow any one to pass their lines until the whole of the meat had been got away. At last the party were permitted to proceed over land, under a flag of truce, to the picket posts of General Wood's Division. General Wood at once sent them, under escort, to the city. Parson Brownlow proceeded immediately to the head-quarters of General Buell, with whom he had a long interview; afterward reported to the City Guard Hotel, where his room has been crowded all the afternoon by friends and strangers, congratulating him upon his safety and listening to the story of his sufferings.

The Parson is in excellent health, notwithstanding the hardships to which he has been subjected, and unaccompanied as ever; that time will make their appearance. He is now at rest as the Federal troops will make their appearance. The day of vengeance is most earnestly prayed for by them, and they will visit powerful retribution upon the heads of all their persecutors.

At Cincinnati the heroic old exile gave an account of his sufferings. The correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial thus reported him:

He gave a touching narrative of his sufferings in prison, of his illness, and of the kindness of his friends in general, over him were detailed when he was so ill could not turn in bed without assistance. The jail was crowded with Union men. Many sickened and perished miserably in it, and others were taken out and hung. General Carroll, of the Confederate army, was at one time a personal friend of his, being a Union man until a late period, visited him in jail, and said to him: "Brownlow, you ought not to be here." "So I think," the Parson responded; "but here I am." The General said the Confederates were starving within a hundred yards of the jail, and if he would take the oath of allegiance he should be immediately released. "No, sir," said the Parson, looking him steadily in the eye, "before I will take the oath of allegiance to your bogus Government I will rot in jail, or die here of old age." I have been informed that you have a rope in your possession you have a Government. It has never been whipped by any Power on earth, and never will be. Before I would take the oath I would see the whole Southern Confederacy in the infernal regions, and you on top of it."

The Parson remained in the jail, continuing, "That is d—d plain talk." "Yes, Sir-re," said the Parson. "I am a plain man, and there is no equivocation." Frequently men were taken out of the jail and hung, and the secessionists would howl at him, and tell him, as he lay sick on from the jail windows, that he was to be hung next. He told them from these windows that he was ready to go to the gallows, and all hanged was one hour's talk to the people before he was to be hung, that he might have his opinions of the men called the Southern Confederacy. He told them that they were a set of d—d cowards, and up to mind to it. At one time he was tried by court-martial, and in the decision of his case he was within one vote of being sentenced to be hung. There was nothing between him and the gallows but the will of one man, and him a secessionist. Great God, on what a slender thread

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN M'LENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER X.

ON returning to the house Magdalen felt her shoulder suddenly touched from behind as she crossed the hall. She turned and confronted her sister. Before she could ask any questions Norah eagerly addressed her in these words:

"I beg your pardon; I beg you to forgive me."

Magdalen looked at her sister in astonishment. All memory, as the result of the sharp words which had passed between them in the shrubbery, was lost in the new interests that now absorbed her: lost as completely as if the angry interview had never taken place. "Forgive you!" she repeated, amazedly. "What for?"

"I have heard of your new prospects," pursued Norah, speaking with a mechanical submissiveness of manner which seemed almost outrageous; "I wished to set things right between us before you went away. I was sorry for what happened. Will you forget it? Will you forget and forgive what happened in the shrubbery?"

She could not proceed: her inveterate reserve —or perhaps her obstinate reliance on her own opinion—influenced her at those last words. Her face clouded over on a sudden. Before Magdalen could answer her she turned away abruptly and ran up stairs.

The door of the library opened before Magdalen could follow her, and Miss Garth advanced to express the sympathetic regret of the occasion.

They were not the mechanically-submissive sentiments which Magdalen had just heard. Norah had struggled against her rooted distrust of Frank, in deference to the unanswerable decision of both her parents in his favor; and had suppressed the open expression of her antipathy, though the feeling itself remained unconquered. Miss Garth had made no such concession to the parents and interests of the house. She had hitherto held the position of a high authority on all domestic questions; and she freely declined to get off her pedestal in deference to any change in the family circumstances, no matter how amazing or how unexpected that change might be.

"I accept my congratulations," said Miss Garth, bristling all over with implied assertions to Frank—"my congratulations, and my apologies. When I caught you kissing Mr. Francis Clare in the summer-house I had no idea you were engaged in carrying out the intentions of your parents. I offer no opinion on the subject. I merely regret my own accidental appearance in the character of an Obstacle in the course of true love—which appears to run smooth in summer-houses, whatever Shakspeare may say to the contrary. Consider me for the future, if you please, as an Obstacle removed. May you be happy!" Miss Garth's last words had come at that last sentence like a trap; and Miss Garth's eyes looked ominously prophetic into the matrimonial future.

If Magdalen's anxieties had not been far too serious to allow her the consciousness of any thing, she would have been ready, on the instant, with an appropriately satirical answer. As it was, Miss Garth simply irritated her. "Pooh!" she said, and ran up stairs to her sister's room.

She knocked at the door, and there was no answer. She tried the door, and it resisted her from the inside. The sullen, unmanageable Norah was locked in.

Under other circumstances Magdalen would not have been satisfied with knocking—she would have called through the door loudly and more loudly till the house was disturbed, and she had carried her point. But the doubts and fears of the morning had unnerved her shrewdly. She went down stairs again softly, and took her hat from the stand in the hall. "He told me to put my hat on," she said to herself, with a much-filled docility which was totally out of her character.

"CONSIDER ME FOR THE FUTURE, IF YOU PLEASE, AS AN OBSTACLE REMOVED."

She went into the garden, on the shrubbery side, and waited there to catch the first sight of her father on his return. Half an hour passed—forty minutes passed—and then his voice reached her from among the distant trees. "Come in to heel!" she heard him call out loudly to the dog. Her face turned pale. "He's angry with Snap!" she exclaimed to herself, in a whisper. The next minute he appeared in view, walking rapidly, with his head down, and Snap at his heels in disgrace. The sudden excess of her alarm as she observed those ominious signs of something wrong rallied her natural energy, and determined her desperately on knowing the worst.

She walked straight forward to meet her father.

"Your face tells your news," she said, faintly. "Mr. Clare has been as heartless as usual—Mr. Clare has said No?"

Her father turned on her with a sudden severity so entirely unparalleled in her experience of him that she started back in downright terror.

"Magdalen!" he said, "whenever you speak of my old friend and neighbor again, bear this in mind. Mr. Clare has just laid me under an obligation which I shall remember gratefully to the end of my life."

He stopped suddenly after saying those remarkable words. Seeing that he had startled her, his natural kindness prompted him instantly to soften the reproof, and to end the suspense from which she was plainly suffering. "Give me a kiss, my love," he resumed, "and I'll tell you in return that Mr. Clare has said—Yes."

She attempted to thank him, but the sudden luxury of relief was too much for her. She could only cling round his neck in silence. He felt her trembling from head to foot, and said a few words to calm her. At the altered tones of his master's voice Snap's meek tail reappeared fiercely from between his legs, and Snap's lungs modestly tested his position with a brief experimental bark. The dog's quaintly appropriate assertion of himself on his old footing was the interruption of all others which was best fitted to restore Magdalen to herself. She caught the shaggy little terrier up in her arms and kissed him next. "You darling," she exclaimed, "you're almost as glad as I am!" She turned again to her father with a look of tender reproach. "You frightened me, papa," she said. "You were so unlike yourself."

"I shall be right again to-morrow, my dear. I am a little upset to-day."

"Not by me?"

"No, no."

"By something you have heard at Mr. Clare's?"

"Yes—nothing you need alarm yourself about; nothing that won't wear off by to-morrow. Let me go now, my dear, I have a letter to write; and I want to speak to your mother."

He left her and went on to the house. Magdalen lingered a little on the lawn to feel all the happiness of her new sensations, then turned away toward the shrubbery to enjoy the higher luxury of communicating them. The dog followed her. She whistled and clapped her hands. "Find him!" she said, with beaming eyes. "Find Frank!" Snap scampered into the shrubbery, with a blood-thirsty snarl at starting. Perhaps he had mistaken his young mistress, and considered himself her emissary in search of a rat?

Meanwhile Mr. Vanstone entered the house. He met his wife, slowly descending the stairs, and advanced to give her his arm. "How has it ended?" she asked anxiously, as he led her to the sofa.

"Happily—as we hoped it would," answered her husband. "My old friend has justified my opinion of him."

"Thank God!" said Mrs. Vanstone, fervently. "Did you feel it, love?" she asked, as her husband arranged the sofa pillows—"did you feel it as painfully as I feared you would?"

"I had a duty to do, my dear—and I did it."

After replying in those terms he hesitated. Apparently he had something more to say—something perhaps on the subject of that passing uneasiness of mind which had been produced by his interview with Mr. Clare, and which Magdalen's questions had obliged him to acknowledge. A look at his wife decided his doubts in the negative. He only asked if she felt comfortable, and then turned away to leave the room.

"Must you go?" she asked.

"I have a letter to write, my dear."

"Any thing about Frank?"

"No: to-morrow will do for that. A letter to Mr. Pendril; I want him here immediately."

"Business, I suppose?"

"Yes, my dear—business."

He went out and shut himself into the little front room, close to the hall-door, which was called his study. By nature and habit the most procrastinating of letter-writers, he now inconsistently opened his desk and took up the pen without a moment's delay. His letter was long enough to occupy three pages of note-paper; it was written with a readiness of expression and a rapidity of hand which seldom characterized his proceedings when engaged over his ordinary correspondence. He wrote the address as follows: "Immediate:—William Pendril, Esq., Searle Street, Lincoln's Inn, London"—then pushed the letter away from him, and sat at the table, drawing lines on the blotting-paper with his pen, lost in thought. "No," he said to himself; "I can do nothing more till Pendril comes." He rose; his face brightened as he put the stamp on the envelope. The writing of the letter had sensibly relieved him, and his whole bearing showed it as he left the room.

On the door-step he found Norah and Miss Garth setting forth together for a walk.

"Which way are you going?" he asked. "Any where near the post-office? I wish you would post this letter for me, Norah. It is very important—so important, that I hardly like to trust it to Thomas as usual."

Norah at once took charge of the letter.

"If you look, my dear," continued her father, "you will see that I am writing to Mr. Pendril. I expect him here to-morrow afternoon. Will you give the necessary directions, Miss Garth? Mr. Pendril will sleep here to-morrow night, and stay over Sunday.—Wait a minute! To-day is Friday. Surely I had an engagement for Saturday afternoon?" He consulted his pocket-book, and read over one of the entries with a look of annoyance. "Grailsea Mill, three o'clock, Saturday. Just the time when Pendril will be here; and I must be at home to see him. How can I manage it? Monday will be too late for my business at Grailsea. I'll go to-day instead, and take my chance of catching the miller at his dinner-time." He looked at his watch. "No time for driving; I must do it by railway. If I go at once I shall catch the down-train at our station, and get on to Grailsea. Take care of the letter, Norah. I won't keep dinner waiting; if the return train doesn't suit I'll borrow a gig and get back in that way."

As he took up his hat Magdalen appeared at the door, returning from her interview with Frank. The hurry of her father's movements attracted her attention, and she asked him where he was going.

"To Grailsea," replied Mr. Vanstone. "Your business, Miss Magdalen, has got in the way of mine, and mine must give way to it."

He spoke those parting words in his old hearty manner, and left them, with the old characteristic flourish of his trusty stick.

"My business!" said Magdalen. "I thought my business was done."

Miss Garth pointed significantly to the letter in Norah's hand. "Your business, beyond all doubt," she said. "Mr. Pendril is coming to-morrow; and Mr. Vanstone seems remarkably anxious about it. Law and its attendant troubles already! Governesses who look in at summer-house doors are not the only obstacles to the course of true love. Parchment is sometimes an obstacle. I hope you may find Parchment as pliable as I am—I wish you well through it. Now, Norah!"

Miss Garth's second shaft struck as harmless as the first. Magdalen had returned to the house a little vexed; her interview with Frank having been interrupted by a messenger from Mr. Clare, sent to summon the son into the father's presence. Although it had been agreed at the private interview between Mr. Vanstone and Mr. Clare that the questions discussed that morning should not be communicated to the children until the year of probation was at an end—and although, under these circumstances, Mr. Clare had nothing to tell Frank which Magdalen could not communicate to him much more agreeably—the philosopher was not the less resolved on personally informing his son of the parental concession which rescued him from Chinese exile. The result was a sudden summons to the cottage which startled Magdalen, but which did not appear to take Frank by surprise. His filial experience penetrated the mystery of Mr. Clare's motives easily enough. "When my father's in spirits," he said, sulkily, "he likes to bully me about my good luck. This message means that he's going to bully me now."

"Don't go," suggested Magdalen.

"I must," rejoined Frank. "I shall never hear the last of it if I don't. He's primed and loaded, and he means to go off. He went off once, when the engineer took me; he went off twice, when the office in the City took me; and he's going off thrice, now you've taken me. If it wasn't for you I should wish I had never been born. Yes, your father's been kind to me, I know—and I should have gone to China if it hadn't been for him. I'm sure I'm very much obliged. Of course we have no right to expect any thing else—still it's discouraging to keep us waiting a year, isn't it?"

Magdalen stopped his mouth by a summary process to which even Frank submitted gratefully. At the same time she did not forget to set down his discontent to the right side. "How fond he is of me!" she thought. "A year's waiting is quite a hardship to him." She returned to the house, secretly regretting that she had not heard more of Frank's complimentary complaints. Miss Garth's elaborate satire, addressed to her while she was in this frame of mind, was a purely gratuitous waste of Miss Garth's breath. What did Magdalen care for satire? What do Youth and Love ever care for except themselves? She never even said as much as "Pooh!" this time. She laid aside her hat in serene silence, and sauntered languidly into the morning-room to keep her mother company. She lunched on dire forebodings of a quarrel between Frank and his father, with accidental interruptions in the shape of cold chicken and cheese-cakes. She trifled away half an hour at the piano; and played, in that time, selections from the Songs of Mendelssohn, the Mazurkas of Chopin, the Operas of Verdi, and the Sonatas of Mozart—all of whom had combined together on this occasion, and produced one immortal work, entitled "Frank." She closed the piano and went up to her room to dream away the hours luxuriously in visions of her married future. The green shutters were closed, the easy chair was pushed in front of the glass, the maid was summoned as usual, and the comb assisted the mistress's reflections through the medium of the mistress's hair, till heat and idleness asserted their narcotic influences together, and Magdalen fell asleep.

It was past three o'clock when she woke. On going down stairs again she found her mother, Norah, and Miss Garth all sitting together enjoying the shade and the coolness under the open portico in front of the house.

Norah had the railway time-table in her hand. They had been discussing the chances of Mr. Vanstone's catching the return train, and getting back in good time. That topic had led them, next, to his business errand at Grailsea—an errand of kindness, as usual—undertaken for the benefit of the miller, who had been his old farm-servant, and who was now hard pressed by serious pecuniary difficulties. From this they had glided insensibly into a subject often repeated among them, and never exhausted by repetition—the praise of Mr. Vanstone himself. Each one of the three had some experience of her own to relate of his simple, generous nature. The conversation seemed to be almost painfully interesting to his wife. She was too near the time of her trial now not to feel nervously sensitive to the one subject which always held the foremost place in her heart. Her eyes overflowed as Magdalen joined the little group under the portico; her frail hand trembled as it signed to her youngest daughter to take the vacant chair by her side. "We were talking of your father," she said, softly. "Oh, my love, if your married life is only as happy—" Her voice failed her; she put her handkerchief hurriedly over her face, and rested her head on Magdalen's shoulder. Norah looked appealingly to Miss Garth, who at once led the conversation back to the more trivial subject of Mr. Vanstone's return. "We have all been wondering," she said, with a significant look at Magdalen, "whether your father will leave Grailsea in time to catch the train—or whether he will miss it, and be obliged to drive back. What do you say?"

"I say papa will miss the train," replied Magdalen, taking Miss Garth's hint with her customary quickness. "The last thing he attends to at Grailsea will be the business that brings him there. Whenever he has business to do he always puts it off to the last moment—doesn't he, mamma?"

The question roused her mother exactly as Magdalen had intended it should. "Not when his errand is an errand of kindness," said Mrs. Vanstone. "He has gone to help the miller in a very pressing difficulty—"

"And don't you know what he'll do?" persisted Magdalen. "He'll romp with the miller's children, and gossip with the mother, and hob-and-nob with the father. At the last moment, when he has got five minutes left to catch the train, he'll say, 'Let's go into the counting-house and look at the books.' He'll find the books dreadfully complicated; he'll suggest sending for an accountant; he'll settle the business off-hand by lending the money, in the mean time; he'll jog back comfortably in the miller's gig; and he'll tell us all how pleasant the lanes were in the cool of the evening."

The little character-sketch which these words drew was too faithful a likeness not to be recognized. Mrs. Vanstone showed her appreciation of it by a smile. "When your father returns," she said, "we will put your account of his proceedings to the test. I think," she continued, rising languidly from her chair, "I had better go indoors again now and rest on the sofa till he comes back."

The little group under the portico broke up. Magdalen slipped away into the garden to hear Frank's account of the interview with his father. The other three ladies entered the house together. When Mrs. Vanstone was comfortably established on the sofa Norah and Miss Garth left her to repose, and withdrew to the library to look over the last parcel of books from London.

It was a quiet, cloudless summer's day. The heat was tempered by a light western breeze; the voices of laborers at work in a field near reached the house cheerfully; the clock-bell of the village church, as it struck the quarters, floated down the wind with a clearer ring, a louder melody than usual. Sweet ódors from field and flower-garden, stealing in at the open windows, filled the house with their fragrance; and the birds in Norah's aviary up stairs sang the song of their happiness exultingly in the sun.

As the church clock struck the quarter past four the morning-room door opened and Mrs. Vanstone crossed the hall alone. She had tried vainly to compose herself. She was too restless to lie still and sleep. For a moment she directed her steps toward the portico—then turned and looked about her, doubtful where to go or what to do next. While she was still hesitating the half-open door of her husband's study attracted her attention. The room seemed to be in sad confusion. Drawers were left open; coats and hats, account-books and papers, pipes and fishing-rods were all scattered about together. She went in and pushed the door to—but so gently that she still left it ajar. "It will amuse me to put his room to rights," she thought to herself. "I should like to do something for him before I am down on my bed helpless." She began to arrange his drawers, and found his banker's book lying open in one of them. "My poor dear, how careless he is! The servants might have seen all his affairs if I had not happened to have looked in." She set the drawers right, and then turned to the multifarious litter on a side-table. A little old-fashioned music-book appeared among the scattered papers, with her name written in it, in faded ink. She blushed like a young girl in the first happiness of the discovery. "How good he is to me! He remembers my poor old music-book, and keeps it for my sake." As she sat down by the table and opened the book the by-gone time came back to her in all its tenderness. The clock struck the half-hour, struck the three-quarters—and still she sat there, with the music-book on her lap, dreaming happily over the old songs; thinking gratefully of the golden days when his hand had turned the pages for her, when his voice had whispered the words which no woman's memory ever forgets.

Norah roused herself from the volume she was reading, and glanced at the clock on the library mantle-piece.

"If papa comes back by railway," she said, "he will be here in ten minutes."

Miss Garth started, and looked up drowsily from the book which was just dropping out of her hand.

"I don't think he will come by train," she replied. "He will jog back—as Magdalen flippantly expressed it—in the miller's gig."

As she said the words there was a knock at the library-door. The footman appeared and addressed himself to Miss Garth.

"A person wishes to see you, ma'am."

"Who is it?"

"I don't know, ma'am. A stranger to me—a respectable-looking man—and he said he particularly wished to see you."

Miss Garth went out into the hall. The footman closed the library-door after her, and withdrew down the kitchen stair.

The man stood just inside the door, on the mat. His eyes wandered, his face was pale—he looked ill; he looked frightened. He trifled nervously with his cap, and shifted it backward and forward, from one hand to the other.

"You wanted to see me?" said Miss Garth.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am. You are not Mrs. Vanstone, are you?"

"Certainly not. I am Miss Garth. Why do you ask the question?"

"I am employed in the clerk's office at Grailsea Station—"

"Yes?"

"I am sent here—"

He stopped again. His wandering eyes looked down at the mat, and his restless hands wrung his cap harder and harder. He moistened his dry lips, and tried once more.

"I am sent here on a very serious errand."

"Serious to me?"

"Serious to all in this house."

Miss Garth took one step nearer to him—took one steady look at his face. She turned cold in the summer heat. "Stop!" she said, with a sudden distrust, and glanced aside anxiously at the door of the morning-room. It was safely closed. "Tell me the worst, and don't speak loud. There has been an accident. Where?"

"On the railway. Close to Grailsea Station."

"The up-train to London?"

"No: the down-train at one-fifty—"

"God Almighty help us! The train Mr. Vanstone traveled by to Grailsea?"

"The same. I was sent here by the up-train: the line was just cleared in time for it. They wouldn't write; they said I must see 'Miss Garth,' and tell her. There are seven passengers badly hurt, and two—"

The next word failed on his lips: he raised his hand in the dead silence. With eyes that opened wide in horror, he raised his hand and pointed over Miss Garth's shoulder.

She turned a little, and looked back.

Face to face with her, on the threshold of the study door, stood the mistress of the house. She held her old music-book clutched fast mechanically in both hands. She stood, the spectre of herself. With a dreadful vacancy in her eyes, with a dreadful stillness in her voice, she repeated the man's last words:

"Seven passengers badly hurt, and two—"

Her tortured fingers relaxed their hold; the book dropped from them; she sank forward heavily. Miss Garth caught her before she fell—caught her; and turned upon the man, with the wife's swooning body in her arms, to hear the husband's fate.

"The harm is done," she said: "you may speak out. Is he wounded, or dead?"

"Dead!"

THE BURNSIDE EXPEDITION.

We continue on page 252 our series of illustrations of the Burnside Expedition, from sketches by Mr. Angelo Wiser.

One of them represents the Explosion of the Rebel Magazine in Fort Dixie at Newbern. After about a dozen shots had been fired on each side, the magazine blew up and settled the fate of the battery.

Another illustrates the Precipitate Flight of the Rebels from Newbern after the fall of their batteries. All the chivalry made speedy tracks for the cars, which were in waiting to carry them off, and so great was their precipitation that, according to the report of eye-witnesses, many were drowned in the river which runs by the side of the railroad.

Another shows us the Removal of our Wounded from the field hospitals to the main hospital at Newbern. They were conveyed to the city in the steamer Union. The scene during their removal was very sad—the most affecting ever witnessed by most of the by-standers.

Another picture represents the Reception at Newbern of a Flag of Truce borne by fifty rebel cavalry, who came to look for their dead and wounded. They were escorted through the town by three companies of the Massachusetts Twenty-fourth, and were of course pretty freely discussed by our men. They were unsuccessful in their search.

The remarkable picture which seems to represent a water-spout is an illustration of the Removal of Obstructions placed in Pamlico Sound to prevent our approach to Washington. Our engineers had to blow them up—which was easily done, and the way was then clear.

The remaining picture represents Colonel Stevenson, of the Twenty-fourth Massachusetts, with Companies E and G of that regiment, Raising the Stars and Stripes in front of the Court-house at Washington, North Carolina. After the ceremony the people were warned that if the flag was not there when the regiment returned they would take vengeance on the town. The people looked on with apathy and apparent indifference.

OUR ARMY IN VIRGINIA.

We devote a large portion of our space this week to the illustration of certain military movements which have taken place in Virginia. Little has been said concerning these movements in the newspapers of the North. Enough has appeared, however, in the Richmond papers, and in the published dispatches of our Generals, to justify us in publishing our illustrations. If we withhold the usual descriptive matter, the reader will readily understand and appreciate our motives.

On page 241 we illustrate the EMBARKATION OF FIELD BATTERY AT ALEXANDRIA, from a sketch from Washington, authorized by the censor and published in the New York papers of last week, similar to the attachment of artillery and cavalry for service point not mentioned. The scene is a striking one; the sketch, by our artist, Mr. A. R. Waud, is very spirited.

On page 244 we illustrate the EMBARKATION OF TROOPS AT ALEXANDRIA. We have from the rebel papers published at Fredericksburg, Virginia, that large numbers of transports full of troops have lately been steaming down the Potomac. These are probably the transports which our artist saw at Alexandria, and which he sketched for us.

On page 245 we reproduce a sketch by an occasional correspondent at Fortress Monroe, representing our TROOPS ENCAMPED AND MOVING AMONG THE RUINS OF HAMPTON, VIRGINIA. Several dispatches from Fortress Monroe, duly authorized by the censor, allude to our having troops in that locality, who would subsequently seem to have been sent up Big Bethel and Yorktown. By the time these lines are printed the public may have more on the subject than is safe to print now. Meanwhile the encampment and military bustle in the ruins of the old town of Hampton are picturesque.

On page 244 we give a view of NORFOLK, Norfolk, as every one knows, is a part of entry on the Elizabeth River, eight miles above Hampton Roads, thirty-six miles from the ocean, and 90 miles by water from Richmond. The situation is low, and the city is not handsome; but the harbor is spacious, and the depth of water and the admirable vessels of all sizes. It was the site of one of the United States dock-yards, and many of our finest vessels of war were built there. On April 20 the rebels seized the Navy-yard, owing to the treachery or imbecility of some of our officers; we succeeded in burning some of the vessels and ships, we saved the Cumberland and Pawnee, and we scuttled the Merrimac, which has since been raised by the rebels. Norfolk is defended by forts on Craney Island, Sewell's Point, and the vicinity.

A French View of the Rebellion.

[From Galignani's Messenger, Paris, March 10, 1862.]

FAVORABLE SENTIMENTS FOR NEW YORK.

The recent cheering news from America, proclaiming victory upon victory for the Union troops, and foreshadowing, almost beyond possibility, the speedy termination of the rebellion, has already produced beneficial effects upon the fashionable mind of Paris at this metropolis.

For the past two seasons a great falling off in exportations to the New World, and more costly and inferior fabrics has been severely felt. It was, therefore, with peculiar pleasure we noticed the other day in one of the first of an old, familiar face, in the person of Mr. W. B. Moore, who, for the past years as successive purveyor of Monsieur and Mme. Isabelle de Paris for the New York city trade, and who, on the accession of the management of the United States Mandolin and Clock Emporium of Mr. George Carey, 204 and 206 Broadway, opposite the Metropolitan Hotel, has secured a fine assortment of the magazines of De Lille, Gaunin, Arnoudeau, Lenoir, and Dubois, and other celebrated manufacturers, and which will very kindly permitted to inspect previous to their shipment. Mr. Moore, as we would observe on extravagance, which is a long time characterized the ladies of America, have not yet recovered from the effects of the panic, and are entirely exempt and charming a collection of novelties as was there ever displayed in Paris.

The world-renowned bouquet of the Republican Court of Washington, as well as the Imperial Court of Metropolis (New York), may well congratulate themselves upon having a person so competent to cater to their good taste as Mr. Mackenzie, and we trust his visits to our gay capital will be equally fashionable and successful.

F. Derby & Company,

TAILORS AND IMPORTERS, invite the special attention of their friends and the public to their ELEGANT CHOICE, AND ATTRACTIVE ASSORTMENT of SPRING and SUMMER GOODS for gentlemen's wear, embracing NEW STYLES, which they are willing to make up to order in their usual well known style of excellence, at POPULAR PRICES,

No. 87 Walker Street, New York.

THE CRAIG MICROSCOPE, Patented Feb. 19th, 1861, magnifying 100 diameters, or 10,000 times, yet so simple a child can use it, is sent by mail on the receipt of $2 25. A liberal discount to the trade. Address HENRY CRAIG, No. 382 Canal Street, New York. Agents wanted.

Statement of the Condition

OF THE

U. S. BRANCH

OF THE

Unity Fire Insurance Company,

- AT NEW YORK,

JANUARY 1st, 1862.

Assets.

United States, 6 per cent Stock - $ 19,250 00
New York State, 6 per cent Stock..... 15,000 00
Stocks.....	115,000 00
New York City, 6 per cent Stock..... 25,000 00
Cash loaned on collateral.....	900 00
" in hand and in Bank.....	10,456 79
" in hands of Agents.....	8,633 90
All other Assets.....	1,000 00
Office Furniture.....	494 17
Interest accrued.....	319 00
	$134,343 92

Liabilities.

Losses ascertained and unpaid.. 2,054 99
All other claims'..... 1,406 94	3,461 14
Net Assets.....	$130,882 68

 Note.—The above statement shows the condition of the United States Branch alone. The total available Assets of the Company, including its English Securities, amount to

$4,793,822

and this is entirely independent of the Life Business, which is a totally distinct Company.

GEORGE T. HOPE,
MANAGER.

No. 7 WALL ST., New York.

PATRIOTIC STATIONERY and PORTRAIT PACKETS. PRIZE STATIONERY and PORTRAIT PACKETS. UNION STATIONERY and PRIZE PACKETS. EXCELSION STATIONERY PACKETS.

Headquarters for UNION STATIONERY and PRIZE PACKAGES of every description.

Circulars free.

HASKINS & CO., 59 Beekman Street, N. Y.

Operatic Choruses, Quartets, &c.

THE OPERATIC BOUQUET. A Collection of Gems, being the choicest Concerted Pieces, from Favorite Operas, arranged for Choruses, Quartets, and Solos. Subscribers' Name Book, Sets, $2; Part, $1 00; on receipt of which it will be mailed, postage paid. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

WATCHES.

10,000 for sale, at Wholesale prices. Entrees stamp for descriptive Circular. C. E. Ferguson, Box 3,000, New York.

Useful and Economical.—Hegeman & Co.'s Benzine, which instantly removes Paint, Grease Spots, Tar, and cleans Gloves, Ribbons, Silks, &c., sent by mail without injury to the most delicate color or fabric only 25 cents per bottle. Sold by Druggists. Be sure and get the genuine. Prepared by HEGEMAN & CO., N. Y.

A sure cure for Rheumatism, Neuralgia, and Salt Rheum. Wholesale Agents F. C. WELLS & CO., 118 Franklin St., New York. Sold by Apothecaries everywhere.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS in every county at $75 per month and expenses, to sell a new and choice Spring Medicine. Address, with stamp J. S. MADISON, Alfred, Maine.

AGENTS. Army Traders, and the Speculating Public generally, can find a profitable article by addressing at once, with stamp, HOWARD & CO., 129 Nassau Street, New York. Price lists sent Free. Address HOWARD BROS., NEW YORK.

THE ALBION, A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER, Established in 1822, DEVOTED to NEWS, POLITICS, CRITICISM, AND GENERAL LITERATURE.

PRICE $5 PER ANNUM; 6 CENTS PER COPY. Send for Specimen Copies, with price, to the ALBION OFFICE, 16 Beekman St., N. Y.

Grand Opening!!!

BRODIE'S

Stock of Spring

and

Summer

MANTILLAS,

Now Ready for Inspection

at his

OLD STAND,

300 Canal Street,

and

His Palace of Fashion,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Corner of 23d Street,

New York.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

The Sin., or Navy Size, carries a Ball weighing 38 to the lb., and 40 to the oz. Revolver, a Ball for each Ch. By recent experiments made in the Army, these Revolvers are recommended the best and most effective weapons in use. Also,

Ballard's Patent Breech-Loading Rifle

This arm is entirely new, and is universally conceded to be the nearest to perfection of any breech-loader. Rifle over barrel. Length of barrel 30 inches, weight of rifle 7 pounds. Size of Cartridge used is No. 32. 12 and 44 cartridges to the pound. For particulars call or send for a Circular to

MERWIN & HRAY, Sole Agents,
No. 240 Broadway, N. Y.

Every Man his own Printer.

ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row N. Y.

Catarrh.—DR. CHASE'S REMEDY for this disease is the first and only one that relieves. Send postage stamp for his Pamphlet, at 417 Broadway, N. Y.

Is your Life Insured?

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. OF BOSTON & NEW YORK, ORGANIZED 1845.

CAPITAL AND ASSETS, ONE MILLION DOLLARS.

This Co. is strictly for mutual protection, entirely beneficent in all its workings and tendencies. It is the oldest purely Mutual Co. in the United States, and uniformly successful. The Insurance Commissioners class it as the leading Co. in solvency and economy. All over estimate returned to each insured. Interesting documents matter sent free. Office, 5 Pine St., Agent for New York, No. 110 Broadway, New York City.

Commercial Travellers and Agents Wanted to Sell our 25 Cent Portfolio Package.

Contents.—15 Sheets Note Paper, 15 Envelopes, 1 Penholder, 1 Pen, 1 Pencil, 1 Blotting Pad, 100 Recipes, 1 War Hymn, 6 Engravings, 1 New Method for Computing Interest, 1 Fashionable Letter-writer, Tongue for Cullers, 1 for Under-Sleeves, 2 for Under-Skirts, 1 for Corner of Handkerchief, 1 for Bonnet, 1 for Cape, 1 for Collar, 1 for Cuff, 1 for Flounce, 1 Pair Gents' Suspenders, 1 Pair Ladies', 1 Puzzle Garden, and 1 Box Beautiful. Address one or both of the Publishers, for Circular of Solicitors to agents.

WEIR & CO., 42 South Third Street, Philada.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.

HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BRACELETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR LOCKETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR RINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR VEST CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR NECK CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF SETTS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF PINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR MINIATURE PINS OF ALL THE CELEBRATED. Send for full particulars.
W. A. HAYWARD, MANUFACTURING JEWELER, 208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

$. SOMETHING NEW.—Agents wanted $. to make $20 to $100 a month, selling our newly-patented articles in every family. Selling rapidly. Satisfaction guaranteed. Samples 25c. each. Enclose stamp. Address, No. 58 Nassau Street, N. Y.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS and ARMS. Manufactory Patents, 310 Broadway, New York. Send for a Circular.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Ballimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Beaufort, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS. Full information. Suiters charged low rates.

EMPLOYMENT. A NEW ENTERPRISE. THE TANNERS SEWING MACHINE CO. want a number of Agents, of industry and character and a small commission allowed. Address, with stamp, HARRIS BURDICK, Boston, Mass. Circulars sent for reference.

To Sutlers and Others.

An article in brick demand!

ANDREWS' YEAST POWDER, put up in cans, with full directions for immediate use. Bread, Biscuits, and Pancakes, beautifully light and wholesome, can be made in two minutes! Warranted superior to all others. Will keep good in any climate. For sale by Grocers and Druggists, who will procure them for you, or send an order to ANDREWS, DURKEE & CO., 106 and 108 Cedar Street, N. Y.

$—The Great Desideratum—Agents Wanted. $3 A Chimney for Coal Oil Lamps that will not break. Sample by mail, 50 cents. Send stamp for descriptive Circular. Address, MILES & CO., 454 Broadway, Albany, Philadelphia, Pa.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE! MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 38c. LETTER. Five different powers, $1. Mailed free.
C. ROWE, 131 Nassau St., Boston, Mass.

AGENTS!!!—Agents if you want to make money, send 4 three cent stamp to A. RICHARDS & CO., New Haven, Conn., and get their Colloquial Circular.

EMPLOYMENT.—Agents Wanted in every Town and County to enter into a respectable and permanent business. For particulars address, with red stamp, H. LAWTON & CO., 54 Dey Street, New York.

WEDDINGS supplied with the new style of Marriage Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAS, Regent Stationery, 192 Broadway, New York.

Wedding Cards and Note Paper at J. EVERDELL'S celebrated Engraving Establishment, 302 Broadway, New York. Samples by mail.

The New Issue of Postage Stamps, of six denominations, for sale. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS, MUSTACHES, or a fine head of hair? Cayuvan will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face. Sent by mail, free from observation, for 25c. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. E. A. SCHIELAN, No. 514 Market Street, N. Y.

A New Edition of

Harper's War Map

Now Ready.

Price Six Cents.

Sent by mail on receipt of price.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Bound Volumes

AND

Back Numbers

OF

Harper's Weekly

Always on Hand.

Price of Volumes in Cloth.....$3 00
" " Half Morocco.....5 00

Beautifully and substantially bound by
HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, N. Y.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-Five Cents. Seven Volumes, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, or Express, free of charge, to any Subscriber within 3,000 miles of New York, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Twenty-three Volumes, handsomely substantially bound, from June, 1850, to November, 1861, are now ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each).....2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Four Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, for one year, $4 00.

 Clergymen and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.

The DEMAND NOTES of the United States will be received for Subscriptions. Specie is expected to remit them in preference to Bank Notes.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

A Thrilling Story,

Entitled,

NO NAME,

By Wilkie Collins,

AUTHOR OF

"The Woman in White."

Richly Illustrated by John McLenan.

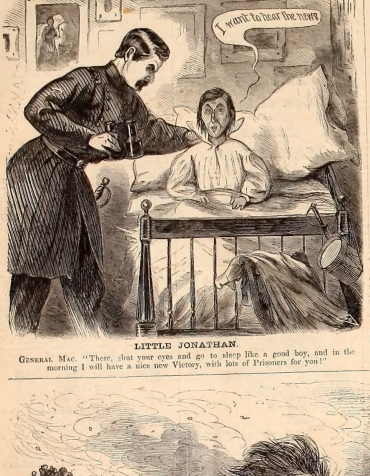
Was commenced in the Number for March 15 (No. 272) of

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

And will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$2 50
One Copy for Two Years.....4 00
Ten Copies for One Year.....20 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.



HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for one month—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V. for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861, of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," handsomely bound in Cloth extra, Price $3 50 each, are now ready.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

LITTLE JONATHAN.

GENERAL MAC. "There, that your eyes and go to sleep like a good boy, and in the morning I will have a nice new Victory, with lots of Prisoners for you!"

This View of the Block (split) out of which "THE WOODEN GUNS" were made, shows how the Editors do sometimes make things up out of their own Heads.

[Vide N. Y. Tribune.]

HOW JEFF DAVIS IS SAVING THE SOUTH.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

NOW READY:

ANOTHER GREAT ORIGINAL STORY IN THE NEW YORK WEEKLY.

By MRS. HELEN CORWIN ESSEX,

Entitled,

RACHEL DEVEREUX;

OR,

The Wolf of Vignoble.

MRS. ESSEX is well known to the readers of THE NEW YORK WEEKLY as the writer of the pleasant and entertaining sketches under the nom de plume of "Somerset," and those who read her serials, "CAPTIC EDGEMERE WILDE" and "The Curse of Everleigh," can not but be pleased with an opportunity to judge of her abilities in a more extended effort. She is a young writer who has won no small popularity by her delightful sketches and unchained pride; fair, with care and study, to ultimately take rank among the first lady writers of the day. We predict much for her, which will not only rest with the gallant pound of the increasing circle by the numerous readers of THE NEW YORK WEEKLY. It can not fail to be fresh and entertaining as everything it that comes from her pen.

Price 4 cents. For sale everywhere.

Gold Pens Repointed--Equal to New,

On receipt of 25 cts. in money or stamps. Orders by Mail promptly attended to. E. S. JOHNSON, 19 Holden Lane, N. Y.

Jewelry of all Kinds Repaired.

Orders by mail solicited. The cost of repairing sent immediately on receipt of Goods. Address

E. S. JOHNSON, 19 Holden Lane, N. Y.

Agents, Country Merchants, and News Dealers.

Rickards' Multomicroon

Contains Stationery, Recipes, Engraved Designs for Ladies' and Children's wear, a present of Jewelry, and other articles, by which more money can be made than by any two Prize Packages ever offered for sale. Send stamps for Circular, and judge for yourselves. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 NASSAU STREET, New York.

The Parlor Gardener.

A beautiful new illustrated guide to the cultivation of flowers in and about the house. Elegantly illustrated. Price 40 cents. Sold by all principal Booksellers and Seedsmen, and sent by mail by the publishers.

J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston.

STEINWAY & SONS'

PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRANDS, AND SQUARE PIANOS

Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured, and will be sold to suit the times. Each Instrument warranted for five years. Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y. Send for Circular.

AGENTS.—Kerosene now successfully burned without Chimney. Using Dodge's Patent Burner gives 24 hours good light for 1 cent. Send 4 red stamps for sample. Address DODGE, 12 Dunne St., N. Y.

THE DIAPHRAGM FILTER, Sold by A. MCKENZIE, Plumber, 162 4th Street, N. Y.

AGENTS.

P. F. P. P.

Panprosphosium Prize Package.

Price Ten Cents.

The Blind Pete Package consists of 10 articles, all new and original, with a piece of valuable Jewelry in each package. Send for a Circular. Agents can make 100 per cent. W. H. CATTELY & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

AGENTS HAVE YOU SEEN THISTLE & CO.'S New Upon Inside Stationery Package? If not send for our Circular, and see the Best and Cheapest in the Market. You can make double 100 per Cent. THISTLE & CO., 130 Nassau Street, N. Y.

STATIONERY and Jewelry Packages, the best in the market, at prices lower than can be purchased elsewhere. For particulars, address, with stamp enclosed, I. S. AYERBACH, 110 Fulton St., Boston, Mass.

DONE GONE! DONE GONE!

AND

THE NEGLECTED PICTURE.

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS of these remarkable Paintings by

E. ANTHONY,

No. 501 Broadway.

No loyal Album should be without them.

Price, 25 cents each, with printed description.

Remittances may be in postage stamps, and the Pictures will be sent by mail prepaid.

Military Books.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, Importer, and Bookseller, of Military and Scientific Books, No. 192 Broadway, N. Y. Catalogues sent free by mail on application.

Prison Life

IN THE

TOBACCO WAREHOUSE

AT RICHMOND,

By a Bull's Bluff Prisoner,

Lieut. Wm. C. Harris,

Of Col. Baker's California Regiment.

Contents.

Chap. I. From Bull's Bluff to Richmond.
Chap. II. Our Prison.
Chap. III. A Day in the Officers' Prison.
Chap. IV. A Day in the Privates' Prison.
Chap. V. Parasites and Peddlers.
Chap. VI. Prison Incidents.
Chap. VII. Sunday at the Prison.
Chap. VIII. Our Jailer.
Chap. IX. Our Victor.
Chap. X. Released Prisoners' Association.
Chap. XI. Prison Corporations.
Chap. XII. Hostages Bound.

Preface.

These sketches were written to lessen the tedium of my lengthy imprisonment; and if they serve to relieve my readers of the same, I shall be amply repaid. Many incidents connected with the Prison House, and omitted the interesting sympathies of former, they will have accomplished all that I desired by publication of them.

With the exception of "Homeward Bound," they were all written within prison walls, and brought to the North even secretly in the lining of an overcoat.

I consistently trust to my fellow-officers for their money as to their fidelity; a description of our "economy," and the necessary of detail in the various duties in our prison life in the Tobacco Warehouse.

W. C. H.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 25, 1862.

☞ Complete in one volume, price 75 cents, or sent securely bound in cloth, 75 cents.

PUBLISHED BY

GEORGE W. CHILDS, 628 and 630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

SENT BY EXPRESS

EVERYWHERE

WARD'S

PERFECT FITTING

SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices

Made to Measure at $20 per doz.

SIX FOR TEN DOLLARS

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,

With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted to Fit, as sold in retail stores for $3 and $4 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $36 90 PER DOZEN.

P. S.—There is no think I can not make a good Shirt for $20 per dozen are mistakes. Here is the testimony of 5,000 satisfied customers.

20 years of New York Mills Muslin at 16 c. per yard.

7 yards of Linen at 50c. per yard.

Making and cutting.....

Laundry, 24 buttons and cotton, 12c.....

Profit.....

Total per dozen.....

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, how to take and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars, free everywhere. The rules are so easy that any one can take their own measure. Send for printed directions.

The shirts can be paid to the Express Company on delivery of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow purchasers to examine the goods before paying for the same. If they are not as represented, you are thereby relieved.

S. W. H. WARD, Profit Paid

387 Broadway, up stairs,

Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VI.—No. 278.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 26, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAJOR-GENERAL HALLECK IN THE FIELD, APRIL, 1862.

OUR SUCCESS.

The regular circulation of Harper's Weekly is now between ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE and ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY THOUSAND copies. Assuming that each number of the paper is read by ten persons—a moderate estimate—a million and a quarter people derive instruction and amusement from this journal. It affords us no little satisfaction to witness this success. Certainly we may say that no effort on our part has been wanting to deserve it.

Our weekly expenses for traveling artists are alone as heavy as our total outlay for artistic labor used to be when Harper's Weekly was first established. This outlay, however, enables us to depict, week by week, the progress of our arms along the whole circumference of the Rebellion, with a fidelity and vividness seldom equaled.

We are besides enabled to lay before our readers each week several pages of the best reading of the day, including the works of Dickens, Wilkie Collins, and Bulwer. So remarkable a combination of artistic and literary excellence has never been presented in any journal, either in this country or abroad.

We think that this Number, for instance, will bear comparison with any number of any paper ever produced in the United States or in Europe.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Saturday, April 26, 1862.

ABOUT MOBS.

A FAVORITE idea of many foreign critics of the United States is that this country is governed by "the mob." We are told that certain measures can not succeed because they will not suit "the mob;" that the Government can not pursue the policy it pleases in consequence of the pressure of "the mob;" that "the mob" will not hear of peace, and hence that "the golden opportunity for compromise" is being lost; that "the mob" will not pay taxes, and therefore that public credit is ruined; that "the respectable classes" in the United States are powerless, the supreme authority being vested in "the mob."

If, when foreigners use the words "the mob," they merely mean "the people," then they are undoubtedly right in stating that in the mob in this country supreme authority is vested by law. There is no class in this country which enjoys legislative authority over its fellow-citizens by virtue of birth, or rank, or wealth. In this country no descendants of the bastard children of king's mistresses are born to make laws for the legitimate offspring of honest women. This may be our misfortune: it is undoubtedly the fact. Herein the United States differ from many foreign countries, and especially from Great Britain.

But if, when foreigners employ the words "the mob," they mean gatherings of lawless and turbulent men, unwilling to obey the mandates of the established authorities, then they are clearly in error in stating that such a class in this country exercises any appreciable control over our public policy, or is in the least feared or regarded either by the legislative or the executive branches of Government.

Such gatherings have never been seen here except at rare intervals in a few great cities. The lawless characters of which they have consisted have almost invariably been foreigners. They have never in a single instance been able to resist the power of the constituted authorities. The most remarkable mobs ever known in this country have been the Astor Place mob, which was quelled in a couple of hours by two companies of militia; the Dead Rabbit mob, which was put down by a mere demonstration without fighting; and the Municipal Police mob, which was a mere cabal, and did not disturb the peace of the city in the least. There never was an instance in this country of a mob, in the sense defined above, undertaking deliberately to resist the execution of the law, or to defy its instruments. All our mobs have grown out of petty local disputes, and have subsided on the first exhibition of purpose by the constituted authorities. An attempt was made by Fernando Wood, in 1857, to get up a mob in this city for the purpose of organizing a revolutionary resistance to the State authorities; and again, in 1860, the attempt was renewed, with the like object. On both occasions the promoters of disturbance failed signally. Even in this great city, where the "dangerous classes" are so numerous, and there are always two or three thousand loose, idle, and disorderly foreigners ready for any tumult, it has never been possible to organize any substantial resistance to the constituted authorities.

The reason is very simple. In this country every man is a maker as well as a subject of the law, and is personally responsible for its execution. In every constituency in the United States the number of persons who are interested in the preservation of law and order largely exceeds that of the persons who are interested in riot and disorder. Our system renders all citizens, jointly and severally, responsible for the welfare and peace of society at large.

In England it is different. There the governing power is confined to a small class of persons, and the benefits of government enjoyed by a still smaller class. The bulk of the British people have nothing to lose and every thing to gain by revolutionary movements. One out of every nine people in England is a pauper; and of the remaining eight only one is entitled to vote at elections. Property is in a few hands: nineteen-twentieths of the British people own nothing, and are controlled by the aristocracy and wealthy commonalty. It is easy to see that in a society thus constituted there must be two classes: the Governing Class, which rules the country and owns the property; and the rest of the people, who have neither power nor property. These latter are called in England "the mob." It likewise follows that between this "mob" and that Governing Class there must be incessant warfare. It has always been so. No ministry in England has ever pursued a policy that was in opposition to the instincts of that unrepresented, unrecognized, but terribly feared body—the British mob—without providing large bodies of troops to protect itself. The history of England during the present century is one series of mobs and riots in London, in Liverpool, in Manchester, in Birmingham; the sandbags which to this day line the roof of the Bank of England, and the iron shutters which shield the windows of Apsley House, are visible evidences of the dread and respect which British mobs have inspired. At this very moment the news from England consists mainly of reports of mobs and riots at Sheffield and other manufacturing cities.

If the present civil war had broken out in England instead of the United States these mobs would undoubtedly have coerced the British Government from time to time. Those British writers who have written about our mob have merely confounded our condition with theirs, and given us credit for suffering from the disease which was familiar to them at home. A closer acquaintance with our system would have shown them that mobs, in their sense of the word, are an impossibility here; and a little more attention to passing events might have induced them profitably to compare our treatment of Dr. Russell of the Times with their outrage upon Haynau, and their rebellion against the Duke of Wellington with the stern calmness with which the West submitted to the removal of Frémont.

THE LOUNGER.

SHORT AND SHARP.

"When the fighting begins," said General M'Clellan in the autumn, "it will be short and sharp." He did not add, what he probably thought, that it would not begin until each side was fully prepared, so that the event must be decisive. But that is evidently the case. Every man, as he hears of the general advance, feels that we are fully ready. Nobody was seriously troubled about the result at No. 10, where the cheerful hero, Foote, told us there was "some of the most beautiful rifle practice ever seen." The siege of Yorktown is proceeding at this moment; but nobody is apprehensive of the issue, except for one reason, and that is the Merrimac—the very point for which no proper provision was made.

Nor can any good excuse ever be made for that negligence. The only thing that can be said is that we preferred to believe she was a failure. For ten or eleven months we knew she was preparing. In Harper's Weekly for Saturday, November 2, there is an admirable picture of her very much as she appeared when, four months afterward, she came out and appalled us, and the account of her construction and armament was accurate; yet we went on as if there were no Merrimac and no danger. Already we have paid dearly enough for our blunder; and at this moment of writing the national joy at the great Pittsburg triumph is overshadowed by the vague apprehension of mischance from the Merrimac. Should she steam out and push on to the relief of Yorktown by the annihilation of our boats there, she might be of signal service in checking our advance.

Yet, except for this unguarded point, the national campaign against the rebellion has proceeded according to the motto of M'Clellan. Nor at last will the wisdom of the general plan be disputed. To have attacked before we were fully prepared to annihilate resistance would have prolonged the war indefinitely. It was not enough merely to defeat the enemy in an occasional battle. It was essential to the final rout of his hopes of resistance that he should feel our overwhelming strength simultaneously at every point of his line.

For no student of the war must forget the essential difference between dealing with a foreign foe and domestic conspirators. And in this case, to say that if we had moved long ago the enemy could not have intrenched himself, is simply to beg the whole question; for the two prominent facts were that the enemy was organized before we began to organize, and he stood upon his own chosen ground. Besides, suppose that we might have driven him from Manassas or beaten him there last December—what then? Was it not cheaper in blood and money to wait until Halleck and the West were ready? And what the condition of the Western Department was as late as October we know from Frémont's report.

If the campaign had been opened at any one point last December, and before there could have been a general co-operation, the chance is that the war would have been dragged out, with varying success, until Europe insisted that the rebels had maintained their independence long enough to be acknowledged.

If a man remembers accurately how long this rebellion had been ripening, how deadly earnest the rebels were, how united, how able, how they had already poisoned the public mind of Europe in their favor, how doubtful we were, how bound hand and foot by Floyd and Toucey, that we had an army to raise and equip, a navy to build, a line of a thousand miles to hold and then push back; if he remembers this, and then considers where we are to-day—that a year ago, when Sumter fell, the nation seemed lost, and to-day when its anniversary returns the rebellion is palpably annihilated, not only in its attitude of armed resistance but in its root of treason—he will surely agree that however he may have criticised details, the general design of the campaign has been most comprehensive and overwhelming. He is a very great genius or a very great fool who thinks he could have improved it.

BEFORE YORKTOWN.

At this moment of writing, when our forces are gathered upon the peninsula before Yorktown and the rebels are assembled for their last desperate defense, it will be curious to put upon record a calculation of the chances.

Immediately following the great victory of our arms at Pittsburg, and involving the fate of the rebel capital, the battle of Yorktown must be considered as the decisive event of the rebellion. Should the national army conquer and the "Confederate" Government get upon wheels and begin to roll Southward, the conspiracy could hardly again gather force enough for any considerable blow. On the other hand, should the rebels defeat us, the disaster would be a serious check to us. The result will be known, probably, before these words are printed. What, then, are the chances?

First, as to numbers. We are probably a hundred thousand strong in the field, with a reserve at Fortress Monroe, and M'Dowell's corps within co-operating distance. The rebels are probably not more than sixty thousand at Yorktown with a reserve nearer Richmond of thirty or forty thousand.

Second, as to position. We are moving across a plain, wooded country in which the rebels have strengthened every defensible point against us. We have some gun-boats to harass them from the water side, to which they oppose heavy batteries and the chances of the Merrimac. The rebels have probably two, and perhaps three, lines of defense across the peninsula upon which they have had a year's time to intrench themselves.

Third, as to arms. Ours are of the best kind and variety, and most ample in number. This has been a special point with M'Clellan. The rebels are near the Tredegar works at Richmond and the factories at Norfolk, and they are doubtless better appointed here than they have been at any point, although they have always been strong in artillery. The number of guns upon either side is purely conjectural. The reports of five hundred upon the rebel fortifications are only the guesses of Baltimore sympathizers.

Fourth, as to quality of men. Ours are confident of numerical superiority. They are flushed with the glory of our incessant victories. They long to mingle the splendor of their renown with that of the Western army. They are eager and enthusiastic. They have been long and carefully trained. They believe in their leaders, and feel that their victory will secure and crown the triumph of the National cause. Moreover, they are in the enemy's country upon a peninsula. A severe repulse would inevitably end disastrously for them. In a sense their ships are burned behind them. Safety as well as honor lies only before. On the other hand, the rebels are stunned and discomfited. The last two months have overwhelmed them every where with defeat at home, and the faint hope of foreign recognition and aid has at length expired. They know that success even does not save them. They are dispirited, hopeless, uncertain. But they hate us, and they stand upon their own soil, and they believe that they are defending their hearths and their honor, and the very desperation of their situation may give them a ferocious energy.

Fifth, as to leaders. We have one directing mind, General M'Clellan. His Generals, Keyes, Porter, Heintzelman, and the rest, are worthy of the wisest chief. M'Clellan has not yet commanded in a great battle as Grant, Buell, Lyon, Siegel, Curtis, and M'Dowell have, therefore his generalship in the field upon a large scale is to be tested. Yet the strategy of the war thus far, of which he is certainly entitled to his share of the credit, has been overwhelmingly triumphant. His troops are proud of him; the country confides in him. Should he capture Richmond, every cloud of uncertainty rolls away from his name. For their side, the rebels have Jefferson Davis, Joseph Johnson, Magruder, and Lee, neither of whom is a very noted general. The great military rebel names were Sydney Johnston, Beauregard, and Leonidas Polk. Joseph Johnson is reputed to be a good soldier. Lee is certainly not. Magruder is a Captain Bobadil, but Jefferson Davis is doubtless cool and sagacious.

The comparison of chances leaves us, then, numerically and morally, superior and better led. The rebels have the advantage of position, and the arms are equal. If the rebels stand and fight in earnest, the battle must be desperate and bloody. Should it result as every loyal heart hopes and believes, the dramatic coincidence of this war with the Revolution would be remarkable. The first bloody battle of the Revolution was fought at Lexington and Concord on the 19th of April. On the same day, eighty-six years later, the first blood of this war was shed at Baltimore. At Yorktown was the success that assured the establishment of our national independence, and at Yorktown will have been won the victory which secures it forever.

YORKTOWN BEFORE.

On the 21st and 24th of August, 1781, Lafayette wrote from his camp at the Forks of York River to Washington at Philadelphia. On the 22d Lord Cornwallis, comfortably secure, wrote from Yorktown to Sir Henry Clinton at New York offering to spare him ten or twelve hundred men. Washington instructed Lafayette to prevent any escape up the peninsula which Cornwallis might attempt when the French fleet under De Grasse arrived. Accordingly troops were sent to the south of James River, and General Wayne was ready to cross it at Westover. Lafayette was meanwhile ready to move to Williamsburg and join the forces which might be landed from the French fleet.

On the 5th of September Washington left for the scene of operations and heard, on the way, of the arrival at the Capes on the 28th August of the French fleet of twenty-eight ships of the line. He immediately wrote to de Grasse that the van of the two armies would drop down the Chesapeake to co-operate with him and Lafayette. De Grasse immediately closed the mouth of the York River and landed 3300 men. At the same time James River was full of armed vessels to cover the transportation of our troops, and Wayne crossed. Cornwallis saw that his escape was cut off—strengthened his works, and sent to Sir Henry Clinton for aid.

De Grasse and a French General begged Lafayette to storm Yorktown and Gloucester. The young chief, humane as honorable, preferred to await the coming of the combined forces to secure a more bloodless, if less brilliant, victory. De Grasse, expecting the fleet of De Barras from Rhode Island, and hearing of the English fleet under Graves, off the Capes, sailed out with many of his ships and amused Graves for a few days, during which De Barras slipped in, De Grasse followed him, and Graves, outwitted, returned to New York.

Meanwhile Washington had reached Williamsburg, and sent to hasten the arrival of the French troops, while he begged General Lincoln to press forward to a junction. These troops were coming down the Chesapeake. On the 22d of September Washington heard of the arrival of Admiral Digby at New York with troops and six ships. De Grasse was afraid of the combined fleets, and proposed to leave a few vessels in the James and York rivers, while he put to sea to engage the English with the rest. Washington saw that if the fleet went Cornwallis had a chance of succor; if it remained he must surrender; and he entreated De Grasse to remain. The Count was persuaded, and by the 25th September the American and French troops were encamped near Williamsburg, and ready. The enemy was mainly at Yorktown, but also held Gloucester Point, opposite. On the 26th our troops were drawn out, twelve thousand strong. In the evening Cornwallis heard from Clinton that a fleet of twenty-three ships with 5000 troops would sail to his relief on the 5th October. In the night he abandoned his outworks. Our men seized them in the morning. On the 28th September our army marched from Williamsburg, and, driving in the British pickets and patrols, encamped within two miles of Yorktown. On the 1st October our lines completely invested the place, while De Grasse's fleet held the mouth of the river. In the evening of the 2d Tarleton and his troop crossed to Gloucester Point from Yorktown to forage; a skirmish followed, and he retreated. The next day the French General, Choisy, with a detachment of marines, cut off Gloucester Point from the rear country.

On the 6th of October General Lincoln opened our first parallel, six hundred yards from the enemy. On the 9th it was completed, and Washington fired the first gun. On the night of the 11th the second parallel was opened, within three hundred yards of the works. On the night of the 14th two redoubts were stormed and carried by the Americans and French, General Hamilton commanding. It was a most brave and brilliant achievement; and it was while watching it, intensely excited, that Washington was greatly exposed, and his aid-de-camp ventured to say so. "If you think so," said Washington, gravely, "you are at liberty to step back." Just before dawn on the 16th Cornwallis tried to carry two of the batteries in our second parallel. It was a gallant dash, but the enemy was repulsed, and had spiked our guns so poorly that by evening they were all right again. Then Cornwallis's only hope was a retreat. He projected crossing to Gloucester Point and forcing his way Northward, leaving his sick and wounded. He prepared sixteen large boats, and had carried over a large number of troops when a storm scattered the boats. Success was hopeless, and he had to recross his troops in face of our fire. At ten o'clock on the morning of the 17th he opened a parley. At two o'clock on the afternoon of the 19th his troops marched out and laid down their arms.

At the surrender of Yorktown we made 7073 prisoners. The loss of the British was 552, our loss about 300. Our combined army was estimated at 16,000, of whom 7000 were French, 5500 Continentals, and 3500 militia.

The best accounts of the siege and surrender are in Thacher's "Military Journal," Irving's "Washington," and Holmes's "Annals."

DAVIS'S DANGERS.

The extreme exigency which threatens the "Confederacy" will probably develop results like those which the pressure of Europe against revolutionary France produced at the close of the last century. Jefferson Davis is probably a man who knows when he is beaten; but there are men around him who will doubtless refuse to see defeat, and whom disaster will only plunge into utter recklessness. Davis's only hope of safety at home will be in running before the wind. When a man in his position and under his circumstances falls, from whatever cause, he falls into utter contempt, and, in perilous times, into danger of personal harm. To save his life, Davis must still be a leader. When Danton paused, Robespierre called for his head. If Davis delays, some man of inferior talent and more bloody will will demand that he be put out of the way.

It is not surprising, therefore, to see by the reports from Secessia that if a final blow falls upon Virginia—like the fall of Richmond, for instance—the Davis Administration will be in danger. Some great design was supposed to be preparing a month ago, and the rebel writers say: "An attack on the Administration and its men, by one of the most eminent men of the times, in Congress, is delayed until this great event fails or succeeds." Is the impending event the national annihilation upon the Yorktown peninsula, and the capture of Fortress Monroe?

So in a debate in the "Confederate Congress," "Boyce" said—is "Boyce" one of the most eminent men of the times?—"This Congress will have devolved upon it a great mission. It may be that, in the progress of this revolution, they may be compelled to save the country at all hazards and by the most startling measures." He feared that if the representatives increased their salaries—for this was the question that engaged them while their "Confederacy" was falling about their ears—they would diminish the influence which they must necessarily have in order to work out this great mission.

This implies possible depositions, dictatorships, dangers, and death. A population like that of the rebel section, ignorant, passionate, and fanatical, could be easily managed by a skillful leader, who should inflame them by insisting that it was the sloth or treachery of the Administration that had overwhelmed the hopes of human freedom and happiness which the "Confederacy" holds out to mankind. Jefferson Davis, if he has any eye to spare from Grant, Foote, Halleck, M'Clellan, Heintzelman, Frémont, Banks, and Buell, should fasten it upon "Boyce" and the other "most eminent men of the times" in his neighborhood. He and his friends must consider what answer they mean to make to the terrible question of their followers, "Why did you drag us into this scrape?"

MR. PEABODY'S GIFT.

WHEN you go to Augsburg, where the Emperor Charles V. held the Diet, they show you the house of Anton Fugger. He was a merchant who entertained the Emperor imperially at his own house. You may see the splendid room in which he slept. There were two Fugger brothers at that time, Raimond and Anton. They lent the Emperor money when he was pressed, and he gave them the right of coining, and made them Princes of the empire. These men came of a family of famous merchants which sprang from a weaver. Their great success and consequent wealth made them powers in the state for more than two centuries. They founded at Augsburg a cabinet of antiquities, a gallery of paintings, and a botanical garden. They built a church; they bought pictures of Titian; and collected the two largest libraries of the time in Germany. Their descendants have married into and are merged in princely houses, and the name of Fugger, the German merchants, lives in history.

Of Lorenzo di Medici, the Florentine merchant, the history of his country and time is full. An English merchant, Mr. Roscoe, has made his own name famous by commemorating that of Lorenzo, and his book is still one of the most charming chapters of early modern history.

An earlier English merchant was Sir Thomas Gresham, the financial friend of Queen Elizabeth, who often made him, at his country-house, one of those famous visits which cost the host so dearly. Gresham was very rich, founded the first Royal Exchange and Gresham College, which still sustains seven courses of lectures.

Stephen Girard was an American merchant born in Bordeaux, France. He was the son of a sailor, and by thrift and skill rose to great wealth. In the war of 1812, when the Treasury wanted a loan of $5,000,000, and only $20,000 could be negotiated, Mr. Girard took the whole. When he died he left $2,000,000 to found the Girard college. The chief building is a copy of the Parthenon modified by modern exigencies. It is an institution for the benefit of white male orphans. Unluckily the fund was larger than the mind which endowed it, and no great public charity probably ever excited less interest and sympathy.

John Jacob Astor was an American merchant born in Germany, the son of a poor peasant. He came to this country just after the Revolution at the age of twenty. He accumulated the largest fortune in the country, estimated at $20,000,000, and his will gave $50,000 to the poor of Waldorf in Germany, his native village. He devoted also $400,000 for the establishment of a public library in the city of New York—nor have four hundred thousand dollars ever been more wisely expended.

These are but a few names of rich men who have erected enduring monuments to their names by making their fellow-men partners of their success. The roll is now increased by one who is not less a public benefactor than the greatest of them. Twenty-five years ago George Peabody, an American merchant born in Danvers, began business in London, and during all that time no resident of that city has been more truly respected than he. In many ways he was an American representative; and few travelers during that time but recall with pleasure the banquets and festivities with which he delighted to honor his friends and countrymen. Now, at the close of his active business career, having already founded a Library and Institute in his native Danvers, and a larger Institute and Library in Baltimore, where he lived for twenty years, the munificent American merchant devotes seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the benefit of the poor of London.

The conditions of the gift are so wise and liberal that the reader of his letter is not surprised to meet the admirable suggestion in regard to its disposition, that a portion of the fund, if not the whole, shall be applied to the building of improved lodging-houses for the poor.

Such a gift, too, comes with peculiar grace at a moment when England so causelessly and ruthlessly reviles us for not suffering our national life to be snuffed out by treason. It may be taken as the earnest of an American practically acquainted with England, that the foolish whims and jealousies which have controlled English opinion of us for a year past are essentially transitory. Let us at least accept the omen. We are not the friends we thought we were, but we need not be enemies.

JUST THE DIFFERENCE.

THE Richmond correspondent of the Charleston Mercury writes, in the middle of March: "At last accounts Jackson was falling back to Mount Jackson, forty miles from Winchester. The Yankees in the Kanawha Valley are building plank roads as fast as the enemy penetrates the country. Timber is plenty, and the Yankees fetch along plenty of portable steam saw-mills. Meantime our own roads are nearly impassable."

That is typical of the result of the war. The civilization of intelligence, skill, and steam saw-mills is conquering that of sloth, ignorance, and decay. Fifty years hence, when Virginia is taking the place which belongs to a region so peculiarly favored by climate, soil, natural irrigation, and variety of surface, and New York looks delighted upon her sister and rival, the sons and grandsons of Jackson's soldiers will look back to this year with incredulity, and confess, what Jackson and his troops deny, that Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and George Mason were wiser men and better Virginians than James M. Mason, John Letcher, Roger Pryor, and Henry A. Wise.

EXIT YANCEY.

IN the presence of recent events Mr. Yancey's speech at New Orleans must be a little disheartening to his friends. "The sentiment of Europe is anti-slavery; . . . . . and they will never recognize our independence until our conquering swords hang dripping over the prostrate heads of the North." The recognition must then be considered indefinitely postponed.

He also said, "It is an error to say that Cotton is King. It is not." Mr. Yancey has been a year in England, and he knows.

He added, "The chosen and the choosers [of the rebel Government] are in the same boat. The storm is raging, the wind is howling, and the waves are beating upon our bark. We have placed them [?!] at the helm. They may commit errors; but all history teaches that when there is mutiny in the crew the bark must go down." The moral is, that the only way to save New Orleans is to surrender by unanimous consent.

Having shown that the rebellion is hopeless, Mr. Yancey closed by expressing the strongest confidence in its success. It was the best course allowed by the circumstances.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A SMALL shareholder in a small railway that yields but small returns, had his half-yearly dividend remitted to him the other day in the shape of postage-stamps. He sent back a verbal message to the secretary, stating that they were of no use to him, as he could not write; and requesting that in future the payment should be made in tobacco, as, although he could not write, he could smoke.

A lover sees his sweet-heart in every thing he looks at, just as a man bitten by a mad dog sees dogs in his meat, dogs in his drink, dogs all round him.

A contemporary has been studying phonotypy. Here is a specimen: "Wat kant be qrd must b ndurd."

Lord Cockburne, the proprietor of Bonally, was sitting on a hill-side with a shepherd, and observing the sheep reposing in the coldest situation, he observed to him, "John, if I were a sheep, I would lie on the other side of the hill." The shepherd answered, "Ay, my lord; but if ye had been a sheep ye would hae had mair sense."

"Now do take this medicine, wife, and I'll be hanged if it doesn't cure you." "Oh, I will take it then, by all means, for it is sure to do good one way or the other."

A gentleman who had a snuff-box that played "Drops of Brandy" and "The glasses Sparkle on the Board," went to dine with a friend a few miles out of town one Sunday, taking his box in his pocket. He accompanied the family to church, and by some accidental pressure he, about the middle of the sermon, touched the spring of the box, which struck up "Drops of Brandy." Every eye and ear was directed toward the spot, to the great dismay of the gentleman, who endeavored to stop the box, but, in doing so, only caused it to change the tune; on which he hastened out of church, the box rattling away as he hurried along the aisle.

AN OLD BACHELOR'S MAXIM.—As people sprinkle the floors before they sweep them, so some ladies sprinkle their husbands with tears in order to sweep the cash out of their pockets.

When the Government is afflicted, the political doctors generally apply leeches to its chest.

The Persians have a saying that "Ten measures of talk were sent down upon the earth, and the women took nine.

A country carpenter, nailing up a board to forbid vagrants trespassing, placed it with the inscription upside-down. "Beggars are accustomed to reverses," observed a passenger.

Horne Tooke returned his income at sixty pounds a year; the commissioners said they were not satisfied. Horne Tooke, in reply, stated that he had much more reason to be dissatisfied with the smallness of his income than they had.

Many persons who have a raging war-fever before going into battle are apt to get the ague afterward.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

☞ For an account of the BATTLE OF PITTSBURG LANDING and the ADVANCE UPON YORKTOWN see page 262.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, April 8, in the Senate, several petitions in favor of the passage of a uniform bankrupt law were presented and referred. The consideration of the bill confiscating the property of rebels was resumed, when Senator Henderson, of Missouri, made a speech in opposition to the proposition. Bills regulating the pay of the navy, and confirming the act of the President in accepting the services of certain volunteer engineer corps, were introduced and referred. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a resolution that Congress adjourn on the third Monday in May was referred to the Ways and Means Committee. The consideration of the National Tax bill was then resumed, and, all the amendments having been acted on, the bill was passed by a vote of 125 yeas to 13 nays. A joint resolution extending to officers and men in all the military departments the provisions of the act securing to officers and men in the Missouri or Western Military Department their pay, bounty, and pensions, was adopted. A bill to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy was referred to the Committee on Territories.

On Wednesday, April 9, in the Senate, petitions in favor of emancipation, and the establishment of a national armory and military department in Wisconsin, were presented and referred. The bill allowing the Attorney-General and Secretary of the interior to fix the salaries of District Attorneys, was passed. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the army. A bill making additional appropriations for the civil expenses of the Government was reported, and nearly all the Senate's amendments to the Post-office Appropriation bill were agreed to. The bill to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia came up on its second reading, to which Mr. Vallandigham objected. The question then recurred under the rule, "Shall the bill be rejected?" which was decided in the negative, 45 against 93. The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Pacific Railroad bill was taken up, and Mr. Phelps, of California, spoke in its favor.

On Thursday, April 10, in the Senate, resolutions of the Massachusetts Legislature, approving of the joint resolution recommended by the President, in favor of extending pecuniary aid to States desirous of emancipating their slaves, were presented. Notice was given of a bill amending the Fugitive Slave law. The bill establishing a line of steamships between San Francisco and Shanghai was taken up, and Senator Latham explained its objects. The consideration of the bill confiscating rebel property was then resumed. Senator Willey, of Virginia, offered an amendment, appropriating $5,000,000 for the colonization of negroes made free by the bill. This created a lively discussion, but no action was taken on the subject. A bill incorporating the North Pacific Railroad Company was introduced, and the Senate then went into executive session. ——In the House, a resolution expressing gratitude to Almighty God for the glorious triumph of the Union arms at Island No. 10 and Pittsburg Landing, and thanking the officers, soldiers, and sailors for their gallantry and devotion in those contests, was presented by Mr. Arnold, of Illinois, and referred to the Military Committee in order that the names of all the commanding officers may be mentioned therein, as is customary in such cases. The Senate's amendments to the Naval Appropriation bill were reported back by the Ways and Means Committee. The amendments appropriating $13,000,000 for iron-clad steam vessels of war, and $783,000 for the completion of the Stevens floating battery, were agreed to. A resolution that, if the Senate concur, Congress will adjourn sine die on the third Monday in May, was adopted. In Committee of the Whole the bill regulating the franking privilege, the bill abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, and the resolution of the Committee on Foreign Affairs relative to neutral maritime rights, were discussed.

On Friday, April 11, in the Senate, Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill amending the Fugitive Slave Law. The bill removing all disabilities for color in carrying the mails, was passed by a vote of 24 to 11. The debate on the bill confiscating rebel property was then resumed and continued till the adjournment.——In the House, the bill abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia was passed by a vote of 93 to 39. The bill has now passed both Houses by a two-thirds vote.

On Monday, April 14, in the Senate, Senator Hale announced his resignation of the Chairmanship of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The bill confiscating the property of rebels was taken up, and Senator Harris, of New York, made a speech in support of it. A resolution directing inquiry as to the expediency of providing by law for an exchange of the products of the United States with foreign countries, through our diplomatic and commercial agents, was adopted. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Speaker announced the following named members as a special committee to devise a plan for the gradual emancipation of slaves, namely: Albert S. White of Indiana, Francis P. Blair of Missouri, George P. Fisher of Delaware, William E. Lehman of Pennsylvania, Cornelius L. L. Leary of Maryland, William V. Whaley of Virginia, James F. Wilson of Iowa, Samuel L. Casey of Kentucky, and Andrew J. Clements of Tennessee. The Committee on Foreign Affairs asked to be discharged from further consideration of petitions in favor of the abrogation of the Canadian Reciprocity treaty. A resolution, calling for information respecting the alleged destruction of property in Missouri by United States troops from Kansas, was referred to the Military Committee. The consideration of the bill establishing a uniform bankrupt law was postponed till December next. The Senate resolution transferring the superintendency of the Capitol extension from the War to the Interior Department was adopted. A bill providing for the construction of a ship canal from the Mississippi River to Lake Michigan, for the transportation of war munitions, etc., and also the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, was reported by the Military Committee.

THE LATEST FROM YORKTOWN.

At the time we close this record there is no stirring news from Yorktown. Every thing is progressing well and quietly there.

The latest news from Fortress Monroe represents every thing quiet there. The Merrimac has made no further movement.

THE "MERRIMAC" OUT AGAIN.

The rebel steam-ram Merrimac came out on 11th from her moorings off Craney Island, accompanied by her consorts, the Jamestown, Yorktown, and her convoy of tugs. She proceeded as far as a point between Newport News and Sewall's point, and made toward the Monitor and the small Stevens iron battery. The Merrimac fired only one shot, but the little Stevens battery returned with four or five, upon which the Merrimac and her companions returned to Craney Island. The Yorktown captured two brigs and a schooner which were lying near Newport News, and steamed off with them.

GENERAL MITCHELL IN ALABAMA.

Our troops have pushed as far south as Huntsville, Alabama, under General Mitchell. They took possession of that place without much resistance, and captured two hundred prisoners, fifteen locomotives, and a large amount of rolling stock. Huntsville is an important point, being situated on the main trunk line of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, which connects Richmond with Memphis and the other cities of the Southwest. Our possession of Huntsville cuts off all connection between the Southern Atlantic States and the West.

On the morning of 12th two expeditions were started from Huntsville by railroad. One, under Colonel Sill, of the Thirty-third Ohio, went east to Stevenson, the junction of the Chattanooga with the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, which point they seized, two thousand of the enemy retreating without firing a shot. Colonel Sill captured five locomotives and a large amount of rolling stock. The other expedition, under Colonel Turchin, of the Nineteenth Illinois, went west, and arrived at Decatur in time to save the railroad bridge, which was then in flames.

General Mitchell now holds one hundred miles of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad—thus securing our position at Huntsville and its vicinity.

PASS CHRISTIAN OCCUPIED.

The Union troops shelled Pass Christian on the 4th inst., and landed 2400 men and twelve 4-pound howitzers. Pass Christian is situated near St. Louis Bay, within 50 miles of New Orleans. It is a port village of Harrison County, Mississippi, 13 miles from Mississippi City.

SURRENDER OF FORT PULASKI.

The Savannah Republican of the 12th announces the unconditional surrender of Fort Pulaski on the previous day. Seven large breaches were made in the walls by our batteries of Parrott guns at King's Landing, and all the barbette guns on that side and three casemate guns were dismounted. Three balls entered the magazine. Colonel Olmstead, the rebel commander, signaled, the day previous to the surrender, that our fire was so terrible that no human being could stand upon the parapet for even a moment.

REPORTED FALL OF FORT CRAIG.

The Richmond Whig publishes news from Fort Mexico, received by way of New Orleans, which professes to show that Fort Craig has fallen into the hands of rebels; Colonel Canby and his command having been compelled to make an unconditional surrender. No dates are given.

MEN AND PROPERTY CAPTURED AT ISLAND NO. 10.

The prisoners and property captured by General Pope and Commodore Foote, at and in the vicinity of Island No. 10, are summed up as follows:

Major-General	1	Privates	5500
Brigadier-Generals	3	Cannon	125
Colonels	10	Arms	10,000
Lieutenant-Colonels and Majors	15	Steamboats	10
Captains	56	Floating battery	1
Lieutenants	64	Horses and mules	2000
Second Lieutenants	84	Wagons	1000

—besides forty thousand dollars' worth of provisions, and ammunition unestimated.

THE FIRST DAY'S FIGHT AT PITTSBURG.

A copy of the Richmond Whig of the 8th contains the following dispatches in reference to the battles in Tennessee, all bearing date on the 6th, and giving an account of the Sunday fight only:

BATTLE-FIELD OF SHILOH,
VIA CORINTH AND CHATTANOOGA, April 6, 1862.

General S. Cooper, Adjutant-General,—We have this morning attacked the enemy in strong position in front of Pittsburg, and after a severe battle of ten hours, thanks to Almighty God, gained a complete victory, driving the enemy from every position.

The loss on both sides is heavy, including our Commander-in-chief, General Albert Sydney Johnston, who fell gallantly leading his troops into the thickest of the fight.

G. T. BEAUREGARD, General Commanding.

THE SECOND DAY'S FIGHT.

The Norfolk Day Book contains the following dispatch from General Beauregard of the second day's fight at Pittsburg:

CORINTH, TUESDAY, April 8, 1862.

To the Secretary of War, Richmond:

We have gained a great and glorious victory. Eight to ten thousand prisoners and thirty-six pieces of cannon. Buell reinforced Grant, and we retired to our intrenchments at Corinth, which we can hold. Loss heavy on both sides.

BEAUREGARD.

WASHINGTON, April 14, 1862.

In reference to Beauregard's dispatch, given above, inquiries have been made at the War Department, and we are authorized to say that the reports from Pittsburg Landing already given to the public contradict the report in the Norfolk papers. All reports received at the War Department confirm the statements that the enemy were routed and pursued as far as the previous orders of General Grant would permit, and the enemy are now shut up in Corinth.

THE EXPLOIT OF COLONEL ROBERTS.

The following is an account of the capture of a rebel battery at Island No. 10, illustrated on page 268:

Wednesday night five launches, one from each gun-boat, and carrying in all fifty seamen and soldiers, armed to the teeth, "might have been seen" a little after dark pushing out from the various gun-boats, and gathering under the shadows of the willows that fringe the Kentucky shore. Each boat had an officer in command, and the whole were in charge of Lieutenant-Colonel Roberts, of the Forty-second Illinois infantry.

The strictest silence was observed—not a whisper nor even the splash of an oar broke the stillness. At length every thing was ready, and giving themselves to the current the boats started down the stream, the oarsmen quietly giving each boat sufficient motion only to enable the steersman to it to keep close within the shadows. In this mysterious manner they departed, and speedily disappeared in the darkness.

An hour later and the solitary rebel sentry who, musket in hand, paced forward and backward along the parapet of the upper battery, had his thoughts disturbed by a remarkable appearance. He had just entered the depths of a cogitation, the main features of which probably were that Yankees were vulgar, base, low-born mud-sills; that Southerners are chivalrous, noble, knightly, superior; and that one of the latter is just an equal match for from five to twenty-five of the former, when suddenly happening to glance toward the river, his eyes caught sight of numberless black objects drifting slowly toward him, and above these dark masses were luminous points and flashes, which seemed to envelop them like a net-work of ghostly phosphorescent flame. He rubbed his eyes, looked again at these mysterious phenomena, and was about to conclude that something was abroad, when suddenly a voice was heard, "Give way!" fifty oars dropped in the water, and the dark-looking objects, with the swiftness of thought, shot straight for his position. He had only time to see that the supernatural light was the gleam of bayonets, and then to his disordered vision there appeared to be coming at him a hundred boats, each carrying a thousand Yankees. With a yell of horror he pulled off his piece in the air, and fled with the darkness, no more to be seen.

He had no more than left when the five boats struck the bank, their contents poured ashore and took possession of the battery, and guards were posted around, and their rat-tail files and sledge-hammers were brought into requisition with a success that, in the course of half an hour, effectually spiked every gun—there were seven—in the battery.

The party remained in the works about an hour, and then, without hearing a word from the enemy, returned to the fleet. The very audacity of the thing seems to have so paralyzed the rebels that they offered no opposition; or possibly the fears of the frightened sentry so magnified the Federal force that they were induced to believe that an army had effected a landing at the battery; and hence, instead of assuming the offensive, they busied themselves in preparations to repel an attack. The circumstance of the battery being entirely surrounded by water, with the exception of the gun-platforms and narrow parapet, which alone connected them with the higher banks below, prevented the rebels from keeping a large force at this place, and consequently they were in no condition to offer any effective defense.

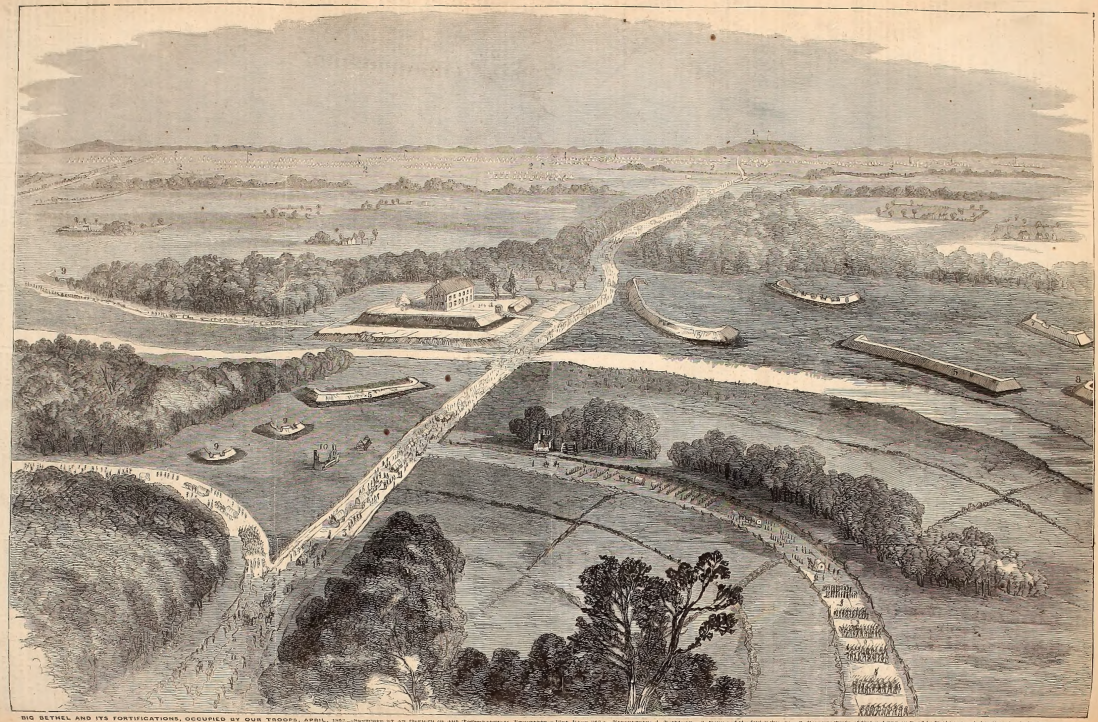
THE "VERMONT" SAFE.

The steamship Baltic arrived at this port on 13th from a cruise in search of the United States ship Vermont. The Baltic came by way of Bermuda on the 8th inst., and there learned that the Vermont was in good condition, and had proceeded on her way to Port Royal. The steamers Bermuda and Herald were loading at Bermuda for Nassau, or with the view of running the blockade at some Southern port.

FOREIGN NEWS.

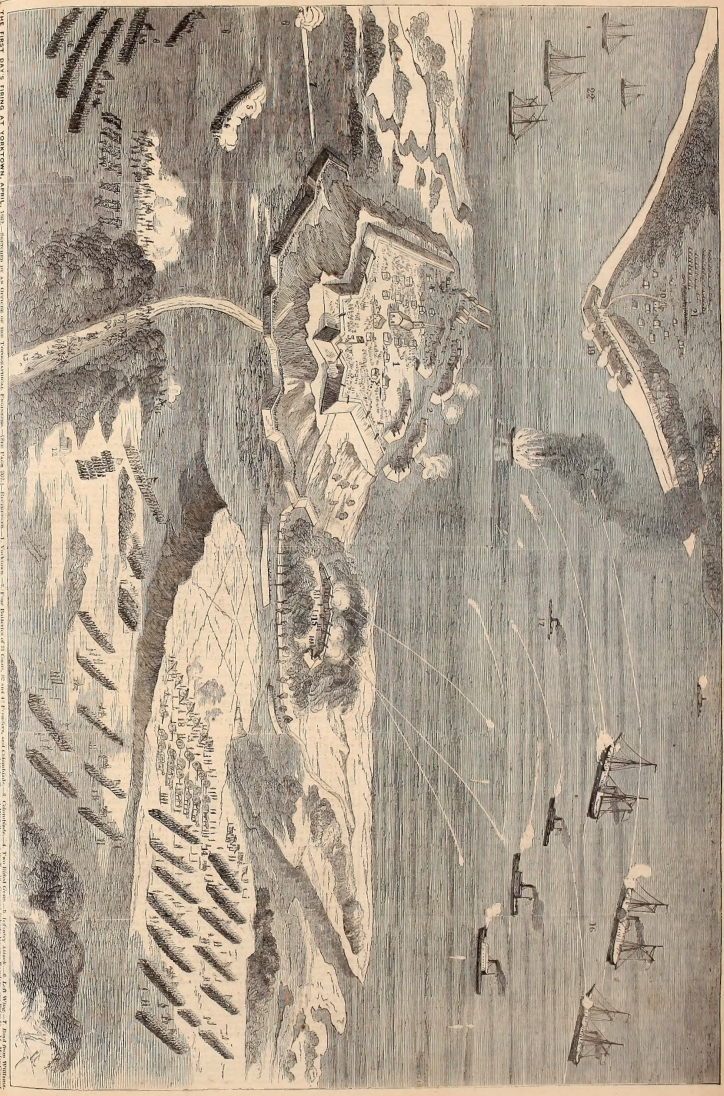
ENGLAND.

MR. PEABODY'S DONATION.

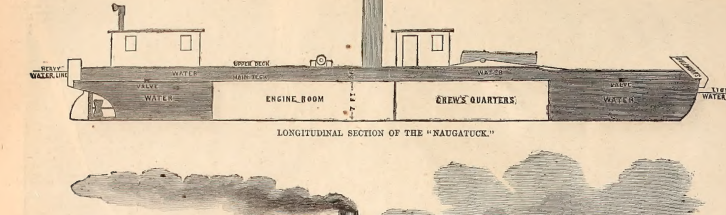


MR. GEORGE PEABODY'S letter, vesting the sum of $750,000 in the hands of trustees, as a free gift, to be employed in ameliorating the condition of the poor of London, with the reply of the trustees, has been published. The Lord Mayor of London was advised to call a meeting in order to offer the thanks of the city to Mr. George Peabody for his donation to its poor.

THE REPRESENTATIVE OF THE REBELS.

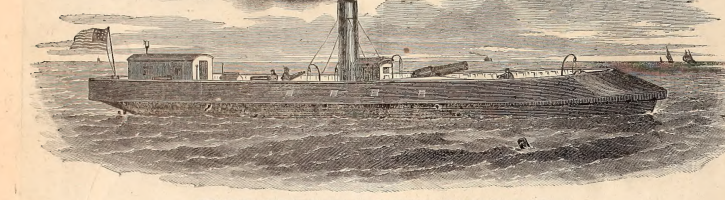


A man named Henry Hotze writes to the London Times, announcing himself as the sole commercial agent of the rebel States in England. He pledges himself not to assume or counterfeit consular functions till the Confederacy is officially dealt with by the British Government; but he is prepared to give every information to all comers. It thus appears that the Mason embassadorial mission has dwindled down to a commercial agency.



NO MORE WOODEN WALLS FOR ENGLAND.

The British press and Parliament are busily engaged in discussing the question of iron-clad floating batteries and the heavy ordnance of the Americans. It is understood that orders have been issued to suspend work on wooden vessels.



BIG BETHEL AND ITS FORTIFICATIONS, OCCUPIED BY OUR TROOPS, APRIL, 1861.—SKETCHED BY AN ARTIST IN THE CONFEDERATE ENCAMPMENT.—[SEE PAGE 261.]—1. Bethel Church.—2. Parsonage.—3. Earthwork.—4. Position of the Union Troops.—5. Passenger Trains of Union Army en Route for Washington.—6. Big Bethel.—7. Earthworks for Cannon.—8. Earthworks for Infantry.—9. Earthwork for Two Guns.—10. Earthwork for Two Guns.—11. Earthwork for Two Guns.—12. Earthwork for Two Guns.—13. Earthwork for Two Guns.—14. Earthwork for Two Guns.—15. Earthwork for Two Guns.—16. Earthwork for Two Guns.—17. Road from Hampton.—18. Hills.

LONGITUDINAL SECTION OF THE "NAUGATUCK."

THE STEVENS IRON STEAM GUN-BOAT "NAUGATUCK," NOW AT FORTRESS MONROE.

THE ADVANCE UPON YORKTOWN.

We devote pages 269 and 261 to illustrations of our advance upon Yorktown. On page 269 we publish a view of GENERAL BARNARD, WITH HIS ENGINEER AND FORTIFICATIONS, from a sketch by an officer of the Topographical Engineers. A correspondent of the World thus alluded to the entry of our troops:

Colonel Spear, with his cavalry, dashed down the road, carrying every thing before them. The two columns, having joined near Big Bethel, soon found themselves within sight of the works where the heroic Grebel fell fighting at his gun and Winthrop breathed his last cheering on his men. The rebels had to oppose their march, they were soon less than one mile from Yorktown, and found that they were mere mud batteries, with rough embrasures for their guns, mounting light field artillery. The cavalry, at the approach of our troops, fled and carried off the guns which were there. The force behind them numbered more or at least 1500 strong, including a company of cavalry. Our troops destroyed the works and proceeded over the earth-work in eight miles of Yorktown. In an open field of about eight or nine hundred acres, above the Half-way House, some infantry were drawn up in line of battle. It was deemed inexpedient to bring on an engagement, as all that was accomplished that was undertaken, our troops took up their line of march toward camp.

On the following page (261) we give a picture (from a sketch by the same hand) of the FIRST DAY'S FIGHTING AT YORKTOWN—9th April. The following account we take from the Herald correspondence:

At seven o'clock A.M. the divisions left Cockletown. The order of march was the same as on the previous day, excepting that the Fourth Michigan regiment, Colonel Woodbury, led the infantry. Colonel Averill's cavalry and Dorrance's battery were in the advance, and reached what has been seen by the enemy's heavy earth fort, but the troops apparently did not heed it; sadly neglected as it was, it could the best and readily road, extending about two miles through a region of swamp. In some places the road was in the man's house. The artillery had never yet had to move on. At intervals the roads were blocked, impeding the progress of the troops. About four miles advance after the march was passed, and the column came into good roads, and in a cultivated and beautiful region of the country. It was inspiring to the troops.

Passing by Cheesecake and Cross Creeks and Confiah Chapel, our column came in sight of the earth-works of the enemy, and York River to the right and beyond. General Richardson was present to direct arrangements. In the excitement neither Sergeant Hall nor myself could believed a battle would soon be fought. Colonel Averill's cavalry, with the Berdan Sharp-shooters and Dorrance's light battery took out for rebels and masked batteries. General Porter's brigade was ordered to the extreme right, and although there was no supporting troops behind for some distance, and wisely ignoring the thought of force the enemy might bring against them.

The brigades were put in position. Captain Griffin and Captain Weeden's batteries took places on the crest of a hill in face of the rebel intrenchments. On the right, in a piece of woods, lay General Morell's brigade, to rest put the batteries. Beyond the woods, in a perch orchard, were the Berdan Sharp-shooters; they were eight hundred yards from the intrenchments. Our artillery was fifteen hundred yards distant from the enemy. It was the first shot was fired. It came from one of the rebel batteries on the right. The shot went over our field-glass, and many more were fired. Generals Porter and Morell and other officers were present. The enemy kept up the cannonade, but did not explode. A quick response followed from Captain Weeden's battery, which was handled with great precision. This second shot, a solid shot, struck one of the cannons, named Reynolds, on the right of the rebel battery. The fight was continued; but the fifth minute after the operation.

A consistency firing was kept up an hour and a half; subsequently intervals of from fifteen to twenty minutes occurred between the shots. The enemy fired ninety heavy guns, from twelve to twenty-four pounders.

ONLY ONE of the enemy's shells burst. Our hero did not seem a mind them much, but rather enjoyed the thing. One shot struck in the Ninth Massachusetts regiment, Pritchard, and wounded two men of the sixty-second Pennsylvania Regiment.

General Morell and staff and General Martindale and staff were in the foremost places of danger in their positions. The Berdan Sharp-shooters made fearful havoc among the enemy's gunners, picking them off by the dozen. Colonel Berdan says they killed at least fifty of the rebels and wounded a hundred. Toward night the enemy commenced shelling them by making a gun out from behind the left end of the fort, discharging it and then dragging it in to load again, the only way the men were enabled to work the gun. They tried the plan of covering the working of guns by running a plank upon the parapet, and turning it upon the edge; but they did not seem to like to trust it. The sharp-shooters, with their rifles, picked off every man as a gunner showed himself the aim of the sweeping rifle would enforce on him the propriety of retirement. At first the rebel sharp-shooters attempted to shoot our men from rifle-pits; but they found even these pieces too hazardous, and were not long in withdrawing to their positions behind the intrenchments. During the afternoon a small mounted party, led by an officer carrying a white shirt, the bearer of which was distinctly visible, ventured outside the fort. A member of the sharp-shooters, who goes by the sobriquet of "California Joe," observed that "he was sent at a white mark." He quickly drew up his telescopic rifle, took aim, fired, and the man reeled in his saddle and fell to the ground apparently dead.

At half past four P.M. the enemy opened heavy firing from earth-works to the left of where the above shooting occurred. They made General Martindale's brigade their target. Our people were ready for them. The First Massachusetts battery took a position, and returned the fire. Lieutenant Kingsbury was in command of the battery. The rebel gunners showed more skill in cutting their pieces here than we shown from the other portion of the intrenchment. The sun was shining on our pieces, which gave the enemy a great advantage.

Before the firing ceased General Hamilton's division arrived on the ground. Captain Randolf's Sixth Rhode Island battery relieved during the last of the firing the Third Massachusetts battery.

The rebels had five range of the best locations for our artillery and the grounds on which we were encamped; but the casualties were very slight indeed compared with the injuries which our sharp-shooters inflicted upon them. Whenever they made a good shot they would utter an earthly yells. The principal portion of our troops which had arrived were located in the large fields on either side of the road, nearly surrounded by woods. In front, where our pickets were planted, there is an extensive field and then a lower ground, a large plain, in front of the rebel works. The rebels are strongly intrenched behind the centre of the fortifications, which have dense woods behind them.

THE VICTORY AT ISLAND No. 10.

We devote page 268 to illustrations of the SIEGE OF ISLAND NUMBER TEN, on the Mississippi, which was finally surrendered to Commodore Foote on the morning of 7th inst. We give a portrait of the gallant COMMODORE; a portrait of GENERAL POPE, whose brilliant "traverse movement" led to the capture of 4 generals and 5000 rebels; a view of the "CAROLINE" GUN-BOAT PASSING THE REBEL BATTERIES; and a picture of the GALLANT EXPLOIT OF COMMODORE FOOTE, which we here print, surprised a rebel battery and spiked the guns.

The following sketches of Commodore Foote and General Pope will be read with interest:

COMMODORE FOOTE.

Commodore Foote is a native of Connecticut, of which State his father was governor for several years, and connected to the navy of the United States. He is a son of Senator Foote, of Mississippi, who was formerly a resident of, and, in the Senate, with one of his famous speeches. He entered the navy as a midshipman in the year 1822, and has since mainly served the country nearly forty years. He was made a full captain in the year 1856, and on the commencement of December, 1861, under which commission he now acts as flag-officer of the western flotilla.

He has seen much service during the past twenty years and a half, and he performed nearly eight years of sea duty. He was stationed for over two years, and was last at sea in June, 1858. At the breaking out of the present troubles he was in command of the Navy-yard at Brooklyn, and shortly after the commencement of hostilities was ordered to the command of the naval forces on Western or Mississippi flotilla, of which he is the commander. Since then he has been engaged in the duties he reported as having worked night and day with a zeal and ability that has commanded the admiration of the officers of the service, and has accomplished an almost herculean task. Being dependent upon the Navy Department for men and a portion of his equipment, and compelled to call upon the War Department for other things equally necessary to the success of his mission in the inland waters, and apparently an object of jealousy and a subject of contempt from both, he has quietly worked through all obstacles. He is a quiet, gray-haired veteran, and, although holding a rank equal to major-general of the land forces, and which is not considered that forces, and, when hoisting at us in unison, while the Rubbing in each broad his flag, has been quietly and unostentatiously serving his country at the junction of the Ohio and the Mississippi. His present expedition has been carried out with spirit and energy, and the result is gratifying to the nation.

GENERAL POPE.

General John Pope was born in Kentucky, about the year 1823. He entered the Military Academy at West Point in 1838, and graduated in 1842 as Second Lieutenant of Topographical Engineers. He was in the Mexican war, and at Monterey so distinguished himself that he obtained his First-Lieutenancy. Again at Buena Vista he won laurels and the brevet rank of Captain. He was still a Captain when the rebellion broke out, and was one of the officers appointed by the War Department to escort President-Lincoln to Washington. He was loyal, and was soon after the inauguration appointed to a command in the Northwest. For some time he served gallantly in Northern Missouri, under Generals Prentiss and Hunter. General Halleck gave him command of a separate expedition in February, and he started from Cairo, Missouri, with a well-appointed command of some 18,000 men, and marched down the Mississippi, capturing all the rebel forts that took the place, except Columbus, all along the west bank of the river for fifteen miles, and captured the rebel camp at New Madrid.

THE EXPLOIT OF THE "CARONDELET."

The New York Times correspondent thus describes the exploit of the Carondelet. After describing the efforts made to send transports through the bayous to General Pope at New Madrid, and the necessity of having a gun-boat to protect them crossing over the tropics, he says:

> Why the Carondelet was selected particularly for this enterprise I do not know. Some boat had to go, and Captain Walke, being nearly the oldest officer in the first, still having an old acquaintance performed gallantly service, was dispatched for the enterprise.
>
> The preparations made were few. On the port side a fed-iron was lashed, loaded with bales of pressed hay, and furnished as a rebel-shot-and-shell proof protection against batteries located on the Kentucky shore. If they got through safely, they had to run the gauntlet of the rebel batteries on the bluff on the bayou, on the opposite side, and by balancing the bow and stern of the boat with the two guns each broadside. During the day (Friday) two of the transports were removed, and their places supplied with rifled guns, and the boat was ready for the possible engagement.
>
> This was all the preparation made, and, this accounted, the boat waited for night, when their search would, to some extent, lessen the danger of the attempt.
>
> At 10 o'clock the cast lines, and moved slowly down the stream. At the same time heavy clouds had overspread the sky, and a genuine tropical (a sixty thunder-storm came howling on the river. It did not rain in the ordinary sense of the word, but the water fell in sheets, completely drowning down in masses. Nor did it slacken and lighten the darkness, but seemed to thicken, and finally rested at us as if all the electric batteries of north, south, east, and west, had concentrated their forces, and were bringing

> The boat moved down the river, and the darkness and the storm increased, the thunder and lightning of the heavens seeming to mock the roar of the artillery which the enemy on the bank were soon to open upon us. Then flashes along the shore ceased, and then came a few moments of terrible suspense. Had she gone down, or was she drifting helpless in the swift current? Just then the flare of a gun came up faintly from below, then another, and another. It was the signal that she had passed through the fleet of rebel gun-boats, and the roar of artillery, and hail and hurricane of shots from the watching crowds, but even the storm itself was outreached, and the voice of ordination, cast down to the whole, with every straining their teeth in bullet rage behind their fortifications.
>
> To conclude, I will add that forty-seven shots were fired at the Carondelet, not one of which struck her! She lay all night a short distance above New Madrid, and the morning early steamed up to the landing.
>
> Such another scene of rejoicing at her arrival was probably never witnessed. Men hurrahed, cried, laughed—they fired cannon, tossed up their hats—and their every excitement culminated in raising the crew of the boat the coons ashore from the Carondelet, and carrying them on their shoulders in triumph all over the town.

(For an account of Colonel Roberts's exploit, see page 269.)

THE BATTLE OF PITTSBURG LANDING.

We publish on pages 264 and 265 a large illustration of the BATTLE OF PITTSBURG LANDING, TENNESSEE, fought on 6th and 7th between the Union army, under Generals Grant and Buell, and the rebels, under Beauregard and Sydney Johnston. The point selected by our artist for illustration represents the closing scene of our army under Grant at 3 P.M. on 7th. The Cincinnati Times gives the following account of the battle:

Our forces were stationed in the form of a semicircle, the right resting on a point north of Crump's Landing, or eastern bank in front of the main road to Corinth, and our left extending to the river in the direction of Hamburg, four miles north of Pittsburg Landing. At four o'clock on the morning of the 6th 400 men of General Prentiss's division were attacked by the enemy six miles in advance of our lines. Our men fell back on the main body of the army, contesting every inch of ground. At seven o'clock the whole of General Prentiss's brigade had joined on the long rail was sounded and the men were falling into line. Reinforcements were coming up, they retreated a galling fire until they reached the lines of the Second brigade.

At six o'clock the attack had become general along our whole front. The enemy in overwhelming numbers fell on pickets of General Sherman's division, and fell on the forty-eighth, Fifteenth, and Seventy-second Ohio regiment. These troops were never before in action, and, being so unexpectedly attacked, made no stubborn resistance. Little but were, in common with the forces of General Prentiss, forced to make support of the troops immediately their rear. At one o'clock the entire line on both wings of the army was engaged. The enemy's force was without interruption from the main centre of the army. Between twelve and one o'clock the fire on the left was a desperate charge on the Fourteenth Ohio battery, which was supported by infantry, and fell into the hands. A gallant army fifth carried for possession of the Fifth Ohio battery, and three of its guns were taken by the enemy.

By eleven o'clock a number of commanders of regiments had been killed, and in some cases the field-officers had resigned; yet the fighting continued with an earnestness which showed the coolest on both sides not to yield or victory. Foot by foot the ground was contested, and the Fifteenth Ohio regiment, which had lost its colonel, was shockedand their fire, and made vigorous efforts to outwing, endeavoring to outflank, and driving it to a new bank. The wing was under General Hurlbut, and was composed of the Fourteenth, Thirty-second, Forty-fourth, and Fifty-seventh Indiana, Eighth, Eighteenth, and Twenty-first Illinois. (The Fourteenth Indiana Regiment was not there. It is serving under General Shields in Virginia. —Ed.) Fronting its line, however, was the Fourteenth, Fifty-seventh, and Seventy-seventh Ohio, and Fifth Ohio Cavalry, of General Sherman's division. For nearly two hours a sheet of fire blazed from both columns, the rebels fighting with a vigor that was only equaled by those contending with them. While the contest raged the battery the gun-boat Tyler passed up the river to a point opposite the enemy, and poured in broadsides from her immense guns, greatly aiding in forcing the enemy back. Up to three o'clock the battle raged with a fury that defies description. The rebels had found every attempt to break our line unavailing. Their dead lay in front of our position in solemn, and fearful, and impossible, but turned all their strength upon our left. Foiled in that quarter, they now made another attempt at our centre, and under every effort to rout our forces before the reinforcements, which had been sent for, should come up.

At five o'clock there was a short cessation in the fire of the enemy, their little failing back for nearly half a mile, when they suddenly wheeled and again threw their entire forces upon our left wing, determined to make a final struggle in that quarter; but the gun-boats Tyler and Lexington poured in their shot thick and fast with terrific effect. Meanwhile General Wallace, who had taken a circuitous route from Crump's Landing, appeared suddenly on the enemy's right wing. In the face of this combination of circumstances the rebels felt that their enterprise for the day was a failure, and as night was approaching fell back until they reached an advantageous position somewhat in the rear, yet occupying the main road to Corinth.

The gun-boats continued to throw shell after them until out of range. After a wearied watching of several hours of intense anxiety, the reinforcements under General Buell appeared on the opposite bank of the river. The work of passing the river began, the Thirty-sixth Indiana, the Sixty-eighth Ohio being the first to cross, followed by the main portions of Generals Nelson and Bruce's divisions. Cheer after cheer greeted their arrival, and they were immediately sent to the advance, where they rested on their arms for the night. All night long shouts were exchanged carrying General Buell's force across, and when daylight broke it was evident the rebels too had been strongly reinforced.

The battle on Monday was opened by the rebels at seven o'clock from the Corinth road, and in half an hour extended along the whole line. At nine o'clock the sound of artillery and musketry fully equaled that of the previous day. The enemy was met by our reinforcements and the still unwearied soldiers of the previous day with an energy that showed their determination to win the victory evidently knowing the extreme of our left wing. Step by step, with perseverance and determination, the rebel forces were weak point by which to turn our force. They left one point but to return to it immediately, and then as suddenly would, by some masterly stroke of generalship, direct a most vigorous attack upon some division where they lacked they would not be expected; but the fire of our lines was as steady as clock-work, and it soon became evident that the enemy considered the task they had undertaken a hopeless one. Further reinforcements now began to arrive, and took position on the right of the main centre under General Wallace.

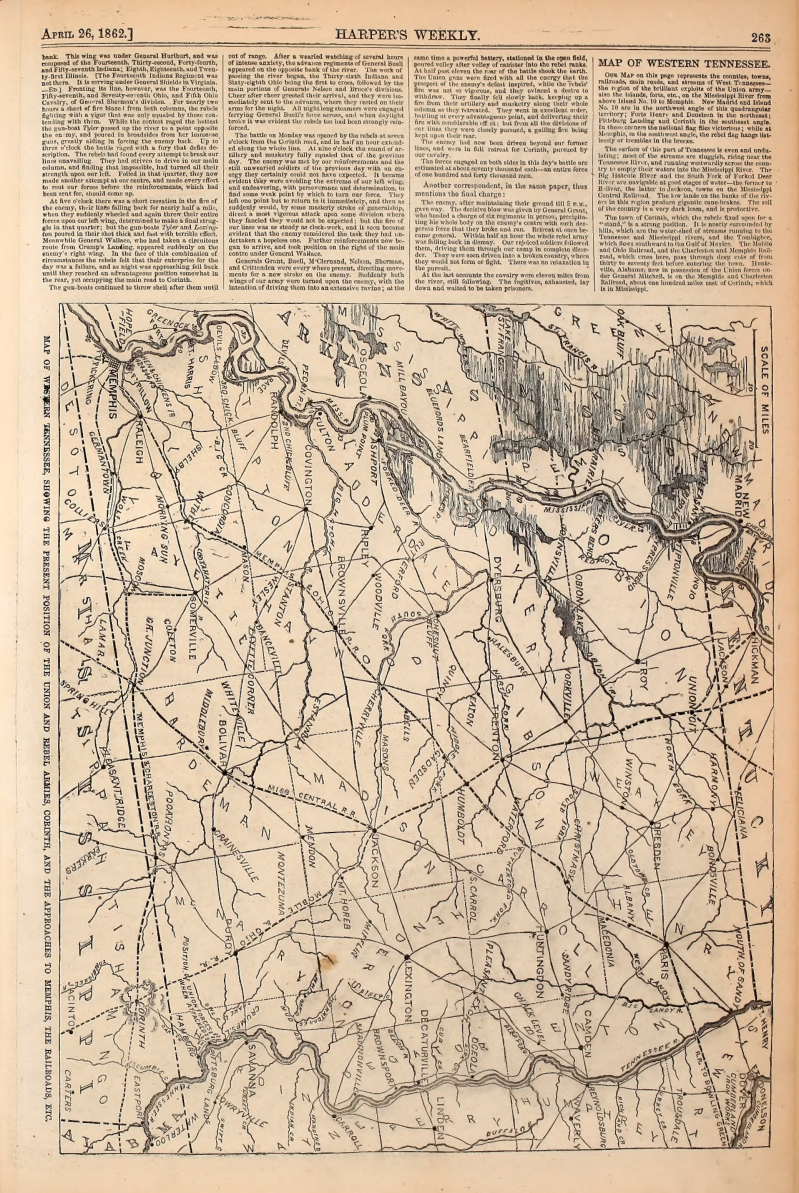
General Grant, Buell, M'Clernand, Nelson, Sherman, and Crittenden were every where present, directing movements for a new stroke on the enemy. Suddenly both wings of our army were turned upon the enemy, with the intention of driving them into an extensive ravine; at the same time a powerful battery, stationed in the open field, poured volley after volley of canister into the rebel ranks. At half past eleven the roar of the battle shook the earth. The Union guns were fired with all the energy that the prospect of the enemy's defeat inspired, while the rebels' fire began to slacken, and finally ceased in the direction of Corinth. They finally fell slowly back, keeping up a fire from their artillery and musketry along their whole column as they retreated. They went in excellent order, halting at every advantageous point, and delivering their fire with considerable effect; but from all the divisions of our lines they were closely pursued, a galling fire being kept upon their rear.

The enemy had now been driven beyond our former lines, and were in full retreat for Corinth, pursued by our cavalry.

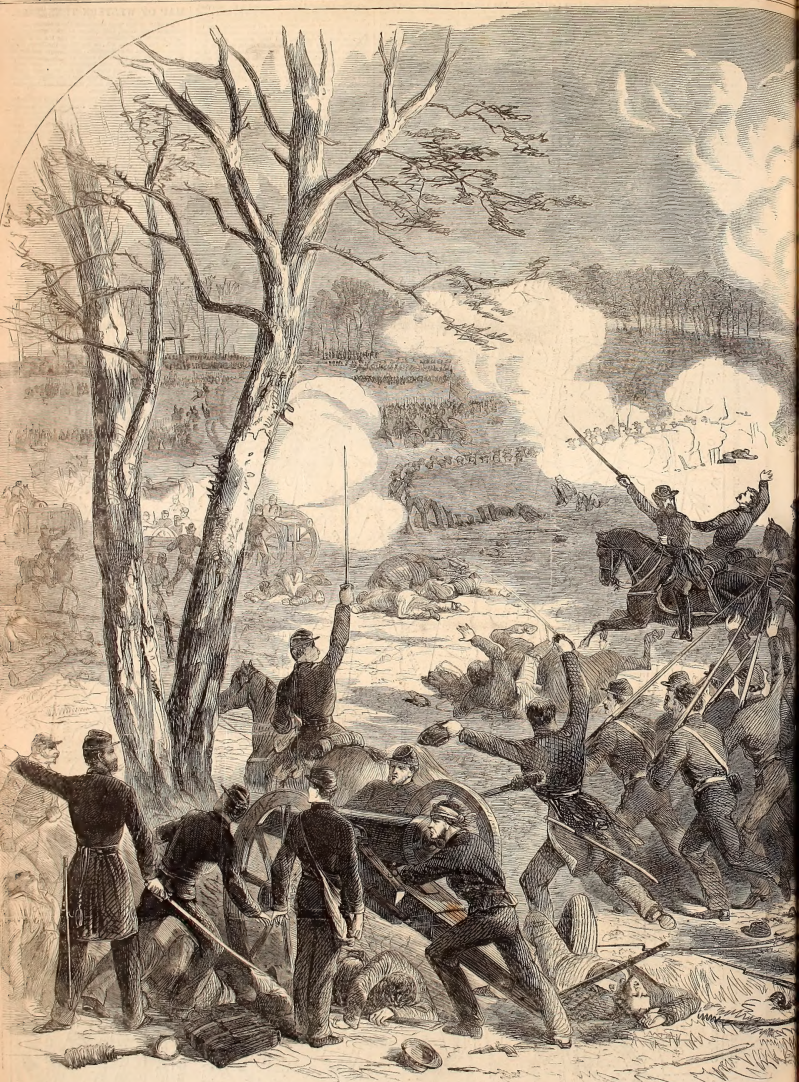
The forces engaged on both sides in this day's battle are estimated at about seventy thousand each—an entire force of one hundred and forty thousand men.

Another correspondent, in the same paper, thus mentions the final charge:

The enemy, after maintaining their ground till 8 P.M., gave way. The decision then was given by General Grant, who headed a charge of six regiments in person, pressing his big white body on the enemy's centre with such desperate force that they broke and ran. Retreat at once became general. Within half an hour the whole rebel army was filling back in dismay. Our rejoiced soldiers followed them, driving them through our camp in complete disorder. They were soon driven into a broken country, where they would not form or fight. There was no relaxation in the pursuit.

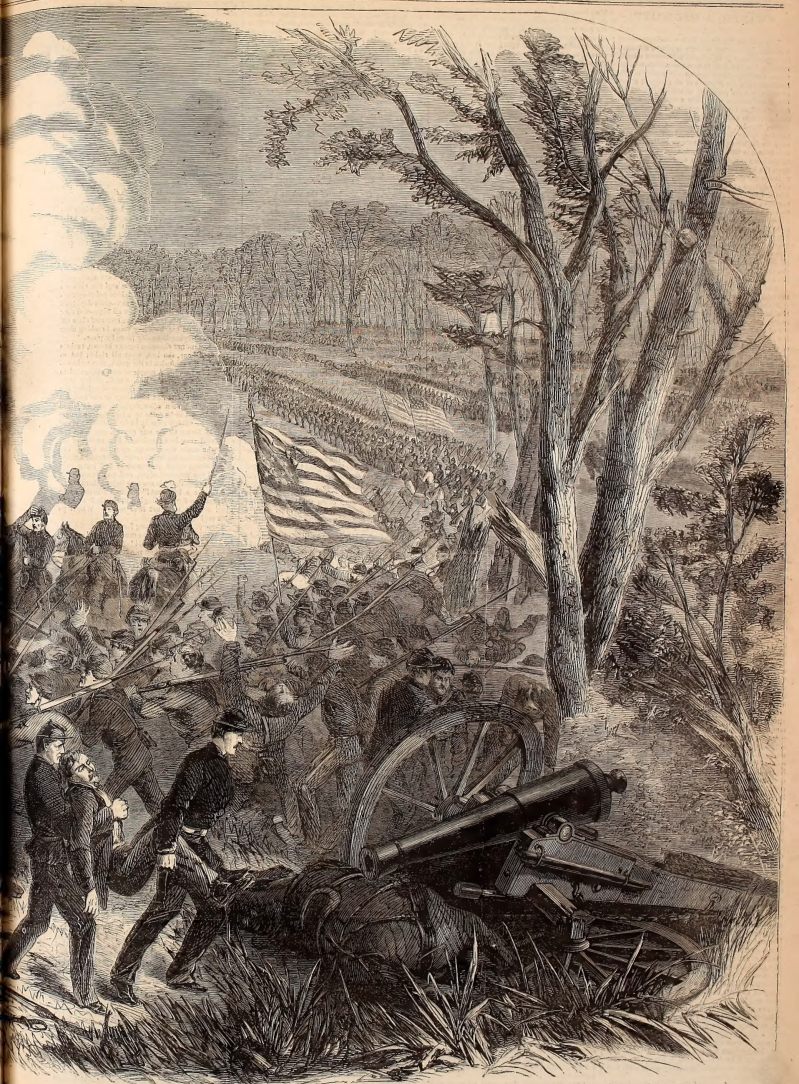


At the last accounts the cavalry were eleven miles from the river, still following. The fugitives, exhausted, lay down and waited to be taken prisoners.



MAP OF WESTERN TENNESSEE.

OUR Map on this page represents the counties, towns, railroads, main roads, and streams of West Tennessee—the region of the brilliant exploits of the Union army—also the islands, forts, etc., on the Mississippi River from above Island No. 10 to Memphis. New Madrid and Island No. 10 are in the northwest angle of this quadrangular territory; Fort Henry and Donelson in the northeast; Pittsburg Landing and Corinth in the southeast angle. In these corners the national flag flies victorious; while at Memphis, in the southwest angle, the rebel flag hangs lifelessly or trembles in the breeze.



The surface of this part of Tennessee is even and undulating; most of the streams are sluggish, riding near the Tennessee River, and running westwardly across the country to empty their waters into the Mississippi River. The Big Hatchie River and the South Fork of Forked Deer River are navigable at good stages of water—the former to Bolivar, the latter to Jackson. The line of the Mississippi Central Railroad, 72 miles in length, is the only railroad in this region passing through a considerable portion of the country in a very dark loam, and is productive.

The town of Corinth, which the rebels fixed upon for a "stand," is a strong position. It is nearly surrounded by the rebel army. It is the point of intersection of the Mobile, Tennessee and Mississippi rivers, and the Tombigbee, which flow southward to the Gulf of Mexico. The Mobile and Ohio Railroad, and the Charleston and Memphis Railroad, which cross here, pass through deep cuts of from thirty to seventy feet before entering the town. Huntsville, Alabama, now in possession of the Union forces under General Mitchell, is on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, about one hundred miles east of Corinth, which is in Mississippi.

THE BATTLE OF PITTSBURG LANDING, APRIL 7, 1862—FINAL AND VICTORIOUS C

RE OF THE UNION TROOPS UNDER MAJOR-GENERAL GRANT.—[See Page 262.]

"WANTED A LIFE-BOAT!"

NOT far from the pretty little watering-place of Glandore, and yet far enough to escape the tourist's route, there is an old and half-ruined chapel, and close to which may be seen a neat little cottage, whose carefully-tended garden and snowy mullin blinds bespeak the presence of an occupant a step or two above the peasantry of the district. Both chapel and cottage are within a stone's throw of a fearful cliff, at the foot of which the waves of the Atlantic chafe and roar with their everlasting and solemn thunder, and over and above, a hundred feet into fury by the pitiless wind, send showers of spray over the dank margin of the rocky wall. It is on an occasion it is that the little cottage shows life; a bright lamp is lighted in the window, a fire glows upon the hearth—and the whole aspect of the place is to invite the entrance of the storm. The occupants of the cottage are two—a young but faded woman, who sits by the fire, her pale, sad face turned to the door, as if watching for some well-beloved one to come—and an old and infirm man, who muses about, sometimes giving his companion a report as to the progress of the storm, but oftener pausing to look up and down himself, with the hopeless expression that it requires little penetration to see that his is one of the hearts made to fill the—the long, heart-breaking watch and ward over the shuttered intellect of one dearer to him than life itself.

Who and what these two are will appear from the following narrative:

Among the passengers on board the Washington, that sailed from Boston toward the close of February, 18—, was a Mr. Morris, who was the owner of the Engineers, who, at the close of the Peninsular War, accepted, like many others, a grant of Canadian land. The old gentleman had prospered, and at his death left his only son a rich man. Rising to an old England, he sold out his estate, and set forth from the land of his adoption full of the brightest anticipations.

For the first night all went well with them; and in all human probability a few days would bring them in sight of British ports; but about 250 they spoke a brig bound for Dublin, and sent letters on board to be posted on her arrival. From the moment of that event, the luck of the voyage was away. Home and England became, as it were, a reality. Each one had settled in his mind as to the voyage without seeming to possess one feeling in common with any one else, now became communicative, and began to recount anecdotes of their childhood, becoming almost poetical in their descriptions of village scenes. The afternoon wore on minutes became an hour, and still tone lingered; more hot water was called for, so the steward, at all events, felt an interest in the conversation.

About twelve o'clock on the following night they were off Cape Clear. Morning would, they expected, give them their first refreshing glimpse of British ground; but morning broke, or rather struggled forth, dreary and stormy. The wind, that had been rising, packed upon each other with that precise appearance a sailor knows so well. Sullen gusts of wind came howling over the waves, and the rain and there showed a troubled, frothy look. As day advanced the gale increased, and, instead of any one denying it, they might prepare for a rough night; the wind was dead in their teeth, and the sea running so that the vessel can, for any length of time, make indecision on the Captain's part whether or not to put about and run for Cork Harbor. But though heavily enough laden, the ship was a good one, perfectly manageable, and had a first-rate crew; thus, though the first impulse of passengers mingled with the dread of exposing so many inexperienced matrons and children to the contingency of a storm, spoke in favor of a retreat, the honor of his ship, the time of his voyage, and the interest he had in the speed of his vessel, were all too strong; and, keeping her well to sea, he still attempted to stay on her true course. The gale, however, grew more and more, and the wind and sea were his opponents, each moment lending to their fierce struggle—so much so that the vessel lay quiet in spite of every effort. Presently the sky cleared a little—the wind lulled; then, veering round to the southward, seemed for one wild moment to blow over. The force was irresistible, the ship drifted helm, and by the fury of night closed in.

Few on board slept that night; for though no hint was there as to danger, the very fact of such a temperature was one to their native habits, and a pressing influence, and, together with the wind and wave, kept sleep far off.

The wind began freshening after midnight; the Captain hoisted a sail to keep the vessel off shore; a greater press of canvas was deemed unsafe. Daylight brought new horrors. It was discovered that the ship had sprung a leak, and that a foot and of water in the hold; the main-topsail and mainmast were to be taken in. But the effort was vain; it was impracticable either. All passengers were at work. At noon they caught a glimpse of land, which to their surprise proved to be Cape Clear, a native of Ireland, came up to the Captain and told him of Glandore Harbor, offering to pilot the ship in, even in the gale. But he was not listened to, a deceptive lull aroused a hope that the wind was abating, and the ship was kept out to sea as long as they could.

The water soon gained upon them, one of the winches having broken; and none being found to fit, the pumps were soon choked, and nothing remained but to take out the fore-hatchway. Casks were broken out at once formed, and set to work. At this juncture the tiller broke, and before any thing could be done to save it the rudder went, and the ship was left at the mercy of the wind and tide, a hopeless wreck.

The passengers, now fully alive to their danger, crowded round the Captain, asking for hope. One poor woman threw herself upon her knees before him, beseeching him to say one word of comfort. At this moment, when, although nearly mid-day, the rain and mist made it impossible to see beyond a yard or two, the ship struck upon a rock. Her, for seemed to tie every tongue; and in this terrible silence, more fearful than even shrieks and sobs, the vessel rose, as if lifted by a supernatural power, trembled for a moment upon a mountain of water, and then crashed down upon the black and pitiless reef.

"It's all over!" said the Captain—his voice breaking the spell of silence.

"Not yet, Captain," cried Harry Crofts, the Irish sailor who had proposed running for Glandore, "if sure we're off Downen Castle! I know that black reef; ay! the Devil's Claw, sure enough. Holy Virgin, they've seen us! There go the guns!"

As he spoke, the boom of a gun was heard, then two hundred yards off, and instantly answered by a yell that seemed to burst from every heart.

"Clear away the life-boat!" cried a voice—showing how near they were to the shore.

A rocket was fired, but fell short; another—and yet another.

"It's the mist," said the Captain; "they can not see us."

"I'll swim ashore with a line, Sir, if you'll let me," said a voice.

"No, no, Crofts; it's death!"

"It's the same to stay, Sir. Here's Mr. Morris and me ready!"

"Off, then; and God speed you! Are you ready?"

"Ay, ay, Sir."

"Ropes all right?"

"Ay, ay, Sir."

"God bless you!"

And the two men, with a rope firmly fixed round the waist of each, sprang over the side, and committed themselves to the mercy of the waves.

A few minutes of intense anxiety followed, during which the people on shore threw another rocket, with an equally unfortunate result. Then those on board beheld the line, felt them tighten—the swimmers had reached the land; a hawser was then attached, and soon drawn ashore. Then one of the sailors proposed to go and see what was to be done; but before he could do so Morris reappeared, and was welcomed with the most enthusiastic cheers.

He and Harry Crofts had reached the mouth of a cavern, and having secured the hawser, were ready to do whatever the Captain might direct, according it.

Buckets were tied together and slung. Into these the children, six in number, were fastened, and intrusted to Morris and a couple of sailors; next the women, in a similar manner—and lastly the men, one by one.

A couple of hours were passed in getting off from the wreck, the last coming the last man to leave her. She could be seen from their resting-place standing upright, and appeared loth to quit. Presently great bank had separated, and the wild waves tossed them to and fro in their fierce play. Even then, their strength to the last moment, for though they were on firm ground, the cavern could be approached only at low water and in fine calm weather; in such a storm as was now raging it was a prison. Besides, they had not even a drop of water or provision, and the cliff was full, nearly 100 persons. The Coast-guardsmen had evidently conjectured as much, for a rope and pound of provisions was lowered toward evening; and in it a few lines scrawled on paper, telling them that the storm would fall would be well. A pencil and paper were laid in the basket; and with these the Captain wrote at last the second as proof of their situation and safety, etc. A few minutes after the basket was drawn up, the rope was lowered down again, and with a bundle of blankets. For the two days that the storm lasted they were abundantly supplied with food; still longer, and the cavern was flooded when the third morning broke, calm and clear, it would be difficult to distinguish the sea from the sky. Directly the tide went down a boat appeared round the end of the cliff, and was, as the reader may imagine, hailed with a cheer—such as one gives once in a lifetime.

FROM the moment that the storm came on, a sort of instinct had drawn Mr. Morris and Harry Crofts together; and from the moment of their arrival on the cliffs in the cavern, and Harry was clasped in his father's arms, he did not forget his friend, but humbly offered him such consolation as their cottage afforded. This Morris thankfully accepted, and for a few days the passengers and crew were amply provided with clothes and comforts by the gentry and country-people. But every one of these was but a fleeting interval before Mr. Morris—who still lingered at the Coast-guard station, incited by every feeling of kindness, inquiring about among the mountains, and listening in the evening to old Tom's yarns and Nelly's sweet Irish songs. Nelly was the Coast-guard's sister, a perfect specimen of Irish beauty, perhaps but remembering the dark eyes and flashing beauty she. He did not, however, acknowledge this even to himself, but found a hundred excuses to quiet his conscience and give him the right to linger. At last he was summoned to London on business, and most reluctantly bade farewell to his kind entertainers, by whom he had endeared himself and become like one of themselves. A couple of months passed by. Morris had written frequently, but not before he had noticed the change in Nelly's looks and spirits, and tried to give her sage advice as a brother of Mr. Morris. Then, as a man of reason, could not think of her in an honest way. Poor Nelly flushed up, and for the first time grew angry with Harry, telling him that she did not care for Mr. Morris, and hoped he would never come back; to which Harry answered nothing, but left home with a sorer heart than he had ever done before.

After Harry went, there came no news of Mr. Morris, and Nelly's cheeks grew paler still. She would sit watching the Bay, gazing eagerly at every passing sail, as if she expected each was wing its way to her with some news of her old lover's fortunes. But winter came and went, and a terrible winter it was! Wrecks multiplied upon the coasts of Great Britain; the cries of the drowning went up from every shore. Three vessels were wrecked off Gallyhead and Ring; and for more than a month after the passenger-ship was lost (with every soul on board), anxious and heart-broken strangers came and went to the village, searching in every inlet of those friends and relatives hurried to their graves.

Life-boats were added to the number then in existence; but the fishermen at Glandore were too poor to purchase one, and the institution was hopeless, as no one cared to supply one free. Rockets were their only means—and even of these but a scanty supply. Many a heart-broken, but human strength and daring could do had been done for the unfortunate vessels; but on such a coast, what could be effected by artificial means, can do little.

Nelly was the wonder of the whole country side; she seemed endowed with superhuman courage and forethought, and the simple villagers began to look upon her with something like awe. They little knew what was nerving her heart and mind, or that the storms had become like a nervous memento of her lost happiness. A vague presentiment had taken possession of her mind that his fate would be linked with the wild sea, and as those the storms cast upon the shore. But spring came, and, so far as she knew, Morris was safe.

One afternoon, when Father having gone some business to Ross, Nelly locked up the cottage, and went off to the cliffs to watch the sea-gulls just above the cavern. A soft breeze was blowing over the water; the waves rose and broke with a regular cadence, and they were creeping the shortwiry grass almost overhanging the cliff, turning their eyes now and then down below to the beautiful depth below. Nelly's thoughts were busy with the day of the wreck; and then following it up, turning to Morris's early sky and bright hopes, all of every thing seemed to mock her own sadness, and bowing forward, with her face covered with her hands, she fell to pondering at her fate.

Nelly had but small experience of the world, and none whatever of love, when nothing spoke about the "old, old story." Her fate seemed to her an unusual one—one at least she had never seen before. Even in our own fashionable world, it was the blame she felt that had made her bear up so bravely. But none could guess the cause of the struggle.

"There she is, yer honor, good luck to ye!" said a childish voice beside her; and starting up, she saw Morris's boy, Tom.

Neither spoke for some minutes. Nelly was busily trying to keep down the beating of her heart, scarcely believing she saw other than a spirit. Morris himself was silent—panic-struck at the change in her.

"Good God, Nelly, are you ill?" at last broke from his lips, as he stepped forward as if to take her hand. Nelly started back. Nelly raised her eyes.

"Oh! Nelly, Nelly! Have I made you ill? Oh, my own love, forgive me! I came to you in haste, but I could not stay away. I've come for my wife."

III.

WHAT a night of gossip and conjecture that was! Every cottage was filled with the news. Harry Crofts not one among them but was proud of Nelly's good luck; and as all of them knew and liked the gentleman, their joy was as envious as unfeigned among them.

Old Tom's return from Ross was one he remembered all his life after; and—when he heard from Morris how he had loved Nelly long ago, but, remembering how unfortunate his prospects were, not happily, had said nothing, and gone away hoping she would forget him, but that every month made him love her more, till at last he could not help returning, just, he thought, to see her once more and then go away—Old Tom wept. Through his eyes more than once during the recital. Then getting Nelly on his knee, he told her it was just like way her mother had done when she married her—was the poor one—her mother being a farmer's daughter, and he but above a common laborer. "But true love gained the day," added Tom, "and so it will to the end o' the world."

Nelly's own thoughts were thought much of sleep that night; and Nelly was up and off to have a look at the sea at daybreak, just as she told Morris—so shy and undemonstrative.

It seemed Morris had no one to please but himself, for he had left the ship and remained in port in place. So it may be believed neither of them had any wish to put it off. Harry was expected home in a few days, and would feel a day spent in Ross would be present.

In the same time, Morris spent his time at the village, making, as the people said, a scholar of Nelly, whose cheeks began to wear their old roses in a week. Then he paraded the crew before them, to show him the sort of men he might intrust his present to.

The only thing that marred the happiness with which the wedding-day broke forth was the non-arrival of Harry. Mr. Morris had written to the agents, and found, the ship's departure having been delayed, he had gone North England, getting a few unusually speedy passage, before the 10th or 12th of the month; and Nelly would fain have put off the wedding-day. But old Tom would not hear of it, and accordingly the arrangements were completed; and upon the 9th of June Nelly stood by the side of her husband in the old cliff, and plighted faith to her chosen one. Every body in the village had packed for miles around, flocked to the chapel, and lent their voices to cheer the beautiful bride.

While the ceremony was proceeding an ominous change had been taking place in the weather. Seagulls were seen hovering uneasily round the cliffs —a few early swallows skimmed along close to the earth, while heavy-backed clouds rose to the south, and the low, moaning wind, sweeping over the rain, came scudding across the water. A slight shade passed over Nelly's face, as, looking out of the bound you in storm, Nelly dear, and as going to have a storm to consecrate our happiness."

Nelly shuddered. Her heart felt as if to dread now he was there by her side and bound to her forever? So she banished the dark fear, and, looking confidingly up, said, "I am having fine—"

"We'll keep the sunshine in our hearts my how, darling; the storm can not touch us."

The threatening storm was soon forgotten, until some four or five hours later the bowling winds began to sweep the sea plainly to seaward, and the fishermen told of other storms that had come on much the same way. At last, just at sunset, there was no mistaking or shutting out the fact that a fearful tempest was raging.

Over the mountains rose the rain—rocket tubes made ready, and look-outs posted. About midnight came a ship in distress were made out through the intense war, the darkness and the violence of the storm that it was impossible to judge correctly of the vessel's movements. One of the rockets that one could be seen, and then all hope of saving her was over. She lay sideways on a reef over off the Devil's Claw, and each successive wave clear over her, carrying her away piece by piece.

Through the night, at intervals of hours, rockets were fired—one, the last, went all right; but so great was the confusion in the wreck, that its howstring to Morris's hand. Then a boat was ordered to come ashore along the line, which, giving way, broke off from the only apparent chance of saving the crew. Tom Crofts had been busy on the look-out all night, and soon after daylight Morris joined him. Nelly, too, was to be seen on the cliffs among the crowd—nobody exactly knew how—that it was the ship Harry Crofts was aboard, and some one was said that Harry had been with him as one of the men who made the attempt upon the line. The wreck was breaking up fast, and the crew were all alive. Some dread presentiment had hung over him all the previous night, and an inward voice seemed to say that his son was with them.

"Oh for a Life-boat!" groaned Morris, as he watched the figures clinging to the deck and rigging. "But we must save some! Who'll go with me?"

Every one of men sprang forward.

"We'll go, Sir; but you mustn't come! Boys, lend a hand to get the boat!" Morris, too, lent a hand, and together they ran a little distance inland to the verge of the spray.

"Now, boys!" exclaimed Tom Crofts, laying his hand upon Morris's shoulder. "You're flying in the face o' the Almighty, boy!"

"No, no! I can not stand and see them drown. Come, lads!"

But there is white figure ran along the beach, and in a second or two Nelly was beside him, horror and fear distorting her face.

"Oh, Harry! Harry!" she cried; "it's coming now! Morris, as sure as you go in that boat, you are lost!" And she clasped her hands wildly round his arm.

"No, no, Nelly; cheer up! It's my duty! I must do it, or live to reproach myself. At any moment may destroy one of them. Good God! there's the first!"

He said this the body of a man was cast forward by a wave, and was left within a yard of the spot where they were standing. Another and many before, and scarcely turned, until a cry of agony drew her round, and she saw her father frantically endeavoring to get out the boat alone. More than human seemed the calm that from that moment came across her. It was as if the lull before the tempest that was to be her last.

"I won't stop you, darling. But you'll come again—you'll live for me and baby!" One wild embrace, and her husband was in the boat, and, catching a favorable moment, the remaining men pushed off. Nelly stood motionless, not at a cheer—for not a soul but felt they were launching forth to death. For a few minutes the boat was lost sight of; then she appeared for an instant, still safe, and a shout and a prayer rose on the beach. Nelly fell upon her knees, and clung to it as a ray of hope; then, with a clap like thunder, the wind burst across the bay. The boat shivered for a second, and then disappeared, overwhelmed by a mountain of dark water.

Nelly never knew any more how Nelly's lips, the only one she ever uttered. The women tried to get her away from the whirling roar; but she, one by one, as they saw her eyes, which were fixed as if upon a sight beyond their ken, while a wild smile played on her face. Then she said that that day and until nightfall, when her father, scarcely less heart-broken than herself, tried to lead her away. Finding it was useless, he got her under the shelter of some rocks, and with one or two of the women sat down to watch. The boat shortly after with her strange gaze fixed upon the sea.

Toward morning poor Morris's body was washed up on the beach, and his son found it watched the boat. Nelly walked calmly to the place, knelt down, and raising the dead face between her hands, she gazed at it for a time, then smiled, and shaking her head, began talking to him, telling him he ought to have come back to marry her, and not broken her heart. At last, when perfectly exhausted, she fell by the boat shivering to the ground, and never heard her name, and never heard her into a deep sleep, in which state she was carried away; not to her home, but by the quiet forethought of the parish priest, to his own cottage beside the chapel—and there Nelly remained. When the excitement of Morris's return and their wedding had passed away, and she still watches each sail as she did for the first long months—preparing warmth and comfort for those whom storms may cast upon the shore, and appears to be anxiously awaiting the arrival of some one.

"It's no good contradicting her," said old Tom to me; "and, after all, maybe she's right; for though he was a heretic, sure they were man and wife, and the trouble she's going through is only getting his dear soul out of purgatory."

Many such instances of the right of Nelly to inherit his property. The case was taken through the law-courts and decided in their favor, on the plea that, there having only been a marriage according to Nelly's faith, whereas, he being a Protestant, the Roman Catholic ceremony was not binding in a legal point.

So the Glendore fishermen have not got their long-wished for Lifeboat yet; they have raised even the 4150 or 4300 that would purchase it. The Lord alone knows if it is going to be given to them; and although half a dozen wrecks in the winter in no unusual event, no one has come forward since the wealthier neighbors to promote a subscription. Year after year brave fellows are lost attempting to save and help the wreckedboats are dug out, and the whole families reduced to beggary. Yet I never heard one of the poor willers or orphans murmur, nor for the loss of a beloved one. "Sure, yer honor," said one poor woman, with the tears trembling in her eyes, "what could Barney do—when the poor creatures were drowin'? I would have gone too, av I'd been strong enough." Such is the spirit—there is no doubt, for the poor things that's wrecked; but there's sore here, when we see them that's the support o' a family left destitute, and following them—all faith it's little he's thought of elsewhere."

Lieut. Fifth James O'Brien,

U. S. Volunteers.

Died April 6, 1862, Aged 33 Years.

SINCE was the inscription on the coffin in which was borne to Greenwood all that was mortal of one of the most gifted writers of the day, who died in defense of his adopted country. FITZ-JAMES O'BRIEN was the only son of an Irish barrister of good family, who died while the boy was yet young. Scarcely spoke of his own early history; but from casual intimations I infer that his boyhood was a singularly happy one. His mother, after many years of widowhood, married again. I have had occasion to see letters from her to her son—remarkable for the most tender feeling for her son in a distant land—and whenever he had written any thing with which he was specially pleased, he was sure to receive for early proofs to send to her. "She will be glad to see it," he would say. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and his college life and literary career was not a brilliant one, measured by academic standards. He carried away from it a fine and less Greek and mathematics; but he must have read largely in general literature and out of the way writings. He then came to London for the last, but choosing literature for a profession, he went to London, while very young, without any personal introduction to the public, and became a contributor to Dickens's Household Words, then in the flush of its early success.

The sudden development of periodical literature in America seemed to open a career to him; and O'Brien came to this country in 1852. Every editor of that period will remember the swarms of English and Irish writers who filled the land. Among these was a man of a notable Cockney or Hibernian accent brought in a specially worthless manuscript, he was sure, by his own account, to be a leading writer for the Edinburgh or Blackwood, Fraser or the Dublin University Magazine, or Bentley's Miscellany—or, quite likely, for all of them; and his articles were eagerly awaited by these publications; but he preferred to publish in this country. "You will be kind enough to decide at once," was the common request; "for of course if you accept, I shall send it by next steamer to Dickens, who will be glad to have it."

Of quite a different order was O'Brien. His brilliant talents were speedily recognized, and he became a valuable member of the literary and artistic circle of the time. Of his earlier writings, not a few lovers of poetry still remember "Pallida," and a score of other charming works which were scattered on the pages of the Whig Review; and his subtle appreciative critique of Tennyson's "Maud" in the New York Times.

The well-born, well-bred, and accomplished young Irishman was welcomed as he had been by the social circles. Permanent and recognized positions in the press were always at his command, and were at different times held on the Tribune, Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and subsequently, and for a small range of years, upon that which was more especially on the pages of the Whig Review; and his subtle appreciative critique of Tennyson's "Maud" in the New York Times.

The well-born, well-bred, and accomplished young Irishman was welcomed as he had been by the social circles. Permanent and recognized positions in the press were always at his command, and were at different times held on the Tribune, Harper's Magazine, Harper's Weekly, and subsequently, and for a small range of years, upon that which was more especially on the pages of the Whig Review; and his subtle appreciative critique of Tennyson's "Maud" in the New York Times.

Intermissions, almost every number contained some writing from his pen. A poem of his, entitled "The Fallen Star," published just seven years after that first contribution; contains, I think, the best description of him as he appeared to me in those bright, early years. I remember well when he read the poem to me. He was a unsympathetic reader—the only person, in fact, to whose reading of his own poems I was always glad to listen. I copy a few verses which seemed then and now to me to describe O'Brien as I had known him five years before:

"A figure slender, lithe, and strong—
A height that scarcely reached a man—
A voice as beautiful as song.
Where heart and eye are open.

"On me, the man of sombre thought,
The radiance of his friendship won,
And found as welcome and as sweet
The enthusiasm of the son.
* * * * *
"This roving diamond arches up,
Whereon the Lord of Light has set
His quaffed all day the golden cup
That gilds the sunset.

"Like fruit upon a southern slope,
He ripened in the summer time,
The winds that thrill the skyey rope,
The sunlight's glow, bind.

"And in his talk I oft discerned
A timid music vaguely heard;
The fragments of a song half burned,
The essays of a bird."

The whole poem is a beautiful power; and I call to mind how burdened with emotion grew the voice of O'Brien as he read the verses which described the unconscious growth of himself as highly gifted—from the leading spirit in wild, buccaneering adventure, to the quiet, shivering mendicant asking alms in the public streets. The first part of the poem describes the poet as he was in the glory and freshness of his youth; but the following are an imagination of the possible depths to which he might descend.—"Then," said the Immortal Dreamer, "I saw some poor wretch grovel down in the cart-tail—" There goes John Bunyan were it my descriptive power!

O'Brien's contributions were of various kinds—tales, sketches of life and character, bits of charming description, natural studies of this region for years chiefly poetry. As a mere story-teller I do not rank him very high. Though he was almost unsuccessfully for the stage, his genius was not dramatic. He had not in a high degree the faculty of creating and sustaining interest. The incidents in his tales are rather embodiments of some delicate thought or sentiment than real individuals. His best productions, which take the form of stories, are the development, in strictly analytic form, of some mental phase. Such is "Diamond Lens." Of this class there are three which deserve especial mention. They are "A Pot of Tulips," "The Diamond Lens," and "What was it?" The first and the last of these appeared in Harper's Magazine; and it was curious to see the contrast between the other, after having been accepted, was withdrawn and published elsewhere.

"A Pot of Tulips" is based upon Richenbach's theory of the "Odic Force," in virtue of which the human skull, for some distance, is seen around the objects in which while living they had some overmastering interest. The plot is wrought out by the finding of a skull, the accompanying being narrated in the most matter-of-fact manner. To the story-teller's art O'Brien attached little value; that any person "who wished further to investigate the subject might have an opportunity of doing so by addressing a letter to the care of the Publishers of the Magazine." Scores of letters, and not a few personal interviews, were received, asking for the means of communicating with Mr. Zschott, the remember one young man, who called on me, and on my finding that he was from the Antipodes by the terms of some great revelation, that he was compelled to tell him that the whole was a pure effort of the imaginative faculty, and that he would not believe me.

Some commentators gave special notoriety to "The Diamond Lens." The story is founded on the old idea that time and space are mere accidents; that, for instance, there is a world in a world in itself, and may be peopled with beings who, in the very drop of water in which they exist, shall go through the experiences of a human life. time, O'Brien, in the story, constructs from the diamond a lens of such magnifying power by bring this world within human perception. All the details of the story are filled in with the utmost with perfect scientific accuracy. The late William North but written a story called "Microcosmus," and treated the same general idea. He had spoken of it to many, though I know of no person except myself who has ever read it. It was offered to the Magazine. Shortly afterward he committed suicide, and the story, so far as I know, was not found among his papers. It was probably charged O'Brien with stealing the "Diamond Lens" from North, slightly altering it, and passing it off for his own. I have seen the two productions, and I am confident that he never saw North's story, and I think he never heard of the writer for two thousand years.

Still more notable is the strange piece, "What was It? A Mystery." The conception of this is, I believe, wholly and absolutely O'Brien's. It is that of a being with body and limbs formed with immense vitality and strength, as tangible to the touch as the firmest flesh and bones, yet utterly imperceptible to the sight. This Thing drops into the chamber of Harry Escot, attacks him in his bed with teeth and claws, and after a fierce contest is overpowered and bound by him and his friend. I know nothing in all literature more powerful than the description of the hand-to-hand struggle between the two strong men and this invisible antagonist. The Thing, when overpowered, is strapped with elaborform and a plaster cast taken from it, which reveals to the eye all its hideous deformity.—Dr. Cahill or Johnnot never conceived more startling fancy. It was his one of Dr. Chalibs's gorillas, with all its revolting brutishness exaggerated to the utmost. Meanwhile what was to be done with the monster? Should they kill it, or try to preserve its life? They knew not even the first step which to level. There it lay, day after day, invisible to the eye, but, as the tearing of the bed-clothes showed, writhing in the agonies of starvation. At length it died, and they carried it to the garden—as heavy as the corpse of a murdered man, and as impalpable to the eye as the purest ether—and buried it. The whole conception is gigantic! And yet, why is it not scientifically possible? If there exist things which we can see and not feel, why may not those exist which we feel and not see?

After all, O'Brien's most excellence was as a poet, as will be manifest when a collection is made of his writings. From his contributions to Harper's Magazine and Weekly alone a volume might be selected which the world would not willingly let die. Such are "The Lover's Secret" and "There are some ballads on Classic and Scandinavian themes; but the greater number are thoroughly American in subject and tone; for though of foreign birth and education, he so moulded his genius to the land in which the years of his life were passed, that he was more thoroughly American than most who are natives by birth and training. There are also a number of keen sketches of society; among which I call specially to mind "The Finishing Touch" and "Parlor Entertainments." In "The Fight"—an indignant protest against the brutalities of the Prize Ring—he was unsurpassed, the best of all, "The Sewing Bird," which is worthy of a place beside Hood's" Song of the Shirt." This poem is a picture, and one particularly suited now to send to his mother. Of the numerous poems in which the gentleness and grace of O'Brien's genius found their truest utterance, in verse of exquisite melody, and replete with charming touches of description, I have not space here to give even the titles. Of one poem, the noblest of all—the Ode on Kane I shall speak more at length.

When the tidings of the death of the Arctic hero reached us O'Brien was asked to write a poem on the fate he deplored—the natural subject of this paper. He set to work at once, but for a time, it appeared, vainly.

The thought was there, but it would not shape itself into verse. All at once the poet flushed before him in a series of pictures. He saw "

"Adown an old bastle crag
Which, sculped by keen winds that defied the Pole,
Gazed with its face on the sea that is cold
Around the scene of the mystic zone,
A solitary figure in furs was seen
Pacing to and fro.

And underneath, upon the lifeless front
Of that giant Berg, were the words it heard:
Fit type of him who, finishing and grand,
But, with a human heart, did stand
Breasted the gathering snows,
Fighting Fate,
By West beleaguered and by Winter chased,
Seeking the Pole, never lost sight of, never reached."

Then came visions of the burst of welcome which greeted Kane from the whole land—from the deep sympathy which the "Texas wild and grand" of the brave young heart seeking to recover in a moment of despair. The last of which it had been robbed by the Arctic winds; and of the solemn end, when,

"Over the thunders of applause were done,
His bright eyes closed forever on the sun!
Then from the lips of Immortality was won
In the Olympic race of Science and of Art."

Then came the two magnificent strophes in which the poet addresses the wide-seas lines that, in spite of peril and self-sacrifice, with the noble choral close:

"No grander epitaph doth chivalry hold,
In all its annals back to Charlemagne,
Than that which will of unsealing pale,
Faithfully kept through hunger and through cold,
Found on the frozen breast of Elisha Kane.

The poem sprung up as a series of pictures, which were to be developed in proper order. We saw only the proofs as he had arranged them, and agreed that the order was faulty, and should be changed by the author. But it was done. Early the next morning he came to me. "We were wrong," he said, "in the order of the poem. I had it all meanwhile come to the same conclusion, and I was altered back precisely as it stood at first. I have not slept, but have heard the same order suggested in which the poem was placed at the first change. We are sure that any one who enters fully into its spirit will agree with us that, as it originally stood and now stands, it is perfect in thought, structure, and arrangement.

For two or three years O'Brien wrote comparatively little—almost nothing, indeed, except an occasional poem and short paragraphs for the Family Fair. The charm of a desultory life had gone, and there was lacking the stimulus of companionship. He proposed to write a novel of American Life and Society. The plot and characters were arranged, but I do not remember that any progress had been made in the actual composition. Meanwhile he contemplated publishing, in collected form, those of his writings which he thought worthy of preservation. The title which he selected was "Fitz-James O'Brien," and the work by Osgood & Co. thrown overboard to enrich Mr. Swan.

But the time for literary rebellion changed the current of his purpose. He was by nature a soldier, and he saw before him a new career. He had been drilled in the regiment, and married with his company to the capital. To the Times he wrote a book a spirited account of the march from Alexandria, which is placed in permanent form in Frank Moore's admirable "Rebellion Record;" and wrote besides several of the best poems which the war has called forth. When the Seventh returned he endeavored to raise a company for a volunteer regiment; but a thousand obstacles, under which he chafed and fretted, intervened. He then tried, unsuccessfully as I believe, to obtain a position on some general's staff. At last in January he received a letter from Lander, with the long-desired appointment on his staff; and on the next day he started for Washington.

The last time I saw him was on the evening before his departure. "I have another poem for you," he said. It was the "Soldier's Letter," published in Harper's Magazine for March. Reading it now, it seems as though it were written with a dim presentiment of his own fate. The scene is a hopeful strain, and closes abruptly, for the long veil is lasting terms, and he must not be missed from the fight. Then comes a postscript, written by the hand of a comrade:

"I was a strong stomach that came as I wrote to you out on the hill:

We had been fighting for a while, and I lost my arm—There, don't cry, my darling!—it will not kill,

But a lady of cavalry that instant death which he received pierced his shoulder; but he still rallied his men, and brought off all save himself unharmed. All these belong to poetry.

O'Brien's wound was not at first thought dangerous. He wrote to his friends that he would be at home in twenty days. But the time passed and he did not come. Then came another letter to his old literary associate of the Household Words, full of genial humor, but telling a sad story of suffering and pain, and worse than suffering.

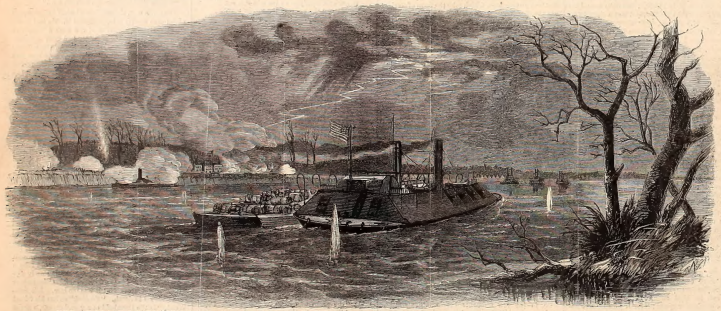
"I hope to God," he says, "you will never have to go through what I have experienced, and what I am liable to at any moment. I am my wound—the disease has assumed that form. Pulse rate from going every sixth pain. I had to be kept under chloroform for the amputation. Took to it kindly. I had a horrible dream that, doing and living, and that'll—I left off my sentence to write down the pain. Then I went on with my sentence in the most genial manner. . . . Imagine the last pound man you knew cut down to about 120, and you would think the fellow a book sketch him as if it were the burning of a shell. . . . The day after the amputation I was put into a chair to see the wound, and showed down as far as my elbow, after which they will cut the flesh of the forearm open to the bone for his father in length. So you see I have quite a pleasing prospect before me. . . . Don't mention it, but I am writing on the distant hills. The singing of the birds comes through the open window in a grateful contrast to the pain, and suffering. On, theory of motion, health, and strength, I never knew what you meant before. Now I do."

The truth was, the surgeon who had taken charge of the case with strictly misunderstood it, and treated as a simple puncture of the flesh a wound in which the joint at the shoulder had been shattered into a hundred pieces, and the bone of the arm-pit was slowly sequestrating away. The only hope was in the critical operation which was to decide he refers. On the 4th of April his friend Davis received a letter scrawled in pencil by O'Brien announcing the result:

"I gave up the ghost, and told him to go ahead. Then came about forty minutes of suffering unparalleled. . . . My shoulder bone and a portion of my upper arm have been sawn off. . . . I am free from pain, and feel as if I ought to be happy. However, I get through. I am very low, and may die, but I don't think so. I am a disease has set in. I have got tetanus, or lock-jaw. There is a chance of my getting well, but that's all. . . . I don't, good-by, old fellow, with all my love! I don't want to make any more arrangement, but if I die you and Frank Wood should be my literary executors, because although I have written a good deal, I have published but I'd write more if I could, but I'm very weak. Write to Mother and Sister. Also get Wife's address."

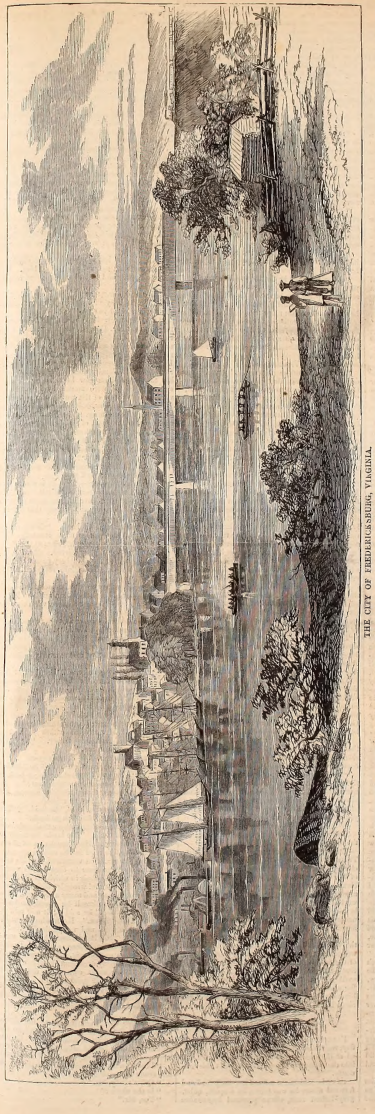
Three of his friends started on the instant. The trains failed to connect at Baltimore. They telegraphed, and received the answer, "Too late. I am very low. He is glad you are coming." They hurried on and reached Washington to be received by the Sunday morning, the 6th of April, O'Brien seemed a little better, and sat up for a time on the side of his bed. At last he was gently and tenderly conveyed through a syringe. The Doctor asked if he would take a glass of sherry. He said "Yes," drank it, and, enjoying it, he turned pale and fell back. Cologne was dashed in his face. But it was too late. His fast-ebbing life was over. "He died," writes Frank Wood, "at the threshold of a grand career, a great man and a brave soldier—a true man of each. A kind and charming nature that he was beloved even by his enemies."

THE "NAUGATUCK."



THIS unique little vessel was built at Rebuken by Mr. Stevens, and embodies some of the principles on which the larger battery is built. She is constructed on the bar-shot principle. Morrow we dispatched an artist to make the sketch which we publish on page 265. We give the following report in regard to her dimensions, build, etc.: Length over all, 100 feet; breadth, including guards, 22 feet; depth, 7 feet 6 in. She is constructed in four compartments of about equal length, with a view to their being used, extended for water, and the middship sections being occupied by the crew's quarters and engine-room. Beneath these are the coal and provision rooms, and the whole length of the vessel, also intended to be filled with water when the vessel is in fighting trim. When this compartment is empty the vessel draws about 4½ feet of water, and when filled with water through valves communicating with larger compartment—she draws within a few inches of 9 feet. The hull is of iron, and has been constructed of white oc ar, 41 feet in depth, 20 inches thick, and extending 18 inches above the deck. The object of this is to afford buoyancy an protection. Her armament consists of one 100-pounder rifled gun and two 12-pound howitzers The former is so placed as to point forward, and a space in the bow is made to open, through which the fire is delivered, and the opening is then closed. The gun is loaded on Stevens's principle of lowering the muzzle beneath the deck and loading from below.

MAJOR-GENERAL FOTE.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 263.]



COMMODORE FOOTE.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.—[SEE PAGE 267.]

THE GUN-BOAT "CARONDELET" RUNNING THE REBEL BATTERIES AT ISLAND NO. 10.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 262.]

SPIKING THE GUNS IN THE UPPER REBEL BATTERY AT ISLAND NO. 10.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 262.]

THE CITY OF FREDERICKSBURG, VIRGINIA.

FREDERICKSBURG, VIRGINIA.

In connection with Major-General M'DOWELL'S statement that FREDERICKSBURG has been evacuated by the rebels, we publish herewith a view of the place. The following is a description:

Fredericksburg is the chief town of Spottsylvania County, in Virginia, and is situated on the right bank of the Rappahannock River, at the head of tide-water. It is seventy-five miles south by west from Richmond by railroad, and sixty-four miles north-east from Gordonsville Junction. Turnpike roads connect it with Falmouth and Newport—the former by a ferry across the Rappahannock—and another turnpike leads through a wilderness to Orange Court House, where a railroad connects it with Gordonsville. The town itself is pleasantly situated in a fertile valley, and has great advantages for commerce and manufactures. The railroad from Washington, city, Aquia Creek, passed through it, and thereby a large traffic and trade was done previous to the rebellion. As the through trains generally stopped at Fredericksburg Station for about an hour on each trip, a not inconsiderable chance trade was created thereby in the immediate locality of the depot. Below the town the Rappahannock is navigable about fifteen miles, from which point part of the Potomac River traffic used to be carried to Fredericksburg by steamers. There also been constructed from the town to a point on the Rappahannock River, about forty miles above, by which large quantities of wheat, flour, and tobacco were received for exportation. The river afforded excellent water power, which, however, was not much used. The hills in the neighborhood, varying in height from forty to one hundred feet, abound in fine granite and freestone. About thirty years since the prospect of Fredericksburg being a really living town was very great; but it suddenly stopped in its prosperity, and after, as it were, standing still for about twenty years, it gradually retrograded in its importance. In 1850 its population numbered nearly four thousand souls; in 1860 it had increased to five thousand eight-eight persons—less than nine each year; and being almost ten per cent. in a decade—a remarkably small increase. Before the rebellion it contained five churches, one orphan asylum, two seminaries, four newspaper offices, and two banks.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

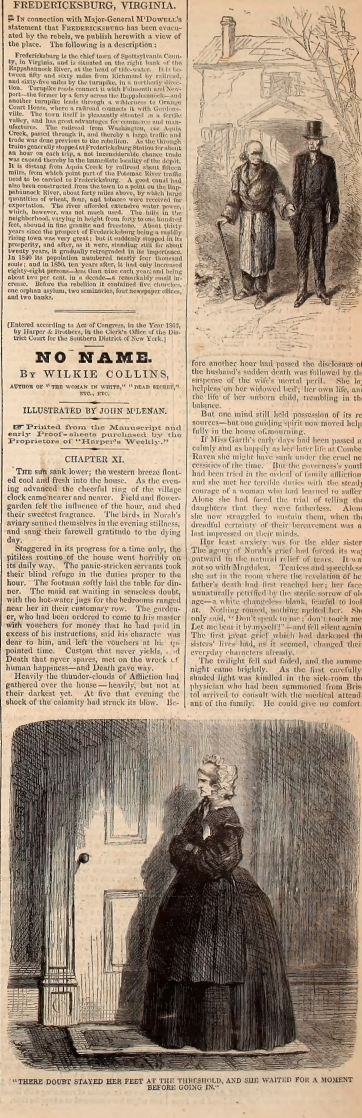
ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN MCLENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XI.

THE sun sank lower; the western breeze fanned cool and fresh into the house. As the evening advanced the cheerful ring of the village clock came nearer and nearer. Field and flower-garden felt the influence of the hour, and shed their sweetest fragrance. The birds in Norah's aviary smiled themselves in the evening stillness, and sang their farewell gratitude to the dying day.

Staggered in its progress for a time only, the pitiless routine of the house went horribly on its daily way. The panic-stricken servants took their blind refuge in the duties proper to the hour. The footman softly laid the table for dinner. The maid sat waiting in senseless doubt, with the hot-water jugs for the bedrooms ranged near her in their customary row. The gardener, who had been ordered to come to his master with vouchers for money that he had paid in excess of his instructions, said his character was dear to him, and left the vouchers at his appointed time. Custom that never yields, and Death that never spares, met on the wreck of human happiness—and Death gave way.



Heavily the thunder-clouds of Affliction had gathered over the house—heavily, but not at their darkest yet. At five that evening the shock of the calamity had struck its blow. Before another hour had passed the disclosure of the husband's sudden death was followed by the suspense of the wife's mortal peril. She lay helpless on her widowed bed; her own life, and the life of her unborn child, trembling in the balance.

But one mind still held possession of its resources—but one guiding spirit now moved helpfully in the house of mourning.

If Miss Garth's early days had been passed as calmly and as happily as her letter-life at Combe-Raven she might have sunk under the cruel necessities of the time. But the governess's youth had been tried in the school of family affliction, and she met her terrible duties with the steady courage of a woman who had learned to suffer. Alone she had faced the trial of telling the daughters that they were fatherless. Alone she now struggled to sustain them, when the dreadful certainty of their bereavement was at last impressed on their minds.

Her least anxiety was for the elder sister. The agony of Norah's grief had forced its way outward in the natural relief of tears. It was not so with Magdalen. Tearless and speechless, she sat in the room where the revelation of her father's death had first reached her; her face, unnaturally petrified by the strain-sorrow of old age—a white, changeless blank, fearful to look at. Nothing roused, nothing relieved her. She only said, "Don't speak to me; don't touch me. Let me bear it by myself!"—and fell silent again. The first great grief which had darkened the sisters' lives had, as it seemed, changed their everyday characters already.

The twilight fell and faded, and the summer night came brightly. As the first carefully-shaded light was kindled in the sick-room the physician who had been summoned from Bristol arrived to consult with the medical attendant of the family. He could give no comfort:

"THERE DOUBT STAYED HER FEET AT THE THRESHOLD, AND SHE WAITED FOR A MOMENT BEFORE GOING IN."

he could only say, "I've must try, and hope. The shock which met her, when she interpreted the news of her husband's death, has prostrated her strength at the time when she needed it most. No effort to preserve her shall be neglected. I will stay here for the night."

He opened one of the windows to admit more air as he spoke. The view overlooked the drive in front of the house, and the road outside. Little groups of people were standing before the lodge-gates, looking in. "If those persons make any noise," said the doctor, "they must be sent away. There was no need to warn them they were only the laborers who had worked on the dead man's property, and the wives and grown women and children from the village. They were all thinking of him—some talking of him—and it is quieter in their muggish minds to look at his house. The gentlefolks threabout were mostly kind to them the men's, but mostly cold. The women whispered to each other of his contagious farming ways when he came into their cottages. "He was a rough man, poor man, and thoughtless of us, too;" he never came in and stared at meal-times, the rest of us help'n, and we help'n us—all he ever said was, better luck next time." So they stood, and talked of him, and looked at his house and ground, and moved on, and passed by two and three, with the dim sense that the sight of his pleasure-house would never comfort them again. The dullest head among them knew that night that the hard ways of poverty would be all the harder to walk on over the dead man."

A little later news was brought to the bedchamber door that old Mr. Clare had arrived early to the house, and was waiting in the hall below, to hear what the physician said. Miss Garth was not to go down to him; the doctor's self must a message. He said to the servant, "I'll come and ask again in two hours' time," and went out slowly. Unlike other men in all things else, the sudden death of his old friend had produced no discernible change in him. The feeling implied in the errand of inquiry that had brought him to the house was the one betrayal of human sympathy which escaped the impenetrable old man.

He came in when the two hours had expired, and this time Miss Garth saw him.

They shook hands in silence. She waited; she never offered to hear him speak of her friend. No: he never mentioned the dreadful accident, he never alluded to the circumstances. He said those words: "Is she better, or worse?" and said no more. Was the tribute of his grief for the husband merely suppressed under the expression of his anxiety for the wife? The nature of the man, implacably antagonistic to the world and the world's customs, might justify some such interpretation of his conduct as this. He repeated his question, "Is she better, or worse?"

Miss Garth answered him.

"No hope? Is there is any change it is a change for the worse."

They spoke those words at the window of the morning-room which opened to the garden. Mr. Clare passed after hearing the reply to his inquiry, walked out on to the walk, then turned on a sudden, and spoke again:

"Has the doctor given her up?" he asked.

"He has not concealed from us that she is in danger. We can only pray for her."

The old man laid his hand on Miss Garth's arm as she answered him, and looked her attentively in the face.

"You believe in prayer?" he said.

Miss Garth drew sorrowfully back from him.

"You might have spared me that question, Sir, at such a time as this."

He took no notice of her answer; his eye were still fastened on her face.

"Pray," he said, "as you never prayed before, for the preservation of Mrs. Vanstone's life."

He left her. His voice and manner implied some unutterable dread of the future which his words had not confessed. Miss Garth followed him into the garden and called to him. He heard her, but he never turned back. He listened his pace, as if he desired to avoid her. She watched him across the lawn in the warm summer moonlight. She saw his head sink between his hands, saw them suddenly against the black back-ground of the shrubbery, raised and struck above his head. They dropped—the trees shrouded him in darkness—he was gone.

Miss Garth went back to the suffering woman with the burden on her mind of one anxiety more.

It was then past eleven o'clock. Some little time had elapsed since she had seen the sister and spoken to the doctor. The imperfect use she dressed to one of the female servants only elicited one information that they were both in the rooms. His daughter had returned to the mother's bedside to say her parting words of comfort to the dangerous woman she left them to watch over Norah's room was the nearest. She softly opened the door and looked in. The kneeling figure by the bedside told her that God's help had come to the fatherless daughter in her affliction. Grateful tears gathered in her eyes as she looked at it, softly closed the door, and went on to Magdalen's room. There doubt stayed her feet at the threshold, and she waited for a moment before going in.

A sound in the room caught her ear—the monotonous rustling of a woman's dress, now distant, now near; passing without cessation from end to end over the floor—a sound which told her that Magdalen was pacing to and fro in the secrecy of her own chamber. Miss Garth knocked. The rustling ceased; the door was opened, and the sad young face confronted her, locked in as cold despair; the large light eyes looked mechanically into hers, as vacant and as tearless as ever.

That look wrung the heart of the faithful woman, who had trained her and loved her from a child. She took Magdalen tenderly in her arms.

"Oh, my love," she said, "no tears yet! Oh, if I could only see you as I have seen Norah! Speak to me, Magdalen—try if you can speak to me!"

She tried, and spoke:

"Norah," she said, "feels no remorse. He was not serving Norah's interests when he went to his death: he was serving mine."

With that terrible answer she put her cold lips to Miss Garth's cheek.

"Let me be ill by myself," she said, and gently closed the door.

Again Miss Garth waited at the threshold, and again the sound of the rustling dress passed to and fro—now for, now near—to and fro with a cruel, unchanging regularity. Can you picture a torment sympathy and daunted the boldest hope.

The night passed. It had been agreed, if no change for the worse occurred, that Miss Garth ing, that the London physician whom Mrs. Vanstone had consulted some months previously should be summoned to the house on the next day. No change for the better appeared, and the physician was sent for.

As the morning advanced Frank came to make inquiries from the house. Had Mr. Clare entrusted to his son the duty which he had personally performed on the previous day, through respect for the memory of Miss Garth's father? or was he had said to her? It might be so. Frank could throw no light on the subject: he was not in his father's confidence. He looked pale and bewildered. His first inquiries after Magdalen showed him to be unconscious as yet of the extent of the catastrophe. He was not capable of framing his own questions: the words faltered on his lips, and he was relieved to be spared the pain of Miss Garth's heart warmed to him for the first time. A larger feeling than that which he owed to sympathy, came wherein it may. She encouraged the lad by a few kind words, and took his hand at parting.

Before noon Frank returned with a second message. His father desired to speak with Miss Mr. Pendril was not expected at Combe-Raven on that day. If the lawyer's arrival was looked for, Frank was directed to be in attendance at the station, and to take him to the cottage, where a bed would be ready for his disposal. The message took Miss Garth by surprise. It showed that Mr. Clare had been made acquainted with his dead friend's intention of sending for Mr. Pendril. Was the old man's thoughtful offer of hospitality another indirect expression of his anxiety to discover whether the property concealed? or was he aware of some secret necessity for Pendril's presence, which could not be bereaved family had been kept in total ignorance? Miss Garth was too heart-sick and hopeless to dwell on questions, but she thought it right that Mr. Pendril had been expected at three o'clock, and sent him back with the answer.

Shortly after he departure, such anxieties on Magdalen's account as her mind was now able to feel were relieved by Norah's waking for the last night's experience had inclined her to hope for. Norah's utterance had now exerted to rouse her sister, and Norah's patient sympathy had won the prisoned grief free. Magdalen had suffered severely—as severely, perhaps, as her nature allowed—here in the effort that relieved her. The healing tears had not come gently: they had burst from her with violence. Remorse—pity for her—once; but Norah had never left her till the struggle was past and the calm began. The gentler better tidings encouraged Miss Garth to withdraw to her own room, and to take the rest which she needed so much. Worn out in body and mind, she slept from sheer exhaustion—slept heavily and dreamlessly for some hours. It was in the green three and four in the afternoon when she was roused by one of the female servants. The woman had come to say that Mr. Clare was with Mr. Clare the younger, with a message desiring that it might be delivered to Miss Garth immediately. The name written in the lower corner of the envelope was "William Pendril." The lawyer had arrived.

Miss Garth opened the note. After a few first sentences of sympathy and condolence the writer announced his arrival at Mr. Clare's, and then proceeded, apparently in his professional capacity, to make the following inquiry:

"If," he wrote, "any change for the better in Mrs. Vanstone should take place—whether it is only an improvement for the time, or whether it is the permanent improvement for which we all hope—I entreat you to let me know the fact at once if it immediately. It is of the last importance that I should see her, in the event of her gaining strength enough to give me the necessary five minutes, and of her being able at the expiration of that time to sign her name legally. I beg that you will communicate my request, in the strictest confidence, to the medical men in attendance. I have reasons for wishing it to be understand, the vital importance I attach to this interview, when I tell you that I have arranged to leave it all other business to-morrow."

Those words last of all: they were prophetic of the end.

The night passed, and she lived through it. The next day came, and she lingered on till the close of the evening. At that hour the last spark of her husband's death had dealt the mortal blow. When the hour came round again, the mercy of God let her go to him in the world unseen. Her daughters were kneeling at the bedside and her head bowed away. She left them unconscious of their presence, mercifully and happily insensible to the pang of the last farewell. Her child survived her till the evening was dark in the wane, and the sunset was dim in the quiet western heaven. As the darkness came, the light of the frail little life—faint and feeble from the first—flickered and went out. All that was mortal of mother and child sat in the dark with the same bed.

The Angel of Death had done its awful business, and the two Sisters were left alone in the world.

CHAPTER XII.

EARLIER than usual, on the morning of Thursday, the twenty-third of July, Mr. Clare appeared at the door of his cottage, and stepped out into the little strip of garden attached to his residence.

After he had taken a few turns backward and forward alone, he was joined by a spare, quiet, gray-haired man, whose personal appearance was totally devoid of marked character of any kind; whose inexpressive face and commonplace, ally quiet manner presented nothing that attracted special notice, or lingered in the mind afterlike. That was Mr. Pendril—this was the man whom Frank was the future of the orphans at Combe-Raven.

"The time is getting on," he said, looking to his watch and turning to be joined Mr. Clare. "My appointment with Miss Garth is for eleven o'clock: it only wants five minutes of the hour."

"Are you sure of the time?" asked Mr. Clare.

"I left Miss Garth to decide—after warning her first of all that the circumstances I am compelled to disclose are of a very serious nature."

"And she decided?"

"She writes me word that she mentioned my appointment, and requested me to come to him. My clerk stopped, and looked at his guest attentively.

"You are almost as old as I am, Sir," he said. "Has all your long experience as a lawyer not taught you yet?"

"I never know how little it had hardened me," replied Mr. Pendril, quietly, "until I returned from the position yesterday which I now occupy. I was not warned that the daughters had resolved on following their parents to the grave. I think their presence made the mournful scene of this dreadful calamity doubly painful, and doubly affecting. I was not aware that the natural course of people were moved by it—and they were in ignorance of the truth; they knew nothing of the painful necessity which brought me to the house this morning. The sense of that unremovable fact—the sight of those poor girls at the time, when I felt my hard duty toward them most painfully—shook me as a man of my years and way of life is not ordinarily shaken by any distress in the present, or any suspense in the future. I have not recovered it this morning: I hardly feel sure of myself yet."

"A man's composure—when he is a man like you—cannot be disturbed for long," said Mr. Clare. "You must have had duties to perform as trying in their way as the duty that lies before you this morning."

Mr. Pendril shook his head. "Many duties in a serious profession," he answered, "seem, to duty so trying, no story so hopeless as this."

With those words they parted. Mr. Pendril left the garden to take the shortest path by field to Combe-Raven. Mr. Clare returned to the cottage.

On reaching the passage he looked through the open door of his little parlor, and saw Frank sitting there in his own comfortless, with his head resting wearily on his hand.

"I have had an answer from your employers in London, Frank," Mr. Clare. "In consideration of what has happened, they will allow the offer they made you to stand over for another month."

Frank changed color, and rose nervously from his chair.

"Is my prospects altered?" he asked. "After Mr. Vanstone's plans for me not to be carried out. He said Magdalen had left a fortune behind for her. She repeated his words to me, she said I ought to know all that his goodness and generosity had done for me. Has he, since then, left death make a change? Has any thing happened?"

"Wait till Mr. Pendril comes back from Combe-Raven," said Mr. Clare. "Question him; don't question me."

The words struck Frank's eyes.

"You won't be hard on me?" he pleaded faintly. "You won't expect me to go back to London after seeing Magdalen for the last time?"

Mr. Clare looked thoughtfully at his son, and considered a little before he replied.

"You may dry your eyes," he said. "You shall see Magdalen before you go back."

He left the room before that reply, and withdrew to his study. The books lay ready to his hand, as usual. He opened one of them, and set himself to read in the customary manner. But his attention wandered, and his eyes strayed away from the page. Once or twice they left the window in which his old friend and gossip had sat and wrangled with him good-humoredly on many a summer morning. And after a struggle with himself he closed the book. "I blame the boy for his faults," he said, "and I hate them, and I must listen." He reached down his pipe from the wall, and mechanically filled it with tobacco. His hand shook, his eyes wandered back to the old place, and a hasty sigh came from him as he lighted it. That empty chair was the only earthly argument for which he had no answer: his heart owned its defeat, and mastered him at last in spite of itself. "He let got the better of me at last," said the rugged old man. "There is a new weak place left in me still, and he has found it."

Meanwhile Mr. Pendril entered the shrubbery, and followed the path which led to the lonely garden and the desolate house. He met not at the door by the man-servant, who was apparently waiting in expectation of his arrival.

"I have an appointment with Miss Garth. Is she ready to see me?"

"Quite ready, Sir."

"Is she alone?"

"Yes, Sir."

"In the room which was Mr. Vanstone's study?"

"In that room, Sir."

The servant opened the door, and Mr. Penfield went in.

THE DOUBLE ROBBERY.

TOWARD the close of the last century Northumberland and its borders were terribly infested by those—in the bucolic mind—particularly obnoxious specimens of the genus thief known as "rievers," or "lifters" of cattle.

Almost all the rascals who followed this not unlucrative profession trusted chiefly to mere brute force to carry out successfully their nefarious schemes. One, however, was a conspicuous exception to this rule to be found in the person of a celebrated freebooter, known as "Dickey of Kingwood," who was very justly considered the most accomplished of his rivals' vulgar mode of following their profession, and repeatedly baffled the efforts of the police to arrest him much by his cunning as they could by their brute force. Nor was this assertion of his mere empty boastings—far from it.

In a few years' time Dickey's name became the terror of the country-side. No farmer felt secure when he retired to rest at night that his cattle might not have vanished ere morning. So cleverly, moreover, were all Dickey's enterprises conducted, that no man could ever succeed in making personal acquaintance with him. He openly set justice at defiance, and laughed at the blank efforts of the law to punish him. Perhaps, however, the best way to illustrate the adroitness and good luck which characterized all Dickey's proceedings will be for me to relate the story of one of his exploits.

It appears, then, that during the course of his peregrinations through Northumberland in the afternoon, Dickey's eyes were gladdened by the sight of a pair of fine oxen which were quietly grazing in a field near Dilston, a village distant but three miles from Newcastle.

Determined to possess them, Dickey hung about the place till nightfall, watched where the animals were driven to, and—his usual good fortune assisting him—speedily secured the prize. This effected, by the exercise of his accustomed cunning, he drove such traces behind him as made the owner of the oxen certain that the freebooter was bent off toward the Tweed. Thither he accordingly proceeded in hot haste. In the former part of this, Dickey had lost no time in "making tracks" toward the west country, and to expeditious were his movements that in a few hours he was once more Lancrost, in Cumberland. Here he fell in with an old farmer on horseback, who, being delighted with the appearance of the oxen, forthwith purchased them.

Dickey was of course rejoiced at getting rid so pleasantly of a charge which could not fail to be troublesome—nay, possibly, dangerous—to him longer to retain. The farmer, meanwhile, also mounted upon a splendid mare, which Dickey, with his practiced eye, saw was very much at home, and knew, at once resolved, by fair means or foul, to secure. He therefore willingly accepted the farmer's imaginable invitation to accompany him to his house in order that they might "crack" a bottle of wine in honor of their bargain. Accepted by Dickey rejoiced of the farmer as he would sell him his mare?

"Sell you my mare!" exclaimed his host, all aghast at this proposition. "Sell my mare! No, thank you! Why, there's not her equal in the whole north country!"

"I do not doubt it, Mr. Musgrave," responded Dickey: "and from what I saw of her on the road this morning, I am quite of your opinion that there's not her equal within a hundred miles of us; but," added the obsequious Dick, "since you will not sell her, I can only wish you long life and good health to enjoy her."

This sentiment was of course duly honored in a bumper.

"I hope, Mr. Musgrave," next observed Dickey, "that you keep a close look-out after your stable-door, because, when that is once unbarred, even Dickey of Kingswood is allowed to be at liberty, a man can not be sure but that any fine morning he may find his stable empty."

"Stable! ha! ha!" chuckled the farmer. "I think," he continued, "that Dickey of Kingswood would find it rather difficult to steal my mare out of her stable!"

"Indeed! where may her stable be situated?" inquired Dickey.

"Her stable! God bless you, Sir!" answered Mr. Musgrave, "her stable is in my bedroom. I'm a bachelor, and so every night I fasten her to my bedpost. I have had a manger put up for her in the room, and no music is so pleasant to me as to hear her grinding her corn all night by my bedside."

Dickey was astounded—as well he might be—at such unheard-of prosperity; but, keeping his astonishment, he contented himself by simply expressing to the farmer his hearty approval of the means he adopted to secure the safety of his favorite.

"I suppose you have a good lock upon your bedroom door?" was Dickey's next "feeler."

"Come with me, and I will show it you," replied the unsuspecting farmer.

This was of course just what Dickey wanted. He examined the lock carefully, and soon satisfied himself that he could pick it without much difficulty. He, however, declared to Mr. Musgrave that it was "just the right sort of lock;" "it wouldn't have been better, in fact;" "it was quite too-quisite," etc.

Again the loving cup passed round, and after retaining a bumper to their "next merry meeting" Dickey departed.

The old farmer, after his guest's leave-taking had been completed, carefully went the rounds of his house, locking doors and closing windows with all due precaution. He then, as usual, tied his mare to her accustomed post, retired to bed, and soon lulled to sleep by the sound of his favorite's grinding her corn.

So the night wore away. Presently, as the first gray streaks of day began to appear, Mr. Musgrave awoke, and feeling very cold and chilly, looked round to ascertain the cause. To his astonishment, he found that all the coverlets had been taken off his bed, and that his blankets had been rolled up into a bundle at the foot thereof. "How thought Mr. Musgrave. Was he the victim of some horrible dream, or was he really awake? Mechanically his eye glanced to the spot where his mare should have been. She was not there! Was he quite awake? During the night, some daring thief had broken into the farm-house, had picked the lock of the door of the bedroom, had spread the blankets over the floor, so that the hoofs of the mare should make no noise, and had thus triumphantly carried off the prize.

Of course Mr. Musgrave roused his household, and commenced a vigorous search, and well it might. It was useless. The despoiler had left no traces behind him, and so Mr. Musgrave was obliged to return home disconsolate, and to console himself with venting curses—neither few nor far between —upon the thief.

In the mean time our friend Dickey—for his was the deed—was comfortably mounted upon Mr. Musgrave's favorite mare, and was every moment increasing the distance between her outraged owner and himself. So great was the speed of the mare, that by break of day Dickey felt quite secure from pursuit. He had directed his steps to the westward, and was therefore not surprised that he whom should he encounter but the veritable owner of the oxen he had stolen two or three days before, and just sold to Mr. Musgrave.

Dickey knew the owner of the oxen well, but, luckily for the freebooter, was certain that he did not know him. He therefore accosted Dickey, and inquired if he had seen any oxen in the course of his travels similar to those which he himself intended to buy as being to sell.

"Why to be sure I have," replied Dickey: "with the very same marks as you describe, grazing in Mr. Musgrave's fields at Lancrost, only yesterday. I was offered them, I believe, cheap by their appearance, and learned, on inquiry, from one of his servants, that Mr. Musgrave had purchased them just yesterday. Therefore the oxen are yours. I would advise you to go to Lancrost at once and claim them."

"Certainly I will," replied the other. "But I am knocked up with walking, and it is a long way to Lancrost. Can you be induced to advance me you sell her?"

After some hard bargaining, terms were agreed upon, the purchase money was paid down on the spot, and Dickey and the farmer separated: the former to ride off upon the mare, the latter from the very owner of the stolen mare he was himself riding, while Dickey proceeded "where he listed."

The next day Mr. Musgrave, who happened, and, of course, at once recognized his own oxen grazing in the field, in further search of his mare, and his man standing near, whom he judged to be the owner of the field, and exclaimed,

"I say, Sir, how came my oxen in your field? How may you have come by them?"

"And I say, Sir," replied the other (after taking a long, astonished look at the animal on which his questioner was mounted), "I that's not my mare; you are not my servant; how came you by her, pray?"

Each of course described the person from whom they had respectively purchased the oxen and the mare; and when this was done, they discovered that they had indeed been "had" up by one and the common order.

So laughable, however, did the joke appear—even to those who had to "pay the piper" in the affair—that neither party could prevent breaking out into a peal of merriment, in which spectators were fully disclosed.

It was now clear that the only way to settle the affair was for each party to take back his own property. Mr. Musgrave was of course overjoyed at the recovery of his mare, and the owner of the oxen Burn farmer being equally delighted at the recovery of his favorite oxen, it fell out that, in the gayest burst of rejoicing, Dickey was allowed to quietly pocket the sale money of both mare and oxen.

Whether Dickey attended to his duties on settling-day, or whether he referred his ways, and died, duly "shrived," in his own bed, history telleth not.

Certain it is, however, that to this day his deeds are "household words" in many parts of Northumberland, and the mention of his name among the peasantry is considered synonymous with "cuteness."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON 259
WIRE WORK, including VERANDAHS, BALUSTRADES, GUARDS, and LAWN RAILINGS.
Illustrated Catalogues sent on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUDSON & WICKENDEN, 259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

Rheumatism.—All those afflicted with Rheumatism, Sciatica, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Gout and Pain in the Joints, Feet, and all Nervous Diseases, by wearing Meeten's Compound Galvanic Belts and Medical Appliances, will find immediate and permanent cure from their use, never having failed in a single instance. Sold. Offer 429 Broadway. Agent for Philadelphia, J. A. SAMSON, 2013 Girard Avenue. Send for a Circular.

Catarrh!—DODGE'S RESTIVE CURE is. Send postage stamp for his Pamphlet, at 627 Broadway.

"MOUSTACHES and WHISKERS in 42 DAYS!" Don't buy "Dupontic" at $1 a box, but send 26c. (coin) for a BOOK explaining this GREAT SECRET, and many more, to 25 Ann Street, Boston. 10c. by mail; 3 for 25c. Address C. E. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

Look

In Harper's Weekly of April 19th, No. 277, page 253, and notice that the name of the firm of W. Forsyth & Co., is changed to H. Wilson & Co. All Creditors with the name of W. Forsyth & Co. attached are good, and will be paid in full as fast as sent in. Address

H. WILSON & CO.,
Send for Circular. 7 Beekman St., N. Y.
P. O. Box 5079.

HICKOX'S STENCIL CHEST
CONTAINS A COMPLETE OUTFIT FOR CUTTING

For Clothing, Cards, Books, &c. Prices from $15 to $50. List of contents: 1 set Capital Letters; 1 set Small to Match; 1 set Figures; 1 Brush; 1 Pencil; 1 Paint Shaker, 1 steel Hammer, 1 figure vise Block; 1 Die Punch; 1 Block Stamping Letters; 1 Screw Driver; 1 Key; 1 Set Dividers, 1 Wrestler, 1 Gimver, 1 bottle Polishing Powder. Stock for fifty pieces (ten quality) with $10 chest; stock for 100 pieces with $20 chest; number 100 bottles Ink, 100 Circular Saws, and 100 Steel Pens, with $30 chest. For catalogue and prices, send to the Manufactory of N. HICKOX, 599 Pearl Street, N. Y.

ENTERPRISING AGENTS ARE DOING well selling Dowsett's Pat. Hooked and Sumac for Hand-Sewing, and other new articles of trade sells. Profit and large. Samples cost five on receipt of the price (20c.). Send 3-cent stamp for price-list and terms. A. L. DOWSETT, 447 Broadway, N. Y.

AGENTS!

PRIZE STATIONERY PACKETS.
PRIZE PACKETS FOR THE MILLION
NEW CHROMO PRIZE AND POSTAGE PACKETS.
UNION STATIONERY AND RECIPE PACKETS.
EXCELSIOR STATIONERY PACKETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR UNION STATIONERY AND PRIZE PACKETS. Circulars containing full particulars sent free.
P. HASKINS & CO., 36 Beekman Street, New York.

The Best Souvenir Of the Great Rebellion is a copy of the New and Superb Monthly Serial,

Ballads of the War.

A Series of PICTORIAL LYRICS, from the well-known pen of

MR. A. J. H. DUGANNE, -

Magnificently Illustrated from Original drawings, by the best artists, and beautifully printed on toned-pressed paper. A Part will appear each month, including many other events, the Battles of

Bull Run, Fort Donelson, Hampton Roads,
Ball's Bluff, Pea Ridge, Fredericksburg,
Fort Henry, Roanoke, &c., &c., &c.
The whole forming a

Illustrated Poetical Souvenir

of every event in the present most important Struggle in which the United States is engaged.

Part I., entitled, THE MARCH TO THE CAPITOL of the 6th Regiment of Massachusetts, will appear as above.

Single Parts (free by post).....25 cents.
One Year (12 monthly parts, free by post) $2.00.
Specimen Part, Cloth, and Circulars, Gratuitous.

Apply to JOHN ROBINS,
P. O. Box, 7,040. 169 Nassau Street, N. Y.

METTAM & CO.'S Patent Galvano-Electro Voltaic Belts and Armlets, a perfectly safe, certain, and speedy remedy for the cure of all forms of nervous and nervous diseases. Send for Circular. Office 429 Broadway, New York.

To all Wanting Farms.

NEW SETTLEMENT OF VINELAND.—39 miles from Philadelphia by Railroad. Good and cheap lands, especially adapted for Wheat, Corn, Grass, Fruits, and Vegetables—good market—healthy location—with churches and schools. Also especially those Towns, and where good business openings can be found. Good mechanics are wanting. Shoemakers, Farms from $15 to $30 per acre only. Villages 5 and 10 acre Lots for sale. Send for Circular. Report of NOLAN ROBINSON, Ag. Ed. of the Tribune, who has visited the place, together with the "Vineland Rural," giving full description, will be furnished. Address

WILLIAM S. CHAMBERS, Jr.,
Vineland, Cumberland County, New Jersey.

Every Man his own Printer.
ADAMS PRESS CO., 31 Park Row N. Y.

Commercial Travelers and Agents Wanted to Sell our 25 Cent Portfolio Package.

Containing 24 Sheets Note Paper, 24 Envelopes, 1 Pocket-book, 1 pen, 1 Pencil, 1 Blotting Pad, 100 Recipes, 1 Set Jewelers' Rings, 1 New Secret for Computing Interest.—2 Fashionable Embroidery Designs for Collars.—1 Set Checkers, 1 for Under-Skirts, 1 for Corners of Handkerchief, 2 for Cuffs, 1 for Silk Purse, 1 for Child's Neck, 1 for Gentlemen's Pillow Case, 1 Parlor Garden, and 1 Coin Beautifully Articles of Jewelry. $10 a day can be realized. Send stamp for Circular of wholesale prices.

WEIR & CO., 83 South Third Street, Phila., Pa.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.

HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BRACELETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR LOCKETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR RINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR VEST CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALBERT CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF SETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF PINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR GOLD AND SILVER PENCILS.
HEAD-QUARTERS. Entire stamp for full particulars.
H. A. LEVY, MANUFACTURING JEWELER,
208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

$5.—SOMETHING NEW.—Agents wanted to sell a new article. $5 a month, selling or keeping; patented articles, wanted in every family. Selling rapidly. Sample sent free. Send stamp for circular. Address stamp. RICE & CO., No. 83 Nassau Street, N. Y.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All Articles for Soldiers at Reduced Rates. Subscription, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops. Send by sure, at half rates. SAUNDER'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Soldiers charged no rates.

EMPLOYMENT. A NEW ENTERPRISE. Male and female, in every town in the country. Address, A. L. & CO., MANUFACTURING JEWELERS, 208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

THE ALBION, A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER, Established in 1822,

DEVOTED TO
NEWS, POLITICS, CRITICISM, AND GENERAL LITERATURE.

PRICE $5 PER ANNUM; 10 CENTS PER COPY.
Send for Specimen Copy. Address
THE ALBION OFFICE, 16 Beekman St., N. Y.

Our Speciality!

The following Goods, of our own Importation or Manufacture, we offer in Quantities as desired:

250 Tons of SODA ASH, different brands and tests. 2000 Kegs of Newcastle BI CARB. SODA, H. & K. and J. C. do. CREAM TARTAR, crystals or pulv., powders, pure. TARTARIC ACID, in 28 and 56 pound boxes. SALACRATUS, every style of brand, pulv., crystals. 100 Tons of Newcastle, or Domestic SAL SODA. CONCENTRATED LYE, Pittsburgh and other brands. CRYSTIC SODA, 100 Tons in 3 to 5 cwt. packages. SOAP MANUFACTURERS' SUPPLIES. SOAP POWDER. EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDERS. Address

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
For 12 years at 110 and 112 Cedar Street, New York.

E. Dorby & Company,

TAILORS and IMPORTERS, invite the special attention of their friends and the public to their LARGE, CHOICE, and ATTRACTIVE ASSORTMENT of SPRING and SUMMER GOODS for gentlemen's wear—entirely NEW MATERIALS, which they are willing to make up to order in their usual well known style of excellence, at POPULAR PRICES.

No. 87 Walker Street, New York.

Statement of the Condition
OF THE
U. S. BRANCH
OF THE
Unity Fire Insurance Company,
AT NEW YORK,
JANUARY 1st, 1862.

Assets.

United States, 6 per cent. Stock	$ 50,000
New York City 6 per cent. Stock	100,000
Stock	175,000
New York City 6 per cent. Stock	100,000
Cash loaned on collateral	500 00
" in hand and in Bank	19,940 16
" in hands of Agents	8,015 95
All other investments	6,461 50
Office Furniture	494 17
Interest accrued	9,125 00
	$254,540 22

Liabilities.

Losses ascertained and unpaid	$ 5,054 99
All other claims	1,456 94
	6,511 14
Net Assets	$248,029 08

* Note.—The above statement shows the condition of the United States Branch alone. The total available Assets of the Company, including the English Securities, amount to $4,793,822;

and this is entirely independent of the Life Business, which is a totally distinct Company.

GEORGE ADAMS,
MANAGER.
Office, 78 WALL ST., New York.

WATCHES.

10,000 for sale, at Wholesale prices. Enclose stamp for descriptive Circular. J. L. Ferguson, 208 Broadway, N.Y.

Useful and Economical.—Hegeman & Co.'s Patent Elastic Seamless Jaconet Fullet, Gored Spats, &c., and excess Gloves, Ribbons, Silks, &c., equal to new without injury to the most delicate of fabrics, only 12 cents per bottle. Sold by Druggists. Beware and get the genuine. Prepared by HEGEMAN & CO., N. Y.

$75 A MONTH!—I WANT TO HIRE AGENTS in every County at $75 per month and expenses, or will pay a large commission. Address (with stamp) S. MADDON, Alfred, Maine.

AGENTS. Army Traders, and the Speculating Public generally. Low prices and cheap Goods. Address of the most reliable verity. Price lists sent free. Address HERBERT & BRUNS, NEW YORK.

Grand Opening!!!
BRODIE'S
Stock of Spring
and
Summer
MANTILLAS,
Ready for Inspection
at his
OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street,
and
His Palace of Fashion,
Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Corner of 23d Street,
New York.

AGENTS!!! AGENTS!!! AGENTS!!!
Agents all over the country read a letter sent stamp to A. RICHARDS & CO., New London, Conn., and get their Illustrated Circular.

WEDDINGS supplied with the true style of Marriage Cards and Envelopes, by A. DEMAREST, Engraver, 103 Broadway. Seals and dies.

Wedding Cards and Note Papers at
J. EVERDELL'S Steam Engraving Establishment, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane Street, N. Y. Samples by mail.

TIFFEAU'S DEPOT FOR Crandall's Patent Spring Rocking Horse. No. 659 Broadway, one block below St. Nicholas Hotel. Wholesale and beginners in the same line. Dealers in Fancy Articles in the Trade. Also, Children's Carriages, &c.
Tiffeau's Swings included for Circular.

COMMODORE FOOTE'S GAME OF TEN PINS WITH BEAUREGARD.

AGENT,

IF YOU WISH TO INVEST A SMALL CAPITAL IN A PAYING BUSINESS,

Examine the merits of the Multomicron.

Call and see it, or send stamp for circular. AGENTS OF ACTIVITY AND ENERGY CAN MAKE from $5 to $10 per day by engaging in the sale of VALUABLE PRIZE STATIONERY

Recipe Package and Envelope.

Our Stationery is superior, and our Jewelry consists of FORTY VARIETIES, each article manufactured with ARTISTIC TASTE.

For information send for a circular, mailed free. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

BALLOU'S PATENTED F. Y. S. French Yoke SHIRTS, WARRANTED TO FIT. Send for a Circular. BALLOU BROS., No. 499 Broadway, New York.

F.Y.S.

Prison Life

AT THE

TOBACCO WAREHOUSE

AT RICHMOND,

By a Bull's Head Prisoner,

Lieut. Wm. C. Harris,

Of Col. Baker's California Regiment.

Contents.

Chap. I. From Bull's Head Chap. VII. Sunday in Prison to Richmond. Chap. II. Our Prison. Chap. VIII. Our Jailers. Chap. III. A Day in the Ob- Chap. IX. Our Visitors. servatory Prison. Chap. X. Richmond Prison Chap. IV. A Day in the Fi- Association. tobacco Prison. Chap. XI. Prison Compan- Chap. V. Persons and Pas- ions. times. Chap. XII. Homeward Chap. VI. Prison Incidents. Bound.

Preface.

These sketches were written to lessen the tedium of my lengthy imprisonment; and if any one shall, in result in my present companions, the scenes enacted in the old Warehouse, and the fortunes and experiences of the members of it, they will have accomplished all that is desired by the publication of these pages.

With the exception of "Homeward Bound," they were all written within prison walls, and brought to the North more securely in the lining of an overcoat.

I confidently trust to my brother officers for their testimony as to their fidelity in delineation of our "domestic economy," and the accuracy of detail in the varied incidents in our prison-life in the Tobacco Warehouse.

W. C. H.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 25, 1862.

☞ Complete in one volume, price 50 cents, or handsomely bound in cloth, 75 cents.

PUBLISHED BY

GEORGE W. CHILDS, 628 and 630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

☞ Send free by mail on receipt of price.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS & ARMS SELPHO'S PATENT.

516 BROADWAY, N.Y. SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

GREATEST CHANCE FOR AGENTS EVER OFFERED. Send stamp. Box 19, Ashport, N. Y.

AGENTS.

P. P. P. P.

Panprophosium Prize Package.

Price Ten Cents.

Send for a Circular. Agents can make 100 per cent. W. H. CATELY & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

The Six, or New Size, carries a Ball weighing 38 to the lb., and the No. 32, or Sig. Revolver, a Ball 90 to the lb. Recent experiments made in the Army, three Revolvers were pronounced the best and most effective weapons in use. Address

Ballard's Patent Breech-Loading Rifle.

This arm is entirely new, and is universally acknowledged to be the nearest to perfection of any Breech-Loading Rifle ever made. Length of Barrel 24 inches, weight of rifle 7 pounds. Size of Cartridge adapted to Sec. 35, 36, and 44 regular water-proof Cartridges. For particulars call or send for a Circular to

MERWIN & BRAY, Sole Agents,

No. 240 Broadway, N. Y.

STEINWAY & SONS'

PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRANDS, AND SQUARE PIANOS

Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured, and will be sold to suit the times. Each Instrument warranted for five years. Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N.Y. Send for Circular.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE!

MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 20c. IN SILVER. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free.

F. C. BOWEN, Box 590, Boston, Mass.

DONE GONE! DONE GONE!

THE NEGLECTED PICTURE.

CARD PHOTOGRAPHS of these remarkable Paintings by E. ANTHONY

No. 501 Broadway.

No loyal Album should be without them.

Price, 25 cents each, with printed description.

Remittance must be in postage stamps, and the Pictures will be sent by mail prepaid.

Van Anden's Patent Portable COPYING PRESS.

HANNAH & CO.,

Sole Proprietors, No. 29 Chatham Street, N. Y.

TWO SIZES—$1 and $1.25.

☞ On receipt of price a Press will be mailed to any address, postage paid. Descriptive Circulars and Testimonials. Stationers and Agents supplied on liberal terms.

James Parrish,

Shirt Manufacturer,

233 CANAL STREET, near Broadway, New York.

SUPERIOR SHIRTS made to measure, $15, $21, and $24 per dozen.

☞ Family supply store of Dresses, Collars, and Wristbands for Shirt making, at reduced prices.!

Children's Fancy Hats, of the most superb and elegant designs ever produced, may be seen at TERRY'S, 327 Broadway, 2d door below Walker Street.

Agents Wanted to Sell

Parson Brownlow's Wonderful Book

Apply to GEORGE W. CHILDS, Publisher, 628 and 630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

AFFLEBACK & CO., Cincinnati Publishers for the West.

Gold Pens Repointed—Equal to New,

On receipt of 50 cents in money or stamps. Orders by Mail promptly attended to. E. S. JOHNSON, 19 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

Jewelry of all Kinds Repaired.

Orders by mail solicited. The cost of repairing sent immediately on receipt of Goods. Address

E. S. JOHNSON, 19 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

INVALID.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all Lung Affections, by sending to D. Aden, 383 Pearl Street, N. Y. He sends it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

SENT BY EXPRESS

EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices, Made to Measure at $20 per doz. OR SIX FOR TEN DOLLARS,

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN.

With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as is sold in retail stores for $2.50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $30 PER DOZEN.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $20 per dozen are mistaken. Here is the cost of one dozen $20 fine shirts.

20 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 18 c. per yd.. $3 40
Thirty-six dozen Linen, at 50c. per yard.. 3 00
Making and cutting.. 6 00
Laundry, $1; buttons and cotton, 75c.. 1 75
Profit.. 6 85

Total.. $20 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. Patterns of perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receiving the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

387 Broadway, up stairs,

Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

$100 PER MONTH SALARY paid for selling the best Sewing Machine extant. Permanent employment given. Address, with stamp for return postage, LOUIS LOCKE, Cattle, Act. Hardware & M. Co., Haverhill, Mass.

AGENTS.—Kerosene now successfully burned in all table lamps. Ring Burner and Chimney will give 54 hours good light for one cent. Send 4 cent stamps for sample. Address HOOPER, DODGE & Co., N. Y.

THE DIAPHRAGM FILTER, Sold by A. MCKENZIE, Plumber, 26b 4th Street, N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Original will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. H. ANDERSON, M.D., 103 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Country for Volunteers Good. Send 16 one-cent stamps. O. Sydenham, 129 Spring St. (Station A), N. Y. City.

AGENTS WANTED to sell the "Universal Clothes Wringer," the only perfect and satisfactory Clothes Wringer ever made. Warranted in every particular. For circular, address R. C. BROWNING, Gen. Agent, 9 Day Street, N. Y.

For Sale or to Let.

The premises Nos. 509 and 511 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, formerly occupied by Messrs. L. J. Levy & Company. For Terms, &c.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS,

New York.

Close of the Twenty-Fourth Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For May, 1862.

CONTENTS.

AMERICAN HISTORICAL TREES.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Big Tree, Genesee.—The Charter Oak.—Penn's Treaty Tree.—Treaty-Tree Mound.—The Sharpsburg Pear-Tree.—Gates's Weeping-Willow.—Putnam's Memorial Tree.—The Washington Elm.—The Tory Tulip-Tree.—The Jane M'Crea Tree.—The Fire Island Button-ball.—Cherry-Tree Rock.—Penn's Elm.—The Shackamaxon Elm.—Dorothy Walpole's Tree.—The Elm Island Sycamore.—The Washington Elm.—The Mound Apple-Tree.—Fillmore's Peach-Tree.—Bo Fox Oak.

A DANGEROUS JOURNEY. PART I.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Mirage in the Sullina Valley.—The Port of San Jonas.—Antelope in the Mirage.—Tejon in the Mirage.—Soledad.—A Dust à la Mortie.—An Indian's Camp.—Jack.

WHAT ARE THE NERVES?

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Fibres of the Brain.—Nerve-Twig dividing.—Nerve Cells, magnified.—Nerve Cells and Fibres.—Nervous System of the Cuttlefish.—Brain and Spinal Cord of Man.—Section of the Spinal Cord.—Upper Portion of the Spinal Cord.

CLOTILDE AND THE CONTRABAND.

MISTRESS AND MAID. A HOUSEHOLD STORY. By Miss M'Intosh.

PINCHES FROM A SCOTCH MULL.

ORLEY FARM. By Anthony Trollope. Illustrated by J. C. Maclise.

CHAPTER XLIX. Mrs. Furnival can't put up with it.

CHAPTER L. It is quite impossible.

CHAPTER LI. Mrs. Furnival's Journey to Hemsby.

CHAPTER LII. Showing how Things went up to Almighty.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—"Never in a very long Word."—"Turn, I have come back again."

VALENTINE MOTT.

EARLY DISINCLINESS

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S LITERARY DRAWER.

OUR NEW YORK.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Ninth Parts of a Man.—The Not-No Man.—A Goose of a Man.—A Man of Family.—A Dab of a Man.—A Sad Man.—Little Man and Tall Man.—A Man-Man.—A Man of Note.—A Muscle-Man.—A Happy Man.—A Lost Man.

FASHIONS FOR MAY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Spring Mantilla and Child's Dress.—Promenade Dress.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, postpaid, for Twenty-five Cents. Volumes I., II., III., IV., and V., Neatly Bound, and by bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States without Charge for Postage, at the rate of Two Dollars per Volume. Subscriptions may be sent for any length of time, and at the change of the postage on Harper's Magazine per Cent. from the above rate. The Twenty-Four Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to May, 1862, are now ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year.. $3 00
Two Copies for One Year.. 5 00
Five Copies for One Year (each).. 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Four or Five Copies.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together one year, $4 00.

☞ Conjurors and Teachers supplied at the lowest Club Rates.

The Discount Notice of the United States will be noticed for Subscriptions. Our discount Notice will be repeated to suit them in preference to Bank Notes.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

A Thrilling Story,

Entitled,

NO NAME,

By Wilkie Collins,

AUTHOR OF

"The Woman in White,"

Richly Illustrated by John McLenan.

Was commenced in the Number for March 15 (No. 270) of

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

And will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.. $2 00
One Copy for Two Years.. 3 00
Ten Copies for One Year.. 15 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together one year, $6 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will be sent gratuitously for six months—as a specimen—to any one who applies for it.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V., for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861, of "HARPER'S WEEKLY," neatly bound in Cloth cases, Price $2 00 each, are now ready.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VI.—No. 279.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE HEROES OF THE BATTLE OF PITTSBURG LANDING.—[SEE PAGE 286.]

OUR SUCCESS.

The regular circulation of Harper's Weekly is now between ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE AND ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY THOUSAND copies. Assuming that each number of the paper is read by ten persons—a moderate estimate—a million and a quarter people derive information and amusement from this journal. It affords us no little satisfaction to witness this constant and favorable way that no effort on our part has been wanting to deserve it.

Our weekly request for traveling artists are alone so heavy as our total outlay for artistic labor used to be when Harper's Weekly was first established. This outlay, however, enables us to depict, week by week, the progress of our army on the field, the successive events of the Rebellion, with a fidelity and vividness seldom equaled.

We are besides enabled to lay before our readers each week several pages of the best reading of the day, including the works of Dickens, Wilkie Collins, and Bulwer. So remarkable a combination of artistic and literary excellence has never been presented in any journal, either in this country or abroad.

We think that this Number, for instance, will bear comparison with any number of any paper ever produced in the United States or in Europe.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1862.

"HARPER'S WEEKLY" AT FORTRESS MONROE.

WE learn by telegraph that the sales of the last Number of Harper's Weekly were stopped at Fortress Monroe in consequence of pictures of Yorktown and the vicinity.

The pictures incapitated represented Big Bethel as it appeared when it was occupied by our troops, and the rebel lines at Yorktown, with the position of our forces when they first appeared before the place on 5th April. Both were from sketches by an Officer of Topographical Engineers, and were sanctioned by the commanding officer of the troops. Such, as any competent military man could see, were as drawn as not to reveal any position permanently occupied by our forces, or to convey any information whatever to the enemy.

Ever since the contest between the United States forces and the rebels became serious this journal has been so conducted as to impart no information to the enemy. We have frequently withheld from our subscribers interesting pictures, for fear they might prove useful to the traitors. We have pursued this course not only with regard to our army at Yorktown but every where. We shall continue to do so. Rather than publish a line or a sketch which could by any possibility injure the Union cause, or endanger the success of our gallant soldiers, we would suppress this journal altogether.

With the consciousness of this purpose we beg leave to state that we shall not allow our business to be interfered with at the whim of any military officer whatever, and that the General who undertakes to stop the sales of Harper's Weekly, or to interfere with its circulation, does so at his peril. We shall hold him responsible for damages before a jury of his country.

We recommend Brigadier-General Wool, and Censor A.D.C. De Witt Clinton, to devote more attention to the duty of suppressing the Southern rebellion, and less to the suppression of Northern newspapers.

By doing so, the former will not again publish such predictions as the one in which he informed Secretary Stanton that M'Clellan would meet with no serious resistance at Yorktown: and the latter will have more time to perform the proper and reputable functions of an A.D.C.

GRADUATING AS SOLDIERS.

A CHANGE has come o'er the British dream. The bullies who, three months ago, when we were in desperate straits, were boasting that they would send the Warrior to bombard "the cities of New York and Hoboken," and dictate peace with Armstrong cannon pointed at peaceful dwellings full of women and children, are now humbled and panic-stricken. The battle of the ninth March has filled them with terror. They realize that that battle destroyed, not only the Cumberland and the Congress, but likewise the entire British navy; that the "commercial rival of England" are gone; that the British Navy "consists of two ships, the Warrior and the Black Prince," both probably fictitious; and that in all probability, before New Year 1863 the United States and France will both be as superior to Great Britain at sea as they are now on land. Under the pressure of these distressing reflections John Bull has set to work to build Monitors on the plan of Captain Ericsson's, taking care, after his usual fashion, to claim our gallant countryman's invention for an Englishman of the name of Coles.

We think we may safely say that the panic which appears to be prevailing in London in consequence of the performance of the Monitor is only the first of a series of fits which this war of ours is destined to occasion in Europe.

In the first place, the Monitor is only an experiment, and by the time Great Britain has spent a few millions in building copies of her, the very improved model will probably have been adopted here. The six big-gun batteries which are now being constructed for Government are greatly superior in many respects to the antagonist of the Merrimac. Another fight will suggest further improvements. In the course of the next sixty days the Galena, the Roanoke, and the Kensington will have been under fire, and will have taught us further lessons. It may be that the Monitor, though capable of coping with a rude product of Southern skill like the Merrimac, will be found inferior to one or all of these vessels. Captain Ericsson himself does not regard her as "invulnerable." But she is obviously a step in advance of previous models. There are many competent sailors and naval authorities who deem the Monitor the most formidable war vessel afloat in our waters. Commodore Porter, now in command of the roster fleet off Pensacola, has declared, ten years ago, that he would undertake to fight any ship-of-the-line with the old Princeton of 1811 for his flag-ship, and that he carried no guns at all. It may turn out that, for all purposes of naval conflict between ship and ship, guns are a superfluity, and that the only things needful are speed, a sharp beak, and an invulnerable hull. Thus, while there is every reason to believe that the little Monitor, now lying in Hampton Roads, would destroy the whole British navy—including the Warrior and the Black Prince—there is every reason, also, not receiving any material injury herself, it is far from likely that the Monitor will be the most formidable vessel in our navy a few months hence.

Meanwhile the progress made in offensive weapons is so rapid as to probably render the war of ours has revolutionized the science of artillery. At Sebastopol the guns used were smooth bores. They were discharged not at one time in batter,, but it did not answer and was discarded. In the Italian war rifled 4 and 8-pounders were used, but they were of inferior factory results. In the Chinese war Armstrong 12-pounders were used for short periods of time, but their performance was found wanting. An opportunity offered for discovering their well-known defects. We are now arming our ships with rifled 100-pounders. They are expected not to carry 15-inch guns, throwing balls weighing 500 pounds. Our siege batteries consist of rifled 30 and 40-pounders, and rifled 10-inch mortars and bombads. The results of the change is seen in the reports of the bombardment of Fort Pulaski. Hundreds of yards have been covered with breaching distance, though artilleries are recommended in the text-books to get 100 yards distance from the work aimed at. Gunners have had proposed to erect a breaching battery at half a mile from the wall to be attacked would have been put down as insane. The Confederate batteries at Pulaski were nearly a mile from the work, yet they made a practicable breach, in a comparatively-formed parapet, in a couple of hours. This was done by a judicious combination of rifled guns, carrying 30 and 40 pound shot fired very low—"point-blank"—and the lower, as is well described in Commander Rodgers's report, bored their way into the wall, while the 10-inch mortars, falling in some degree, rended the honey-combed stone and brick work that it gave way and crumbled into ruin.

This breaching demonstration was not only Fort Pulaski, but all the stone forts in the world. Not a fort in Europe could stand 48 hours bombardment by the combined fire of the Monitors and Columbiads. They were well enough when opposed to smooth 18, 24, and 32 pounders. They would probable throw back a shot of 68 and 100 pounders from James or Parrott guns.

We have thus, in the course of a year's war, established the utter inability of forts to act existing navies ,r forts in the world to resist an attack from the vessels and weapons which we are now using. And we are going to keep going to learn. In the course of the next six months our weapons of offense and defense will probably be as far superior to those of to-day as the latter are superior to those which were used a year ago. We hear already that General Gilmore is preparing to bombard Fort Sumter at Charleston at a distance of 2000 yards. We understand that the Monitor has lately been provided with a 15-inch rifle. Should she encounter the iron sides of the Merrimac as easily as if they were made of wood. Captain Rodman, whose shop-mate invented the Columbiad, is casting cast at Pittsburg for the new Monitors, has cast a 20-inch gun, and is experimenting with 25-inch guns in preparation for the new iron-clad defense which will throw a ball weighing three thousand pounds. Should the Warrior, in the course of her visit to Hampton Roads, "New York and Hoboken," come in contact with one of these little missiles, it would be a matter of difficulty, into account whether the ball or the ship had become of her, or where she was when her voyage was abruptly terminated.

As the opinion of a Prussian officer who recently left this country, there is no army in the world so completely equipped, in regard to artillery and rifles, as the army of the Potomac. There are picked regiments in France and in Germany as well armed as any of ours. And there are batteries of artillery in many countries equal to any thing on this side the ocean. But nowhere in the world, except on the Potomac, have there been fifty or a hundred 200,000 men armed with the best possible weapons, or a park of 400 pieces of light artillery, all perfect and of the best make and most effective character. This Prussian officer declared that the Emperor Napoleon had no such army under his command. He might have added that no army but ours possesses such a corps as the Berdan sharp-shooters, with their telescopic rifles. The sharp-shooting in the Crimea and in Italy was mere boy's play in comparison with the performance of the men of this regiment, who pick off gunners at a distance when their forms can barely be descried by the naked eye. In the words of Lord Lyons—probably the most experienced officer of the British army—"as soon as the regimental officers in the river of the Potomac become more efficient—a matter of time—that army will simply irresistible."

The Americans have not been a fighting people for many years. The Mexican war was a diversion, and did not excite the people at large. Ever since 1811 the whole population has been directed to military pursuits. No people in the world had less knowledge of real warfare, or less general acquaintance with the practical business of fighting, than we had when this wretched rebellion forced the sword into our hands. In the course of a single year, however, we have organized gunnery, naval architecture, and fortification, and have raised an army which is admitted by competent foreign judges to be without an equal in the world.

It is to be hoped that, after the suppression of the rebellion, our foreign friends will permit us to convert our sword once more into a pruninghook. But if not, the experience of our present troubles will probably enable us to make some important changes in the map of the world.

YULEE'S LETTER.

THE letter of Mr. Yulee, late Senator from Florida, of which we give a fac-simile on page 278, is by far the most important published document in the secret history of the war. It establishes the fact of the elaborate conspiracy which resulted in the armed rebellion. It is an utterly infamous letter; for the writer was, at the moment of writing, a sworn and paid officer of the Government against which he was conspiring, and, indeed, the rebel Secretary of the Navy, was chairman of the Naval Committee of the Senate.

Almost all the letter, then Senators from Virginia, were also conspirators. Mason told a friend, in the middle of February, that he hoped the Union could be saved, and the next day he wrote to a friend in Paris the details of the plan to destroy it. Hunter and Slidell waited upon the Northern politicians in Washington at the same time, and told him that every thing was ready—that there might be a little fighting, but no serious opposition would be offered in the West would adopt the Montgomery Constitution, and New York would not long delay, while New England must be left out of the reorganized government, or admitted as a single State. This course was also urged openly or covertly by certain influential men in some Republican The Vice-President, Breckinridge, another conspirator, sincerely asked Andrew Johnson, in Washington, whether he thought the Government could coerce States? Even the most patriotic citizens could not help at least wondering whether there might be something in the plan of the whole North for the Union. They did not wonder after the fall of Sumter.

The plan of the conspirators clearly contemplated that some of the Confederates should nominally remain uncommitted, in order to prevent the Government. Breckinridge was one of these. And when the developments of Time allow the history of the rebellion to be fully written and published, the part which the Calhoun conspirators in Rome, and the Jacobite malcontents in Great Britain, had never a more famous prototype than the letter of which Jefferson Davis is the acknowledged head, and Yulee proves himself an accomplice.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY.

THE Derby Gallery is light and spacious, and its admirable room for the Exhibition of the National Academy of Design in the Camp of the Seventh Regiment near Washington (106) is the chief of these, and it is remarkable for the odd-ity with which the personality of the chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Weston, is rendered. This Lounger has seen that gentleman but once, and in the picture hi- back is to the spectator, but the individuality of the man is unmistakable. Mr. Telford is one of the artists who, during the year, have preserved the traditions of Mr. Irving's circle, by patriotic service under arms.

The first of the large portraits is Mr. Blake's full-length of Cooper Hall, late chief of the Astor Library (14). He is sitting in the Library and reading a book. The picture should be studied from across the room, and it will then be seen that it is one of the most admirable works of the theater. The likeness is capital. The accessories are remarkable. They are painted with great fidelity, and propriety of detail: the books are books, the carpet is carpet, the wood is wood. The character of the worthy subject, however, seem rather too shining for bookishness, though the true bibliophile has always been noted, like the scholar, for shining garments. So characteristic and satisfactory a portraiture as this of the Librarian-in-chief of the Astor ought certainly to belong to the Library. Side by side with a good likeness of the founder, it would go down to the remotest posterity of posterity, for whom Astor devised and Cogswell collected and arranged. It is peopled with historic dust, and its fit place is the Astor Library. Nay, it is Page's portrait of Collector Barney, a picture full of power and skill, but, from its very lesson, not pleasing. The likeness is excellent, but the accessories are disagreeable. Where he is, or what he is doing, it would be difficult to say. But Mr. Page's works are too important, too carefully conceived, and too thoughtfully wrought, to be hastily dismissed; and we shall return to his portraits, for which there is room even within the walls, full-lengths, of a gentleman, and a lady and child.

Mr. Huntington's Chancellor Ferris (68) is a grand, free, masterly effective portraiture. The Chancellor stands in his flowing robes, with his hand upon an antique tome and a stained window before him. The head, being slightly cut away, sion is simply true to life. In the painting the artist has not been in the least afraid of purple. The coloring is rich and harmonious, and the work is a fine specimen of the artist, full of talent, and a most valuable portrait of a worthy man.

In No. 111 Mr. Elliott exhibits the best portrait that we recall from his hands. It is full of power and excellence. Unlike many artists, authors, and orators, who are sometimes very good and sometimes bad, Elliott is always good. The painting is always sure of vigor, brilliancy, and fidelity. But in this portrait there is a solidity that he does not always exhibit. The incisive force of character in the subject, the maturity of sagacity, alertness, and prudence which mark a man of affairs and a scholar, have been seized with enthusiasm by the painter, and reproduced with corresponding skill. He had the privilege of the portrait of forming a face in which the individuality is thoroughly individual, and the Universality is universal. It was fortunate too that the very coloring of the subject was most congenial to the pallet of the painter; so that he has given us one of the most lively portraits that have hung in any Academy exhibition.

In the further room, under the gas, are sixteen works of Paul Duggan, who died a few months since in Texas. They are the work of a young sculptor, and there are two models in plaster, curious and elaborate studies in anatomy. The portraits are of well-known persons, one of them will have a three-fold interest to many visitors of the Exhibition: first, as Duggan's work; second, as a bust of noted people; third, from their association with the Century Club, upon whose walls they hitherto hung. Duggan carried a bust into the Exhibition where they are, we can hardly see in strength of Darley's portrait of the artist who had hangs among them. How often before the picture of the Exhibition that slight, wan, partly sleeping figure appeared to us, and how often the gazing and calmly disseminating, yet ever still kindness set sweet himself! How his kindling and genial be stole though the crowds on the gay evening and in the old rooms, as with the same cheerful aloneness and gentle sympathy he passed through the rest of life to his grave! His patient life, his quiet heroism, his cheerful submission, were also but the signs of the luminousness within, of that keen sense of beauty and sympathy with it which animated the imaginings of art! And now that we record a pious instinct in placing among the paintings of our living artists these works of their brother so lately dead.

Next week we shall have another look at the Exhibition.

FORWARD!

THE President's signature to the District Emancipation Bill is the first practical proof of the changed policy of the United States Government. It is the true step in the return to the principles and practice of the fathers of the Constitution. Their system was nearly unanimous upon the subject. Believing, as Roger Sherman said, that the spirit of the age was abolishing slavery, they supposed that the different States would complete the work. Innocent Roger, who did not foresee the cotton gin! But the principle of the spirit and intention of our Government is perfect, and that there might be no possible mistake what kind of emancipation they meant to form, the fathers took good care to say expressly that it was "to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

The most striking testimony to the anti-slavery feeling of the period was the speech given by A. H. Stephens, the rebel Vice-President, in his speech, upon retiring from Congress, at Augusta in June, 1861. He said, "In my judgment there are more thinking men at the North now who look upon our system of slavery as right—socially, morally, and politically—than there were even at the South thirty years ago. The leading public men of the South in our early history were almost all against it. Jefferson was against it; Madison was against it; nearly all of them were against it. I need not name them. The controversy of their names is clear. It was a question which they did not, and perhaps could not, fully comprehend in their day."

Perhaps not; but these are the men who most our Government, and "nearly all of them" were against slavery. Whoever, therefore, administers the Government in their spirit will be "against" it, and work against it, and take good care that the Government is kept free from its pollution. And all the more strenuously will they work when they see that the indication of a popular desire to return to the old faith and practice has been clutched as the excuse of bloody revolution.

The work is begun, and when the sun is stopped in the sky it may be stayed. The work is begun, and resting, as it does, upon the national conviction of justice and policy, it will go on to its sublime completion. A year has passed since Sumter fell: and already a treaty for the more effectual suppression of the foreign slave-trade is negotiated with England—for the first time in our history a slave-trader has been hung—by express law the disability of color is removed from mail-carriers—slavery has been abolished in the District of Columbia—and at the President's suggestion, by an overwhelming vote in Congress, the national policy of the fathers, of Washington and Jefferson, of Franklin and Jay, of Adams and Madison, is restored to the Government. Moreover, the President proposes to Congress to recognize Hayti—the officers of the army are forbidden to return slaves escaping from the civil chaos which their masters have occasioned—and the unconstitutional rigors of the Fugitive Slave Law are proposed to be ameliorated.

Let no timid soul fear rashness of action. In the President of the United States Providence has vouchsafed a leader whose moral perceptions are blinded neither by sophistry nor enthusiasm—who knows that permanent results must grow, and can not be prematurely seized—a man who, whatever he has not, has that inestimable common sense which is the last best gift of Heaven to all who are clothed with great authority.

THE GERMAN SOLDIERS.

"LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY

"DEAR LOUNGER,—I am angry with you, but you must not resent it until you hear the reason and decide the merits of the cause. I am jealous of the praise you bestow upon the brave troops of every State of the Union, without ever as much as mentioning my countrymen—the Germans—or giving them credit for a single brave action, and you know the latter are not few. Let me state to you a few facts. In the first place, we come here to better our condition, and to be free; and, I think, you will acknowledge that a more law-abiding and patriotic element is not found in our country.

"When this rebellion broke out we volunteered our full quota to the ranks. Just take, as example, the State of Missouri. In St. Louis, out of a population of 160,000, 60,000 are Germans. These have furnished three-fourths of all troops raised in Missouri. Two-thirds of the principal men in St. Louis (Germans excepted) are Secessionists; but they were kept at bay by the Germans under the old flag. And through hard trials these patriots have gone. Three times were the Home Guards of St. Louis attacked by the mob, but stood their ground well. For a time no soldier in uniform could go single through the streets of the city without danger of assassination. One by one did the first Volunteers go to the Arsenal, to fill the regiments that were recruited there by Siegel, Blair, Boernstein, Osterhaus, and others, under our lamented Lyon. Nobly have they done their duty every where. Hardly an engagement but the Germans have had their representives there. Do you remember Carthage—how General Siegel, with 1500 Germans, whipped 8000 rebels? Have you forgotten Max Weber at Hatteras Inlet, Willich at Rowlett's Station, or the Ninth Ohio at Mill Spring, or Blenker's division at Bull Run, and the crowning victory at Pea Ridge, which was so largely due to our own Siegel? I think it is not right to ignore so entirely the services of an adopted population of about seven and a half millions of our twenty-three millions. I am your constant reader, and hold your views of this war as correct and most prophetic. I do sincerely believe the end will be according to your predictions; for they are just and right. If a man kicks up a fuss let him bear the consequences. The leaders in the South will have to answer for many tears shed for the loved ones who will never return from the bloody battle-field; but to the sword have they appealed, and by the sword must they be punished."

The Lounger publishes the preceding letter with the greatest pleasure. He would be a poor American indeed who did not with all his heart acknowledge the patient and successful valor of the patriot soldiers of German birth or descent. But the Lounger's correspondent will understand that in America all citizens are Americans. General Siegel, Colonel Corcoran, General Burnside, stand side by side in this war, through weal and woe, simply as what they all are, American citizens and soldiers. The effort to discriminate nationalities among citizens can have no possible good result. There is no fear but that they will be sufficiently remembered. All that the Nation asks to-day, as all that she ought ever to ask, is, Is this man honest and capable, and is he loyal?

The Lounger's correspondent will therefore believe that it is not through any unmindfulness of the bravery of the soldiers of German descent, but merely because as an American he knows no German, no Frenchman, no Irishman, and no Italian among his fellow-citizens, that he has not commended soldiers as German, Irish, French, or Italian. He, with the whole country, acknowledges with grateful admiration and pride that no name in this war is more illustrious than that of Franz Siegel.

WORDS ARE THINGS.

ONE of the morning papers spoke lately of "the States composing the Confederacy," meaning the Union. Why not say Union, then, since the very political question that underlies the war is whether we are a Confederacy or a Union—in other words, a nation. If the United States are a Confederacy, the war is, to say the least, expensive and unwise. That they are so, has been always the doctrine of the Southern political doctors; for, foreseeing the present conflict, they have always sought to wean the Southern mind from patriotism. The Union, in the Southern view, is a Confederacy of equal States; the Constitution is a treaty, and the system a dissoluble partnership. It is, in the Southern view, only a new form of the old Confederation. But in civil war words are things; and for the same reason that Mr. Lincoln would not address Jefferson Davis as His Excellency the President of the Confederate States of America, ought all loyal citizens and papers to use words which can not be misconstrued. Our political system is neither a League nor a Confederacy: it is a national Union, whose law is the law paramount of every State. It is a form new in history. It is truly a Republic, both one and many. To call it a system in which States compose a Confederacy is to misunderstand and misrepresent it.

GOOD AND GREAT TRAITORS.

THE Richmond Enquirer says that all "the best intellects of the Cotton States have been excluded from public affairs." On the other hand, Jefferson Davis, in his Message to his Congress congratulating them upon the retreat of their soldiers at Pittsburg Landing and the death of General Sydney Johnston, alludes to "th shining host of the great and good who now cluster around the banner of our country." Unless, therefore, there is a vital difference of opinion between Davis and the Enquirer, this greatness and goodness are of the purely moral kind, untainted with intellect.

Upon reflection, as all the leaders who cluster around that drooping and faintly-flapping banner are as good as they are great and as great as they are good, it is not easy to discriminate the purely good from the exclusively great. To which category, for instance, does Floyd, that Ajax of the shining host, belong? Or Pillow? Or Wigfall? Or Roger Pryor? Or Yancey? Or Judah Benjamin? Or Pickens? Or Pettus? Or Magoffin? Or Letcher? Or Slidell? Or Mason? Or Toombs? Or Polk? Or Keitt? Or Rhett? Or Spratt?

The question is, which of these great men are also the good men, or which of all these good men are not equally great? Can it possibly be true that the Enquirer is right, and that the best intellects have been excluded? Or are these the names of the best intellects that consent to this infamous rebellion?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A TRUE PICTURE OF DESPAIR.—A pig reaching through a hole in the fence to get a cabbage that lies a few inches beyond his reach.

If a man is murdered by his hired men, should the coroner render a verdict of killed by his own hands?

"Haven't you finished scaling that fish yet, Sam?" said a fishmonger to his boy. "No, master, it's a very large one." "Why, you have had time to scale a mountain."

The certain way to be cheated is to fancy one's self more cunning than others.

The ancient Greeks buried their dead in jars. Hence the origin of the expression, "He's gone to pot."

A dull and plausible man, like an unrifled gun, is a smooth bore.

"The dear little things!" said an old nurse, of her mistress's twin-children; "one looks so much like both, you can't tell t'other from which!"

Many a man who is proud to be quarter-master has a wife at home who is whole master.

WOMAN'S GRIEF.—A stingy husband.

WOMAN'S CROWNING GLORY.—Her bonnet.

Children are generally very noisy, but we must except the children of the brain, who do not often make so much noise in the world as their fond parents desire.

Hopeless old maidenhood or bachelorhood is matchless misery.

A dentist advertises that he inserts teeth cheaper than any body else. He might find a bull-dog who would do it still cheaper.

A poor fellow who had spent scores of pounds at the bar drinking, one day asked the landlord to trust him with a glass of liquor. "No," was the surly reply; "I never make a practice of doing such things." The man turned to a by-stander and said, "Sir, will you lend me a sixpence?" "Certainly," was the reply. The landlord with alacrity placed the glass before the man, who swallowed its contents, then, handing the money to the lender, said, "Here, Sir, is the sixpence I owe you. I make it a point, degraded as I am, always to pay borrowed money before I pay my spirit bill."

Britannia's breast with pity swells for slaves!
Their wrongs are ne'er forgotten:
Poor maid! we fear her bosom swells
Are but the rise and fall of cotton.

"This is really the tour [tower] of Babel," as the old bachelor said when he walked round the nursery.

It has been ascertained that the man who "held on to the last" was a shoemaker.

"I'm particularly uneasy on this point," as the fly said when the boy stuck him on the end of a needle.

The man who makes a boast of extraordinary shrewdness hasn't got a particle.

A man swallowed a set of teeth lately, and the last accounts of him stated he was experiencing, as was to be expected, a terrible gnawing at the stomach.

Some persons shame the devil, not by speaking the truth, but by outlying him.

Why are umbrellas like pancakes?—Because they are seldom seen after Lent.

A ducking in cold water destroys the temper of hot steel, but increases that of a fiery woman.

The human race, like an auctioneer's goods, are always going—going—gone.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

☞ FOR an account of the BOMBARDMENT OF FORT PULASKI see page 278.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, April 15, in the Senate, Senator Grimes introduced a bill prescribing the qualifications of electors in the City of Washington, which was laid over. Senator M'Dougall called up the resolution calling upon the Secretary of War for information relative to the arrest of General Stone, and made a long speech in vindication of that officer. Senator Wade replied. The resolution finally went over. The Senate soon afterward went into executive session.——In the House, Mr. Trowbridge called up a motion, heretofore made by him, to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted a resolution asking the Secretary of War for information as to the delay in exchanging Colonel Corcoran, and directing him to stop all exchanges until Colonel Corcoran should be released. After considerable debate, the resolution was amended so as to include Colonel Wilcox and other prisoners. The bill to regulate the franking privilege was considered. On motion of Mr. Colfax, who explained that the Post-office Committee, with one exception, were all in favor of the entire abolition of the privilege, in accordance with the provisions of the bill now before the Senate, the bill was laid on the table, 58 to 48.

On Wednesday, April 16, in the Senate, Senator Hale withdrew his resignation of the chairmanship of the Naval Committee. Bills providing a Territorial government for Kanawha (Western Virginia), and for the enforcement of the laws of the United States, were referred. Senator M'Dougall continued his remarks respecting the arrest of General Stone, and opposed the adoption of the motion calling on the President for information on the subject instead of the Secretary of War. The Confiscation bill was then taken up, and Senator Powell, of Kentucky, spoke against it. The death of Mr. Cooper, representative of the Seventh district of Pennsylvania, was announced, and the customary resolutions of condolence adopted. The President sent a special message to both Houses of Congress announcing his approval of the act abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. The President appointed ex-Mayor Berret of Washington, Hon. Samuel F. Vinton of Ohio, and Daniel R. Goodloe, formerly of North Carolina, Commissioners to determine the validity and value of the claims presented under the act of emancipation. Mr. Berret has since resigned.——In the House, a bill appropriating thirty millions of dollars to make up deficiencies in the appropriations for the pay of the army was passed by a vote of one hundred and ninety yeas to two nays—Messrs. Calvert and May, both of Maryland, voting in the negative. A resolution, reported by the Judiciary Committee, declaring that the Government should not interfere with the transmission of intelligence by telegraph, when it will not afford aid to the enemy, was adopted. The death of Mr. Cooper, of Pennsylvania, was announced, resolutions of condolence were adopted, and the House adjourned.

On Thursday, April 17, in the Senate, a joint resolution appropriating $7000 for the relief of the officers and privates of the Maine battalion, who lost their personal effects on the Port Royal expedition, was adopted. The bill requiring electors of the District of Columbia to take the oath of allegiance to the Government was passed. The House bill establishing a Bureau of Agriculture was taken up. Senator Wright offered a substitute, providing for an Agricultural, Statistical, and Commercial Bureau, and made a speech in support of it. A resolution was adopted calling on the President for the papers and testimony in the court of inquiry in the case of Lieutenant Fleming, of the navy. The bill providing for a line of steamships between San Francisco and Shanghai was called up; but without taking action on it the Senate went into executive session.——The House was occupied all day in debating the Pacific Railroad bill.

On Friday, April 18, in the Senate, the select committee appointed to inquire into the circumstances attending the surrender of the Pensacola and Norfolk navy-yards, and the armory at Harper's Ferry to the rebels, made a voluminous report, which was ordered to be printed. With regard to the Norfolk Navy-yard, the committee censure the Buchanan administration for destroying part of the property there and abandoning the remainder, as the evidence shows that the yard and the immense war material therein might easily have been saved by our forces occupying the place, who numbered one thousand men, while the rebels had only five hundred. Commodore Paulding, and Captains Pendergrast and M'Cauley are also censured by the committee. A resolution calling on the Superintendent of the Census Bureau for the names of all persons who own slaves in the District, the ages of the slaves, and other information relating to them, was adopted. The bill establishing a line of mail steamers between San Francisco and Shanghai was discussed, and Senator Howard, of Michigan, made a speech in favor of the Confiscation bill. ——In the House, several private bills were passed, and the Pacific Railroad bill was discussed in Committee of the Whole. Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, April 21, in the Senate, in addition to petitions in favor of a bankrupt law, and a ship-canal from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River, and memorials in reference to the Tax bill, a petition was presented from free colored citizens of the United States, praying that territory may be acquired outside the national limits for their colonization, and suggesting Central America as a desirable locality. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A resolution calling on the Secretary of State for the names of all Kentuckians who have been arrested and held as prisoners of state, and also the names of all who have been released, was offered by Senator Powell, and laid over. The consideration of the resolution in regard to the arrest of Brigadier-General Stone was then resumed, and after a long and somewhat angry discussion the resolution offered by Senator Wilson, requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public welfare, to furnish all the information in his possession relative to the arrest and imprisonment of General Stone, was adopted. The Confiscation bill was taken up, and Senator Davis, of Kentucky, obtained the floor, but the Senate went into executive session, and subsequently adjourned.——In the House, a bill making appropriations for a bounty to the widows and legal heirs of volunteers who may die or be killed, was referred to the Ways and Means Committee. The Secretary of War was requested to furnish a statement of the appointments of Brigadier-Generals from April 1, 1861, to April 1, 1862. The resolution offered by Mr. Diven, of New York, requesting the Attorney-General to take proceedings to recover from John C. Frémont and E. L. Beard the sum of money obtained from the Treasury on the order of said Frémont, payable to said Beard, as set forth in the report of the Select Committee on Government Contracts, came up, and elicited an interesting debate, which terminated in laying the resolution on the table. A resolution, directing the Judiciary Committee to report back the bill providing for the trial and punishment of military officers charged with swindling, was adopted, and the House adjourned.

M'DOWELL ON TO RICHMOND.

General M'Dowell made a dashing and successful advance, with a portion of his army, from Warrenton Junction, upon Fredericksburg, on 17th, accomplishing a march of twenty miles by seven o'clock on the morning of 18th. The rebels, consisting of a regiment of infantry, one of cavalry, and a battery, intercepted their route, but were driven across the Rappahannock, and our troops occupied the suburbs of Fredericksburg, having pushed forward in spite of the successful efforts of the enemy to destroy the bridges, which retarded though it did not prevent the pursuit of our troops. The Ira Harris cavalry played a conspicuous part in the action, and suffered considerably. Several of the rebels were killed and wounded, but the number is not known. Falmouth, opposite Fredericksburg, was occupied by our troops at seven o'clock on the morning of 18th. The rebels, in addition to the bridge, burned the steamer St. Nicholas, which they stole in the Chesapeake Bay several months ago, together with all the other craft in the river. The municipal authorities of Fredericksburg consented to surrender the city upon a guarantee of protection to private property; and a meeting between General Augur and a committee from the City Council was to be held on the 19th. Vast amounts of grain and forage are stored at Fredericksburg.

BANKS ON TO RICHMOND.

General Banks is moving rapidly up the valley of the Shenandoah in the direction of Staunton, which place he will probably occupy in a day or two. Our latest dispatches from his advance are dated Sparta, Rockingham County, at which place it arrived on 19th, driving the enemy from an adjacent hill with artillery and charges of the cavalry. Six thousand of Jackson's troops had passed through the town on the previous evening and encamped a short distance beyond. A skirmish took place beyond Sparta on the afternoon of 19th, in which a considerable body of rebels was dispersed by our artillery. General Banks's progress is necessarily considerably delayed by the destruction of the bridges on the route by the rebels.

General Banks reports that the rebels have left Harrisonburg for Gordonsville, and it was supposed that they were concentrating at Yorktown.

GENERAL HALLECK'S ARMY.

There is no further intelligence of importance from General Halleck's army. General W. T. Sherman has moved his division two miles farther toward Corinth, and on 16th had a brisk skirmish with the rebels, in which he defeated them, killing fifty or sixty, and maintained his position intact.

GENERAL MITCHELL'S ARMY.

General Mitchell, after seizing the Memphis and Charleston Railroad from Stevenson to Decatur, marched suddenly into Mississippi, seized Iuka, 22 miles from Corinth, and burned the bridges at Decatur and Florence. At the former place he seized the telegraph, and intercepted the following message from Beauregard:

CORINTH, April 9, 1862.

To General Samuel Cooper, Richmond, Va.:

All present probabilities are that, whenever the enemy move on this position, he will do so with an overwhelming force of not less than 85,000 men. We can now muster only about 35,000 effectives. Van Dorn may possibly join us in a few days with about 15,000 more. Can we not be reinforced from Pemberton's army? If defeated here we lose the Mississippi Valley, and probably our cause. Whereas we could even afford to lose, for a while, Charleston and Savannah for the purpose of defeating Buell's army, which would not only insure us the Valley of the Mississippi but our independence.

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

THE MISSISSIPPI EXPEDITION.

On 18th Commodore Foote's bombardment of Fort Wright was still proceeding. The firing on the day previous had been very heavy on both sides. The enemy had done no damage to our flotilla; whether they had suffered any from our fire was not known. There appears to be no expectation of an immediate reduction of the fort, as the present high stage of the water in the Mississippi prevents co-operation on the part of General Pope's forces, which are at Oceola, Arkansas. Deserters say that the rebel batteries now mount 40 guns, and that they have 60 more which they are rapidly putting in position. Bragg, it appears, is in command, having succeeded Villipique. He is said to have about 600 troops, and has the co-operation of four gun-boats, mounting 24 guns. Fort Wright, formerly called Fort Pillow, is the first rebel fortification on the river below New Madrid. It is near the mouth of the Hatchie River, a few miles below Oceola, Arkansas, on the opposite bluff, known as the first Chickasaw Bluff, some 12 miles above Randolph, and 78 miles above Memphis.

FIRE OPENED ON FORT MACON.

From rebel sources we have an account of the opening of the bombardment by our troops on Fort Macon on Saturday week, and two days' hard fighting there. The Richmond Dispatch says, that the fort will, no doubt, be able to hold out against the invaders.

Four companies of the Connecticut Eighth Regiment had a skirmish on the 12th with a force of rebels of one hundred and fifty, who made a sortie from Fort Macon, the rebels driving in our pickets. After a sharp engagement the rebels were driven back to the fort. During the engagement Fort Macon fired seventy shots at the engaging forces.

OCCUPATION OF APALACHICOLA.

The city of Apalachicola has been successfully occupied by our troops, thus giving us another important point in Florida. The capture was effected by the gun-boats Mercedita and Sagamore, with but little opposition, on the 3d inst. A few shell dispersed the rebels who were in arms there; and the non-resistant portion of the population were found in an almost starving condition. The blockade had effectually cut off supplies on the sea-board, and their resources from inland were not sufficient to maintain the ordinary comforts of life.

RECONNOISSANCE UP THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

On 14th inst. a portion of the Potomac Flotilla passed up the Rappahannock as far as Tappahannock, about fifty miles below Fredericksburg. At Urbana our men, on attempting to land, were fired upon but without effect, when a few shells, judiciously distributed, scattered the few rebels there. Two miles from Tappahannock is Lowry's Point, where the rebels had a strong battery. This was engaged by the flotilla with such success that the rebels were speedily forced to flee, when our men landed and destroyed the rebel quarters and secured considerable booty. The fleet remained at Tappahannock until the 15th, and then returned down the river, having gained much valuable information.

NASHVILLE RETURNING TO HER FIRST LOVE.

The City Council of Nashville, Tennessee, at its last session (April 14th) passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Mayor of the city of Nashville be, and he is hereby requested and instructed to have the flag of the United States placed upon all public property belonging to this corporation.

Resolved, That we cordially thank the officers and soldiers of the United States for the unexampled kindness and courtesy hitherto extended to our fellow-citizens, and that, as men striving together with them for the re-establishment of the government of our fathers, we pledge them our most sincere and hearty co-operation.

Resolutions were also adopted directing the teachers in the public schools in the city to take the oath of allegiance or resign.

THE "NASHVILLE" OUT AGAIN.

The rebel steamer Nashville arrived at Nassau, New Providence, on the 1st inst. from Charleston, and changed her colors to the British, under the name of Thomas L. Wragg. She sailed again on the 6th, having cleared for St. John's, New Brunswick, having on board a cargo of arms brought to Nassau by the British steamship Southward. She doubtless intends to run the blockade at Charleston again.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE "MONITOR" PANIC.

BOTH Houses of the British Parliament have been engaged in debates on the inutility of land fortifications and wooden ships for purposes of coast defense and war, as well as the necessity of an immediate reconstruction of the British navy, so as to put her in possession of an iron-armored fleet. The speeches of Lord Hardwicke, a practical seaman; the Duke of Somerset, First Lord of the Admiralty; Lord Palmerston, Sir John Pakington, and other prominent men, show that they are greatly alarmed at the position in which their country is placed by the issue of the conflict between the Merrimac and Monitor. The press re-echoes the sentiment; the London Times assuring its readers that England must not allow to "any other nation a moment's start" in obtaining the "greatest force of invulnerable vessels," and that "all other things are secondary to this."

FRANCE.

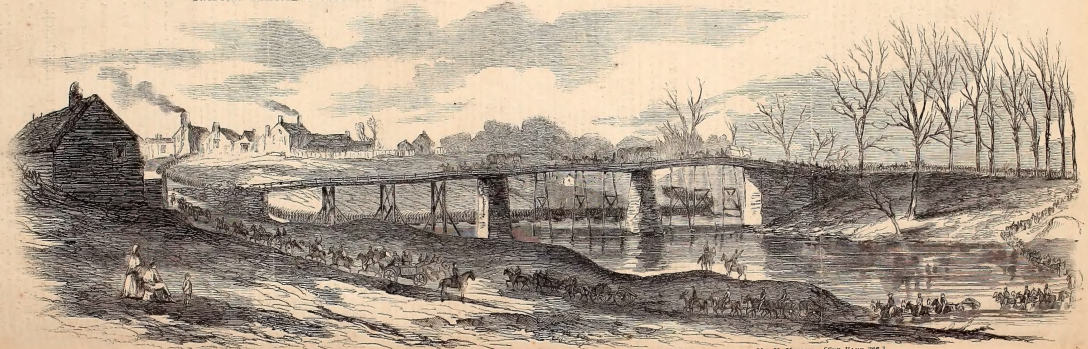
IRON-CLAD SHIPS THERE TOO.

The French iron-plated gun-boat which arrived in the Seine from Bordeaux about a year ago has been lengthened and modified in shape; she is now completed, and being wholly roofed in by a casing of iron plates, presents a remarkable appearance in the water—something like a gigantic egg. She has two very short funnels, two engines, and is propelled by two screws.

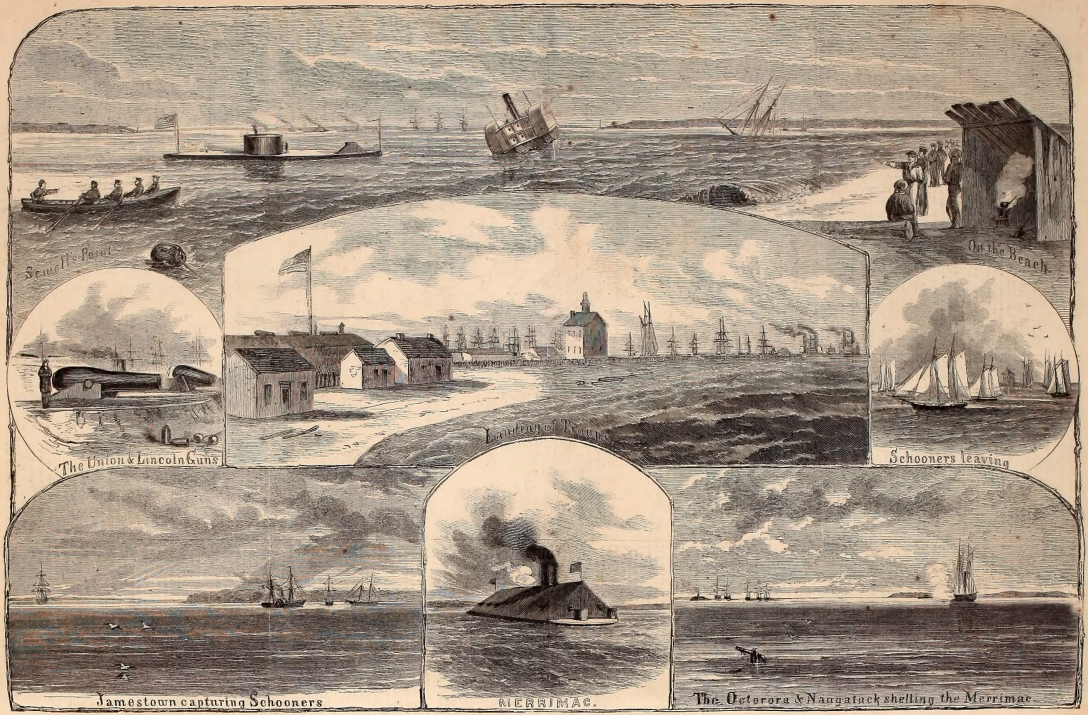
RUSSIA.

THE CZAR CATCHES THE DISEASE.

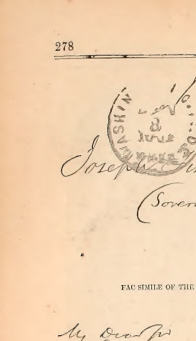
The Russian Government is determined to save every ruble possible in order to apply the money for the fitting out of an iron-plated fleet.



THE BATTLE-FIELD OF SHILOH, OR PITTSBURG LANDING.—[SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.]



SHILOAH MEETING HOUSE.



PITTSBURGH LANDING.

GENERAL BUELL'S ARMY CROSSING DUCK RIVER, AT COLUMBIA, TENNESSEE, TO REINFORCE GENERAL GRANT.—SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.—[SEE PAGE 268.]

THE SECOND TRIP OF THE "MERRIMAC"—SCENES AT AND AROUND FORTRESS MONROE.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—(SEE PAGE 278.)

FAC SIMILE OF THE SUPERSCRIPTION OF THIS LETTER.

SENATOR YULEE'S LETTER.

We reproduce herewith a fac-simile of a remarkable letter from Senator Yulee to Joseph Finnegan, of the "Sovereignty Conference" of Florida. This letter, which reveals the crooked purposes of the traitors who have plunged the country into the present war, was found by the correspondent of the New York Times at Fernandina, Florida, when the town was occupied by the Union forces. The following were the resolution inclosed in the letter:

Resolved—1. That in our opinion each of the Southern States should, as soon as may be, secede from the Union.

Resolved—2. That provision should be made for a Convention by organic Conference of the Seceding States, the Convention to meet not later than the 15th of February, at the City of Montgomery, in the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That in view of the hostile legislation that is threatened against the Seceding States, and which may be consummated [de in original, for it seems his secession brain extended even into orthography] before the 4th of March, we ask instructions whether the delegations are to remain in Congress until that date for the purpose of defeating such legislation.

Resolved, That a Committee be and are hereby appointed, consisting of Messrs. Davis, Stokli, and Mallory, to carry out the objects of this meeting.

CAPTURE OF FORT PULASKI.

We recorded the fall of Fort Pulaski, on the 11th April, in our last Number. We now publish, on page 284, a series of views of the FORT and ON BATTERIES, from sketches by Mr. Theodore R. Davis, and a PLAN by Lieutenant HAAS. Mr. Davis, who was with General Gillmore when the batteries were being built, thus describes the work:

Shortly after the occupation of Tybee Island by our troops, Captain (now General) Gillmore commenced the erection of a number of batteries for the reduction of Fort Pulaski. The locality of these batteries were by the nature of the case rather exiles. Most of these were to be erected within easy range of the walls of the fort. How to do this unseen was a matter of serious consideration, as the smallest party of men seen during the daytime by the rebels would be followed by a shower of shells. This made it necessary that all work should be done at night. There being few natural advantages the slightest facilities were made, by the ingenuity of General Gilmore, to serve the basis of a fortification. Starting with eight inches and twelve were carefully raised a foot or so at a time, and with no change in their appearance were covered from Fort Pulaski, a battery was in course of construction within from 2000 to 5000 yards. Whenever the transportation of any of the heavy mortars was interrupted by the approach of daylight it was carefully covered up with bushes, and, it is related, undisturbed during the day. Some of these mortars were placed in position on the night of the 10th inst., but at first the wheels of the carriages sank into the mud up to the hubs. A corduroy road was then hastily constructed, however, with logs bound together, the batteries being filled with earth. Some of the guns were mammoth, and all the batteries were carefully screened from view. Not a word was spoken during their construction. Orders were given in an under-tone, and during the transportation of the artillery orders were transmitted by a whisper. It is supposed that the enemy were in total ignorance of the operations going on so near them until our guns opened upon the fort.

The bombardment is thus described in the correspondence of the Herald:

On Thursday morning, at twenty-three minutes of eight, the fire was opened by a discharge of a 13-inch mortar from Battery Stanford Hall, fired by Lieutenant Horace Porter, of the Ordnance Department, the shell exploding in the fort; and this was succeeded by a 13-inch shell from Battery Stanton, which exploded short. In a moment or two several of the mortars were discharged from the other batteries; but none of the shells were effective, the firing being very bad, and the range too short. Then came the the first 64 from Fort Pulaski responded from a 10-inch battery, which fired with remarkable precision over Tybee Island. The firing was kept up rapidly for some time, with little damage being done by either side, some time elapsing before the rebels obtained the correct range, and the mortars were not certain of the position of our battery. Soon, however, we observed the fort fairly fly from the parapets, burst on the south and southeast faces, and we were satisfied that the breaching batteries (Halleck, Scott, Sturgis, M'Clellan, and Totten) on Coast Point were in full play, sending their rifled balls, solid 10-inch shot and heavy shell, with terrible effect against the brick walls.

The bombardment was on all day, the fire from our batteries being more effective every minute. The enemy, finding that our 13-inch shells were not so destructive as they expected, began to work their barbette guns with great energy and apparent trouble. Our Parrott guns were brought to bear upon them, and a hot fire was poured upon the rebel gunners, which soon demounted. At the fire from the breaching batteries became more and more disastrous to the enemy as the day advanced, and at midnight began to assume a sublime aspect. It appeared to have the small-pox, batteries appearing all over it. Then after a while its guns together, and they broke in fire of the wall of the parapet were discovered, which burnt fiercer and deeper, and seemed the front of a breach. The breach at dusk, at which time the fire was temporarily suspended on account of the smoke settling through the wall, except at one small point, through which a gleam of sunlight was employed almost sunset. During the night an occasional shell was thrown from batteries Burnside and Halleck, and from the rifled guns of Battery Siegel. The enemy made no reply, but seemed to be engaged in repairing damages. We had not lost a man during the day, and sustained no damage of consequence to our batteries.

Sunday no guns opened were required by the engineers during the night, and all was made ready by daylight for whether day's operations. At daylight on Friday fire was opened by our batteries, and responded to by the enemy.

The 13-inch shells, which fell well bored and lenty-eenth the precepe of the fort, had prepared it well for the operations of the 10th inst., and when the Columbiads from Coast Point opened the parapets began to crumble. The breach of the day previous enlarged, new ones were effected, and by two o'clock, when the rebel flag was hauled down and a white flag raised, a practicable breach large enough to drive a four-horse wagon through, had been formed, and our 13-inch shells were passing through it, across the terre plein, and breaching the magazine itself. This brought the rebels to terms. They surrendered unconditionally.

The fort was much cut up by our firing. The breach was immense, and rifle-balls passed completely through it. No fort was ever breached before at so great a distance.

The breaching batteries were as follows:

No.	Battery		Guns.
1.	Stanton,	3 13-in. Mortars,	1861, 17,18
2.	Grant,	3 13-in. Mortars,	1861, 17,18
3.	Lyon,	3 10-in. Columbiads,	1861, 18,62
4.	Lincoln	3 10-in. Columbiads,	1861, 1862
5.	Burnside,	3 13-in. Mortar,	1861, 17,18
6.	Sherman,	3 13-in. Mortars,	1861, 17,18
7.	Halleck,	3 13-in. Mortars,	1861, 17,18
8.	Scott,	{ 1 8-in. 1 6-in. Columbiads.
9.	Siegel,	{ 4 24-pr. 6 32-pr. James Parrott }	Siege carriage.
10.	M'Clellan	{ 4 42-pr. 4 32-pr. }	Sea coast.
11.	Totten,	4 10-in. Mortars,	{ gatters 1841, gatters 1805.

MAP OF YORKTOWN AND ITS SURROUNDINGS.

THE MAP on page 279 represents that peninsula of Virginia and its surrounding waters where the Union and rebel forces stand—the former in front of the rebels under the archrebel Jeff Davis, are concentrating for the final struggle in Virginia. Right along the coast-line runs Hampton road, of six feet and less at low tide; the dotted lines between it and the shore are shoals (two fathoms or four); between these dotted lines the depth of water in the James and York rivers is in many places over six fathoms. The James River, before it opened to Gloucester Point, has great depth of water opposite Yorktown. The channel opposite Farrest Monroe is also very deep, and well guarded by the fort on one side and the Rip Raps on the other. Strong rebel batteries on Sewall's Point and Craney Island guard the lair of the Merrimac. The rebel intrenchments extend across the Peninsula from mouth of York River, up its west bank, thence northeastwardly to the York River to Sydnor's Swash, thence midway between Wormley's Creek and Yorktown.

THE SECOND TRIP OF THE "MERRIMAC."

We publish on page 277 a series of sketches from Fortress Monroe, illustrating the SECOND TRIP OF THE "MERRIMAC," which occurred on 11th inst. The various sketches explain themselves. Meanwhile we condense the following account of the cruise of the rebel iron-clad monster from the Herald correspondence:

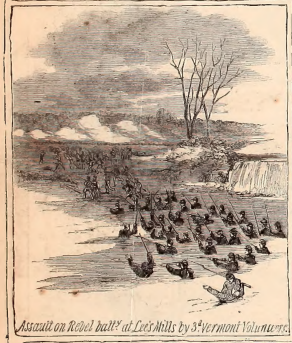
The long-expected reappearance of the rebel steamer Merrimac occurred yesterday morning. After a lapse of nearly five weeks of inactivity, during a portion of which her movements with the Monitor, she returned to the Roads from Norfolk at 11 o'clock, accompanied by her consort, the Patrick Henry, 3 guboats, Teaser, Raleigh, and Beaufort.

On signal-gun at the fortress was fired, to give notice to the garrison was under arms; and the artillerists composed of detachments of the Naval brigade and Wisconsin artillery, soon after manned the guns on the parapet of the fortress. The large fleet of Union schooner transports which was anchored in the Roads on seeing the rebel fleet signal their movements, and, forming in a wind and line, were soon out of harm's way. Many of those in Hampton Roads, controlled by the masters and steamboat channels, and being able to get out of the way of them. Others were towed by tug-steamers, of which there are a number here. The little Monitor, which has been mysteriously awaiting the re-appearance of the Merrimac, on seeing the latter approach, got ready for action by clearing her decks, lowering her smoke and blow pipes, slipping her anchor, and in less than ten minutes was ready for action. The orders from Flag-officer Goldsborough were, however, to act strictly on the defensive, and to give battle only when the rebel craft should approach a given point. The Merrimac and her consorts meanwhile had approached to within a mile and a half of the fortress, and there she anchored, having, as it afterwards proved, certain boundary, within the range of the guns of the fort, over which she would not pass.

The French war steamer Catinat, which was anchored in the Roads, got under way at 8 o'clock in the morning, and was taking in water from a Union schooner, back up her anchor, and, taking the schooner under the protection of her flag, proceeded to a point between here and Newport News, where she has since been joined by the French war steamer Gassendi and the British steamer Rinaldo. The rebel steamers were those of Duke, Mayo, South Carolina, and others, with troops, were in the harbor, but soon after 8 o'clock began to leave for the mouth of the James river point. The Monitor, in her defensive attitude, joined the fleet of Union vessels, and moved down with them in the Roads, at times showing their broadside directly at the rebel fleet. The rebel fleet seemed to take a two-fold advantage of the presence of the foreign vessels in the Roads, and kept continually under their cover, so that, in the event of a movement on the attempt, we could not have fired a shot at the rebels without endangering the neutral vessels. This movement lasted from 8 o'clock A. M. to o'clock A.M. the rebel gunboat Patrick Henry left the fleet and run into Hampton Cove by the fields channel, heading from Newport News Point toward Hampton village. At first it seemed to be a manœuvre to induce the Monitor to change her position; and others supposed the real manœuvre had hostile designs on the Federal camp at Hampton (Camp Hamilton). The sequel to the problem was not long solved when the rebel craft, subsequently joined by the rebel steamer Teazer, were seen coming out of the cove, and, passing the fleet, moved down the channel for the James River, and disappeared from view.

The Patrick Henry turned her prizes to Norfolk, and returned to the Roads at about half past 11 o'clock. A large number of rebel excursionists on steamers followed the fleet down from Norfolk to see the fun; but they were doomed to disappointment, as no fight occurred.

The Merrimac and her rebel consorts returned to Norfolk from the Roads at half past 8 o'clock, without having accomplished the object of their visit, which was evidently to coax the Monitor to combat. Before leaving, however, she exchanged a few shots, at long range, with the Union gunboats Genesee and Stevens battery Naugatuck, the latter firing at anchor in Hampton Cove. The practice of the Merrimac was very poor, her best shot apparently being a shot over three miles, while her opponents threw shot over three and a half miles. The Naugatuck, with her augmented 150-pound Parrott gun, throwing even further.



It is supposed that in the great gun of the Merrimac exploded on 11th.

MAP OF YORKTOWN AND THE VICINITY, SHOWING THE POSITION OF GENERAL MCLELLAN'S ARMY, AND THE REBELS UNDER JEFF DAVIS.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

Rebel works seen from Gen.l Porters Division.

Assault on Rebel batt.y at Lee's Mills by 3.d Vermont Volunteers.

The enemy's com

Berdans Sharpshooters picking off the enemy's gunners.

OUR ARMY BEFORE YORKTOWN, VIRGINIA.—From

Reconnoissance in force by Gen. Gorman near Yorktown.

The Ocean Queen conveying troops to Yorktown

Religious services in Camp of 61st N.Y. Volunteers

URES BY MR. A. R. WAUD AND MR. W. HOMER.—[SEE PAGE 283.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC. ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN MCLENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

read the first words, "In the name of God, Amen," he turned the sheet, and pointed to the end of the next page. She saw the well-known signature, "Andrew Vanstone." She saw the customary attestations of the two witnesses, and the date of the document, reverting to a period of more than five years since. Having thus convinced her of the formality of the will, the lawyer interposed before she could question him, and addressed her in these words:

"I must not deceive you," he said. "I have my own reasons for producing this document."

"What reasons, Sir?"

"You shall hear them. When you are in possession of the truth, these pages may help to preserve your respect for Mr. Vanstone's memory—"

Miss Garth started back in her chair.

"What do you mean?" she asked, with a stern straightforwardness.

He took no heed of the question; he went on as if she had not interrupted him.

"I have a second reason," he continued, "for showing you the will. If I can prevail on you to read certain clauses in it, under my superior direction, you will make your own discovery of the circumstances which I am here to disclose—circumstances so painful that I hardly know how to communicate them to you with my own lips."

Miss Garth looked him steadfastly in the face. "Circumstances that affect the dead poet's estate, or the living children?"

"Which affect the dead and the living both," answered the lawyer. "Circumstances that prove to say, which involve the future of Mr. Vanstone's unmarried daughters."

"Wait," said Miss Garth, "wait a little." She pushed her gray hair back from her temples, and rested with the sickness of sudden and dreadful faintness of terror, which would have overpowered a younger or a less resolute woman. Her eyes, shut in watchings, were dry with grief, scorched by the lawyer's unfathomable fear. "Give me a moment," she repeated to herself, vacantly. "He talks as if there was some worse calamity than the calamity which has made them orphans!" She roused herself again, and rallied her sinking courage. "I will not make your task any duty, Sir, harder to you than I can help," she resumed. "Show me the place in the will. Let me read it, and know the worst."

Mr. Pendril turned back to the first page, and pointed to the concluding line of stamped lines of writing. "Begin here," he said.

She tried to begin; she tried to follow his finger, as he moved it under the lines of the sentences and the dates. But her senses seemed to share the confusion of her mind—the words mingled together, and the lines swam before her eyes.

"I can't follow you," she said. "You must tell it, or read it to me." She pushed her chair back from the table, and tried to collect herself. "Stop!" she added, with a sudden fear in her visible hesitation and reluctance, took the papers in his own hands. "Tell me one thing first. Does his will provide for his children?"

"His will provided for them when he made it."

"What is it now, Sir?" Impatient of her unnatural bluntness broke out in her manner as she repeated the answer.) "Does it provide for them now?"

"It does not."

She snatched the will from his hand and threw it into a corner of the room. "You mean well," she said; "you are a kind man, Sir; you are wasting your time and my strength. If the will is useless, there let it lie. Tell me the truth, Mr. Pendril—tell me briefly, tell me concisely, in your own words!"

He felt that it would be useless cruelty to resist that appeal. There was no merciful alternative but to answer it on the spot.

"I must refer you to the signing of the present year, Miss Garth. Do you remember the fourth of March?"

Her attention wandered again; a thought seemed to have struck her at the moment when she spoke. Instead of answering his inquiry she put a question of her own.

"Let me break the news to myself," she said —"let me anticipate you, if I can. That useless will, the terms in which you speak of his daughters, the doubt you seem to feel of showing me respect for his memory, have opened a new view to me. Mr. Vanstone has died a ruined man—is not that what you had to tell me?"

"Far from it. Mr. Vanstone has died, leaving a fortune of more than eight thousand pounds—a fortune invested in excellent securities. He lived up to his income, but never beyond it; and all his debts added together would not reach two hundred pounds. If he had died a ruined man, I should have felt deeply for his children—but I should not have hesitated to tell you the truth, as I am hesitating now. Let me repeat a question which seemed you, I think, when I first put it. Carry your mind back to the spring of this year. Do you remember the fourth of March?"

Miss Garth shook her head. "My memory for dates is bad at the best of times," she said. "I am too confused to exert it at a moment's notice. Can you put your question in no other form?"

He put it in this form:

"Do you remember any domestic event in the spring of the present year which appeared to affect Mr. Vanstone more seriously than usual?"

Miss Garth leaned forward in her chair, and looked cagerly at Mr. Pendril across the table. "The journey to London!" she exclaimed. "I distrusted the journey to London from the first! Yes! I remember Mr. Vanstone receiving a letter—I remember his reading it, and looking so altered from himself that he startled us all."

"Did you notice any apparent understanding between Mr. and Mrs. Vanstone on the subject of that letter?"

"Yes, I did. One of the girls—it was Magdalen—pacing out the poor-thing, some place in America. It all comes back to me, Mr. Pendril. Mrs. Vanstone looked excited and anxious the moment she heard the place named. They went to London together the next day, they explained nothing to their daughters, nothing to me. Mrs. Vanstone said the journey was for family affairs. I suspected something wrong; I couldn't tell what. Mrs. Vanstone came to me from London, saying that her object was to consult a physician on the state of her health, and not to alarm the daughters by telling them. Something in the letter rather hurt me at the time, I thought there might be some other motive that she was keeping from me. Did I do her wrong?"

"You did her no wrong. There was a motive which she was keeping from you. In revealing that motive I reveal the painful secret which brings me to this house. All that I could do to prepare you I have done. Let me now tell the truth in the plainest and fewest words. When Mr. and Mrs. Vanstone left Combe-Raven in the March of the present year—"

Before he could complete the sentence a sudden movement of Miss Garth's interrupted him. She started violently and looked round toward the window. "Only the wind among the leaves," she said, faintly. "My nerves are so shaken the least thing startles me. Speak out, for God's sake! When Mr. and Mrs. Vanstone left this house—tell me in plain words—why did they go to London?"

In plain words Mr. Pendril told her;

"They went to London to be married."

With that answer he placed a slip of paper on the table. It was the marriage certificate of the dead parents, and the date it bore was March the twentieth, eighteen hundred and forty-six.

Miss Garth neither moved nor spoke. The certificate lay beneath her unnoticed. She sat with her eyes rooted on the lawyer's face; her mind roused, her senses awake. He saw that all his efforts to break the shock of the discovery had been efforts made in vain; he felt the vital importance of meeting her, and firmly and distinctly repeated the fatal words.

"They went to London to be married," he said.

"Try to rouse yourself: try to realize the plain fact first: the explanation shall come after!" Miss Garth, I speak the miserable truth! In the spring of this year they left home; they lived in London for a fortnight, in the strictest retirement; they were married by license at the end of that time. There is a copy of the certificate, which I myself obtained on Monday last. Read the date of the marriage for yourself. It is Friday, the twentieth of March—the March of this present year."

As he pointed to the certificate that faint breath of air among the shrubs beneath the window which had startled Miss Garth stirred the leaves once more. He heard it himself this time, and turned his face so as to let the breeze play upon it. No breeze came, no breath of air that was strong enough for him to feel fronted into the room.

Miss Garth roused herself mechanically and took the certificate. It seemed to produce no distinct impression on her: she laid it on one side in a lost, bewildered manner. "Twelve years," she said, in low, hopeless tones—"twelve quiet happy years I lived with this family. Mrs. Vanstone was my friend; my dear, valued friend —my sister, I might almost say. I can't believe it. Bear with me a little, Sir; I can't believe it yet."

"I shall help you to believe it when I tell you more," said Mr. Pendril—"you will understand me better when I take you back to the time of Mr. Vanstone's early life. I won't ask for your attention just yet. Let us wait a little until you recover yourself."

They waited a few minutes. The lawyer took some letters from his pocket, referred to them attentively and put them back again. "Can you listen to me now?" he asked, kindly. She bowed her head in answer. Mr. Pendril considered with himself for a moment. "I must mention you on one point," he said. "If the aspect of Mr. Vanstone's character which I am now about to present to you seems in some respects at variance with your later experience, bear in mind that when you first knew him twelve years since he was a man of forty, and that when it first knew him he was a lad of nineteen."

His next words raised the veil and showed the irrevocable Past.

CHAPTER XIII.

"THE fortunes which Mr. Vanstone possessed when you knew him" (the lawyer began) "was part, and part only, of the inheritance which fell to him on his father's death. Mr. Vanstone the elder was a manufacturer in the North of England. He married early in life; and the children of the marriage were either six or seven in number—I am not certain which. First, Michael, the eldest son, still living, and now an old man, turned seventy. Secondly, Selina, the eldest daughter, who married in after-life, and who died ten or eleven years ago. After these two came other sons and daughters whose early deaths make it unnecessary to mention them particularly. The last, and by many years the youngest of the children, was Andrew, whom I first knew, as I told you, at the age of nineteen. My father was then on the point of retiring from the active pursuit of his profession, and in succeeding to his business I also succeeded to his connection with the Vanstones as the family solicitor.

"At that time Andrew had just started in life by entering the army. After little more than a year of home-service he was ordered out with his regiment to Canada. When he quitted England he left his father and his elder brother Michael seriously at variance. I need not detain you by entering into the cause of the quarrel. I need only tell you that the elder Mr. Vanstone, with many excellent qualities, was a man of fierce and intractable temper. His eldest son had set him at defiance, under circumstances which might have justly irritated a father of an milder character; and he declared, in the most positive terms, that he would never set Michael's face again. In defiance of my entreaties, and of the entreaties of his wife, he rose up, in our presence, the will which provided for Michael's share in the general inheritance. Such was the family position when the younger son left home for Canada.

"Some months after Andrew's arrival with his regiment at Quebec he became acquainted with a woman of great personal attractions, who came, or said she came, from one of the Southern States of America. She obtained an immense influence over him, and he came to be the basest purpose. You knew the easy, affectionate, trusting nature of the man in later life—you can imagine how thoughtlessly he acted on the impulses of his youth. It is useless to dwell on this lamentable part of the story. He was just twenty-one; he was blindly devoted to a worthless woman; and she led him on, with merciless cunning, till it was too late to prevent her. In one word, he committed the fatal error of his life —he married her.

"She had been wise enough in her own interests to dread the influence of his brother officers, and to persuade him, up to the period of the marriage ceremony, to keep the proposed union between them a secret. She could do this, but she could not provide against the results of accident. Hardly three months had passed when a chance discovery exposed the life she had led before her marriage. But one alternative was left to her husband—the alternative of instantly parting from her.

"HER EYES, DIM WITH WATCHING, WEARY WITH GRIEF, SEARCHED THE LAWYER'S UNFATHOMABLE FACE. HIS UNHAPPY DAUGHTERS, SHE REPEATED TO HERSELF, VACANTLY."

"The effect of the discovery on the unhappy boy—for a boy in disposition he still was—may be judged by the event which followed the exposure. One of Andrew's superior officers found him in his quarters, weeping by his father's corpse. Some of the disgraceful truth with a loaded pistol by his side. That officer saved the boy's life from his own hand, and hushed up the scandalous affair by a compromise. Mrs. Vanstone sang a perfectly heartless and inhuman part in the conduct prior to the ceremony giving her husband no claim to his release from her by divorce, if we only consent to be her sense of her own interests. A handsome annual allowance was secured to her, on condition that she returned to the place from which she had come, that she never appeared in England, and that she ceased to use her husband's name. These stipulations were added to these. She accepted them all, and measures were promptly taken for to have her well looked after in the place to her retreat. What life she led there, and whether she performed the conditions imposed on her, I can not say. I can only tell you that she came, to my knowledge, once into England; that she never annoyed Mr. Vanstone; and that the annual allowance was paid her, through a local agent in Jersey, down to the day of her death. All that she wanted in marrying him so money, and money she got.

"In the mean time Andrew had left the regiment. Nothing would induce him to face his brother officers after what had happened. He sold out and returned to England. The first intelligence which reached him on his return was the intelligence of his father's death. He came to my office in London before going home, and there found from my lips how the family secret had ended.

"The will which Mr. Vanstone the elder had destroyed in the moment of his death, I have, as I knew, replaced by another. When I was sent for, in the usual course, to draw it, I firmly expected that the law would be left to make the customary division among his widow and his children. But my surprise at finding among his papers, correctly drawn and executed, and dated about a week after the period when the first will had been destroyed, the will which gained his vindictive purpose against his eldest son, and had restored to a married life the professional assistance which I honestly believe he was ashamed to ask for at my hands.

"It is needless to trouble you with the provisions of the will in detail. There were the widow and three surviving children to be provided for. The widow received a life-interest only in a portion of the testator's property. The remaining portion was divided between Andrew and Selina—two-thirds to the brother, one-third to the sister. On the mother's death, the money from which her income had been derived was left to Andrew and Selina, in the same relative proportions as before. The accumulations of saving been first deducted from the sum and paid to Michael as the sole legacy left by the implacable father to his son.

"Speaking in round numbers, the division of property, as settled by the will, was this: To Andrew the mother's death Andrew had seventy thousand pounds; Selina had thirty-five thousand pounds; Michael had twenty thousand. The mother's death Michael had five thousand pounds, to set against Andrew's twenty thousand invested to one hundred thousand, and Selina's inheritance increased to fifty thousand. Do not suppose that I am speaking unnecessarily on this part of the subject. Every word I now speak bears on interests still in existence, and still closely concern Mr. Vanstone's daughters. As we get on from past to present, keep in mind the terrible inequality of Michael's inheritance and his brother's inheritance. The harm done by that inheritance will be, I greatly fear, not over yet.

"Andrew's legal interests, when he heard the news which I had to tell him, was worthy of the open, generous character of the man. But I am not proposed to divide his inheritance with his elder brother. But there was one serious obstacle in the way. A difference from Michael existed between him at my office when he came there, and that letter charged him with the unjustifiable cause of estrangement between his father and his elder brother. The efforts which he had made—though not successful—to heal the feud in the purest and kindest intentions, as I know—so composed the quarrel between the brothers were perverted by the vilest misconstruction to support an accusation of treachery and falsehood which would have driven any man to the rash act. Andrew felt, what I felt, that if these imputations were not withdrawn before the question of his brother took effect the mere fact of their existence would assume in a practical sense the character of a verdict against him. His worst to his brother in the most forbearing terms. The answer received was as severe as words could make it. Michael had inherited his father's temper, and had also inherited his father's qualities: his second letter reiterated the charges contained in the first, and declared that he would only accept the offered division as an act of atonement and restitution on Andrew's part. I next wrote to the mother to see her influence. She was herself aggrieved at being left with nothing more than a life-interest in her husband's property; she added resolutely that Michael and she stigmatized Andrew's proposal as an attempt to bribe her eldest son into withholding the truth against his brother, which that brother knew to be true. After this last rejoinder nothing more could be done. Michael withdrew to the Continent, and his mother followed him there. She lived long enough, and saved money enough out of her income to add considerably at her death to her elder son's five thousand pounds. He had previously still further improved his pecuniary position by an advantageous marriage; and he is now passing the close of his days either in France or Switzerland—as widower with one son. We shall return to him shortly. In the mean time I need only tell you that Andrew and Michael never again met, and never communicated even by writing. To all intents and purposes they were dead to each other from those early days to the present time.

"You can now estimate what Andrew's position was when he left the regiment and returned to England. Possessed of a fortune, he was living in the world, his former destroyed at the fair outset of life; the mother and brother estranged from him; his sister lately married, with interests of her own, and little to be to share. Men of firmer mental caliber might have found refuge from such a situation as this in an absorbing profession. Andrew had no such resource of the effort; all the strength of his character lay in the affections he had wasted. He was alone in the world was that quiet place at home, with wife and children to make his life happy, which he had lost forever. He took back to the mercenous youth drive him on, and cast himself into the lowest dissipations of a London life.

"His friends remonstrated in vain: he was his ruin. A woman's love saved him at the outset of his destruction he had wasted. A woman's pity her harshly—for we had her with her husband in the grave.

"You, who only knew Mrs. Vanstone in later life, when illness and sorrow and secret care had altered and saddened her, can form no adequate idea of her youthful beauty and her charm—her charm she was a girl of seventeen. I was with Andrew when he met her for the first time on a rescue him, for one night at least, from degrading associates and degrading pleasures by persuading him to go with me to the first night of the great City Companies. There they met. I shall not attempt to describe the effect on the moment he saw her. To me, as to him, she was a total stranger. An introduction to her, obtained in the course of the evening, informed him that she was the daughter of one Mr. Blake. He met his discovery next day, when I, his new partners in the dance (unobserved in that crowded hall-room) all through the evening.

"Circumstances separated her from the first. She was unhappy at home. Her family and friends occupied no recognized station in life; they were vulgar, pretentious people, in every way unworthy of her. It was her first ball—it was the first time she had ever met with a man who had the breeding, the manners, and the conversation of a gentleman. Are these excuses for her? I will leave it to her mercy when she asks if we have any human feeling for human weakness, sanity and love!

"The meeting of that night decided their future. When other meetings had followed, when the confidence of her love had responded to his, he took the one course of all others (took it inexcusably and unconsciously) the most fatal and dangerous to them both. His frankness and his sense of honor forbade him to deceive her. He opened his heart to her, told her that his life was a generous, impulsive girl; she had no homestrong enough to plead with her: she was unconsciously tempted by the bad example that appeal to her pity, which, to the eternal honor of women, is the last appeal that a man finds able to resist. She saw, and saw truly, that she alone stood between him and his ruin. The last chance of his restoration to a virtuous life. She accepted and saved him.

"Let not her be misunderstood; let me not be accused of trifling with the serious social question on which my narrative forces me to touch. If wild fancies and passions be no false reasoning—I will only speak theirwith. It is a fact truth that the strongest and purest influences which must have ended in his early death. It is the truth that she restored him to that higher moral condition which is remembered or tenderly—which is remembered so gratefully that, on the day when he was left a widow, his wife, in a morbidly calm its right, and condemn her early fault. I have read my love's handwriting and her tears; the question than mercy may not soften the hard sentence against her—if Christian charity may not find a plea for her error. I can only say and falsify, the suffering and the sacrifice, of her whole life.

"A few words will close this part of a letter time, and to events which have happened within your own experience.

"I need not remind you that the position in which Mr. Vanstone was now placed could lead to but one end—a second union—a clandestine more or less inevitable, of the truth. Attempts were made to keep the hopeless misfortune of his life a secret from the world generally; and, as a matter of course, those attempts failed because the intimate friends of the husband were friends. What might have happened if her relatives had been what is termed 'respectable,' I am not prepared to say. They were a set of people who could (in the common phrase) be conveniently treated with. The only survivor of the family at the present time is a scoundrel calling himself Captain Wragge. When I tell you that he privately extorted the price of his silence from Mrs. Vanstone to the last; and when I add that his conduct presents no extraordinary exception to the conduct, in their lifetime, of the other relatives—you will understand what sort of people I had to deal with in my client's interests, and how their assumed indignation was appeased.

"Having, in the first instance, left England the friend, Mr. Vanstone and Miss Blake remained there afterward for some years. Girl as she was, she faced her position and its necessities without flinching. Having once resolved to sacrifice her life to the man she loved; having quieted her conscience by persuading herself that his marriage was a legal mockery, and that he was 'his wife in the sight of Heaven,' she set herself from the first to accomplish the one foremost purpose of so living with him, in the world's eyes, as to raise the suspicion that she was not his lawful wife. The women are few indeed who can not resolve firmly, scheme patiently, and act promptly, where the dearest interests of their lives are concerned. Mrs. Vanstone—for by that name I must continue, in this name—Mrs. Vanstone had more than the average share of a woman's tenacity and a woman's tact; and she used both, in the circumstances, in those early days, which her husband's less ready capacities left him not to do—to observe cautions to which they were largely indebted for the preservation of their secret in later times.

"Thanks to these safeguards, not a shadow of suspicion followed them when they returned to England. They first took a house in London, merely because they were far removed there from that northern county in which Mr. Vanstone's family connections had been known. On the part of his surviving relatives they had no serious interruptions to dread. He was totally estranged from his mother and his sister. His married sister had been forbidden by her husband to see her. He was a clergyman by his calling, and was therefore not allowed to hold any communication with him from the period when he had fallen into the deplorable way of life which I have described as following his retirement from the army. Other relations he had none. When he and his wife took back to Devonshire their next change of residence was to this house. Neither courting nor avoiding notice: simply hiding in themselves and their children, and in their rural life; unsuspected by the few neighbors who formed that narrow circle of acquaintance to which other than what they seemed—the truth, in their case, as in the cases of many others, remained undiscovered and accident forced it into the light of day.

"If in your close intimacy with them it seems strange that they should never have betravel themselves, let me ask you to consider the circumstances. You will understand the apparent anomaly. Remember that they had been living as husband and wife; to all intents and purposes (except that the marriage service had not been read over them), for fifteen years before you entered the house; and bear in mind at the same time that no event occurred to distract Mr. Vanstone's happiness in the present, to remind him of the past, or to warn him of the future, until the announcement of his wife's death came, a few days before you came from America which you saw placed in his hand. From that day forth—when a post which he abhorred was forced back to his memory—when a future which she had never dared to anticipate was placed within his reach—you will soon perceive, if you have not perceived already, that they both betrayed themselves time after time; and that your observation of all suspicion, and their children's innocence of all suspicion, alone prevented you from discovering the truth.

"The sad story of the past is now as well known to you as to me. I have had hard words to speak. Forgive me. I have spoken them with true sympathy for the living, with true tenderness for the memory of the dead."

He paused, turned his face a little away, and rested his head on his hand in the most unobtrusive manner which was natural to him. Thus far Miss Garth had only interrupted his narrative by an occasional word or by a mute token of her attention. She made no effort to conceal her emotion. She sat with her head over her wasted cheeks as she looked up and spoke to him. "I have done you some injury, Sir, in my thoughts," she said, with a noble simplicity. "I know you better now. Let me ask your forgiveness; and let me say your hand."

Those words and the action which accompanied them touched him deeply. He took her hand in silence. She was the first to speak, the first to set the example of self-control. It is one of the noble characteristics of women that nothing more powerfully rouses them to struggle with their own sorrow than the sight of a man's distress. "Your husband and her tears," she gently drew her chair round the table so as to sit near to him while she spoke again.

"I have been sadly wanting, Mr. Pendril, by what has happened in this house," she said, "or I should have known that the truth was much better than I have borne it to-day. Will you let me ask two questions before you go? Will you trust me when I say that I have no other object than ever my children now. Is there no hope for their future? Are they left with a name to act but poverty before them?"

As he spoke he bowed his head to answered them gently.

"Not on Michael Vanstone?"

"Yes: on Michael Vanstone."

OUR ARMY BEFORE YORKTOWN.

On pages 280 and 281 we publish a series of pictures from OUR ARMY BEFORE YORKTOWN, from sketches by our artists, Messrs. Waud and Crane. Most of these pictures need no explanation, and the less said about the weather the better. But of the skirmish of 16th, at Lee's Mills, in which the gallant Vermont brigade won such glory, we take the following description from the Tribune:

At 6 o'clock Companies E, F, D, and K of the 3d Vermont were detailed as skirmishers, Major Wheelock reporting them with a very accurate flow of shot and shell. The Vermonters moved forward, when they were ordered. Their fire had been very accurate. The rebel Wiggerts, who began dancing on discovering and swinging their hats, and defying our troops in the customary Secession military fashion, was dropped at rapid by the sharp-shooters as to be soon carted of this style of dance. The former occupants of the 3d had done after dinner and thoroughly vexed themselves.

The Vermonters had now become pretty well cooled up, formed into line, and told by their Colonel in a pithy speech that the work was not to be finished as they would have desired, and take the enemy's intrenchments. Across a portion of this batteries, numbering 12 guns, were placed, and command of the center of the line of attack was assigned the Vermonters' advance. They marched steadily at the order to the edge of the creek, and planted in the rear. The water deepened unexpectedly. The men were soon obliged to hold up their cartridge-boxes above their shoulders, and their muskets held up high. The enemy soon discovered the storm in the water, and on the edge of their rifle-pits, and raised a fire of bullets on the advancing line.

The storm, as deemed, was about twelve rods wide. The Vermonters kept on and fired as they waded. They killed and wounded began to fall from the tiniest of our rifles. Some of the men in the front rank were killed outright, and the color-bearer of the center of the brigade across, and laid down on the opposite side. The order was to fire and advance and get foothold, instead of "fall to "Charge!" With a yell, with true Green Mountain pluck, they rushed on. The rebels fought well. Quite a regiment of rebels broke from behind it, and ran into the woods. The Vermonters, leaving the Yorktown Road.

For at least an hour they fought from here against overwhelming numbers, with unflinching resolution. The first of four companies of the 6th Vermont, and afterward the remaining companies of the 6th Vermont. They shot for principally through the head, and as superior use their rifles. The rebels were commanded by Col. Magruder, and had fresh regiments into the fort, and into a ditch in front of the fort. The fight began by the 3d Vermont at 6 o'clock in the morning, and increased fire as the Vermonters, though they waited to stay, had to go. Regiment after regiment of Vermonters followed, filling up the regiment of rebels broke from behind it, and ran into the woods. The Vermonters, leaving the Yorktown Road.

For at least an hour they fought from here against overwhelming numbers, with unflinching resolution. The first of four companies of the 6th Vermont, and afterward the remaining companies of the 6th Vermont. They shot for principally through the head, and as superior use their rifles. The rebels were commanded by Col. Magruder, and had fresh regiments into the fort, and into a ditch in front of the fort. The fight began by the 3d Vermont at 6 o'clock in the morning, and increased fire as the Vermonters, though they waited to stay, had to go. Regiment after regiment of Vermonters followed, filling up the regiment of rebels broke from behind it, and ran into the woods. The Vermonters, leaving the Yorktown Road.

Many were now shot in the water, and drowned beyond all possibility of help. The barrages of a Louisville County Court, as they say, "Why, Sir, I saw a man shot while bolting in their stream—the bullets fell so thick," as to appreciate that fact. Many of the wounded were killed by the brave men having backed out of the deep water, formed a line on the bank, and began the fight again. Others, who were not detailed, but volunteering through impulses of soldierly duty, and the excitement of the hour, joined the ranks, and began to aim and fire at the wounded, who were clinging to the bank and sitting about their heads in the water.

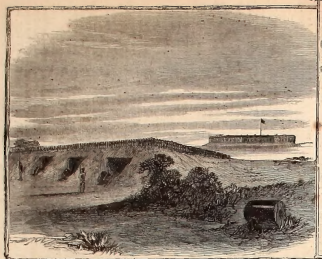
ISLAND NUMBER TEN.

We publish on page 285 a view of ISLAND NUMBER TEN, which was surrendered by the rebels on April 7 to Commodore Foote. We subjoin a letter from a sketch by our artist, Mr. Alexander Simplot. The following account of the place will be read with interest:

Arriving at No. 10 I found more than space will allow me to write about. Large and long guns, mortars, and field batteries, would have commanded the river had it not been for the fact that they were spiked by the rebels before they surrendered, while with rat-tail files, and the Grampus and other small gunboats, we took in the entire defenses of the island and Tennessee shore. Great piles of provisions and ammunition, and all the paraphernalia of war, were left in the batteries, and failed to destroy the effectiveness of all descriptions, with camp paraphernalia, occupied the batteries and all available ground on the Missouri shore of the siege. The lifeless wharf-boat, with the name of Island No. 10 on the roller of its bows, filled with some forty thousand dollars' worth of stores of all kinds, and the Island No. 10 Post Office, with mail-bags busy taking care of the abandoned property, while outside were sentinels with the accoutring bayonets of the United States.

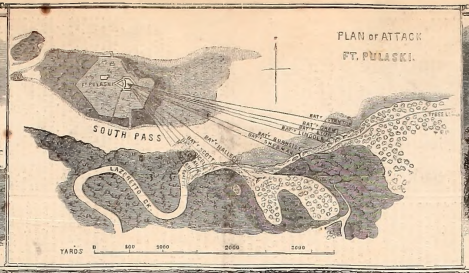
The works upon the island are of less extent than those upon the main land, and, with the exception of the upper battery, are not very strong. The rebels had been confining fine pollutions for long ranges, but rendering their guns useless by the most thorough spiking. The trunnions of the gun-boats resting the trackless, when they lugged their guns around, and spiking the same with the vent-pieces.

No. 1. The walls of this battery are two hundred and fifty yards long, and the parapet twenty feet thick. Within it is divided into four quarters or divisions by three gallery-ways, upon the inside of which are magazines. The outside of the walls are also brought into double requisition as bomb-proofs, and the men sleep in the corridors which were beneath. The armament consists of one eight-inch Columbiad, two ten-inch Columbiads, one rifled gun, one thirty-two, and one ten-inch Columbiad. The three last mentioned were dismounted, and the rifle gun so situated that it could not be worked.

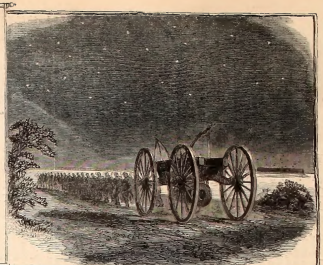


No. 2 is a work seventy-five feet long, with walls of the same thickness as those of battery No. 1. It is divided in the center by a single gallery, which is also used as a bomb-proof. The armament of this work consist in one eight-inch rifled Dahlgren, one thirty-two pounder, and one eight-inch gun.

No. 3 is another angular fortification similar to No. 2, in dual battery. The walls are of the same thickness, and dead fact in extreme length. It is furnished with gallery and bomb-proof, of which dual battery consists. It has two sixty-fours, smooth; one eight-inch rifled Columbiad, one ten-inch Columbiad, and one thirty-two gun. The last gun is exploded. Both of the works are four eighty-two pounders.

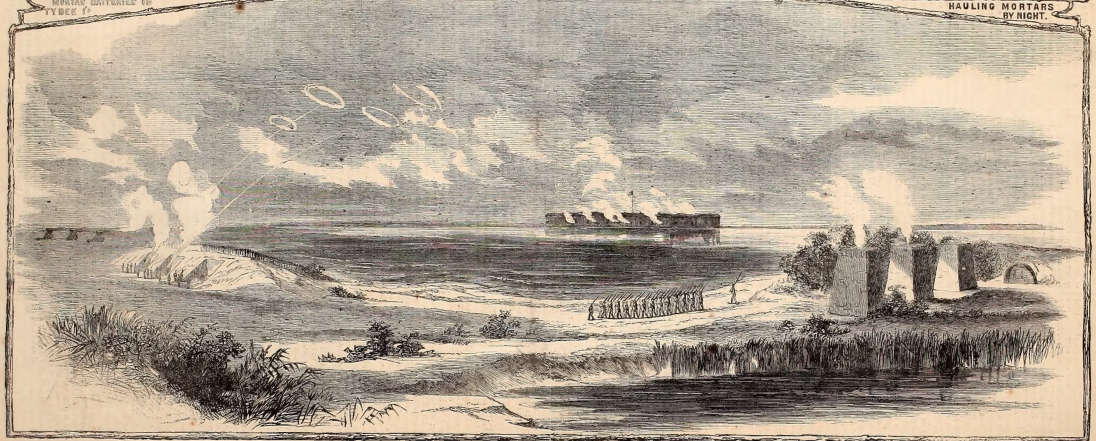


No. 4 is a heavily thrown up work, with a gallery and bomb-proof. It is pentagonal in shape, and mounts but one gun—the ten-inch Columbiad. Another eight-inch gun is in readiness for the embrasure.

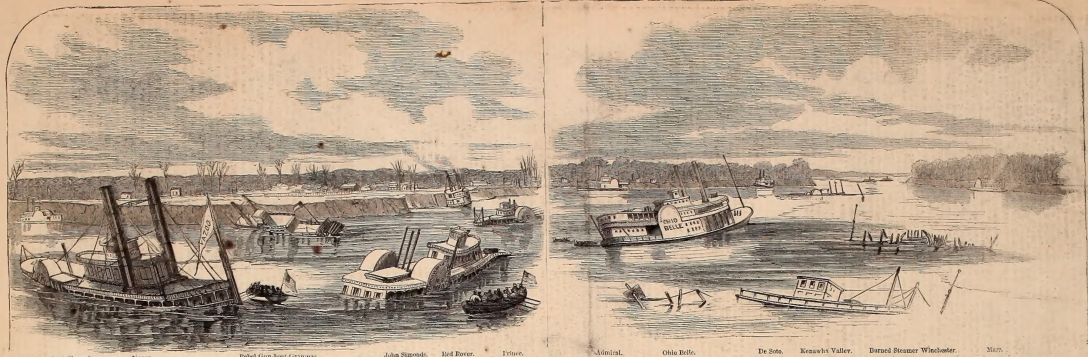


Adjacent to this and the other island batteries are a number of rifle-pits, and the substitution for embrasures of cotton sack in the sandy soil and rocks of over high, and solid cast. Barrows for bunnet habitations are also formed against heavy logs, composed of parted excavations, with a roof of logs and leaf clipping from the ground to the top of the main log. There are other holes and hollows concealed in the banks of the island, and other edifices testify to the terrible fire of shot and shell to which the island was subjected.

On the same page we give a picture—also from a sketch by Mr. Simplot—of the SIEGE OF FORT PULASKI OPPOSITE ISLAND NUMBER TEN. They have since been raised, and are now at Fort Wright, for our camping.



MORTAR BATTERIES ON TYBEE I.



HAULING MORTARS BY NIGHT.

THE BOMBARDMENT AND CAPTURE OF FORT PULASKI, APRIL 11, 1862.—From Sketches by Lieutenant Haas and Others.—[See Page 276.]

VIEW OF STEAMERS SUNK BY THE REBELS BETWEEN ISLAND NUMBER TEN AND NEW MADRID.—Sketched by Mr. A. Simplot.—[See Page 283.]

ISLAND NUMBER TEN AFTER THE SURRENDER.—Sketched by Mr. A. Simplot.—[See Page 283.]

THE BATTLE OF PITTSBURG LANDING.

We have received several sketches of the Battle of Pittsburg Landing from our artist, Mr. H. Mosler, and three of them we reproduce on page 276. One represents the Landing at Pittsburg—a scene, as Mr. Mosler says, of unmitigated mud. Up the steep banks of the bluff here the troops of Buell's army toiled to join Grant, dragging their artillery with them; and down these bluffs, sad to state, the cowards in the raw regiments fled to seek shelter from shot and shell. Another picture shows us Shiloh Meeting-House, which was in front of General Sherman's division. The battle here raged with great fury, and at one time the wounded and dying of both armies sought refuge in the building. It is from this house that many propose to call the fight the battle of Shiloh. A third picture shows us General Buell's Army crossing Duck River at Columbia, Tennessee, on their way to join General Grant. The infantry crossed over a pontoon bridge; the cavalry and artillery forded the river, while the baggage crossed the great bridge. Columbia is a pretty little village of 3000 inhabitants.

On page 273 we publish a group of portraits of The Heroes of the Battle of Pittsburg Landing. The following sketches of the lives of the men will be read with interest:

MAJOR-GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT.

Major-General Ulysses S. Grant was born at Point Pleasant, Clairmont County, Ohio, April 27, 1822, and entered West Point Military Academy from Ohio in 1839, where he graduated with honors in 1843, and was attached as Brevet Second Lieutenant to the Fourth infantry. He was promoted Second Lieutenant at Corpus Christi in September, 1845, and served as such through Mexico, under General Taylor at Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, and Monterey; and under General Scott from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, and was twice promoted for his bravery. He was regimental quarter-master from April 1, 1847, and when he resigned the service on the 31st of July, 1854, he was a full Captain in the Fourth infantry of regulars. After his resignation he settled in St. Louis County, Missouri, and moved from there to Galena, Illinois, in 1860. Upon the breaking out of the present war he offered his services to Governor Yates, and was appointed Colonel of the Twenty-first regiment of Illinois Volunteers, and served with his regiment until promoted a Brigadier-General, with commission and rank from the 17th of May, 1861. He was engaged as Colonel and Acting Brigadier-General in several of the contests in Southeastern Missouri, and his course as commander of the Southeast district of Missouri has been thoroughly scrutinized; and among his most praiseworthy acts was the occupation of Paducah and stoppage of communication and supplies to the rebels via the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers. The manner in which he conducted the battle of Belmont is still fresh in our readers' minds. The rest of his course, as commander there, is too well known to be repeated here, and certain it is that his action in every instance has been applauded both by his superior officers and the people. After the capture of Fort Henry a new district was created, under the denomination of the District of West Tennessee, and General Grant was assigned by General Halleck to the command of it. He was in command of the Union forces at Fort Donelson, and his noted correspondence with General Buckner gained him the sobriquet of Unconditional Surrender Grant, answering to his initials of U. S. Grant. For the success of that action he was created a Major-General; but being unavoidably absent from the field during the earlier portion of the fight, it was reported that he was temporarily deprived of his command until the matter could be investigated. After a few days he was, however, again ordered into the field, and took the command of our forces at Pittsburg Landing. From the accounts of correspondents it does not seem that he showed much generalship, though his gallantry on the Monday undoubtedly contributed to the success of the day, and will preserve his fame among the people.

MAJOR-GENERAL D. C. BUELL.

General Buell is a native of Ohio, in which State he was born about the year 1818. He graduated at the Military Academy at West Point in 1837, and served as Second Lieutenant in the Third Infantry. He obtained the rank of First Lieutenant in June, 1846, and accompanied his regiment to Mexico. In September of the same year he was brevetted Captain for gallant and meritorious conduct at Monterey. He accompanied General Scott's army, and again distinguished himself at Cerro Gordo, Contreras, and Churubusco; was severely wounded at the latter fight, and brevetted Major for gallantry there. On his return home he was appointed Assistant Adjutant-General, and served in that capacity in various parts of the country. On the outbreak of the war Major Buell was active in organizing the army at Washington. On General M'Clellan's appointment to the chief command he placed General Buell in command of a division, which soon became so perfect in discipline and drill as to elicit general remark. Soon afterward it was deemed best to supersede General Sherman in the command of the army in Kentucky, and General Buell was appointed in his stead. He spent the winter in organizing his troops, and in February proceeded to move. The battle of Mill Spring and the occupation of Bowling Green were the first exploits of his troops. He occupied Nashville after the fall of Donelson, and then moved southward through Tennessee. Three of his divisions arrived at Pittsburg Landing in time to save General Grant's army.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN A. M'CLERNAND.

Major-General John A. M'Clernand is not a soldier by trade, but is best known to the country as a Democratic politician from Illinois. He was a leader of the Douglas Democrats, and did battle for them valiantly at Charleston. At the outbreak of the war he took sides manfully for the Union, and shortly afterward was nominated a Brigadier-General of Volunteers. In the Belmont fight he manifested that he possessed very good military capacity, and during his administration of military affairs at Cairo he secured the good-will of the men under his command. In the reconnoissance in the rear of Columbus, during the advance upon Fort Henry, and at the grand battle before Fort Donelson, General M'Clernand manifested superior military ability. For his gallantry on these occasions he was, on the 21st of March, made by Congress a Major-General of Volunteers, and accompanied the advance up the Tennessee River toward Savannah. At the battle at Pittsburg Landing he distinguished himself exceedingly.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL W. H. L. WALLACE.

This gallant soldier, who fell at the battle of Pittsburg Landing, was a lawyer by trade, and a resident of Ottawa, Illinois. He first saw service in the Mexican War, in which he enlisted as a private in 1846, carrying a musket in Company I, First Regiment Illinois Volunteers, led by the lamented Hardin. A Lieutenancy and Adjutancy followed, and General Wallace was by his Colonel's side when he fell. At the outbreak of the present war he was elected Colonel of the Eleventh Illinois. For months he was Acting Brigadier and Commandant at Bird's Point, and he received his appointment and confirmation to Brigade command for gallantry at Donelson. At Pittsburg he commanded a division. He was shot on the Sunday, the ball entering below his ear and passing through his head. He was left where he fell till Monday, when he was found still living, but died shortly afterward. He has three brothers and a father-in-law in service in this war, the latter Colonel T. Lyle Dickey, of the Fourth Illinois Cavalry, his law-partner, and now attached to General Wallace's division.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL B. M. PRENTISS.

General Prentiss, who was taken prisoner at Pittsburg Landing, is an old soldier of the Mexican War. When that war broke out he volunteered as a lieutenant of the Illinois troops, and was selected by the unfortunate J. J. Hardin to act as his Adjutant. By Harden's side he fought in every battle until that gallant chieftain fell, and with his own hands he helped to dress his corpse for the last rites of humanity. During that entire campaign he was the most intimate companion of that lamented officer, and the sash which he wears now at the head of his regiment is the one which Hardin wore on that last fatal field. He is an able officer, and very popular with his men. He was a candidate for Congress in the Fifth Illinois district last year, but the Democratic majority was too much for him. At the commencement of the rebellion he stepped forth at the head of the first regiment of Illinois volunteers who volunteered for three months. The regiment was numerically known as the Tenth Illinois Volunteers, and as the Colonel was the senior officer of all the troops who occupied the dépôt at Cairo, he became Acting Brigadier-General and Commander of the post. He afterward had the full rank awarded to him, dating from May 17, 1861. His regiment re-enlisted for the war en masse, under Colonel Morgan. He has been engaged during the war in various parts of the State of Missouri, more recently on the Kansas border, from which post he proceeded to join the army up the Tennessee River.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL W. T. SHERMAN.

General Sherman is a native of Ohio, brother of Senator John Sherman. He graduated at West Point in 1840, standing No. 6 in his class, in which were Generals Van Vleit, George H. Thomas, and others of the Union army, and General M'Cown, of the rebels, recently a commander at Island No. 10. On the 1st of July, 1840, he was promoted to a Second Lieutenancy of the Third Artillery, and on the 30th of November, 1841, was further promoted to a First Lieutenancy. He was acting as Assistant Adjutant-General in the Tenth Military Department in 1847, and was brevetted Captain for meritorious services in California during the war with Mexico. His brevet was awarded in March, 1851, and dated from May 30, 1848. He was next appointed Commissary of Subsistence, with rank of Captain, dating from September, 1850. He resigned the service on the 6th of September, 1853. On the 17th of May, 1861, he was appointed a Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and when General Anderson requested to be relieved was appointed to the command of the army in Kentucky. He was subsequently superseded by General Buell, and removed to the command of the force at Sedalia. After a short time he was again removed and placed on the non-active list. General Halleck has since recalled him into active life and ordered him to join General Grant.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL NELSON.

General Nelson is a native of Kentucky and about forty years of age. He entered the United States Navy at manhood and served twelve years at sea. When the rebellion broke out he offered his services to Government, and was detailed to command the Ohio River fleet of gunboats. His extensive acquaintance with the people of Kentucky, and his large relationship in that State, pointed to him as a proper person, during the bad health of General Anderson, to be sent into Kentucky to sound the loyal sentiment of that State, and to strengthen it. Accordingly, as early as April, he went thither and began the formation of a camp and the recruiting of troops at a point between Garrardsville and Danville, since known as "Camp Dick Robinson." Some time afterward, Colonel George H. Thomas, of the Second cavalry, proceeded thither, having received the appointment of Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and assumed the command. General Nelson was then ordered to form a camp at Washington, Mason County, Kentucky, for the enlistment of troops. To fine natural abilities and large experience in arms he adds great energy of character and fine judgment of men. He it was who ordered the arrest of Stanton, Casto, & Co., though they were old friends and companions. He does not recognize any relationships in life when duty demands their prostration or sacrifice. His brother, Thomas Nelson, of Indiana, is our present Minister to Chili, and his brother-in-law, J. Monroe Stockton, Postmaster at Maysville.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL THOMAS L. CRITTENDEN.

General Crittenden is a native of Kentucky, and a son of John J. Crittenden. His brother George is a rebel, and commanded the rebel force at Mill Spring. When the rebels took up arms in Kentucky, General T. L. Crittenden was empowered to take command, and at the head of the Home Guard started for Muldraugh's Hill and effectively checked the advance of the rebels on Louisville. Since that time he has been actively engaged in the field under General Buell. His commission of Brigadier-General dates from September 27, 1861.

ACTING BRIGADIER-GENERAL T. W. SWEENY.

Colonel Sweeny, who was wounded at the battle of Pittsburg Landing, and distinguished himself, is an Irishman by birth, but came to this country when a child. He was bred a printer, but volunteered when the Mexican war broke out, and was chosen Second Lieutenant in Burnett's regiment. He was at the storming of Vera Cruz, and was with the army up to the City of Mexico. He was twice wounded in the battle of Churubusco—once so severely that he had to lose his right arm. On Colonel Sweeny's return to this city in March, 1848, he received the commission of Second Lieutenant in the Second Regiment of United States infantry, and was soon afterward ordered to California, where he performed many arduous duties. From California, he, with a portion of his regiment, was ordered to Fort Pierre, in Northern Nebraska, where he served as aid to General Harney. In June, 1851, he was promoted to a First Lieutenancy. At the commencement of the rebellion Colonel Sweeny, who was then a Captain of the Second United States infantry, having obtained that rank on the 19th of January 1861, was ordered to Newport barracks, and soon afterward to the command of the St. Louis Arsenal, previous to General Lyon taking the command. He was also second in command at the surrender of the notorious rebel Claib. Jackson, and was afterward appointed Colonel and acting Brigadier-General of the three months' Missouri volunteers. Previous to the battle of Wilson's Creek, where it was decided not to attack the rebel General Price, General Sweeny was so impressed that a retreat would be worse than a defeat that he prevailed on General Lyon to make the attack. In that battle he was again wounded, and still carries the ball in his limb.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL M'DOWELL M'COOK.

General M'Cook, who distinguished himself at Pittsburg, comes of the fighting family of M'Cooks of Columbiana County, Ohio. He was born April 22, 1831; was appointed to West Point in 1848, and graduated in 1852. He was appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant in the Third Infantry, and ordered to the Department of New Mexico. He took an active part in all the prominent Indian campaigns in that department up to February, 1858, when he was ordered to West Point, where he served as principal assistant-instructor in infantry tactics, and also in the art of war, until the fall of Sumter. He then applied for permission to take the field, and was ordered to his native State to muster in volunteers for the three months' service. On his thirtieth birthday he was elected and commissioned Colonel of the First Ohio Volunteers. He commanded this regiment at the battle of Bull Run, where it formed part of Schenck's Brigade. He returned to Ohio with the regiment, mustered it out of the service, and recruited it again at Dayton, Ohio. He was appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers September 3, 1861, and ordered to the Department of the Cumberland. He has since commanded a division under Buell, and arrived at Pittsburg in time to be of great service.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU.

General Rousseau, who is reported for gallantry at Pittsburg, is a Kentuckian, of Huguenot descent. His father died when he was young, leaving him to educate himself. In 1840 he removed near Louisville, and began the study of law without an instructor. Subsequently he settled in Indiana, where he was elected successively to the State Legislature and Senate. He commanded a company in the Mexican war, and fought gallantly at the battle of Buena Vista. In 1849 he returned to Louisville, and rose rapidly to distinction at a bar rich in ability. He was a member of the Kentucky State Senate at the time our present national troubles began, and immediately took a bold and decided stand in favor of the Government. In June, 1861, he resigned his seat in the Senate, and applied for a commission to raise volunteers. Against the remonstrances and determined opposition of nearly all the prominent men of Kentucky, he succeeded in raising two splendid regiments, composed entirely of Kentuckians, called the Louisville Legion. It was those troops, aided by a battalion of Home Guards from Louisville, that saved that city from falling into the hands of the rebels. General Rousseau was soon promoted to be Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and has since served under Buell.

THE GHOST-DEAD-BELL.

"It is now over two years since I was quartered with my regiment in Vienna. Among the acquaintances which I formed there was a young nobleman who was in the Imperial Guard, the Baron Von Steingraff. He was the sole descendant of an ancient Styrian family, that had lived for centuries in an old castle not far from Saltzburg. A finer-hearted fellow could not be found in his Imperial Majesty's dominions, nor a better soldier in his army than Friederich. Frank and gay as a companion, he was a favorite with his own sex; and a good figure, to say nothing of a good property, made him not unacceptable with old mammas and young daughters. Friederich, however, seemed to be no marrying man, though he had nothing misogynistic in his nature. When our intimacy had grown into friendship, I happened to banter him upon the subject of matrimony, naming a young lady who was evidently not unfavorably disposed to him. But Friederich assured me gravely that he had resolved never to marry. 'Not,' said he, 'that I have any disinclination to the state, but that I have long felt the conviction that fate had forbidden me to enter into it.'

"Then he told me how, when a child, a Zigeunerinn, or gipsy woman from Bohemia, had met him in the wood near the Schloss, and looked into his hand, and said to him, 'Ach! jung Herr, when you go to marry a wife take heed. The way to God's altar lies through God's acre!'

"'Well,' said I, 'that was a safe prophecy. A man can not well get to the church door till he walks through the church-yard.'

"'Oh,' he replied, 'that was not the woman's meaning. If she spoke true, either I or she, whom I would make my wife, should not live for the bridal day. At all events the belief has so grown with my growth that I can not now reject it. And so I will never endanger my own life or that of one whom I could love well enough to marry. And now, my dear friend, let us never speak on this subject again.'

"Of course we never did; and the matter was soon entirely forgotten by me.

"A year passed by, and I was far away in the north of Germany, when I got a letter from the Baron Von Steingraff. It announced that he had proposed for a young lady in his own country, was accepted, and would shortly be married. 'My destiny,' he continued, 'whatever it be, I must work out; and I could not resist the attractions of my little Roeschen. So come to me as soon as you can. Who knows but your interpretation of the gipsy's prophecy may be the true one?'

"I laughed heartily as I closed the letter. The old story—old as Adam. Woman's tongue has overcome man's resolve. Pretty young Roeschen has beaten the withered old gipsy out of the field; and so saying I prepared for my journey, and was en route the following morning.

"The close of a lovely autumn day found me on the road between Salzburg and St. Gilgen, where it skirts the picturesque little lake of Mondsee, so snugly embosomed in precipitous hills clothed with the pine and the larch. Not far from this stood the Schloss of my friend, built close to the ruins of a suppressed monastery, and pleasantly sheltered by the dark forest upon which the evening sun was now glinting. Thither I worked my way, rather slowly, for the approach was steep and circuitous, so that by the time I stood at the heavy door-way the sun had set and the large mass of building was lying in gloom. My visit did not seem to be expected, for I had to knock many times and loudly upon the thick oaken portal before any one came to my summons. At last the door was opened by a man who looked more like a holzknecht or woodsman of the district than a servitor of a well-ordered establishment. He had a lamp in his hand, and appeared flurried. I stated who I was, and desired him to conduct me to his master. To this he made no reply, but shaking his head, motioned me to follow him. We crossed the great hall and entered a small chamber, where the man set down the light and disappeared. 'A strange welcome,' thought I, 'from an intended bridegroom for his best man;' and I looked around me. The room was comfortably furnished: there were cases well filled with books; guns, rods, spears, and hunting gear were hanging from the wall, and an escritoire stood near the fire-place; but no cheerful fire was glowing there—a few half burned pine logs lay upon the iron dogs on the hearth. When I had completed my survey an old serving man entered, and a few words solved the mystery. The day his master had written to me he was suddenly seized with illness, and he was now in the eighth day struggling with fever, and was delirious. The doctor of the neighboring town of St. Gilgen, who was in attendance, had just left him for a short time, declaring that the case was almost hopeless, but that the crisis, which would occur that night, would determine his fate.

"I need not say how this intelligence shocked me. I desired to be shown to the chamber of my poor friend, and announced that I would wait the issue whatever it might be. Messieurs, it is a trying thing to stand beside one whom you last saw in health and strength of mind and body, and to witness a poor shattered being, with flushed face, a burning lip, and a glazed eye, tossing and raving; whose hand does not return your clasp, whose ear does not recognize your words of love, whose eye looks vacantly upon you. I sat down overwhelmed with emotion. From time to time, through his wild raving, I could distinguish words which told how the bewildered spirit wrestled, as it were, with the horrible phantoms of his disordered brain; with what appalling incongruity did he mingle the scenes of the charnel vault and the bridal chamber, now calling on his bride to wrap her grave-clothes around her, and in a moment after, with a wild laugh, bidding the sexton to pledge him in a skull of wine. But I must not dwell on this painful subject. When I returned to the small apartment I had first entered I found all necessary arrangements made for my comfort, but I determined to watch through the night which was to decide all. I felt, however, too nervous and agitated to remain alone, so I entreated the old butler to bear me company. By degrees we became quite familiar. The doctor had returned and sat by the bedside of his patient, who was gradually growing tranquil and lethargic. It wanted now more than an hour of midnight; old Klaus threw a fresh log on the fire, and filled my glass from the flask of Hungarian wine that he had placed beside me. I could do no less than return the compliment; and as the good old soul drank it sorrowfully to the recovery of his master the tear stood in his eye, and he fairly sobbed aloud. I spoke a word of comfort to the poor fellow.

"'Alas! Herr Kauptmann,' said he, 'my mind misgives me sadly. I am afraid every moment that I shall hear the Geistertodenglocke—God protect us!'

"'The Geistertodenglocke?' I asked, 'what is that, Klaus?'

"'Ach! Herr Kauptmann, what an old fool I am. I forgot you could know nothing about it.'

"A little pressing got it all out; for grief with men of his class is talkative.

"'I suppose, Sir,' said he, beginning his story, 'that you observed the old monastery near the castle as you came up this evening.'

"'I did, Klaus, a fine old ruin, with the bell-tower.'

"'Ay, a ruin now, Sir; but it was once a grand and a holy place, with its lord, abbot, and monks, and broad, rich lands. Well, Sir, a long time ago—I don't know how many hundred years since—the Baron Steingraff of that day—he lived then in the old castle higher up the hills above the Krötensee—had a quarrel with the abbot. The Baron was a fierce and a haughty man, that cared little about church or priest, and the abbot was as haughty in his own way, so the feud grew deadlier every day. At last the abbot swore on the holy relics of St. Wolfgang that he would excommunicate the Baron; and the Baron swore upon the cross of his sword-hilt that he would tear the frock off the abbot's back, and drive him and his monks out of the monastery. The abbot was as good as his word; and so, upon the feast of the blessed St. Wolfgang, he and all his monks walked in procession through the church up to the high altar, and the great book was opened and the anathemas read, and then the bell was tolled, and the lighting candles were extinguished, and so the Baron was excommunicated. Well, the bell was still tolling, and the priests were on their way back down the aisle when the shouts of the Baron and his wild men-at-arms, and jägers, and holzknechts rang at the walls, and sledges and great pine beams were battering at the gate. Short work they made of it. One mad fellow seized a splinter of pine-wood, and he lit it at the altar, and then he fired the panels and the roof, and the dry wood was all soon in a blaze. The Baron, as if possessed by an evil spirit, seized the bell-rope and rung out a wild peal of triumph; but the abbot walked up to him, dressed in all his robes, and holding up his hands, cursed him in the name of the Blessed Trinity, and he said—"As the spirit of the Evil one peals that bell now by your hands, so shall he peal it when the soul passes from the body of you, and of your son, and of your son's son, in sæcula sæculorum, Amen!" So saying, the abbot called all his monks, and they went their way down to the lake of Aber; and they built a new monastery where the church of St. Wolfgang now stands. The Baron seized the monastery lands and held them too, for might was right in those days, and built the present castle hard by the ruins of the monastery, lest the abbot and his retainers should rally and seek to regain their old possessions. But they never did, for the abbot was not overloved in the country, besides the Baron was too powerful to be lightly meddled with.

"'Time passed on, and the Baron had well-nigh forgotten that abbot or monk had ever dwelt within the old blackened walls. One wild winter's night the Baron sat with his retainers in the great hall drinking and reveling, as was their wont. The wind howled in gusts fitfully, and in the pauses a loud knocking was heard at the oaken door, the very door by which you entered this evening, Herr Kauptmann. The Thurhüter, when he opened the door, saw no one, though the moon was that moment shining through the drift of the clouds, but he felt a cold blast sweep across his face. So he shut the door again, and thought it must have been the storm that had deceived him. The next moment those in the hall saw a monk in a black habit, with his cowl drawn over his head, enter and walk up to where the Baron was sitting. Then the monk threw back his hood, and an old withered face, ghastly pale, but stern and fierce, gazed on the Baron.

"'Tausend sakerment!' shouted the Baron, starting up in a rage; 'dog of an abbot what brings you here? Trundle out the shaveling, and set the hounds upon him.'

"'The abbot raised his skinny arm, and said in a hollow and solemn voice, "This night twenty years you and I met last. I am on my way to the abbey, follow me."

"'The abbot retired as he came, no one daring to hinder him.

"'Zum henker! to the hangman with him,' cried the Baron, choking with rage, and springing after him. That moment the old bell pealed out with a wild clang from the tower. The Baron in his haste tripped over a stool and fell to the ground. When they lifted him up he was dead. 'Twas said he died of a fit. Maybe so. But that very night one of the holzknechts returning to the village from the Rivers up in the hills where he had been working, declared that as he passed the tree he heard the old bell pealing, and saw a procession of monks following a tier, and disappearing within the ruins. Next morning tidings came that the old abbot had died the day before at St. Wolfgang's, but where or when he was buried nobody yet knew."

"Old Klaus passed to take breath.

"A strange, wild story," I remarked, as I filled his glass. "Has the ghost-bell been ever heard since that time, Klaus?"

"I heard my father say, when I was a little boy, that no lord of Steingraff ever died at home here that the Geisterglocke[n]e was not heard tolling as his soul passed from his body."

"Pray tell us your own, if you remember, Klaus? You must remember when the old lord died?"

"I'll be sure I do. 'Tis now over twenty years; but he died at Vienna, where he was in attendance upon the Emperor Franz. If he had died at home I should have heard the bell, I suppose."

"This strange tale affected me more than I cared to acknowledge. I am not naturally credulous, but the shock I had received, added to the excitement of a journey of several days, had, I suppose, somewhat shaken my nerves. I woke up once more to the sick-room. Friederich still slept heavily. To my inquiry the physician answered with a shake of his head.

"'Tis the sleep, I fear, that will wake in death, an hour will decide; but be prepared for the worst.'

"I returned to the chamber, but could not soon very sadly. The thought of the young girl whose cup of happiness was all but brimming over to be dashed from her hand, came upon me. Then I questioned old Klaus, and learned that she was all but her own confidante. Before his master she had entreated to be permitted to attend upon him, but her request was denied; and Friederich himself was constantly transmitted to her of the state of the young Baron.

"'Ah, Herr Hauptmann,' said Klaus, 'should my lord not recover, I fear it will go hard with the young lady. There will be two to mourn where there are fateful, and how noble masters will come to an end, for each is an only child.'

"Our conversation gradually flagged, in spite of our efforts to keep it alive. The dark, still, solemn night deepened around us. There was not a sound to be heard, when or without, save the ticking of the clock in the great hall. How sharply every beat smote upon the ear, and how slowly ran, as it seemed, the life of one whose existence was now measured by minutes, not hours, or days, or years. How slowly and painfully the moments dr'ibt sad night were on. I shall never forget it, were I to live through a hundred years. The fire in the Klaus at last dozed off in his chair. The suspense became intolerable. I rose and paced the room. A book lay open upon the table, but no one had been reading it recently. I took it up: it was the Bible; and I read the fourteenth verse of the fourth chapter of the Epistle of St. James: 'Die ist nicht wisst was morgen sein wird. Denn was ist eur Leben? Ein Dampf ist es, der eine Kleine Zeitwährt, darnach aber verschwindet er.' Then I felt, indeed, both the uncertainty and the transitoriness of life. That I knew not what shall be on the morrow. That life is as a vapor that appeareth for a little time, and presently away. I laid down the book. The clock struck, ringing out upon the silence, and I counted the strokes—one, two—up to twelve. Hours all over Europe again. The night were past; what shall the morrow bring forth? What shall tell?

"'Lord have mercy upon us,' cried old Klaus, waking from his sleep; 'Die Geisterglocken-stones!'

"A clang of a bell smote upon my ear, wild, full, and irregular, not as human hand can ring it; nor loud and quick the peals, now faint and slow. I rushed from the room, and in a moment was in the Baron's chamber. He was sitting upright on the bedside; his hand was on the patient's heart. I read all in his face. 'It is all over,' said he; 'he is dead.'"

The narrator ceased speaking, and covered his eyes with his hands, as if overcome by his feelings.

"Ah! how sad and how strange. And what became, pray, of the poor young lady?" asked our host; "did she die?"

"By no means," answered the other, "she married before the year was out."

"Peste [illegible] a heartless jade," cried our host, indignantly.

"Pardon, Monsieur," returned the story-teller, gravely. "There never was a truer heart than little Roschen's; I had the pleasure of being at her wedding."

"What! and your friend the Baron not cold in his grave?"

"I should think not. On the contrary, he was present on the occasion, and any thing but cold. Monsieur will please to explain. It turned out that the Baron was not dead, but in a trance, which lasted for many hours. When he awoke the fever had passed away. He recovered in due time, and led his little Roschen to the altar, walking through the church-yard to the church door, and so fulfilling the gipsy's prophecy."

"Well, but the Geisterglocke. How do you account for that?" asked our host.

"Oh! nothing easier. You must know that the bell in the tower was used on ordinary occasions to summon the serfs and retainers to work and to meals. It happened that a messenger to the bell had been broken a few days before I arrived, and was mended by a rope of twisted hay. The door of the tower had been left open on the night of my vigil, and it so chanced that a cow strayed in and commenced to eat the hay rope, and by her efforts set the bell tolling—that's all."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Cruising for Tobacco cured. Send 36 one-cent stamps. O. SPOTSWOOD, 119 Spring Street, N. Y. city.

You must Notice,

That the name of the firm of W. Forsyth & Co. is changed to J. H. Winkle & Co., Mr. Forsyth having retired. Business continued the same, and all Certificates with the name of W. Forsyth & Co. attached are good, and will be redeemed by us when, with the same promptness and faithfulness as heretofore, we thank our customers for 100,000

WATCHES, CHRONOMETERS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

Splendid List!!

Of Articles to be Sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....$100.00 each
100 " " " " .....60.00 each
100 Ladies' Gold Watches.....50.00 each
500 Ladies and Gentlemen's Watches.....25.00 each
3000 Gold and Silver Watches.....5.00 to 10.00 each
3000 Gold Bust Bracelets.....5.00 to 10.00 each
3000 " Pins.....5.00 to 8.00 each
3000 Cameo Brooches.....5.00 to 8.00 each
3000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches.....4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.....4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Ear Drops.....4.00 to 8.00 each
3000 Gold Lockets.....4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Watch Keys.....5.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Fob and Ribbon Slides.....5.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Sets of Bosom Studs.....5.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Sleeve Buttons.....5.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Plain Rings.....2.50 to 6.00 each
3000 Garnet Set Rings.....2.50 to 6.00 each
3000 Jet Bracelets.....2.50 to 6.00 each
3000 Seal Ladies' Jewelry.....5.00 to 10.00 each
3000 Gold Pens, in Cases and Ward, 4.00 to 6.00 each
(with Silver Mounted Holders.)

All of the above Articles of Jewelry will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one may have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, as we receive the money, at the chance. On receipt of the Certificate you will see what it is worth, and then send us One Dollar and receive the article and one dollar and take the article or not.

We shall transmit to you, by mail, on receipt of forwarding the Certificate, paying postage, and doing the business, the article named in the Certificate, corresponding Certificate to be sent for. Five Certificates for $5, and one hundred for $15. Twenty Certificates for $10, and one hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Any person who wishes to act as Agent, to obtain orders or remit certificates ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to at least $20, can receive a dozen Certificates for every Certificate and remit 15 cents to us, either in money or postage stamps, and the same will be sent to every one of the dozen Certificates in regard to giving their correct address, town, county, and State, and nearest express office.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
P. O. Box 5,040. 27 Park Row, N. Y.

N. B. We wish it distinctly understood that all articles of jewelry are of the best quality, and satisfaction can be returned and the money will be refunded.

AGENTS!
Send for Circulars and Terms, free.
PRIZE STATIONERY PACKETS.
PRIZE LOCKETS, FOR THE MILLION.
UNION STATIONERY AND PORTRAIT PACKETS.
PRIZE GOLD PENS, IN SILVER CASES, WARD.
EXCELSIOR STATIONERY PACKETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR LOCKETS AND STATIONERY AND PRIZE PACKAGES of every description. Circulars free.
J. HUTCHISON & CO.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

The Six, or Navy Size, carries a Ball weighing 38 to the lb., and the Five, a Ball 50 to the lb. Ball fit by recoil experiments made in the Army, these Revolvers are pronounced the best and most effective weapons in use. Also,

Ballard's Patent Breech-Loading Rifle.

This arm is entirely new, and is universally acknowledged to be the nearest to perfection of any Breech-Loading Rifle ever made. Length of barrel 24 inches; weight 8 lbs. Sizes of Calibre adapted to Nos. 22, 32, and 44 rim-fire metallic Cartridges. For further particulars call or send for a Circular to

MERWIN & BRAY, Sole Agents,
No. 240 Broadway, N. Y.

Parlor Ornaments.

Elegant staid plants, pots and colored, engravings, $3&50. "The Home Pair," "A Court of Death," "Cruikshank," and 100 other Kinds, mailed free. Send for Catalogue, including a Gift of Jewelry worth from 25c to $100. Catalogue sent free. Address Bullock & Crenshaw.

For Sale or to Let.

The premises Nos. 909 and 911 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, formerly occupied by Messrs. L. J. Levy & Company. For Terms, &c.,
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS,
New York.

F. Derby & Company,

TAILORS and DRAPERS, have just returned from abroad with a full and fine assortment of CLOTHS, SILKS, and VESTINGS, which they are selling by the piece or by their usual well known style of excellence, at POPULAR PRICES.

No. 57 Walker Street, New York.

WATCHES.

10,000 for sale, at Wholesale prices. Enclose stamp for descriptive Circular. J. L. Ferguson, No. 208 Broadway.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Oregenut will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face, even when all else has failed. Price $1—sent free by mail to any address, on receipt of an order by mail, postage paid. H. L. GRAHAM, No. 169 Nassau Street, N. Y. city.

"MOUSTACHES and WHISKERS in 21 days."—Do not buy "Onguents" at $1 or $2, but send 20c. for a BOOK with this GREAT SECRET and many others. Address DR. LYON, Box 4,632, New York. Mailed free on receipt of 3 dimes; 6 for 50; 13 for $1. C. HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON 259
WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire.
RAILINGS, BALUSTRADES, BALCONIES, GUARDS, &c., for CEMETERIES, every description. Plans, Elevations and Catalogues mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM,
199 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

Statement of the Condition
OF THE
U. S. BRANCH
OF THE
Unity Fire Insurance Company,
AT NEW YORK,
JANUARY 1st, 1862.

Assets.

United States, 6 per cent. Stock, $ 19,250 00
New York State, 5 and 6 per cent.
Stock.....115,000 00
New York City, 6 per cent. Stock.....60,000 00
Cash loaned on Collateral.....50 00
" in hand and in Bank.....10,840 78
Premium Notes.....4,000 00
All other investments.....54,401 36
Premiums in course.....694 17
Interest accrued.....215 00
	$256,452 29

Liabilities.

Losses ascertained and unpaid.....3,054 20
All other claims.....1,498 94	4,461 14
Net Assets.	$252,021 08

 Notes, payable, forms statement shows the condition of the United States Branch alone. The total available Assets of the Company, including its English Securities, amount to $4,793,622;

and this is entirely independent of the Life Business, which is a totally distinct Company.

GEORGE ADLARD,
MANAGER.
No 55 WALL ST., New York.

RHEUMATISM.—ALL THOSE AFflicted with Rheumatism, Gout, Sciatica, Chilblains, &c., read Dr. Donaldson Flint, and his Arsenic Liniment, 25 cents, 50 cents, and $1 per bottle. Sold by all druggists. Medical Journals, will find immediate and permanent relief from pain, never having yet failed in hundreds of cases. Office 423 Broadway. Agent for Philadelphia, J. S. SANSOM, 1010 Chestnut Avenue. Send for a Circular.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All Articles for soldiers in Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS. Office, 110 Broadway, Corner Liberty street.

The Best Souvenir of the War!
On the 25th April will appear a New Monthly Serial,

Ballads of the War.

A Series of PICTORIAL LYRICS, from the well-known

MR. A. J. H. DUGANNE,

Magnificently illustrated from Original drawings, by the best artists, and printed in Independence Square, Philadelphia. A Part will appear every month, including among other Subjects,

The Fall of Sumter, Fort Donelson, Hampton Roads, Death of Lyon, Pea Ridge, Pittsburgh Landing, Port Royal, Ironsides, &c., &c., &c.
The whole forming an

Illustrated Poetical Souvenir

of every event in the present most Eventful Struggle in the history of this Great Nation.

Part 1, entitled, THE MARCH TO THE CAPITOL of the 6th Regiment of Massachusetts, will appear on above.

Single Parts (free by post).....25 cents.
One Year (12 monthly parts, free by post).....3 00.
Liberal terms to the trade, Clubs, and Canvassers.
Apply to JOHN E. POTTER,
P. O. Box, 3,040. 37 PARK ROW, N. Y.

ENTERPRISING AGENTS ARE wanted in every County to Discover Fine Humbugs and Swindles of Hard-dealing, and other new articles of ready sale. Profits large. Samples sent free on receipt of the price (50c.). Send 3 cent stamp for price-list and terms. A. D. DOWNEY, 442 Broadway, N. Y.

Wedding Cards and Note Papers of the most approved style, at the lowest prices. J. EVERDELL'S celebrated Engraving Establishment, 302 Broadway, corner of Duane, N. Y. Samples by mail.

Commercial Travelers and Agents Wanted to Sell our

25 Cent Portfolio Package.

Contents—18 Sheets Note Paper, 18 Envelopes, 1 Pencil, 1 Rubber, 1 Pen, 1 Pencil, 1 Penholder, 1 Copying-Ink, 1 Way Bill, 5 Engravings, 1 New Method for Computing Interest, 1 Package Fine Embroidery Designs for Collars, 4 of the Latest Fashion Plates for Ladies-Skirts, 1 Set Letters of Gold for Marking Cards, 1 Set Silk Pieces, 1 Pr Child's Cards, 1 Package Ornamental Pillow Tops, 1 Package Superior Beautiful Article of Jewelry. $20 a day can be Easily Made. Send stamp for Circular and Terms.
WEIR & CO., 43 South Third Street, Phila., Pa.

METTAM & CO.'S Patent Galvano-Electro Metallic Tablets and Anodes, a perfect silver substitute, and mostly indigestuous remedy for all rheumatic and nervous diseases. Call or send for Circular to Mettam & Co., 429 Broadway, New York.

LADY AGENTS wanted for "Mrs. Hawking Explained." Address Author at Beverly Courtlee, Ellesquette, Curious Pictures, Stories, &c. For Sample, 7 cts. Agents 50 cts. CLAUNT, Publisher, N. Y. City.

Every Man his own Printer.
ADAMS PRESS CO. 81 Park Row N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT.—Agents Wanted in every Town and County to enter into a respectable and permanent business. For particulars address, with red stamp,
DR. J. H. WARNER,
54 Third Street, New York.

THERMOMETERS, warranted correct; beautifully decorated, 93 cents each by mail.
O. SPOTSWOOD, 119 Spring Street, N. Y. City.

Catarrh.—GODDARD'S ESSENCE cures it. Send postage stamp for his Pamphlet, at 612 Broadway, N. Y.

THE ALBION, A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER, Established in 1822,
DEVOTED TO
NEWS, POLITICS, CRITICISM, AND
GENERAL LITERATURE.
PRICE 8? PER ANNUM; 6 CENTS PER COPY.
Send for Specimen Copy—with pride, to the
ALBION OFFICE, 16 Beekman St., N. Y.

Grand Opening!!!
BRODIE'S
Stock of Spring
and Summer
MANTILLAS
Now Ready for Inspection
at his
OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street,
and
His Palace of Fashion,
Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Corner of 234 Street,
New York.

To all Wanting Farms.

NEW SETTLEMENT OF VINELAND.—50 miles from Philadelphia by Railroad. Grapes, Small fruits and Apples unsurpassed for Wines, Corn, Grass, Cattle, and Vegetables—good markets, healthy location. Climate more charming than Southern Italy. Settlement of Friends and others, where good business openings can be found. A Temperance Colony. Society good. Farms from $15 to $30 per acre only. Village 6 and 16 acre Lots for sale. Four years' time given. Report of SOLON ROBINSON, Ag. Ed. of the Tribune, who has visited the place, together with Vineland Rural, giving full description, will be furnished. Address
CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland P.O., Cumberland County, New Jersey.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.

HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BRACELETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR LOCKETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR RINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR VEST CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR GUARD CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR SETTS OF SETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF PINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR THE LARGEST TYPE OF ALL THE GENERALS. Enclose stamp for full particulars.
W. A. HAYWARD, MANUFACTURING JEWELER,
208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

EMPLOYMENT. A NEW ENTERPRISE! THE PEERLESS Sewing Machine will want a number of Agents. Liberal salary and expenses paid, or commission allowed. Address, with stamp, HARRIS BROTHERS, Boston, Mass. (Clip this out for reference.)

$5.—SOMETHING NEW.—Agents wanted to make $5 to $10 a day, selling our new and an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten or Twenty.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4.00.
10th Compositors and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.
The Demand Notes of the United States will be taken for Subscriptions. One dollar of these bills are required to remit them in preference to bank bills.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.

A Thrilling Story,
Entitled,
NO NAME,
By Wilkie Collins,
AUTHOR OF
"The Woman in White,"
Richly Illustrated by John McLenan,
Was commenced in the Number for March 15 (No. 272) of
HARPER'S WEEKLY,
And will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

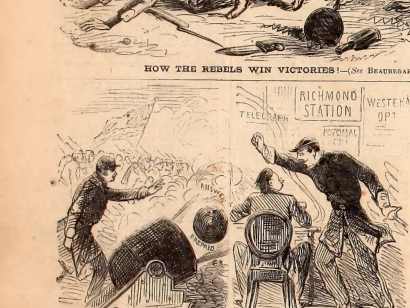
One Copy for One Year	$2.00
One Copy for Two Years	3.00
Three or more Copies for One Year, each	2.00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten or Twenty.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4.00.
10th Compositors and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.
The Demand Notes of the United States will be taken for Subscriptions. One dollar of these bills are required to remit them in preference to bank bills.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For May, 1862.

TERMS.



One Copy for one Year	$2.00
Two Copies for One Year	3.00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2.00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4.00.
10th Compositors and Teachers supplied at the lowest CLUB RATES.
The Demand Notes of the United States will be taken for Subscriptions. One dollar of these bills are required to remit them in preference to bank bills.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HOW THE REBELS WIN VICTORIES!—(See BEAUREGARD'S Despatch from Corinth.)

TWO ENDS OF THE TELEGRAPH.—(See News from GEN. MITCHELL.)

TEN REASONS WHY YOU SHOULD
1st. THISTLE & CO.'S PACKAGE.
2d. They Contain the Best Stationery.
3d. They Contain the Neatest Style of Jewelry—and the Quality Cannot be Better.
4th. They give Better Satisfaction.
4th. Your Customers will take that in Preference to any Other.
5th. You can sell them to the same person again—the reason is they are finished.
6th. You can Warrant Each Package to be as Represented.
7th. They are put up in Good Style.
8th. They are the Cheapest.
9th. THISTLE & CO. spare no pains to make them the Best.
10th. They are Universally Acknowledged to be the Best. Agents Wanted. Circular sent free.
THISTLE & CO., 159 Nassau Street, New York.

Patterns for Ladies' and Children's Garments, Spring and Summer Styles. Twelve full-size Patterns mailed free to any part of U. S. on receipt of 20 cents in stamps. Call or address
JOHN H. TINGLEY, 169½ Fulton Street, N. Y.

DELMONICO'S,
Corner of 5th Avenue and 14th Street,
WILL BE OPENED
Wednesday, April 9, 1862.

Books of Great Interest.
ESSAYS AND REVIEWS. By Eminent English Churchmen. New Edition. Edited by Rev. Dr. HENRY. $1 25.
TRACTS FOR PRIESTS AND PEOPLE. A Series of Papers by Heroes, author of "Tom Brown;" Pope, Wiese." Three. $1.
"A work of great power and learning."—Independent.
PRAYERS. By Thirteen Puseyite Pastors. Mem. With ad. Suitable Likeness of Mr. Parker, engraved on steel, by Schoen. Cloth, extra, 75 cents.
Just published by
WALKER, WISE & CO.,
BOSTON.
All the Books sent free by mail, on receipt of the price.

10 Packets Flower Seeds, extra varieties, with the Novelties. Double Zinnia, &c., or 26 of Fresh Choice Seeds, either collection for $1. Eleven for $2.50. Flower Seeds make a nice present. Half name, Post Office and State plain. Sent by return mail. "Needham's Seeds are the best I have ever purchased."—Mrs. Gen. Worth, Buffalo. "Seeds all right."—Lake Shore Home. "Seeds unsurpassed."—Ex. Grape-vines, and pure native Wine for Medicinal and Sacramental purposes, at lowest rates. Try me.
GEO. J. NEEDHAM, Washington, D. C.

AGENTS.—Kerosene now succeeds fully burns well without chimney. Using Dodin's Patent Burner gives 24 hours good light for one cent. Send 4 cent stamp for samples. Address JOS. DODIN, 23 Dunne St., N. Y.

Just Published.

THE CHANNINGS.
A NEW NOVEL.
BY MRS. HENRY WOOD,
Author of "Earl's Heirs."
The Channings!
The Channings!
The Channings!
By Author of "Earl's Heirs!"

THE CHANNINGS. A Domestic Novel of Real Life. By MRS HENRY WOOD, author of the "EARL'S HEIRS," is published and for sale this day. It is prized from the advanced sheets purchased from the author, and is issued in a large, square volume of over 300 pages, large type, double column, and printed on the finest and best of white paper. Price Fifty Cents in paper cover, or Seventy-five Cents in cloth.
Published and for sale by
T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS,
306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
To whom all orders must come addressed.

Copies of the Channings will be sent to any one free of postage, on remitting fifty cents to the publishers, in a letter; or, two copies will be sent for One Dollar.
Booksellers, News Agents, and all others, will please send on their orders at once for what they want of this book to start with, which will prove to be even more popular than "Earl's Heirs" or "East Lynne."
Address all orders to the publishers,
T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS,
No. 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

To the Public.
Beware of Counterfeits.
Brandreth's Pills and New Style.

☞ THE WHOLE OBJECT TO INSURE A CURE in most cases of sickness, is to remove

Impure Humors

faster than they are formed. The lines of cure will be governed by the rule. Thus by using BRANDRETH'S PILLS according to the printed directions, the matters in the producing organs will become less, like snow under the genial influence of a spring sun.

New Style of Brandreth's Pills.

The New Style is a small hand of paper around the box of Pills and directions; on the back is printed, in
RED INK,
Benjamin Brandreth's Pills.
Benjamin Brandreth's Pills.

The paper is covered with these words in small RED SEVEN LETTERS, and around the white is a piece of silver plates, to keep the Pills sweet in any clime.
This New Style ensures you fresh Pills, and the Genuine; but it is not to be denied, that many respectable Dealers still Genuine Brandreth's Pills of Old Style. These will be changed for New Style, if not over two years but paint since they were in my possession.
B. BRANDRETH.

Brandrethian Offices:—No. 4 Union Square, 351 Third Ave., 164 Ninth Ave., New York. E. S. McMurdy, cor. Broadway and Maiden Lane, Albany. No. 14 North Eighth Street, Philadelphia, and corner of Ninth and E Streets, Washington, D. C. Price twenty-five cents, with full directions.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE,
294 Canal St., Brandreth Building, N. Y.

Agents Wanted to Sell
Parson Brownlow's Wonderful Book.
Apply to GEORGE W. CHILDS, Publisher, 628 and 630 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
APPLEGATE & CO., Cincinnati Publishers for the West.

PASSPORT OFFICE, No. 200 Broadway, near Fulton Street, Ground Floor.
Naturalized citizens must produce their certificates. Information for travelers furnished on application at the Office, or in reply to letters addressed PASSPORT OFFICE, Box 3,751, New York.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE! MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 50c. IN SILVER. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free.
F. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

AGENTS.—THE DIME PANPROSPHORUM PRIZE PACKAGE, PRICE 10 CENTS, CONTAINS 38 ARTICLES, ALL NEW AND ORIGINAL. EACH PACKAGE HAS A GIFT OF JEWELRY. Agents can make 100 per cent. Send stamp for a circular. W. H. CATELL & CO., 102 Nassau St., N. Y.

AGENTS OF ACTIVITY AND ENERGY can make from $5 to $10 per day by engaging in the sale of the VALLANCE PRIZE STATIONERY.
BEAUTY PACKAGE AND ENVELOPE.
Our Stationery is superior, and our Jewelry consists of FORTY VARIETIES of the latest styles manufactured with ARTISTIC TASTE.
For information send for Circular, mailed free.
RICHARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

A GENT—IF YOU WISH TO INVEST A SMALL CAPITAL IN A PAYING BUSINESS, Examine the merits of the MULTOMICROSCOPE. Pays 100 per cent. to Agents. Call and see it, or send stamp for circular.
S. C. RICHARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Davis Collamore & Co.,
Importers and Dealers in
China, Glass, &c.,
479 Broadway,
BETWEEN GRAND AND BROOME STREETS.
Are now prepared to offer a largely-increased assortment of Goods in their line, including all desirable articles, either staple or novel, carefully selected from the best foreign and domestic markets.
They take this opportunity of thanking their customers and the public for the continued favor which they have extended to their Establishment since its Formation in 1842,
and trust, by further exertion, to deserve an increased patronage.
Quality Good. Prices Low.

DONE GONE! DONE GONE!
AND
THE NEGLECTED PICTURE.
CARD PHOTOGRAPHS of these remarkable Paintings by
E. ANTHONY,
No. 501 Broadway.
No loyal Album should be without them.
Price, 25 cents each, with printed description.
Remittances may be in postage stamps, and the Pictures will be sent by mail prepaid.

Gold Pens Repointed—Equal to New,
On receipt of 25 cts. in money or stamps. Orders by Mail promptly attended to. Gold Pens 25 cts. Pen and Holder 50 cts. E. S. JOHNSON, 19 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Jewelry of all Kinds Repaired.
Orders by mail solicited. The cost of repairing sent immediately on receipt of Goods. Gold Pen Repointed 25 cts. Address E. S. JOHNSON, 19 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERYWHERE.
WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.
Retailed at Wholesale Prices, Made to Measure at $20 per doz. OR SIX FOR TEN DOLLARS,
MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With fine Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as sold in retail stores for $2 50 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $36 00 PER DOZEN.
P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $20 per dozen are mistaken. Here is the cost of one dozen $20 fine shirts.

30 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 18 c. per yd.,	$5 40
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard,	3 92
Making and cutting,	6 00
Laundry, 24; buttons and cotton, 76,	1 00
Profit,	4 68
Total,	$20 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.
The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.
The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.
S. W. H. WARD, from London,
387 Broadway, up stairs,
Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

INVALID.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all Lung Affections, by writing Dr. A. Jones, 281 Pearl Street, N. Y. He reads it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

BALLOU'S
PATENTED
F. Y. S.
French Yoke
SHIRTS.
WARRANTED
TO FIT.
Send for a
Circular.
BALLOU BROS.,
No. 400 Broadway
New York.
For sale by all the principal Dealers through the UNITED STATES.

Children's Fancy Mats, of the most superb and elegant designs ever produced, may be seen at TERRY'S, 387 Broadway, 3d door below Walker street.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS
& ARMS. SELPHO'S PATENT
628 BROADWAY, N.Y. SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

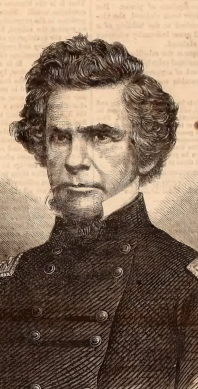
VOL. VI.—No. 280.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MITCHELL.

MITCHELL! strong brain, quick eye, and steady hand!
Fulfilled in service—faithful in command;
Thou heroic son of science! fit to stand
Foremost among the thousands of the land!

In this the nation's crisis, the captain's skill,
In fine conflict, work fitting triumphs still;
And nobler yet the patriotic thrill
Which guides the manly triumphs of thy will!



Golf with a handful of such hearted men
To board the wolf of Treason in his den—
Men quick to plan and strike to act—and then
Escape shall ring our triumphs back again!

Onward, my hero! Men shall catch the flame
While lights thy sword—and glow again for shame,
With this—and such as thee—we shall reclaim
The standing glory of our country's name!

GENERAL O. M. MITCHELL.

We publish herewith, from a photograph kindly furnished by ANSCO, 383 Broadway, a portrait of GENERAL O. M. MITCHELL, whose brilliant exploits in Northern Alabama and Mississippi are the theme of so much eulogy.

ORMSBY M'KNIGHT MITCHELL is a native of Kentucky, but was appointed to West Point from Ohio in 1825. He is about fifty-seven years of age. In 1829 he graduated in the same class as the rebel Generals Joe Johnson and Lee. He served three years as Professor of Mathematics at West Point, and was a short while in the army. But in 1836, becoming weary of inaction, he resigned his commission, studied law, and opened an office at Cincinnati, Ohio. From 1836 to 1844 he filled the chair of Professor of Mathematics in the Cincinnati College, and in 1842 founded the Cincinnati Observatory. His love for astronomy induced him to devote most of his time to the study of this science. He published several works on the subject which attained considerable popularity; and in 1859, when the troubles in the Dudley Observatory left it without a manager, he was called to the vacant post. Astronomy, however, did not engross MR. MITCHELL. Like M'CLELLAN, BOMFORD, CRAIG, and others, he was a railroad man, and for many years filled the office of Engineer of the Ohio and Mississippi line. He was also at one time Adjutant General of Ohio. In every position he was remarkable for energy, boldness and thoroughness.

MAJOR-GENERAL O. M. MITCHELL.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANSCO.]

When the war broke out he was among the first to inculcate the necessity of defending the unity of the country at all hazards. He was one of the speakers at the great meeting on Union Square, and his speech was probably the most thrilling that was delivered that day. He said:

"I owe allegiance to no particular State, and never did, and, God helping me, I never will. I owe allegiance to the Government of the United States. A poor boy, working my way with my own hands, at the age of twelve years, to take care of myself as best I could, and beginning by earning but four dollars per month. I worked my way onward until this glorious Government of the United States gave me a chance at the Military Academy at West Point. There I landed with my knapsack on my back, and, I tell you God's truth, just a quarter of a dollar in my pocket. There I owe allegiance to the Government of the United States. I did not adjure the love of my own State, nor of my adopted State, but high above that was proudly triumphant and predominant my love for our common country." His speech was continued with a fervor that held his hearers enthralled, and amidst its remarks the faltering words slid from his lips: "When the rebels come to their senses we will receive them with open arms; but until that time, while they are trailing our glorious banner in the dust, when they wrest it, condemn it, curse it, and trample it under foot, I must unite, and in God's name I will unite, and so long as I have strength I will do it. . . . I am ready, God help me, to do my duty. I am ready to fight in the ranks or out of the ranks. Having been educated in the Academy, having been in the army several years, having served as a commander of a volunteer company for ten years, and having served as an Adjutant-General, I feel I am ready for something. I only ask to be permitted to act; and in God's name, give me something to do!"

He was appointed Brigadier-General from New York, and sent to Kentucky. There he obtained command of a division of BUELL'S army, which was the first of our troops in Bowling Green. From Nashville he was sent due south through Murfreesboro and Columbia. Nor the latter place he left the bulk of his division under one of the brigadiers, and with a brigade of infantry, a squadron of cavalry, and two batteries, he made an extraordinary forced march on Huntsville, which place he occupied before the rebels suspected his proximity. He seized the telegraph office, and, it is believed, obtained some useful information in the shape of dispatches from and to Beauregard. Since then he has been dashing hither and thither on the Memphis and Charleston Road, until now (April 29) he holds two hundred miles of the line, from Stevenson, Alabama, to Tuscumbia. He is one of our most dashing and splendid generals.

A REBEL CAPTAIN FORCING NEGROES TO LOAD CANNON UNDER THE FIRE OF BERDAN'S SHARP-SHOOTERS.—SEE THROUGH A TELESCOPE FROM OUR LINES, AND SKETCHED BY HIS HEAD.—[SEE PAGE 299.]

OUR SUCCESS.

The regular circulation of Harper's Weekly is now between ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE and ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY THOUSAND copies. Assuming that each number of the paper is read by ten persons—a moderate estimate—a million and a quarter people derive instruction and amusement from this journal. It affords us no little satisfaction to witness this success. Certainly we may say that no effort on our part has been wanting to deserve it.

Our weekly expenses for traveling artists are alone as heavy as our total outlay for artistic labor used to be when Harper's Weekly was first established. This outlay, however, enables us to depict, week by week, the progress of our arms along the whole circumference of the Rebellion, with a fidelity and vividness seldom equaled.

We are besides enabled to lay before our readers each week several pages of the best reading of the day, including the works of Dickens, Wilkie Collins, and Bulwer. So remarkable a combination of artistic and literary excellences has never been presented in any journal, either in this country or abroad.

We think that this Number, for instance, will bear comparison with any number of any paper ever produced in the United States or in Europe.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Saturday, May 10, 1862.

DEMOCRACY ON TRIAL.

During the Crimean war the late Prince Albert was furiously abused by the British people for saying, in a public speech, that constitutional monarchy was on trial. What he meant was, that the pending contest would test whether it was possible to carry on a great war without interfering with the free institutions which were established for peace-time. The event proved that the British system was equal to the test. The war was brought to a successful close without any violation of the laws established for the government of the British empire in time of peace. It must be remarked, however, that the war was prosecuted at a point several thousand miles distant from Great Britain; that England's trade with Russia was very limited; that the chief commerce of Great Britain was not injured by the war; and that the number of individuals whose private interests were affected by the war was very small indeed.

In these important aspects the pending war in this country differs essentially from the Russian war, and it is reasonable to assume that its bearing on our peace institutions must be widely dissimilar. The war is carried on at our own doors, with a people most closely allied to us by ties of marriage, association, and commerce; it has crippled our trade, and gravely impaired our industrial energy; and the number of persons whose interests are directly affected by it is enormous.

These essential differences explain why it was necessary, in this country, to do what was not required in England during the contest of 1854–'5; namely, to suspend the operations of those great free institutions which, in peace-time, are the main bulwark of popular liberty.

It must always be borne in mind by the candid observer that since history began there never was such a rebellion as the one we are now suppressing. The rebellion of Catiline, to which it has been compared, was only able to raise 5000 men, and of these a large portion had no better arms than clubs. The famous rebellions which constitute so important a part of the history of Great Britain and France were trumpery little disturbances in comparison with the Southern insurrection. A faint resemblance may be traced between the present contest in this country and the religious wars in Europe; but the latter, it will be seen at once on examination, were very diminutive prototypes of the present struggle. In all the religious wars in England and France there was no more bloody contest than the Battle of Winchester, which the historian will class among the minor fights of the present war. History contains no example of 8,000,000 people rebelling against 20,000,000 of their countrymen, and bowing so completely to the lead of fanatic leaders as to submit to be forced by conscription into military service. There never was an instance before of a country raising a million of men to fight each other. Nor was there ever a war, before the present one, which inflicted such wholesale misery upon the country which first took up arms; which involved so fearful an injury to peaceful commerce; which developed so much treachery on the part of persons in public employ; which brought to light such diabolical treason and such heartless perfidy. The honest historian will stand aghast when he discovers the progressive developments of the scheme of secession.

These unparalleled facts will constitute the historical apology for the violations of law perpetrated by the authority of President Lincoln. They will be deemed an ample and sufficient excuse. Posterity will decide that if Abraham Lincoln had hesitated to assume the responsibility of suspending the act of habeas corpus, or of interfering with the dissemination of treason in Northern newspapers, he would, under the circumstances, have proved as derelict as his imbecile predecessor James Buchanan.

At the same time it must not be forgotten that, if it comes to the worst, our liberties are more precious than any thing else. We could better afford to forego the restoration of the Union than the complete reassertion of the rights secured to us by the Constitution. What has been done was right, and inevitable under the circumstances. But if it was in violation of law, the law must vindicate itself.

We are therefore not sorry to see that an action at law has been instituted against Ex-Secretary of War Simon Cameron by a party who was at one time confined in Fort Lafayette by his orders. We have no doubt but the Secretary, or the President, by whose orders he acted, had sufficient reasons for ordering the incarceration of the person in question. But it is right, it is due to our institutions, that a jury should pronounce upon the subject. Congress will of course interpose to protect the members of Mr. Lincoln's Administration against pecuniary loss arising from such prosecutions. But the facts should nevertheless be ascertained. General Jackson was thoroughly commended by the American people for trampling on the law of the land at New Orleans; but he was sued for it, and fined $1000, and the people approve the condemnation. It must be so now. Unusual emergencies have called for unusual remedies, and remarkable assumptions of power. But wherever the laws have been violated, the violator should be punished at the bidding of a jury. Congress will grant indemnity wherever it may rightfully be claimed.

If we can not suppress the rebellion without sacrificing the fundamental principles of our political system, the work of suppression will cost dear. In the memorable words of President Lincoln:

> "I understand the ship to be made for the carrying and preservation of the cargo, and so long as the ship can be saved, with the cargo, it should never be abandoned. This Union should likewise never be abandoned unless it fails, and the probability of its preservation shall cease to exist without throwing the passengers and cargo overboard. So long, then, as it is possible that the prosperity and the liberties of the people can be preserved in the Union, it shall be my purpose at all times to preserve it."

THE LOUNGER.

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY.—No. II.

Since the opening of the Exhibition the Committee have extinguished the gas in the front room, and admitted the daylight. The result shows that their first judgment was correct. For in seeing pictures it is desirable to have plenty of light, though it be not sunshine; and the tops of the windows at the end of the room supply only a twilight, in which it is impossible to see the real value of the paintings. In the entrance-hall also there are several works full of conscience, skill, and talent, which it is a pity can not be better seen. But the difficulty is not one that the Committee could avoid. They have procured the best accessible hall, and they have placed the more important pictures in the largest gallery. But the artistic success in smaller works is proportionably so much greater than in larger ones that it would be a good thing always to secure a room in which they could have full justice.

Thus in the entrance-hall, in the very sanctum of Mrs. Croker, whose annual presence is one of the pleasant traditions of the Academy, you may observe, No. 512, The Pacific from the Ramparts of the Panama, by Charles Parsons, whose peculiar talent for marine subjects is already well known. The sketch is striking for its vigor, breadth, and fidelity. The wide sweep of sea dashes up on the stone walls and the ruined tower—a monument of past dominion and romantic history. The sketch shows the poet's eye as well as the painter's hand. Mr. Parsons is not unknown to the diocese of Harper's Weekly. His late anniversary picture, in the number for April 19, of the great uprising of the nation is a memorial work, a most felicitous patriotic allegory. In the same passage with 512 is No. 521, At Work, a pen-and-ink drawing, by Thomas C. Farrer. It is a portrait, of cabinet size, of a young man writing. The likeness is excellent, and the portrait of John Brown on the wall, and the card or address of Wendell Phillips upon the table, show the direction of his sympathies. But the specialty of the work is the marvelous delicacy of its execution. It is like the finest etching, and although finished with the painful fidelity of the Pre-Raphaelites, is yet broad and effective. No. 546, by the same hand, is Spenser's butterfly—

> "Now this, now that he tasteth tenderly,
> * * * * * * *
> But pastures on the pleasures of each place."

It is a study of common wild flowers and weeds, in tangled and brilliant luxuriance, and is one of the most conscientious works in the gallery. The talent for manipulation and the knowledge of the pallet shown by such a sketch are remarkable.

Passing into the large gallery, Mr. Gignoux's Winter, No. 9, is one of the characteristic bits of the painter, and yet a surface of such universal snow among the mountains would seem to be hard to find. Our New England and Northern hills are usually shaggy with evergreen forests, and the snow drifts between, or catches upon the needles and sprays so as to give the mass a silver-gray rather than white complexion. But any critic must be very diffident in speaking of the representation of an aspect of nature which the painter has especially studied. Mr. Hall's, No. 10, Un Carro de Sevilla (as per Catalogue), is a bright strain of Spanish reminiscence. Costume, attitude, and "business" are doubtless faithful. Yet if Spanish peasant life is not essentially different from that in Italy, the scene is too clean. Dirt belongs to Italian peasant romance, however brilliant, as dust enhances the charm of bottled wine. This merry group looks almost like a masquerade of ladies and gentlemen. No. 15, Beard's March of Silenus, is in his best vein. The humor is thoroughly bestial; the open mouth of the bear behind admirable; and if Kaulbach occurs to the spectator as he looks, it is but to mark the difference in a generally similar fancy. No. 21 is Mr. Hazeltine's Amalfi, Coast of Naples. It is almost too dainty, if not too gorgeous, for the actual coast. But the patient skill with which the whole is wrought, and the poetic sensitiveness with which the scene is felt, instantly suggest that the painter is doubtless truer in his picture than the critic in his remembrance of that lovely shore. The dingy, briny luminousness of the rising wave is masterly. It is sea-water itself rolling up on the beach, with bits of floating sea-weed caught like flies in amber. The beach itself, the burnished, rainbow-glowing pavement of the sea, is resplendent, as in evanescent, glancing sweeps of sunlight the shore may be. This picture is the best we remember to have seen by a painter of evident power.

No. 28, a Lady, by R. M. Staigg, is one of the fine portraits of the Exhibition, and one of the most admirable works of the artist. Mr. Staigg carries into his portraits the same refinement and delicacy and tender fidelity which marked his miniatures, but there is no niggling, no littleness; and there is not a quieter, broader portrait upon the walls. That it is the likeness of a lady there needed no catalogue to tell. There is a certain gravity of experience in the expression which yet is not enough to repress the salient, buoyant spirit that is evidently the mainspring of the character. The elegant simplicity and propriety of the treatment are singularly harmonious with the impression produced by the subject. It is a great success. No. 34, Sunlight and Shadow, by A. Bierstadt, is an effect of sunshine upon the stone wall and balustrade of an old church, and is more perfectly painted than any sunshine we ever saw. Look through your closed hand at it from a little distance. See how the light glances along the top of the balustrade, flecking the posts beneath, and how kind and placid and warm it lies upon the wall itself of the church. Inside the door the sunshine never comes, only the light. It is cool, and odorous, and still within. There are gorgeous gleams on the high painted windows, but far up in the vaulting nave and around the altar there is grave shade always, and a few cloaked solitary figures are silently kneeling. You do not see all this in the picture; oh no, but it is there, in the church. This is the court where the wicked cease from troubling, the pasture where the weary are at rest. And the sunlight, dropping through masses of leaves, rests like a benediction. This picture, too, is a poem.

No. 44 is Mr. Page's portrait of Collector Barney. It is certainly he who stands there; but where he is, and what he is doing, are still as uncertain as ever. It is a picture curiously devoid of taste, but only an accomplished painter could have painted it. On the other side of the gallery are Nos. 162 and 169, also portraits by Page. When you first look at them they are perfectly flat; they have an unreal, glazed, spectral air. But gradually the skill of the modeling of the head, especially in 162—the conscientious fidelity with which, as the painters say, every point of the surface is "felt"—the masterly decision and confidence with which every line is drawn and every touch placed, soon show you that it is not the work of a tyro, at any rate, nor of a man who has not a clear conception of the effect he wishes to produce. Whether that effect is reached, and if so, whether you know what it is, are different questions. Like all Page's pictures, this portrait, No. 162, is in a very low key, which is perhaps a just principle; for since light can be only proximately represented upon canvas, every thing else in nature should be delineated accordingly if you would have real harmony. Then there is an avoidance of dark shadow—and of shade generally—and the tint of the back-ground overpowers the figure. This is peculiarly evident also in 169. The result is an impression of power, and skill, and knowledge, but not of satisfaction. The picture challenges you—"Come, what is the matter with me?" It draws every spectator in the gallery before it, and defies him with that question. "If I am right," it says, "all these others are wrong. If I am wrong, can you say where and how? 'Pooh!' is no answer. No fool painted me, but many a one looks at me!" You see, this is a very unmanageable kind of picture. It gives you as good as you send.

Mr. Inness's Light Triumphant, No. 48, is a study of a brilliant effect skillfully done. But it is a feat of pigments rather than a picture. Nos. 54 and 63 are portraits by Mr. Wenzler, the latter of the poet Bryant. The likeness of this last is very striking. The failure is in a tone of pensiveness which is part of the natural, although not immediately observable, expression of the subject, and which is not indicated in the portrait, which shows mainly the severity that belongs to the face. The elaborate, verging upon morbid, smoothness and carefulness of treatment which distinguish Mr. Wenzler's style, and which give the faces a slightly opaque and waxen look, are evident in both these pictures. But there is with it a sweetness and tenderness which, united with the strong likeness, make the charm of Wenzler's portraits.

We stop here to-day, but shall return to our notes of the Exhibition.

A LOOK AROUND.

At this moment of writing we have reached a lull in the movements of the war. Driven back almost simultaneously from their outer line across the country from the Chesapeake to the Mississippi the rebels stand at Corinth and at Yorktown. At the former place Halleck for the first time appears in the field, and at the latter M'Clellan has the most ample theatre for the exhibition of his powers.

That the public confidence in success at the Southwest is increased by the presence of Halleck in active command is unquestionable. There has been such an accumulation of proof that we were not properly prepared for attack at Pittsburg Landing, that brave and loyal, and successful even, as General Grant has been, it was impossible to avoid the question whether we should be any better prepared for the next onset. There has as yet been no reason assigned for the separation of the two great divisions of our army in Tennessee by so large a space that we had almost been destroyed. Common sense must count for something even in military strategy.

Parson Brownlow says he considers Beauregard the best General upon the Continent. If he be so, he is worthily opposed to General Halleck, in whose sagacity, rapidity, and comprehensive grasp of the campaign there is very general confidence. Whether this arises from the public satisfaction with his administration of the Western Department or from extraneous considerations, it is not easy to say. This only we know, that, whether the Department had been prepared for success by the operations of General Frémont, who had every conceivable difficulty to master when he was in charge, or from whatever other reason, yet the West, since General Halleck took command, has been the scene of a continuous series of splendid victories.

How much of the credit of all this belongs to the Commanding General is yet another question. But it is impossible not to recognize the prestige which the mere fact gives to him; and if he succeeds in defeating the army of desperation under Beauregard, while Foote presses down the river—for the two events would probably be simultaneous—it will not be easy for the rebels to collect another formidable army, except under great difficulties.

So also if M'Clellan is successful upon the Yorktown peninsula, and either defeats the enemy in a general engagement or compels him to retire upon Richmond—Norfolk falls; the rebels can hardly stand in Virginia or North Carolina; they will retreat southwestwardly, and the rebellion will be virtually inclosed in the sea-board and Gulf slave States. It would then by no means yield, but maintain itself by a general guerrilla warfare, and a sullen submission wherever the National force was actually superior. This state of things would inevitably continue until pride and passion and prejudice had had their way. At length the ordinary motives and desires of men in civil society would begin to act; the people of the rebellious section would give pledges, not oaths, of their loyalty to the National Government; and gradually, as various influences combined to extirpate the root of treason, they would be as faithful to the system which gave them dignity, nationality, honor, and power, as the most loyal citizens to-day.

It is dangerous to speculate—how much more to prophesy—so we forbear. Especially as our eyes rest upon an enthusiastic article in the Times of March 17, which exultingly predicts that "within twenty days Richmond will be in the hands of M'Clellan, Norfolk in possession of Burnside, and Jeff Davis either a prisoner in our hands or a fugitive among the people whom he has deluded and ruined."

The Times will smile, and justly insist that its rosy anticipations were out a little in point of time, but not of fact; and that about May-day all will be true. Amen! It is, after all, only a question of time.

HOPELESS SPITE.

The recognition of Hayti and Liberia is another of the national acts which show that we are no longer chained to the most remorseless despotism. This Government sends a minister to the Chinese, who are yellow people; and an agent to the Japanese, who are bronze people, whom Mr. Douglas called an inferior race; we have consuls in India and a minister in Turkey, where the people are dark red and olive; and there really has seemed to be no reason why we should refuse an agent to people who are black. Nor has there been any reason except that many of the Senators, whose consent was necessary, held black people as slaves.

The utterly false, abnormal, and fatal position which this nation has occupied toward men of African descent is being rapidly changed to the natural and simple one which other civilized people maintain. Nor would there be any serious difficulty in immediately establishing it except for two things—the prejudice which always prevails in a country against an enslaved race, and the party capital which in this country is made out of it.

Such a person as Vallandigham, for instance, who comes from Ohio, is in practical collusion with slavery and its effort to destroy the Government, merely because it serves his political purpose. The slaveholders for many years had worked with the Democratic party. The consequence was that, to secure the unanimous slave section, the Democratic party gradually relinquished all its fundamental principles, and became an association for the propagation and extension of slavery and the annihilation of the safeguards of liberty. The consequence of this in turn was, that as the party left its principles the best Democrats left the party, until at last the Southern leaders stood in open rebellion, and all loyal national Democrats stood against them.

Those who did not were last summer's "peace men." These were people who thought that the Government was, as Mr. Senator Powell calls it, a tyrant and despot for laying its hand upon its enemies. They were the people who voted in Congress with Breckinridge and the other open traitors, who staid because they could do most harm by staying. These are the people who, upon the hope that the French Government has indirectly threatened recognition of the rebellion, call loudly with Vallandigham for the correspondence that the traitors may be encouraged by it. They are the men who would like to see Jeff Davis, reeking with the blood of thousands of loyal citizens, marching into the White House: who rejoiced over Bull Run: who are aghast at Pea Ridge, Donelson, and Newbern: who would gladly shut, by any means, the mouths of men who expose the true source and aim of this infamous rebellion: and who show the spite they bear to human progress, national peace, and the civilization of liberty, by opposing every measure which aims to cut the fangs of slavery.

Meanwhile these measures are sure to be taken, and they will cut the fangs of these gentry at the same time.

TELLING SECRETS.

THE letter of YOKE, which was printed in facsimile in the Harper of last week, is one document of a secret history of rebellion which will doubtless be unearthed as our arms advance and we occupy the rebellious cities. The Nashville paper is already down the scent. It appears that the editor of the Dallas (we prefer not to say the) Herald was active but secret agent of the conspiracy. With every disclosure of this kind the national deliverance will appear only the more auspicious. It will be an interesting inquiry for the historian how far the plot depend in the core of New York in the good old days of GAMALIEL W. SMITH, and Lovell, the Jacques of that redoubtable Robert Macaire, Lovell, to General Gaines's report to General Floyd, only stole himself away, we ought not to complain.

The definite secret organization of the conspiracy was doubtless complete as to a few leaders. Of course much must have depended upon the developments of popular sympathy which could not be previously calculated. That Jefferson Davis's knowledge of the wide military distribution of sympathy of the country, gained from his occupancy of the War Department, was of important service to him is evident. That his residence for two summers in Maine gave him an opportunity which he did not neglect to inform himself upon Northern sentiment is of course unquestionable; and that a vast mass of correspondence and documentary evidence awaits the historian is beyond doubt.

Yet, in case of an absolute and sudden reverse, much of this material will be destroyed. Senator Harris, in his speech upon the confiscation bill, said that few people are aware how difficult it would be to convict Davis of treason. Where is he to be tried? Those are the witnesses? Are they his confederates are men shrewd enough to remove all dangers which they can foresee, and a trial for treason would be rather conspicuous in Richmond just now.

The seized telegrams of last May also will be a quarry for the patient delver. How extremely shaky in their shoes certain gentlemen must have felt on the morning of that announcement! Here were people who had been playing with fire and suddenly found themselves in it! Here were men who had insisted that "the South" (which had filled and controlled every nook and cranny of the Government for nearly a generation) was far more than half justified in taking "retires" by force. How much of all this sympathy was to appear in their telegrams must have puzzled some of these worthy gentlemen. They have the consolation of knowing that little if any will be found out—the facts, but will duly record the name of all who substantially and morally favored a treason which is destitute of a solitary plausible pretense.

FOR US OR AGAINST US?

THE correspondent of the New York Herald in one of his late letters, reports that the rebels had a regiment of mounted negroes, armed with sabres, at Manassas, and that some five hundred Union prisoners taken at Bull Run were escorted to their filthy prison by a regiment of black men. There is little doubt also that the fiendish cruelty of Secession and those at Yorktown were the work of the slaves. The same paper reports that "the rebels dug up the remains of our soldiers, and made spurs of their jawbones, cutting up their skeletons into every conceivable form, and sending them North as a present to their friends."

There is plenty of beautiful confirmation of these barbarities.

Will some one now say why, if slaves are to be armed at all, they should be armed to cut our friends instead of our enemies? And is it not clear that the question which is now assuming form is, shall freed, would instantly fall to committing are already perpetrated by the rebels? There is no recorded Sin Domingo "insurrection" more horrible than this last story.

At least twenty thousand slaves have been liberated by the necessities of the war. Will any friend of the rebels, so fearful of the ungovernable passions of emancipated slaves, suggest any other manner whose jawbone they have cut into spurs or whose skull they have made into a drinking-cup?

A NEW LITERATURE.

THE great rebellion will produce a literature. For a long time the most exciting and interesting books printed will be on the histories, annals, memoirs, biographies, journals, and disquisitions growing out of the war. There is a literature of the English rebellion, which was Macaulay's strong point; and a literature of the French revolution, in which Thiers is profoundly versed; and in like manner new names and forms will be made by the works that will be inspired by this conspiracy.

The material is not only copious, but a thoughtful case preserves it all. The librarian of Harvard University receives contributions of every published scrap upon either side relating to the struggle. Such an illustrated paper as Harper's Weekly is a current, vivid history of the war brought down to the latest dates; while Mr. Putnam's "Rebellion Record" is an unexpressed collection of the material of history. It is not digested, nor condensed, nor shaped in any way, but it is a most thorough and careful record of every document, speech, letter, description, report, debate, printed in full, and ready for the selecting eye and sifting hand of the historian. It is, in fact, the block of marble and the tools. The artist has only to bring his genius with him, fall to work, and hew out an imperishable history.

It will, nevertheless, be a long time before the final story of the conspiracy can be written. It must be sought and studied in its causes, and followed into details of which much is now hidden. But a grander theme, before, never presented a profounder significance and interest, never allured the student. Not Sallust in the Conspiracy of Catiline which he saw, nor Livy in the Annals of Rome which he brought down to his own day, nor Thucydides in the Peloponnesian War, which he was a soldier, nor Xenophon in the retreat of the ten thousand which he led, could have had a more inspiring theme than this act of the great historic drama in which the Anglo-Saxon race, upon a new continent, with a freedom which the power was in the hope of Despotism, and enlarges human liberty by constitutional law.

As this great struggle, by revealing to us our own manhood, releases us nationally from our childish dependence upon European criticism, so it will emancipate our literature from foreign subscription. Our literature opinion is especially haunted, and the skill with which, by various hands, we have told the story of Spain at home, in America, and in Europe—the story of early France, of the Netherlands, and of our colonial existence, will now illustrate with even greater fervor the triumph of the civilization of Liberty.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A SEA CHANGE.—The necessary reconstruction of the navy will effect a similar change in nautical phraseology. "Shiver my timbers!" will become obsolete; and the corresponding expression will be, "Shiver my iron-clad!" Instead of "Scuttle my copper!" the dramatic Jack Tar will exclaim, "Sink my gun-boat!" "Avast there, and belay!" and whereas he used to utter imprecations on his bowsprit, he will henceforth perhaps invoke injury on his bowsplitter.

"IN THE VOICES OF THE DEEP."—Dr. Dalgleish proves to us that fishes have auricles. Lucky fishes, say we. But we wonder what language are the fishes in the habit of speaking? We suppose they talk in the Salmon tongue.

"THE CRUELTIES OF WRAITH."—Of all the "Children of the Mist" the most black-hearted are the Rebel children. So enormous is their wrath, that we are amazed by a proposition to hang the Secretary of the navy and many a time it has been proposed to hang him.

SCRIPTURAL WEAKNESS.—We have been asked what girl in such a book of Scripture corresponds to Miss Nancy, designing "woman," can only write under the table? We answer, Because spirits of that description are best proof.

They were sitting side by side,
And she sighed, "How sweet the night!"
Said he, "My darling dear!"
And he laid his arm on her shoulder.
"You are cruelin's belle,"
And she sighed, and he sighed,
And he sighed again,
And she sighed, and then he sighed.
"You are my only belle I'm sure,"
And she groaned, and then he groan'd.
"You shall have a gold ring,"
And she giggled, and then he giggled.
Said she, "Will you?"
And he look'd, and then she look'd,
And he sighed, and she sighed,
And he wilted, and then she wilted.

An Irishman being asked why he left his country for America, replied, "It wasn't for want; I had plenty of that at home."

ANNA MARIA STORY was married to Bob Short. A very natural way of making a Short Story long.

"Illustrated with cuts," said a young urchin, as he drew his pen-knife across the leaves of his grammar.

The printer truly commend till they have given their promise to obey.

A certain old bachelor of our acquaintance, whenever he hears the word "commend married," he sees every blade double, even his bloodiest.

WALTZING.

At first they move slowly, with caution and grace,
Like horses when just setting out on a race;
Then quicker they go, like horses at races,
Must amble a little to show off their paces.
The music plays faster, they're forced to keep time,
Like lumbiber they skip like bottoms they spin;
The couples change sides, and back to back fly,
And ankles, at least, are exposed to the eye.
Now round and round like a mill they all swim:
He smiles upon her, and she smiles upon him;
Till, out of breath, they're obliged to pause,
The arm quits its partner, and both form a brace.
They still bear in mind, as they're turning each other,
Not to go out of "one turn dearer to mother;"
And those bodily terms often end, it is said,
In turning the head of the household to bread.

Why is a lady's hair like a heathen?—It holds the comb.

The young lady who was "driven to distraction" is now afraid she will have to walk back.

Poverty humbles pride. A man, when he is short, can hardly carry a head.

"I tell you, love, I have got the plan all in my head." "Ah, then it is all in a nutshell."

What's treason to the present time?
Treason, past treason, present, hoot or roll—Heist;
Because you can easily catch cold.

Many wedding-day is called "bridal day." The word ought to be called "bridle."

Wear is a lottery, in which every customer may expect to draw a second.

This little contradictions are many. Salt water gives us fresh eels, and hot water produces cold.

Young women are never in more danger of being maidenloves than when the men are at their feet.

SOUND WITHOUT WORDS.—Those of that blessed baby.

The man who would try to stab a ghost would stick at nothing.

Present your wife with every thing she wants, and perhaps she will be quiet for the present.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why is a Spanish fly like a hogshead?
Because it is full of words.

My dog is great critic to effectiner cold!
Cutted commotion in silver, and sometimes in gold.
My second a beath, the terror of men,
Who roars in a desert, and lives in a den.
My whole is a dog not now in existence,
To something between a horse and a woman.
Ans. Bowse.

When is it dangerous to walk in the fields?
When the hedges are plowdings.

What letters in the alphabet are most destructive to beauty?
U. A. Glass.

Why is a dog like a tattling person?
Because he is a tell (tale) bearer.

Who was the first whacker, and what time did he whittle?
The wicked, "Over the hills and far away."

If a man were to fall from the Monument, what would he fall against?
His inclination.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, April 29, in the Senate, the select committee on the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, Virginia, made a report that the committee find that Mr. Stark is delayed to the Government of the United States. The report was ordered to be printed. A resolution was presented, calling on the President for copies of all orders of the General commanding, instructions, etc., given to General Sherman, lately commanding in South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. The bill establishing a Department of Agriculture was taken up, and Senator Wilkinson addressed in opposition. The consideration of the bill confiscating the property of rebels was then resumed, and Senator Harris, of New York, resumed a speech on the bill, which, he said, was a measure of gigantic injustice. Without consulting his remarks, Senator Harris was up for an extended speech, and subsequently the Senate adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Thomas, of Massachusetts, offered a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the President to strike from the army list the name of any officer who has been known to be habitually intoxicated. Mr. Merrill stated that he had received a letter from Gen. Halleck, informing him that the forces in the field near Yorktown, on the 16th inst., in front of the enemy's fortifications offered an opening, a brush at the time, and fell off his horse into the mud. When pressed to the rear he was found to be drunk. He claimed to give it. A motion to lay the Confiscation bill on the table was rejected, yeas 52 against 69. Several of Mr. Hughson's bill was selected from among them, to embody the principle of the bill. The House then went into committee of the whole on the bill, which, for sake, was a measure of gigantic injustice. Without consulting his remarks, Senator Harris was up for an extended speech, and subsequently the Senate adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Thomas, of Massachusetts, offered a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the President to strike from the army list the name of any officer who has been known to be habitually intoxicated. Mr. Merrill stated that he had received a letter from Gen. Halleck, informing him that the forces in the field near Yorktown, on the 16th inst., in front of the enemy's fortifications offered an opening, a brush at the time, and fell off his horse into the mud. When pressed to the rear he was found to be drunk. He claimed to give it. A motion to lay the Confiscation bill on the table was rejected, yeas 52 against 69. Several of Mr. Hughson's bill was selected from among them, to embody the principle of the bill. The House then went into committee of the whole on the bill, which, for sake, was a measure of gigantic injustice. Without consulting his remarks, Senator Harris was up for an extended speech, and subsequently the Senate adjourned.——In the House, Mr. Thomas, of Massachusetts, offered a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the President to strike from the army list the name of any officer who has been known to be habitually intoxicated. Mr. Merrill stated that he had received a letter from Gen. Halleck, informing him that the forces in the field near Yorktown, on the 16th inst., in front of the enemy's fortifications offered an opening, a brush at the time, and fell off his horse into the mud. When pressed to the rear he was found to be drunk. He claimed to give it. A motion to lay the Confiscation bill on the table was rejected, yeas 52 against 69. Several of Mr. Hughson's bill was selected from among them, to embody the principle of the bill. The House then went into committee of the whole on the bill, which, for sake, was a measure of gigantic injustice. Without consulting his remarks, Senator Harris was up for an extended speech, and subsequently the Senate adjourned.

On Thursday, April 24, in the Senate, a communication from the War Department, covering copies of the report made by that department for 1861, was presented. The bill establishing a Department of Agriculture, and establishing diplomatic intercourse with those countries, was taken up, and Senator Davis, of Kentucky, offered a substitute, authorizing the President to appoint a Consul at Monrovia, Liberia, and at Haytien and Dominican ports. The substitute was rejected, and the bill finally passed. The bill to confiscate the property of rebels was then taken up, and Senators Howard and Sumner addressed the Senate upon the bill. Senator Sherman moved to amend the bill by striking out the provision which declared certain offices under the rebel government was agreed to—yeas 24, nays 19. The further consideration of the subject was then postponed, and the Senate went into executive session.——In the House, the Confiscation bill was taken up, and after some debate the House, by a vote of 80 to 71, decided the subject to a special committee. Mr. Valandigham, of Ohio, quoted from a speech of Senator Wade, in which he declared that he favored the bill, loyalty to the Union, and emphatically pronounced the Senator to be a traitor to the Union, and a coward, because his resilience to meet him say where. Mr. Blake took up to the subject of the Confiscation bill, and offered as a resolution declaring Mr. Valandigham's language a violation of the privileges of the House, and that he be censured for the same. Mr. Valandigham said a few words in the House. Pending the question on the resolution the House adjourned.

On Friday, April 25, in the Senate, resolutions from the Legislature of Ohio, approving the action of President Lincoln, Ohio, saying that the loyal feelings of the people of that State are unchanged, and that the rebel acts of Congress at Camp Chase were allowed to retain their slaves by Colonel Andrews, were unfavorably considered by a vote of Ohio in the name of the people of Ohio, and solemnly protested against the action of Colonel Andrews and the people of Ohio. The resolutions were accompanied by a note from Governor Dennison, of Ohio, stating that he did not permit it, but that the negroes had been sent there to work on the fortifications, and that they had been returned to their owners. Senator Wilson said he could add nothing to what he had already said on Monday. The bill establishing a line of armed steamers between Charleston and Aboukir and Port Royal was passed. A bill protecting United States officers from arrest by State authority was also passed. Several reports were made from the Judiciary Committee. An executive session was held, after the passage of many appointments.——In the House, the bill providing bounties for the widows and heirs of deceased soldiers was passed. The House then resumed the Government Contracts Investigating Committee Report. A resolution was then taken upon Senator Sherman. Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Saturday, April 26, in the Senate, a communication relative to the number and ages of slaves in the District of Columbia was received and referred. The bill to confiscate the property of rebels was then taken up, and after some discussion was passed. A bill protecting United States officers from arrest by State authority was also passed. Several reports were made from the Judiciary Committee. An executive session was held, after the passage of many appointments.——In the House, the bill providing bounties for the widows and heirs of deceased soldiers was passed. The House then resumed the Government Contracts Investigating Committee Report. A resolution was then taken upon Senator Sherman. Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

On Monday, April 28, in the Senate, a communication relative to the number and ages of slaves in the District of Columbia was received and referred. The bill to confiscate the property of rebels was then taken up, and after some discussion was passed. A bill protecting United States officers from arrest by State authority was also passed. Several reports were made from the Judiciary Committee. An executive session was held, after the passage of many appointments.——In the House, the bill providing bounties for the widows and heirs of deceased soldiers was passed. The House then resumed the Government Contracts Investigating Committee Report. A resolution was then taken upon Senator Sherman. Both Houses adjourned till Monday.

OUR ARMY BEFORE YORKTOWN.

General McClellan telegraphed to the War Department on the 26th inst., that the enemy had opened a heavy fire upon a portion of the enemy in front of Yorktown, driving the rebels out of their intrenchments, and silencing their fire, recapturing the work. Our loss was only three killed and twelve wounded. The rebels left their dead and wounded over for a day advanced on the enemy. General McClellan represents that the enemy's position is very strong, and that which appears to grow on a contrary in that region.

THE ARMIES AT CORINTH.

It is rumored, on pretty reliable data, that General Halleck has ordered the concentration of the armies under his command at Corinth. A large portion of them are, we understand, already there. The remainder, however, will soon be over down constantly in that region.

THE ARMIES AT CORINTH.

The latest accounts which we have—up to Sunday night—say that Halleck was then within a day's march of the rebel works. Our mared vessels, with their superior armament, were daily expected to pass the rebel batteries, while the fire of the rebels fails for short of their mark. Beauregard is said to be losing his men by desertion, and it is on not but many issues before a general and terrific engagement takes place.

AFFAIRS AT PORT WHEELER.

The last accounts from Port Wheeler say that the rebels have fourteen gun-boats and the ram Manassas lying off the forts, and that Captain Farragut has his eye upon them. The commands continues without important result.

THE REBELS CUTTING THE LEVEES.

The rebels are now cutting the levees on the Arkansas side of the river, and that should the country for a distance of thirty miles back be overflowed, with much amount of property. This was done to prevent the advance by land of the Union forces. The act is considered by the loyal citizens detrimental to the interests of the Southern people in that vicinity.

A FIGHT IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Persons from Newbern, North Carolina, report that a fight occurred last Tuesday near the canal locks of Elizabeth City, North Carolina, between the Federal troops under command of Colonel Hawkins and a force of rebels. The rebels were repulsed with considerable loss. Two of Colonel Hawkins's men were wounded. Colonel Hawkins was wounded in the right hand and lost the use of it.

ADVANCE OF GENERAL BANKS.

The news from General Banks's corps is important. Our troops are in possession of Strasburg. The rebel force is reported to be resting on the east side of the Shenandoah River, about seven miles from Strasburg, on the line much toward Gordonsville. It is said that 40 of his men have been captured.

LIEUTENANT GUNN'S EXPEDITION INTO ALABAMA.

Lieutenant Gunn, of the United States gun-boat Carondelet, reaches Foote contain the official report of the expedition of Lieutenant Gunn, of the Carondelet, up the river Tombigbee to Chickasaw, Alabama, containing 1000 troops, and Colonel Hawkins, of the Fifty-fourth Indiana Regiment, where they disembarked, and proceeded rapidly to the rebel camp, which they found two miles from the town of Okerbeton Railroad, for the purpose of destroying it and the rest of the bridges on the road to Mobile. Lieutenant Gunn reports that the expedition was entirely successful. They destroyed two pontoon bridges on the road. It was completely destroyed, together with some 500 feet of trestle-work and a mile of railroad track. The ram made a feeble resistance to our cavalry, 150 in number, and retreated to the river, pursued by them. Our loss of troops was killed 3.

RUMORED DEATH OF GENERAL SMITH.

The steamer Sanatorium and steam-tug Samford went up the James River on the 26th inst., and returned to Fortress Monroe at 4 o'clock. They took to tow a number of schooners which had been captured by the rebels at the Trexlogar Works in Richmond. Four new gun-boats have been launched at Norfolk, and are now ready for service. In course of construction at Norfolk, and part of them will be finished.

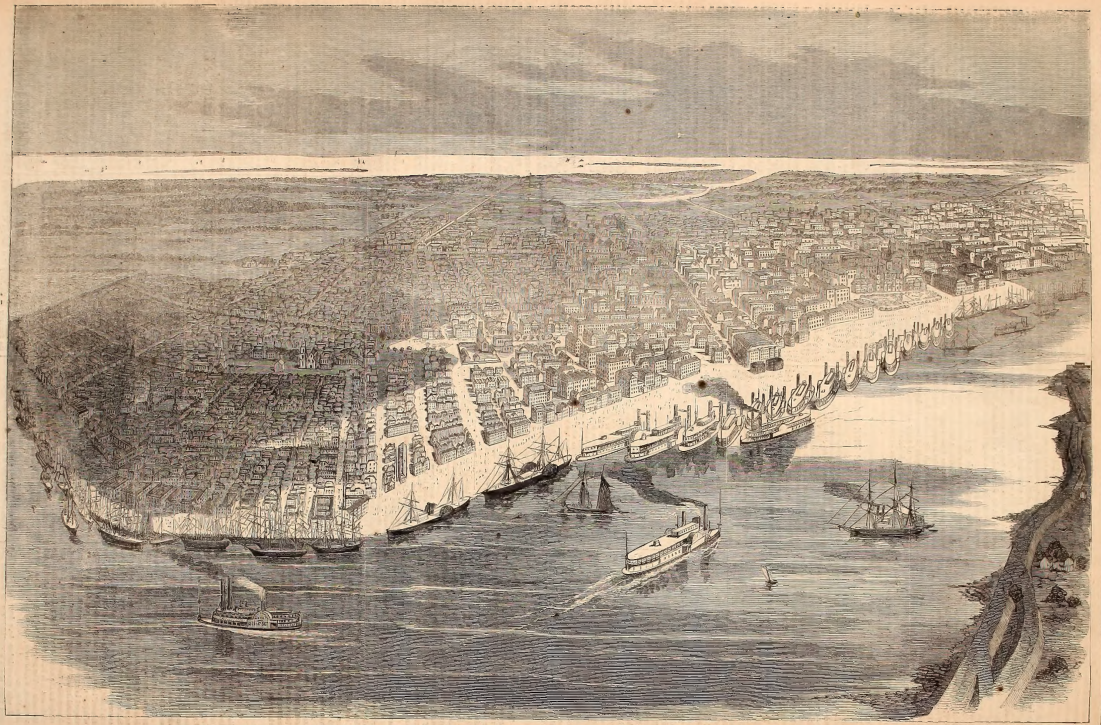
DEATH OF GENERAL SMITH.

Major-General C. F. Smith died at Savannah, Tennessee, on Saturday afternoon, of dysentery. General Smith was taken sick at the time of the battle of Pittsburgh by the forces under him, and has been suffering and sinking slowly for some weeks, though his condition was not thought to be dangerous until the past week. His family have been at his bedside for days, and on their way to Savannah.

THE FRENCH MINISTER IN SECESSIA.

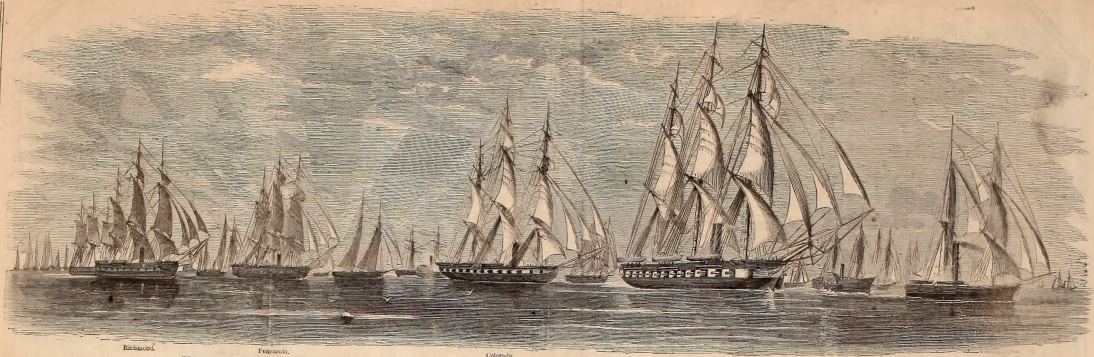
The French Minister returned from Richmond last week to his residence in Washington. He has left Secessia but, of course, not treasonized, but dispatches were at once forwarded to him by the Count de Persigny, Ambassador to France. No published importance, it would appear, is attached to Washington to the visit of M. Mercier to the rebel capital.

FOREIGN NEWS.



ENGLAND.

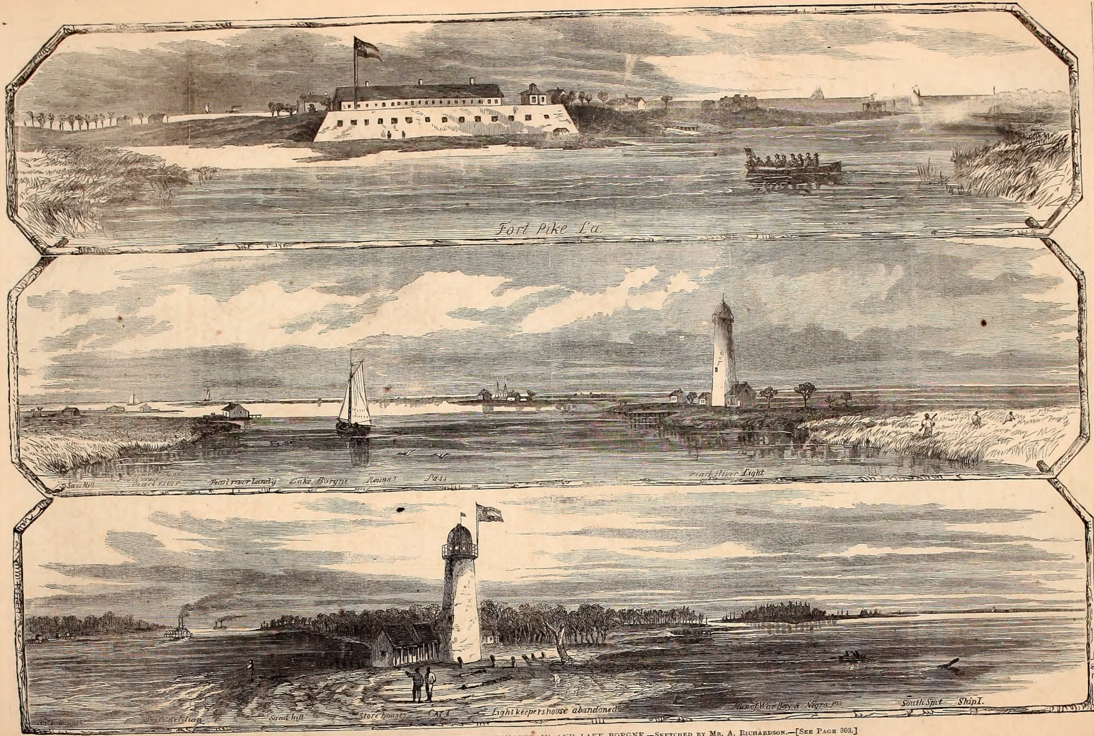
THE NAVY PANIC.



WHEN has been a panic in London unless vessels in every dock yard in England, and all hands are engaged in getting ready for sea? The Admiralty is interested in creating a navy. Sir William Armstrong and Mr. Bidder have been called to counsel as to what guns can be made of sufficient power to destroy any iron plates now in use, and the Duke of Somerset has superintended the experiments at Shoeburyness, by order of the Admiralty, in that direction. The Duke of Somerset is a man with that one of his graces, of twelve inch weight, charged with fifty pounds of powder, and fired at a target of iron plates, at a distance of 200 yards, and the shot went through the target. The result will hasten forward the preparations for harbor defenses, and, for the present, increase the possibility of iron frigates from France bringing the dock-yards of England, and so forth. Captain Cowper Coles, R.N., offers to construct a vessel of very light draught of water which will destroy the Warrior in a short time.

ANOTHER PIRATE.

The Geiolo, a new and large steamer, sailed from Liverpool on the 24th of March, destined, we are supposed, for the rebel service in America. She is adapted for a heavy armament, and has a crew of 100 men. She has also on board her gun in some foreign port before running against the Union blockade for the rebels.



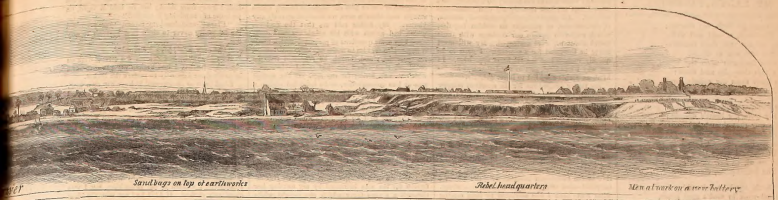
THE CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, TAKEN BY THE UNION FORCES, APRIL 24, 1862.—[SEE PAGE 303.]

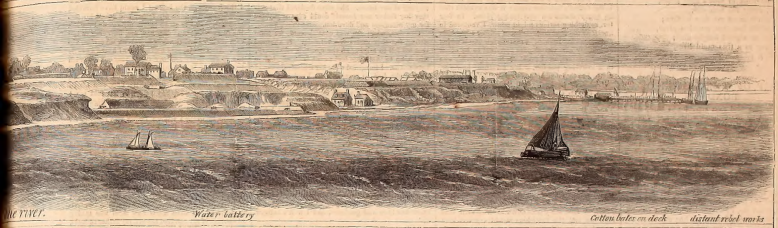
FLAG-OFFICER FARRAGUT'S GULF SQUADRON, AND COMMODORE PORTER'S MORTAR FLEET.—From a Sketch by our Special Artist on Board the Flag-Ship.—[See Page 303.]

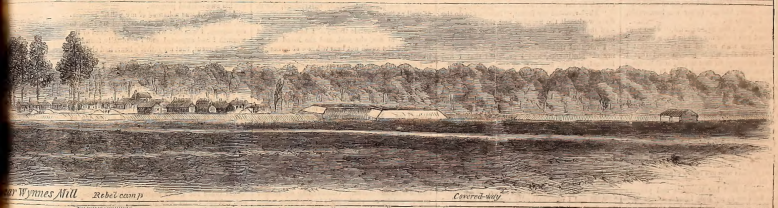
RECONNOISSANCE OF FORTS JACKSON AND ST. PHILIP, ON THE MISSISIPPI, BY GUN-BOATS FROM FLAG-OFFICER FARRAGUT'S SQUADRON.—Sketched by our Special Artist with the Squadron.—[See Page 303.]

THE APPROACHES TO NEW ORLEANS BY LAKE PONTCHARTRAIN AND LAKE BORGNE.—Sketched by Mr. A. Richardson.—[See Page 303.]

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER FROM ITS MOUTH TO CAIRO, SHOWING NEW ORLEANS, MEMPHIS, FORT WRIGHT, ISLAND NUMBER TEN, COLUMBUS, ETC.







Portion of Rebel battery at Winnes Mill, the gun which wounded Lieut Wagner.

YORKTOWN, GLOUCESTER, AND SCENES IN THE CAMPS

Baxter's Zouaves making a road through the woods in front of Yorktown.

E YORKTOWN.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 299.]

MY LADY'S FARMWELL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

Go forth, go forth, my dearest;
The world is wild and wide,
But 'tis not that thou fearest—
Not that can us divide.
I bless the cross upon thy breast,
I kiss thee—lip and brow:
Go forth upon thy saintly quest,
And keep thy knighly vow.

Go forth, my bravest, boldest—
My own, my heart's delight!
This tear that thou beholdest
Stains not thy armor bright:
The Christian armor, bright as strong,
In which I made thee dress,
The sword, to hew down mortal wrong,
The knee-pads, righteousness.

Go forth, my best beloved!
And trust in God's dear grace,
That, every foe removed,
Thou'lt have time to face;
But if He not that guerdon gives,
Die, as a good knight dies;
Bring us a true maid lives,
We'll meet in Paradise.

OUT OF THE HOUSE OF BONDAGE.

My mother died soon after I was born, and I was petted by my father until the whole country began to call me in Canada for education. I remained under the care of a kind family at Quebec until I had attained the age of sixteen, when my father called me home to keep house for him, as he was very lonely, and his health was giving way.

My father had desired that I should be taught by the best masters that could be obtained, and no expense was to be spared in my education.

I had lived a happy life in Canada, and Mrs. Summers, the lady under whose care I had been placed, loved me as a mother. I believe she loved me as she did her own daughter. She was most unwilling to part with me, and wished to retain me for another year; but my father was inexorable, and home I had to go.

"My dear," said she as we parted, "when your father placed you under my care he knew what my sentiments were on the subject of Slavery, and was opposed to the whole system, and that I looked with contempt on that feeling as abhorrence which is universally manifested, even in the Free States, for all persons of negro descent. To my surprise," she continued, "I expected to my never suppressing my opinions before you, and now I look to you, my dear" (she earnestly pressed my hand), "to do all that may be in your power to mitigate the horrors of the system, and endeavor to raise the character of those unfortunate beings whom your father has told me is that, if it shall please God to grant you the glorious privilege of emancipating any one of them, you may feel that you have the satisfaction of feeling that you have conferred freedom on persons who are really capable of benefiting by the blessing."

She promised that her thoughts and prayers should be with me in my holy task.

I was only sixteen when I went to my father's to live, in a very hot-bed of slavery. If I had been older, perhaps I might have withstood for a great time the force of example and custom. I say perhaps, for I have known men and women coming out from free England resisting the system of the bush for a certain time, and then gradually succumbing to it. I say that because even ladies of good education use the cowhide until the feminine softness of the eye was changed to a tyrannical hardness.

But I did for a time strive to do some good, beginning with those placed immediately under me. I did this, too, under great discouragement; for my father was very stern with his slaves whenever at home, told me with stern decision that I must at once forget all the sentimental trash I had learned in the North, for I ventured indeed to say a word about kindness.

"Kindness, my girl? I feed my niggers well, and clothe them well, don't overwork them, nurse them when they are sick or old; but if I were to rule with what you call kindness none of them would be found a rod in three months."

The slaves about us were certainly demons indeed. My kindness and all hope by it were unceremoniously kind and indulgent—was mistaken for weakness. I was despised. The word of a woman was wretchedly attended to. Then my father interfered; his remedy was effectual, and every thing went well with me.

I became weary and disheartened, but I had still one great hope in which I fancied that I had an appeal to reason and affection. Surely, I thought, with human beings, however low, there must be a response to such an appeal, that respects being the proof of their humanity. The very strength of my power in this matter led to error. I made my attempt with great earnestness and resolution, and signally failed. To mention one instance—there was a child specially appointed to wait on me. I devoted hours of labor to the task of developing a better nature in the child, but it was all vain. My shallow vanity led me to believe that what I had done was remedy enough for all her defects of a moral growth, for all her dwarfing from the cradle, and in consequence of my failure, I gradually adopted the creed that man and woman with African blood in their veins belonged to a lower humanity; that there was a great gulf fixed between their nature and mine that we really could not be equal in the sight of God.

I succeeded in making myself feared, and all things then, to my father's great satisfaction, apparently went well in the house; but, looking back now, I can see how terribly my own nature was affected. All those valuable qualities of patience, of forbearance, of restraint on sudden impulse, which ought to govern our dealings with those round about us, were destroyed. My will must never be thwarted for a moment. I grew to be quickly incensed at the slightest opposition. In a way I was kind, just as my father was kind—kind, as people are kind to lower animals.

My father praised me for the excellent manner in which the household arrangements were now conducted.

"I let you come round of yourself to common sense, my dear," he said, with a smile. "I knew six months would teach you the proper kindness for niggers."

At this period, to strengthen me still further in my impious creed, came my introduction to my cousin, Abel Duncan.

I had stood from my window a stranger arrive at the house—on business with my father, I suppose—and I was struck by his noble air. After some time I was attracted by loud talking in my father's business-room; it was evident that an angry dispute was taking place. In fear lest something serious might occur, I ventured to knock at the door on pretence of asking a question about household affairs. From the few words which caught my ears the dispute appeared to be about money matters, and I could hear that my father was in a towering passion. My presence, however, seemed to act as a restraint upon them.

"Clara!" he exclaimed, "here's your cousin Abel I've so often told you about; go and kiss him, and then go and order tea. I'll settle with you my own quick, recollect."

I went toward him at my father's bidding, but my cousin seemed to shrink away from me. I attributed this at the time to bashfulness.

"Is that your daughter, Duncan?" in a passionate voice. And then my cousin came forward and gave me a kiss, but the kiss seemed to kiss through his lips.

"Your cousin Abel comes from the North," said my father; "so you two can worship the biggest together."

"Uncle knows how I worship them," laughed Abel, "and my aunt and cousins, too, that look on me as the Britishers would cry out loud enough for every one of the colonies to disregard."

"Ah!" returned my father, "leave us to do the dirty work—all the flogging and that sort, hey? And then forget the cuts, the cowhide, the clank bands?"

I felt that this badinage was directed against my old sentiments, and I protested that I had learned, at least, how to treat negroes.

"Ah, ha! Abel, you hear? Cowhide for ever!"

There was something vindictive in his voice and in the gleam of his eyes which jarred me through and through.

In the progress of our acquaintance I could see as regarded myself, notwithstanding the outward respect he showed me, that he entertained no real respect for me. I could see it in his manner. I could detect, moreover, a certain fulsomeness of manner in his attentions to me, which seemed to border an apparently frank and outspoken demeanor; still, there was nothing sufficiently tangible for me to ask notice of, and my mind was not strongly prepossessing my father in his favor.

Abel and I were thrown much even a great deal together, and though I could not help disliking him, there was one sad cause which gave him a certain power to fascinate me. That was, there were certain times when the good teaching I had received from Mrs. Summers would, defying all my efforts to strangle the thoughts, start up in judgment within me—times, perhaps, when my temper had been sorely tried—when I had been made a slave to the overseer for chastisement. Then, when a distant cry of anguish broke upon my ear, the doubt would come, Are they human or not? at best I might; the girl had shamefully neglected her duties, and I had punished her, and with full fully perverse. It was not difficult to square the doubt with reason; but still, doubt remained. Much if it were possible for me to be a human being created as myself in the image of God, and that this girl was a human being, and had been in a debasement, destroying that work of His, and leveling her to the condition of the brute?

Abel was always ready to answer my doubts, and afford me fresh faith in my new creed. With blasphemous ingenuity he would quote to the Bible itself in confirmation of all he asserted as to the inferiority of the African race; he would tear it, in very truth, from the wrath of God stamped in the very form of the forehead; that they were declared to be doomed to be servants of servants even to the end of time; that their mental capacity was so low that they could only be ruled by fear. His blasphemous sophistry was a comparative relief to me, and I was only too ready to quiet all he advanced.

I recollect now what diffidence ingenuity he used to compare the deep of color in the negro skin lurking in the frame. He would attain that peculiar tone which, to be good enough, up to a certain extent, and for a certain period, but, like insanity, the black fibre would be certain, sooner or later, to work to the surface and make the fair moral nature would be thrown out of balance. He would quote to me the terrible outbreaks of the soul by Quadroon women with their fair faces and devilish hearts—yes, men even whom he had known, who had inherited fortune and high education, and life itself.

I fear his words found a readier respons in an under-current of pride which caused me to rejoice in my own exhilation above the debased race. Looking back, however, to my feelings at that period, I think it was owing rather to Abel's frequent reiteration of his opinion than to any logical considerations of my own that I came to acquiesce in the principle which he so strongly asserted. Abel had been systematically poisoned my soul.

My father was not on terms of intimacy with any of the families in the neighborhood, and, with the exception of one or two old bachelor friends whose estates were close to ours, we received scarcely any visitors. My father told me that the coolness which had arisen with his neighbors was occasioned by some questions of property, which made it impossible for him to make any advances toward reconciliation; and though he regretted that he could not them afford me that social intercourse which was a solace for my age, yet the matter was of less consequence, as he intended within a year or two to realize his property and proceed to Europe, where I should enjoy all the pleasures and amusements of society.

Abel's father, who was an English doctor, a widower with an only daughter, came to settle in our neighborhood. There was some difficulty in finding a residence for them. The Evans, and my father, who was very hospitable, insisted on their taking up their residence with us until they could be suited. Dr. Evans and his daughter was about my own age, and we soon became great friends. Her affection for me was evinced by my nursing her through a severe fever which she caught while visiting at our house. She often declared that she never could have recovered but could ever repay me for my attention and devotion.

One day, when she was convalescent, we were sitting together under the veranda. It chanced that we fell to talking on the question of slavery, and I, in the course of my remarks, made use of a bitterness. I imagined what her sentiments would be, as she was recently left England, and I begged her to speak without reserve to me; but I cautioned her that it would be prudent, in a general way, to suppress anti-slavery opinions.

In the warmth of our conversation we had forgotten Abel, who had been standing by us, listening. I shuddered as I caught his hateful smile, and felt a dread as his knowing how entirely I was at present in his power.

"Abel," said I, "you will explain this matter to Miss Evans better than I can."

He only smiled in reply, with a sneer; "you understand it perfectly."

"It's no time for belief!" exclaimed Mary Evans. "Why, Clara tells me that one drop of black blood could destroy her very nature. I don't believe any goodness, and I won't believe it."

"It's the opinion generally entertained, North as well as South," replied Abel.

Mary turned earnestly to me, and prayed me to discard such false theory. I had been good and kind to her, she said, an I she loved me so much that she could not bear to know of a thought like this having a place in my mind.

I could not deny my convictions, and the subject was at last dropped; but I felt that I had destroyed the bond of sympathy which until then existed between us.

I don't think I have mentioned the extreme indulgence and tenderness which my father showed toward me. My wishes and fancies were almost immediately gratified, and the only return he seemed to desire was my company and my presence. He was much engrossed in my singing and playing, overwhelmed me with praise, and always bidding me to reward a speedy journey to Europe, and a happy life in the Old World.

All this time I became more and more tyrannical, more exacting, and petulant in my intercourse with the slaves. One evening my temper was roused by the awkward fear of a young negress then usually careless and inattentive. In my anger I struck her. She was much fairer than the other of her station, and consequently by far the most troublesome of all.

To my amazement she muttered a few words in an undertone. This drove me frantic, but I mastered my feeling of indignation. When I recovered myself, I found that she should be severely punished for the insult she had shown me, and in the greatest anger hurried down to my father. He and Abel were sitting together under the veranda. He perceived how greatly I was moved, and, with his usual indulgence, asked me the cause of my grievance. It was disgusting and painful to me even to whisper the girl's words in his ear.

Yet, indignant and angry as I was, I felt terrified by the excess of my father's rage.

"I'll make her mind out of her," he exclaimed, "if the punishment goes within an inch of her life. And all the niggers on the plantation shall see it done."

It haunts my conscience to-this day that I did not fall on my knees and plead for my father to save the girl. Her prayer for mercy rings in my ears even now. You will marvel, notwithstanding the influence which I had acquired over Abel, that I came to bring to suffer extreme pain for the purpose of appeasing my selfish feelings; you will naturally think that I was dead to every generous and noble impulse. Yet you must remember that I had just heard Mary Evans, who was a comparative stranger to me, at the peril of my own life.

Abel had followed my father out when the girl was dragged out. He returned in about half an hour. "Clara," said he, "we've taught her not to say another word to a slave, and she won't forget the lesson in a hurry."

The tone in which he uttered this nettled me. "Abel," I exclaimed, "you have spoiled the girl, prevented you from pairing me by a repetition of her words."

He effected me a very elaborate apology; but I could see that a sneer remained on his lips.

I retired to my room, and in my agitation I drew from my bosom the miniature locket I was accustomed to wear, and bursting into tears, I exclaimed, "My dear, fair, beautiful mother to be called a slave!"

"What's that?" cried Abel. "My aunt's portrait! How did you get it?"

I had just discovered it one day in my father's desk. I had begged him as a great favor to let me have it for my mother's sake. He had refused me point-blank at first. At last I had teased him into compliance.

My father entered the room. I tried to git the locket away from Abel; but he held it tight, on pretense of examining it carefully.

"Clara!" exclaimed my father, "you promised me that I should have to show that portrait to any one."

"But only Abel, papa," I pleaded.

He said that he had expressed a strong wish on the subject—that I had broken my promise—and he ordered me instantly to restore the locket.

I had been so accustomed to have my own way, playing and trifling with any wishes of his that thwarted mine, and always recovering it by something him in the end, that I refused to give up the miniature. I ought to have considered how irritated the events of the night had made him. He stepped forward, and, seizing my hand, wrenched the locket from me; then, in his anger at my opposition, he struck me a blow with a switch he held in his hand.

The pain was scarcely any thing; it was the indignity—and Abel standing by with a smile of triumph! I wanted to say something, but I was absolutely choked. If Abel had not seen the blow I think even on the instant I could have humbled myself, and forgiven my father and asked his forgiveness. But to stoop before my cousin! I left the room with proud defiance, and shut myself to my own room locked the door and threw myself on the bed. After the lapse of half an hour I heard a gentle tap at the door, and my name pronounced with tenderness. It was my father's voice. I felt that he wanted to ask forgiveness, and I should have given words to have opened the door and kissed him; but my wretched pride, which told me I could retain the love by keeping my dignity in Abel's eyes, held me still.

Next morning I felt my father was longing for reconciliation, but that former wretched sense of Abel caused me to be cold and sullen.

I had not yet learned that the man I so detested should have stood thus between my father's heart and mine. My father's affection these years greatly excited against Abel by reports of his conduct with one of the women on the plantation. Far above the strongest sense of morality was indignation for his degradation, and I could not endure the thought of being humbled in the presence of a man I heartily despised. Abel, with keen foresight, was taking advantage of my conduct toward my father to work out his own wicked purpose.

At length I was ashamed of my willful perversity, and eagerly courted a reconciliation; then, to my surprise, I was met with estrangement of the warmth I had expected, and I gradually found, to my astonishment, that my father's heart had changed toward me.

Though I was mortified, yet when I thought over the matter in quieter moments I blamed my own heart. It would almost seem something were wanting in my nature. I might have known that something was inward wanting in my nature. There were certain little matters connected with the mode of life which the slaves looked upon as so being odd; they had relation chiefly to my father's little intercourse with his neighbors. In my inexperience I could not judge of these things over, and the more I thought of them the less satisfactorily I could explain them which would make the whole matter plain and consistent.

That reason was beyond my power was so manifestly impossible that I was able to laugh it away. "Stupid fancy!" I exclaimed, gazing in the glass, and gladly gathering my self-love features as a remembrance to the features of the miniature. Still, at moments, the doubt returned again, and more particularly when any question arose as to my going into society.

This painful thought was aroused one day by my father's objecting to my going to a public ball at which I had heard Mary Evans was to be present. I had been under the impression that all the same inadequate objections. I had been spending the glass, and gladly gathering my features, she had made no allusion to the ball. We were sitting together in the evening, and I held her hand affectionately in mine, when I saw Abel observer whose was the smaller. It was nature, born as I was, of a slave mother, and considered as had no less fair than hers, yet my hand was but little darker. I alluded casually to the ball, saying that I hoped I was to be present at it with her, and then from her lips came the same excuses, spoken with the same tone and confidence. I glanced hand again, gazing on the two hands with deep anxiety. The comparison reassured me; the haunting idea left me. It was more creature of my own morbid fancy; and the words I said then to Mary Evans were said in very mockery of my fears. "You shall have me to the ball because of the negro blood in my veins."

I departed, laughing answer. I trembled when I saw the deep compassion expressed in her face.

"Alas! who has broken the secret to you? she asked, mournfully. I could not recall, could not tell her that it was she who in those words had revealed the fearful truth.

My senses seemed numbed. I was barely conscious that she assured me of her love, covered my hands with kisses, and prayed me to be calm. My heart felt like stone. Love itself was loathsome in the thought of its connection with a type were set in rigid coldness. A frightful gulf seemed fixed between us which no human love could bridge. I pushed her passionately from me, and left the room. Ah, that fearful ride! Abel had been also at the Evanses, and he was to return with me. I would have given any thing to have been alone, but I was already in the carriage before he got in, and I seemed to have lost all power of will, and all womanly dignity.

He sat at my side without speaking a word, but I was sure he knew that I had learned the secret of my birth. Then I knew why it was that on our first visit he had disliked to kiss me as his cousin, why all his manner toward me had so peared so false, why he had taken so much pleasure in proclaiming the degradation of the negro race. He sat quite silent, but I could read his thoughts. I who had deemed myself his lawful cousin, his equal by right of birth, his superior in every gift of soul, so that if, as the only child of a rich planter, he should have the presumption to make me an offer of marriage I had resolved to spurn him away with contempt—I shuddered and crouched away from him—knew that in his vile thoughts he held me no higher than that wretched girl he had abused. He pray me to be his wife! The very laws forbade my being the Christian wife of any white man! His contemptuous silence awed me; he sat perfectly still, letting me sink to the floor of the carriage.

The daughter of a slave! That dreadful idea turned the current of my thoughts from Abel, and the blow my father had struck me burned anew like fire; but that girl who had suffered the torture of the lash for my sake! The recollection of that night flashed into my mind, crushing me with an overwhelming remorse. Her nature was the same as mine; there was the same dark blood in our veins; the same capacity for moral elevation, the same capacity for pain, God forgive me! My crime struck home.

I resolved to see the girl before entering the house. Her forgiveness would, I felt, ease the load on my heart.

I found my way in the dark, as well as I could, to the negro huts, and discovered where she was being nursed. She was lying asleep on a mat, but the old woman who attended on her had not gone to bed.

"Is she nearly recovered?"

"She is."

"Was the punishment very severe?"

I felt the utmost anguish at the woman's answer.

No one had been so severely flogged on the plantation for years!

I sank on my knees at the girl's side. By this time she had awoke. I poured forth my words of contrition, and my scalding tears fell on her hand, which I grasped in mine. She was partly dazed with sleep, but both she and the old woman gazed on me with astonishment. My behavior was so utterly incomprehensible to them. To ask pardon of a slave was an idea beyond the limit of their thoughts. And even then as I knelt there, with the sense of my own wickedness fall upon me, I could scarcely bring myself to believe that I was praying forgiveness of a being who partook to the full of my own humanity!

It was only when I told the girl I had discovered that she had spoken the truth—that I knew that I was the daughter of a slave—it was only then that their senses were aroused; fear was strongly visible on their countenances; the girl started forward, and vehemently contradicted me. No, no! I was Mr. Duncan's child, she cried, and the perspiration stood out on her brow. She piteously implored me to leave her, lest she should be again punished owing to my having come to the hut.

I assured them both, again and again, that they had no occasion for fear in speaking about the truth. The old woman then told me that before I was brought home my father had given the strictest injunctions, enforced with stern threats, to every body on the plantation, that not a word should ever be breathed to me concerning my birth; and that it was to show his determination in the matter that he had made such a severe example of the poor girl.

Stronger even than my bitter feelings of remorse for the suffering I had caused was the anxious desire which possessed me to hear the account of my real mother—my own mother, notwithstanding her misery, and degradation, and shame. At first the old woman would not speak. I swore not to reveal a word of her statement; in my passionate eagerness I threatened, coaxed, bribed her. At last I forced the story bit by bit from her most unwilling tongue.

She had nursed my mother when she died, and had nursed me when I was born. To the best of her recollection, my mother had died where the girl was then lying before my eyes, and I too had been born in that very hut.

"How did she die?" I inquired, eagerly. And then I became so nervously fearful lest she should in any degree conceal the truth from me, that by force of old habit I threatened her with the most severe chastisement if I should ever find that she had deceived me one iota.

But my hasty threat brought punishment on my own head; for when I repeated my question the woman looked significantly toward the girl. Then came the frightful conviction that my mother herself had suffered the very pain I had so often been the means of inflicting. On my knees I prayed the old woman's forgiveness for my threat, and I poured all the money I had in my purse into her lap.

My mother died of a broken heart, the woman said. She had been sold away from her children. As far as I could understand the account, she had at first been treated with degrading kindness and indulgence; but nothing could drive a cloud of past love from her brow, and in spite of her beauty she grew wearisome.

"But when I was born?" I asked, anxiously. "Was she happier then—did she forget the past a little in her love for me?"

In the woman's answer a curse seemed to fall on my head. I had never been blessed with a mother's smile. I had been nursed with hatred on her bosom; my very life had been saved out of her hands! And so she had lain down to die, lying where that beaten girl was then lying. I kissed the girl in pity for her sufferings; my tears fell wet upon her face; but every kiss seemed to bring me nearer to my dead mother, and to all her sorrow and all her shame.

If I had been left to myself I should not have returned home that night, but the old woman, partly by force, partly by persuasion, led me up to the entrance of the house.

I could not endure the thought of meeting my father, and I stole on tip-toe past the room where he and Abel were sitting. My father must have seen the conflict of that night written on my face when he met me the next morning. I believe his heart was moved with pity, for he came forward to kiss me; but I involuntarily shrank from him before his lips touched mine. An irresistible influence seemed to drag me away.

He called me to him, but I had no power to move.

Then his indignation was excited; he upbraided me for my ingratitude; true, I had discovered the secret of my birth, though he had done all in his power to hide it from me; but yet the knowledge of my origin ought only to have increased my affection and gratitude. He reminded me that I had been treated as the daughter of the house, though my mother was a slave. All that education could do had been done for me; but he feared it was only too true that there was some radical perversion in natures such as mine which unfitted them for love.

Oh! It was intolerable anguish to hear such words from his lips, and to feel, as I did then feel, that they were true.

He finally told me with great sternness that although I was free—free beyond all question or doubt—yet my future destiny depended on my own behavior. Whether I gave him my heart or not—he had once looked for a daughter to solace his old age, but that hope was gone—he would at least have a return for the money spent upon me. I should amuse him, read and play to him as heretofore, and arrange the household affairs; I should suffer for it if I failed.

Abel entirely usurped my place in my father's heart. The affection and indulgence which had been mine were lavished upon him. I had stood between him and his hope, as nearest lawful heir, of inheriting my father's wealth; there was no longer any danger that I should spoil his prospects.

He still kept up the show of treating me with great outward respect: taking care, however, that the crushing thought of my degradation should be continually before me; for he well knew that thought to be the main cause of my estrangement from my father.

There was no one to support me through this heavy trial. Mary Evans, indeed, was true; she would twine her arms round me, drawing me affectionately to her bosom, protesting an eternal friendship; yet I felt at those times more than ever my isolation. Her nature was not my nature; the drop of dark blood and the iron hand of the law had decreed our separation; her pity might be as great and as good as the pity of an angel, but it could not afford that blessed consolation which arises from the possession of a common nature liable to the same trials and the same sufferings.

Do not imagine that this was merely a morbid fancy of mine; its truth was too evident in the ordinary intercourse of life. When Mary Evans and Abel and I were sitting together, and he talked in a bantering tone of some friends of his who had fallen in love with us, his words amounted to no more than familiar badinage, to which the laughing retort of Mary Evans formed, on her part, a fitting answer. But those same words addressed to me were laden with unutterable shame, bringing a burning blush to my cheeks.

But the lash—ah me! the day of retribution had come. While I was yet responsible for all household matters, the ability to command had left me, and the slaves knew it, as the horse knows an unskilful rider. I dared not punish. The thought of my own mother, and the knowledge that I was ordering a creature of like nature with myself to be lashed, tied my tongue and held my hand. Things were often neglected, and my father would receive no excuses for any shortcomings he discovered. I had the means of punishment, he said, and he would summon the overseer, and force me to give the order for punishment. Sometimes in his irritation at what he termed my stupid "nigger-worship," he would strike me, even in the presence of Abel, with his switch.

There was a clergyman, a Mr. Graham, a neighbor of ours, who occasionally visited at our house. He was an old man, toward whom I entertained the strongest feelings of respect and veneration; it was impossible not to be attracted by the tenderness of his manner, and by the strong but unobtrusive piety which marked his demeanor. When I tell you that he held slaves, you will in all probability smile at the thought of his tenderness and utterly deny his piety. Yet he was not a hypocrite. I will mention, by way of illustration, that memorable instance of the great leader of the Evangelical party in past days—the pious John Newton, of Olney, successor of Whitfield, and intimate friend of Cowper. Well, he was in his earlier days a slave-trader, the master of a slave ship. On board his vessel, as I have read, the negroes were packed together like herrings, stifled, sick, and broken-hearted. But, separated by a single plank from his victims, the voice of their jailer might be heard, day by day, conducting the prayers of his ship's company, and joining them in singing devout compositions of his own. He experienced on his last voyage to Guinea—these are his own words—"sweeter and more frequent hours of Divine communion" than he had ever elsewhere known. Even in his old age, long after he had entered the Church, holding a conspicuous position as a Christian minister, honored and revered by a large congregation, he coldly and phlegmatically avowed his participation in the slave-trade; and to the last he was little conscious of the heinousness of his guilt.

Mr. Graham would have resisted as indignantly any assertion that the negroes are the intellectual and moral equals of the white race, as he would have opposed the theory that mankind at large have been developed from monkeys.

Yet it was impossible for him to be harsh or severe to any living creature. No trouble was too great, if he could only alleviate pain and suffering wherever they might exist. When any slave chanced to be ill, he would watch with the utmost solicitude at the bedside, speaking the kindest words, and noting every change which took place in the patient. An ordinary observer would have marveled at such devotion, and would have felt the greatest admiration for such conduct on the part of a man toward his poorer fellows; but Mr. Graham never for a moment entertained the idea that the sufferer was bound to him by the bond of a coequal humanity. He would have acted—indeed I have known him act—with the same tenderness toward a poor dog which had been, by accident, severely wounded. In his establishment, both slaves and lower animals were equally spoiled; but, as a matter of principle, he would have no more thought of denying that the lash was, at times, necessary for the correction of slaves, than he would have denied that it was necessary for the correction of brute creatures.

One day, in an agony of despair, I threw myself at Mr. Graham's feet, and poured out all my sorrow. His manner was very kind and affectionate—but still that taint of blood! I read the thought in his words of tender pity. He evidently felt that there was some difference in our respective natures—a radical defect existing in mine, which demanded his deepest sympathy. The same sort of conversation might have taken place between us on the supposition that some slight germ of insanity existed in my mind, so slight that my reasoning faculties were scarcely affected by it—so slight, in short, that there was every hope the evil might be overcome by healthy mental discipline and strict watchfulness.

My feeling of estrangement toward my father appeared to him unnatural, and not to be accounted for by any ordinary cause. He admitted that mine was a bitter trial; but yet my father had done all that lay in his power to lighten the burden. I had received the blessing of a good education. I had been brought up in the paths of religion and virtue. I had been associated, as far as possible, with my father's own friends and connections. I had been treated with the utmost affection and regard. I ought to humble myself to my father's will, and to strive to cast out the evil pride which hardened my heart. By God's grace I might hope to do it; but I must make earnest effort, using frequent prayer.

That interview with Mr. Graham only added to my despair. I had sought consolation of one for whom I felt the greatest reverence and respect; I had sought consolation where consolation may be most surely found—in religious converse and advice; but his words and love utterly failed to alleviate the sorrow of my heart. I little imagined at that time that what I looked upon with the utmost misery as being the dark depravity of my own heart was an intuitive sense of God's justice in rebellion against man's false principle and practice. My heart would not be humbled by prayer, but it was humbled by the endurance of ignominy. All pride was cast out of me at last. My cheek no longer flushed at the vile yet cleverly hidden insinuations of Abel. I had lost all sense of degradation in a blow from my father. I was callous to all affronts from the visitors who now frequented my father's house for Abel's pleasure and amusement.

Shut out from earthly hope and heavenly consolation, I felt that I was gradually sinking to the level of the wretched beings around me. My mother had claimed me as her own—the inheritor of her nature and her degradation. I suppose it could only have been a question of time how long my bodily strength would have endured this fearful conflict of feeling. The end came at last.

My father was taken dangerously ill. It was my duty to nurse him; and then, God be thanked! I experienced a gleam of relief. I could love him with some of my old love when he was in pain, for those social ties which had estranged me from him were lost in the sick room. There seemed, in some strange way, to be a bond of union, arising from his sufferings, which bound him to my dead mother and myself. Alas! it was but a slender link.

The hasty vehemence of health and a passionate disposition left him now; he became very mild in his manner, thoughtful beyond his wont, and his thoughts turned heavenward. Mr. Graham frequently came to visit him, reading and conversing on religious matters.

My father, one day, when we chanced to be alone, gave me his keys and bade me get the miniature from his desk. He held it a while feebly in his hands, gazing fondly upon it, and then made me fasten it by a ribbon round his neck. From that period his thoughts, with few intermissions, centred in the recollections of his wife. Her name was always on his lips, uttered with terms of endearment. All his hope was to meet her again, and be with her in heaven. Not one word, through all this, not one thought, of my mother! I used to sit at his bedside, my heart ready to burst, hoping and praying that the remembrance of the shameful past might rise up in his mind. They told me that the slightest excitement might be fatal to him, so my tongue was bound to silence.

One night my father desired to be left alone with Mr. Graham. I was told to leave the room; but I stole back, crouching behind a curtain. There was something still on his mind which troubled him. It had no reference to my mother. Mr. Graham cheered him with Christian hope and consolation. I could endure it no longer. I arose from my hiding-place and stood before them.

"My mother!" I exclaimed; "has he prayed forgiveness for that wrong?"

Mr. Graham was startled by my presence. "He has repented," was the reply, "of the grievous sin which gave you existence. I have the fullest confidence in his repentance."

"But his sin against my mother!" I cried; for some feeling I could not resist impelled me to speak out. "Torn away from her husband and children—sold away to infamy and shame—that is the sin I speak of!"

"You speak," answered Mr. Graham, "as if this act had been done to some white woman living in holy matrimony."

I burst into tears and fled from the room.

They never let me see him again; they never forgave me what I had said. Toward the end, they told me he became very calm, lying a while almost insensible, with the miniature clasped in his hand. Then, with a last convulsive effort, he stretched forth his arms, as if in the act of clasping some form to his bosom, and crying aloud the name he loved so well, fell back and died.

The Evanses took me away to their house. I was in the greatest need of comfort and support. The misery which appeared to arise from the innate defect of my nature was wrought to its utmost pitch. I felt that I was guilty of hastening my father's death, and that the inherent defect of my nature was to blame for my guilt.

Abel succeeded in all his plans. The bulk of the property was left to him: a moderate competency only being reserved for me. But the loss of wealth seemed nothing in comparison with the dark taint left upon me.

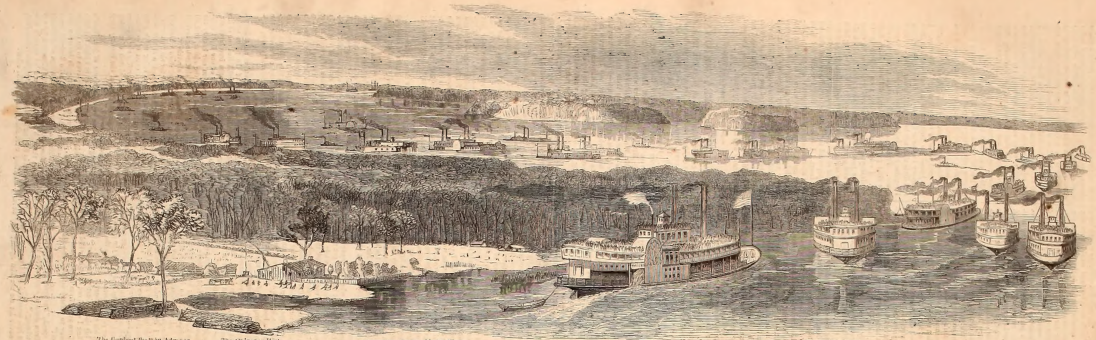
It was long before my bodily health sufficiently recovered to allow of my leaving the Evanses. I then joined the Summerses in Canada, and in their company I came to England. It was only by little and little that my broken spirit was built up; that I regained my feeling of self-respect, of self-confidence. Free! At first it seemed utterly marvelous that people in England did not shrink from me. I could not for a long time believe in the possibility of being loved and treated as an equal by the pure white race. They used to think me cold and proud, when in reality I was holding back in the misery of my old sense of inferiority, and my old fear of insult. Mrs. Summers and her daughter supported my faltering confidence and cheered my heart. I told them that I would not have their friends deceived in respect of my personal history, and I was astonished when I found that this knowledge only elicited for me the warmest sympathy and regard. Every lingering doubt was dispelled one day, when those words, which in my own land would have covered me with shame were whispered in my ear, and the good man asked me to be his wife, who has been my kind husband these many and many happy years.

OUR ARMY BEFORE YORKTOWN.

We continue this week, on pages 289, 296, and 297, our series of sketches of the military operations at Yorktown, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. A. R. Waud, and Mr. Mead of the Vermont Brigade. Pages 296 and 297 contain a view of Yorktown from the River, Gloucester also from the River, and the Rebel Works at Wynn's Mill, and two other war pictures. Our artist, Mr. Waud, thus describes these pictures:

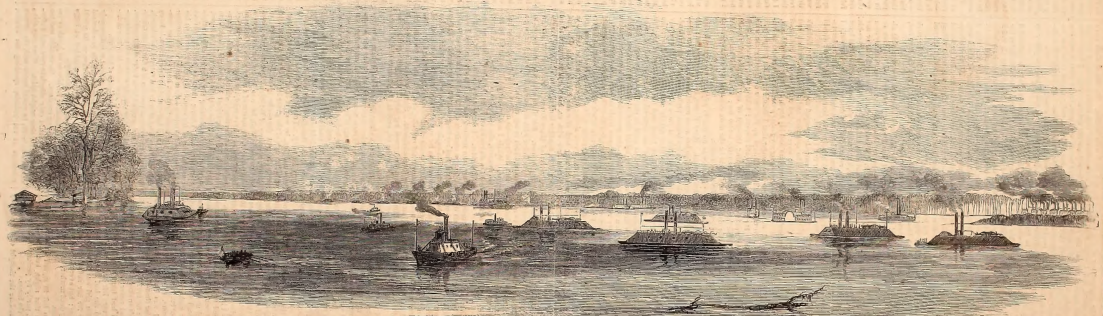
"The view of 'Yorktown from the River' was sketched from Farinholt's house—a position on the river from which Gloucester and Yorktown can both be seen. The works at Yorktown consist of fortifications extending along the top of the bluffs, running far inland, and a water-battery on the beach. The little dock on the point is a very busy spot. Schooners are constantly going and coming, unloading men and stores. Wagons crowd the adjacent beach, attended by crowds of men, horse and foot. On the water-battery three very heavy guns are mounted; and there is another, partly hidden by the sand-bags, on the little fort to the right. Above, on the table-land, are numerous works for the defense of the water-front of the position. Behind these the houses of Yorktown can be seen. It is a small place, and seems to be just such a place as Fairfax Court House. On the opposite side of the river is Gloucester—a much smaller place, but strongly fortified. Here is a water-battery of seven embrasures, and alongside of it a redoubt, mounting two heavy pieces, connected with the works on the heights by a long curtain. On the bluff the enemy is busy covering his guns with sand-bags.

"The rebel flag flaunts over these works at several points, marking the head-quarters of different commands, and there is a goodly number of hospital flags.



"The picture entitled 'Rebel Works at Wynn's Mills' is a view of a portion of the rebel works, from a point south of Yorktown, two or three miles from the river. It consists of a line of rifle-pits, with earth-works for guns behind, with occasional redoubts along the front. The course of the little stream which afterward becomes Warwick River is marked by the stockade which crosses it, where there is a dam. Beyond, to the left, the rifle-pits run into the woods, which are defended by stockades and logs fastened across from tree to tree. At one place in the sketch—marked by a distant horseman—is visible the covered way connecting the works. Here a carriage is occasionally seen, supposed to contain Jeff Davis.

"The 'Sketch of a Rebel Gun' is an enlarged view, taken through a glass, of the piece which wounded Lieutenant Wagner and killed one of his assistants. It seems to be a large iron howitzer, and was finally silenced by one of our light field-pieces. At every discharge from our battery the man on the right would give the alarm, and all would drop out of sight; notwithstanding several were wounded and carried off on stretchers.



"The holes on the fort beyond show where our shots struck uncomfortably near for the gunners.

"The country about Yorktown is a swamp covered with pines, little clearings being made here and there for farms. No roads exist of any account for military operations, therefore our soldiers have had to make them. The sketch of making roads is a good representation of the country they have to work through."

On page 289 we reproduce one of Mr. Mead's sketches. It illustrates the way in which the cowardly rebels force their negro slaves to do dangerous work. It represents a struggle between two negroes and a rebel captain, who insisted upon their loading a cannon within range of Berdan's Sharp-shooters. The affair was witnessed by our officers through a glass. The rebel captain succeeded in forcing the negroes to expose themselves, and they were shot, one after the other.

BIRDS-EYE VIEW OF THE FEDERAL FLOTILLA DESCENDING THE MISSISSIPPI TO ATTACK FORT WRIGHT.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 302.]

RECONNOISSANCE OF FORT WRIGHT BY THE GUN-BOATS AND MORTAR FLEET, APRIL 16, 1862.—SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 302.]

GENERAL QUINCY A. GILMORE.

We publish on this page a portrait of General Gilmore, the hero of Pulaski, from a photograph by Lieutenant Haas.

General Gilmore was born in Ohio, about thirty-six years ago. He entered the Military Academy at West Point in 1845, and graduated in 1849, at the head of a class of 43 members. He was appointed to the Engineers, and was promoted to a First Lieutenancy in 1856, and to a Captaincy in 1861. From 1849 to 1852 he was engaged on the fortifications at Hampton Roads; from 1852 to 1856 he was instructor of Practical Military Engineering at West Point, and during this time he designed the new Riding School on the crest of the Hill. He served from 1856 to 1861 as Purchasing Agent for the department in New York, and made many friends here. In 1861 he was assigned to the staff of General Sherman, and accompanied him to Port Royal. General Sherman appointed him Brigadier-General of Volunteers—a rank which it is hoped the President will confirm. General Gilmore had entire charge of the siege operations against Fort Pulaski, and it is to his skill that the success of the bombardment is due. The Tribune correspondent well says:

> The result of the efforts to breach a fort of such strength and at such a distance confers high honor on the engineering skill and self-reliant capacity of General Gilmore. Failure in an attempt made in opposition to the opinion of the ablest engineers in the army would have destroyed him. Success, which in this case is wholly attributable to his talent, energy, and independence, deserves a corresponding reward.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL QUINCY A. GILMORE.—[Photographed by Lieutenant Haas.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "Dead Secret," etc., etc.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN M'LENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

CHAPTER XIII.—(Continued.)

Miss Garth's hand still mechanically grasped the lawyer's arm. Her whole mind was absorbed in the effort to realize the discovery which had now burst on her.

"Dependent on Michael Vanstone!" she said to herself. "Dependent on their father's bitterest enemy! How can it be?"

"Give me your attention for a few minutes more," said Mr. Pendril, "and you shall hear. The sooner we can bring this painful interview to a close the sooner I can open communications with Mr. Michael Vanstone, and the sooner you will know what he decides on doing for his brother's orphan daughters. I repeat to you that they are absolutely dependent on him. You will most readily understand how and why, if we take up the chain of events where we last left it—at the period of Mr. and Mrs. Vanstone's marriage."

"One moment, Sir," said Miss Garth. "Were you in the secret of that marriage at the time when it took place?"

"Unhappily I was not. I was away from London—away from England at the time. If Mr. Vanstone had been able to communicate with me when the letter from America announced the death of his wife, the fortunes of his daughters would not have been now at stake."

He paused; and, before proceeding further, looked once more at the letters which he had consulted at an earlier period of the interview. He took one letter from the rest, and put it on the table by his side.

"At the beginning of the present year," he resumed, "a very serious business necessity, in connection with some West Indian property possessed by an old client and friend of mine, required the presence either of myself or of one of my two partners in Jamaica. One of the two could not be spared; the other was not in health to undertake the voyage. There was no choice left but for me to go. I wrote to Mr. Vanstone, telling him that I should leave England at the end of February, and that the nature of the business which took me away afforded little hope of my getting back from the West Indies before June. My letter was not written with any special motive. I merely thought it right—seeing that my partners were not admitted to my knowledge of Mr. Vanstone's private affairs—to warn him of my absence, as a measure of formal precaution which it was right to take. At the end of February I left England, without having heard from him. I was on the sea when the news of his wife's death reached him, on the 4th of March, and I did not return until the middle of last June."

"You warned him of your departure," interposed Miss Garth. "Did you not warn him of your return?"

"Not personally. My head-clerk sent him one of the circulars which were dispatched from my office, in various directions, to announce my return. It was the first substitute I thought of for the personal letter which the pressure of innumerable occupations, all crowding on me together after my long absence, did not allow me leisure to write. Barely a month later the first information of his marriage reached me in a letter from himself, written on the day of the fatal accident. The circumstances which induced him to write arose out of an event in which you must have taken some interest—I mean the attachment between Mr. Clare's son and Mr. Vanstone's youngest daughter."

"I can not say that I was favorably disposed toward that attachment at the time," replied Miss Garth. "I was ignorant then of the family secret: I know better now."

"Exactly. The motive which you can now appreciate is the motive that leads us to the point. The young lady herself (as I have heard from the elder Mr. Clare, to whom I am indebted for my knowledge of the circumstances in detail) confessed her attachment to her father, and innocently touched him to the quick by a chance reference to his own early life. He had a long conversation with Mrs. Vanstone, at which they both agreed that Mr. Clare must be privately informed of the truth, before the attachment between the two young people was allowed to proceed further. It was painful in the last degree, both to husband and wife, to be reduced to this alternative. But they were resolute, honorably resolute, in making the sacrifice of their own feelings; and Mr. Vanstone betook himself on the spot to Mr. Clare's cottage.—You no doubt observed a remarkable change in Mr. Vanstone's manner on that day; and you can now account for it?"

Miss Garth bowed her head, and Mr. Pendril went on.

"You are sufficiently acquainted with Mr. Clare's contempt for all social prejudices," he continued, "to anticipate his reception of the confession which his neighbor addressed to him. Five minutes after the interview had begun the two old friends were as easy and unrestrained together as usual. In the course of conversation Mr. Vanstone mentioned the pecuniary arrangement which he had made for the benefit of his daughter and of her future husband—and, in doing so, he naturally referred to this will here on the table between us. Mr. Clare, remembering that his friend had been married in the March of that year, at once asked when the will had been executed; received the reply that it had been made five years since, and thereupon astounded Mr. Vanstone by telling him bluntly that the document was waste paper in the eye of the law. Up to that moment he, like many other persons, had been absolutely ignorant that a man's marriage is legally, as well as socially, considered to be the most important event in his life; that it destroys the validity of any will which he may have made as a single man; and that it renders absolutely necessary the entire reassertion of his testamentary intentions in the character of a husband. The statement of this plain fact appeared to overwhelm Mr. Vanstone. Declaring that his friend had laid him under an obligation which he should remember to his dying day, he at once left the cottage, at once returned home and wrote me this letter."

He handed the letter open to Miss Garth. In tearless, speechless grief she read these words:

> "My dear Pendril,—Since we last wrote to each other an extraordinary change has taken place in my life. About a week after you went away I received news from America which told me that I was free. Need I say what use I made of that freedom? Need I say that the mother of my children is now my Wife?
>
> "If you are surprised at not having heard from me the moment you got back, attribute my silence in great part—if not altogether—to my own total ignorance of the legal necessity for making another will. Not half an hour since I was enlightened for the first time (under circumstances which I will mention when we meet) by my old friend, Mr. Clare. Family anxieties have had something to do with my silence as well. My wife's confinement is close at hand; and besides this serious anxiety, my second daughter is engaged to be married. Until I saw Mr. Clare to-day these matters so filled my mind that I never thought of writing to you during the one short month which is all that has passed since I got news of your return. Now I know that my will must be made again I write instantly. For God's sake, come on the day when you receive this—come and relieve me from the dreadful thought that my two darling girls are at this moment unprovided for. If any thing happened to me, and if my desire to do their mother justice ended (through my miserable ignorance of the law) in leaving Norah and Magdalen disinherited, I should not rest in my grave! Come, at any cost, to yours ever,
>
> A. V."

"On the Saturday morning," Mr. Pendril resumed, "those lines reached me. I instantly set aside all other business and drove to the railway. At the London terminus I heard the first news of the Friday's accident; heard it, with conflicting accounts of the numbers and names of the passengers killed. At Bristol they were better informed, and the dreadful truth about Mr. Vanstone was confirmed. I had time to recover myself before I reached your station here, and found Mr. Clare's son waiting for me. He took me to his father's cottage; and there, without losing a moment, I drew out Mrs. Vanstone's will. My object was to secure the only provision for her daughters which it was now possible to make. Mr. Vanstone having died intestate, a third of his fortune would go to his widow, and the rest would be divided among his next of kin. It is the cruel peculiarity of the English law that the marriage of the parents does not legitimatize children born out of wedlock. Mr. Vanstone's daughters, under the circumstances of their father's death, had no more claim to a share in his property than the daughters of one of his laborers in the village. The one chance left was that their mother might sufficiently recover to leave her third share to them, by will, in the event of her decease. Now you know why I wrote to you to ask for that interview—why I waited day and night, in the hope of receiving a summons to the house. I was sincerely sorry to send back such an answer to your note of inquiry as I was compelled to write. But while there was a chance of the preservation of Mrs. Vanstone's life the secret of the marriage was hers, not mine, and every consideration of delicacy forbade me to disclose it."

"You did right, Sir," said Miss Garth; "I understand your motives, and respect them."

"My last attempt to provide for the daughters," continued Mr. Pendril, "was, as you know, rendered unavailing by the dangerous nature of Mrs. Vanstone's illness. Her death left the infant who survived her by a few hours (the infant born, you will remember, in lawful wedlock) possessed, in due legal course, of the whole of Mr. Vanstone's fortune. On the child's death—if it had only outlived the mother by a few seconds, instead of a few hours, the result would have been the same—the next of kin to the legitimate offspring took the money; and that next of kin is the infant's paternal uncle,

"'We know it already,' she repeated, in clear, measured tones."

Michael Vanstone. The whole fortune of eighty thousand pounds has virtually passed into the possession already."

"Are there no other relations?" asked Miss Garth.

"Is there no hope from any one else?"

"There are no other relations with Michael Vanstone's children," said the lawyer. "There are no grandchildren or grandmothers of the dead child on the side of either of the parents; now alive. It was not likely there should be, considering the ages of Mr. and Mrs. Vanstone when they died. But it is a misfortune in the eyes of ordinary people, to have no children, or reasonably lamented that no other uncles or aunts survive. There are cousins alive—a son and two daughters of that elder sister of Mr. Vanstone's who married Archdeacon Bertram, and who died, as I told you, some years since. But their interest is superseded by the interest of the nearer blood. No, Miss Garth, we must look facts as they are resolutely. The law of England, as it affects illegitimate children, is the law of the nation. It visits, by degrading fetters on the unborn, not only the sins of the parents on the children; it encourages vice by depriving fortune, in many cases, of the strongest of all motives for making there of the strongest of all motives for making the atonement of marriage; and it claims to protect them two abominable results in the names of morality and religion. It is not the law of Scotland, not the law of France, not the law (as far as I know) of any other civilized community in Europe. A day may come when England will be ashamed of it; but that day has not dawned yet. Mr. Vanstone's daughters are Nobody's Children, and the law leaves them helpless at their uncle's mercy."

He spoke those words with the energy of honest indignation, and rose to his feet.

"It is useless to dwell longer," he said, "on the past and present. The morning is wearing away, and the future claims us. The best services which I can now render you is to shorten the period of your suspense. I will return in an hour I shall be on my way back to London. Immediately on my arrival I will ascertain the speediest means of communicating with Mr. Michael Vanstone, and will let you know the result. Sad as the position of the two sisters now is, we must look at it on its best side; we must not lose hope."

"Hope!" repeated Miss Garth. "Hope from Michael Vanstone!"

Yet, free from the influence on him of the time, if not from the influence of money. As I have already told you, he is now an old man; he can not, in the course of nature, expect to live much longer. If he looks back to the period when he and his brother were first in partnership, he must look back through thirty years. Surely these are softening influences which must affect any man! Surely, with our knowledge of the shocking circumstances under which he has become possessed of his wealth, we may count with him, if nothing else does?"

"I will try to think as you do, Mr. Pendrill. I will try to hope for the best. But I have left long in suspense before the decision reaches us?"

"I trust not. The only delay on my side will be caused by the necessity of discovering the place of Michael Vanstone's residence on the Continent. I think I have the means of ascertaining this difficulty successfully, and the moment I reach London those means shall be tried."

He took up his hat, and then returned to the table on which the father's last letter and the father's address were lying. He took up the letter. After a moment's consideration he placed them both in Miss Garth's hands.

"It may help you in breaking the hard truth to the orphan sisters," he said, in his quiet, self-repressed way, "if they can see that I do not ask you refers to them in his will—if they can read his letter to me, the last he ever wrote. Your silence tells me that the one idea of their father's life was the idea of making atonement to his children. They may make it worthy of that birth, he said to me at the time when I drew this useless will; 'but they shall never make it worthy of me. I will cross them in nothing: they shall never know a sorrow that I can spare them, or a want which I will not satisfy.' He made me put those words in his will to please him when the truth which he had concealed from his children in his lifetime was revealed to them after his death. No law can deprive his daughters of the legacy of his affection and his pity. Let me leave the will and the letter to help you: I give them both into your care."

He saw how painfully deadness touched her, and thoughtfully hastened the farewell. She took his hand in both her own, and pressed it to her broken words of gratitude. "Trust me to do my best," he said—and, turning away with a merciful abruptness, left her. In the short, cheerful sunshine he had come in to reveal the final truth. In the broad, cheerful sunshine—that truth disclosed—he went out.

CHAPTER XIV.

It was nearly an hour past noon when Mr. Pendrill left the house. Miss Garth sat down again at the table alone, and tried to face the necessity which the event of his departure forced on her.

Her mind was not equal to the effort. She tried to lessen the strain on it—to lose the sense of her own position—to escape from her thoughts for a few minutes only. After a little she opened Mr. Vanstone's letter, and mechanically set herself to read it through once more.

One by one the last words of the dead man fastened themselves more and more firmly on her attention. The unrelieved solitude, the unbroken silence, helped their influence on her mind, and opened it to those softer impressions of past and present which she was most anxious to shun. As she reached the melancholy lines which closed the letter she found herself insensibly, almost unconsciously, at first—tracing the fatal chain of events, link by link, backward, until she reached its beginning in the contemplated marriage between Magdalen and Frances Clare.

That marriage had taken Mr. Vanstone to his old friend with the confession on his lips which would otherwise never have escaped them. That marriage was the discovery to be sent him home to summon the lawyer to the house. That summons again had produced the interview, on the afternoon of the Saturday's journey to Zeale, the Friday of the fatal accident, the Friday when he sent to his death. Beginning with followed the second bereavement which had made the house desolate, the helpless position of the two sisters whose prosperous future had been his dearest care; the revelation of the secret which had overshadowed their existence—the disclosure, more terrible still, which she now stood committed to make to the orphans.

Had the first time she saw the whole sequence of events—saw it as plainly as the cloudless blaze of the day and the green glow of the trees in the sunlight outside.

How—when could she tell them? Who could approach them with the disclosure of their own illegitimacy before their father and mother had been dead a week? Who could speak the dreadful words while the first tears were wet on their cheeks, while the first pangs were throbbing as if a knife were in them, while the memory of the funeral was not a day old yet? Not their last friend, the friend who had known them when heart bled for them. No! silence for the present time at all risks—merciful silence for many days to come!

She left the room with the will and the letter in her hand—with the dreadful secret in her grasp at her heart which sealed her lips and shut her eyes resolutely to the future. In the hall she was met by Mrs. Lecount, who spoke to her inaudible. She softly ascended the stairs on her way to her own room, and passed the door of Magdalen's chamber. Voices inside, the voices of the two sisters, caught her ear. After a moment's consideration she stopped, listened, and then, with quickly descended the stairs again. Both Norah and Magdalen knew of the interview between Mr. Pendrill and herself: she had felt it her duty to show them his letter making the appointment. Good reasons for not disturbing them at present. Good reasons for not shutting herself up from them in her room as soon as the lawyer had left the house. She had trembled on the stair-rail: she felt that her face might betray her. The self-forgetful fortitude, which had never failed her in the days of the past, had become too often—had been tasked beyond its powers at last.

In the hall door she reflected for a moment again, and went into the garden, directing her steps to a rustic bench which commanded a view of the house among the trees. In the past times she had often sat there with Mrs. Vanstone while she dared not trust out of her own possession, laid on the table—her head bowed over them; her face hidden in the shade of her hands—sat there, and tried to rouse her sinking courage.

Doubts thronged on her of the dark days to come; dread beset her of the hidden danger which she must encounter in the near future. The calm might store up in the near future. The accident of a moment might suddenly reveal the secret. Mr. Pendrill's words, "Think the person's ally address himself to the sisters, in the natural conviction that she has their interests at heart," conditions might confound them at a moment's notice; unforeseen necessities might arise that immediately leaving the house. She saw all these perils—and still the cruel courage to face the worst, and speak, was not to be found in her.

Ere long the shickening conflict of her thoughts forced its way outward for relief in words and actions. She rose from the bench and beat her hand helplessly on the table.

"God help me, what am I to do?" she broke out. "I can not—and I will tell them!"

"There is no need to tell them," said a voice behind her. "They know already."

She started to her feet, and looked round. It was Magdalen who stood before her—Magdalen, who had spoken those words.

Yes, there was the graceful figure, in its mourning garments, standing still and black, and motionless against the leafy back-ground. There was Magdalen herself, with a changeless stillness on her white face, with an icy resignation in her steady gray eyes.

"We know it already," she repeated, in clear measured tones. "Mr. Vanstone's daughters are Nobody's Children, and the law leaves them helpless at their uncle's mercy."

So, without a tear on her cheeks, without a faltering tone in her voice, Magdalen spoke the sorry own words, exactly as he had spoken them. Miss Garth staggered back a step, and caught at the bench to support herself. Her head swam: she closed her eyes in a momentary faintness. When they opened again Magdalen's arm was supporting her. Magdalen's breath fanned her cheek. Magdalen's cool lips kissed her. She drew back from the kiss, and looked at the girl's lips thrilled her with terror.

As soon as she could speak she put the inevitable question. "You heard us," she said. "Where?"

"Under the open window."

"All the time?"

"From beginning to end."

She had listened—that girl of eighteen, in the first week of her orphanage, had listened to the whole terrible revelation, word by word, as it fell from the lawyer's lips, and had never once betrayed herself! From first to last, the only movements which had escaped her had been movements guarded enough and slight enough to be mistaken for the passage of the summer breeze through the leaves!

"Don't try to speak yet," she said, in soothing and gentler tones. "Don't look at me with those doubting eyes. What wrong have I done? When Mr. Pendrill wished to speak to you about Norah and me he letter gave us our choice to be present at the interview, or to keep away. If my elder sister decided to keep away how could I come? How could I bear my own story except as I did? My listening has done no harm to Norah or to you—it has taken from the distress of speaking to us. You have suffered enough for us already—I will not be tortured to suffer for ourselves. I have learned. And Norah is learning."

"Norah!"

"Yes. I have done all I could to spare you. I have told Norah."

She had told Norah! Was this girl, whose courage had forced the terrible necessity from which a woman shrunk, the girl who, recalled and recalled, the girl Miss Garth had brought up? the girl whose nature she had believed to be as well known to her as her own?

"Magdalen!" she cried out, passionately, "you are cruel to me!"

Magdalen only sighed, and turned wearily away.

"Try not to think worse of me than I deserve," she said. "I can't cry. My heart is numbed."

She moved away slowly over the grass. Miss Garth watched the tall black figure gliding away alone, until it was lost among the trees. While it was in sight she could think of nothing else. The moment it was gone she thought of herself. The moment it was gone in her experience of the sisters her heart led her instinctively to the elder of the two.

Norah was still in her own room. She was sitting on the couch by the window, with the old, familiar, well-used book—the keepsake which Mrs. Vanstone had found in her husband's study on the day of her husband's death—open on her lap. She looked up from it with such quiet sorrow, and pointed with such ready kindness to the place at her side, that Miss Garth doubted for the moment whether Magdalen had spoken the truth. "Yes, dear," she said, simply, turning to the first leaf in the music-book. "My mother's name written in it, and my name also to my father. Do you recognize? We may keep this for ourselves if we keep nothing else." She put her arm round Miss Garth's neck, and a faint tinge of color stole over her cheeks. "I see anxious thoughts in your face," she whispered. "Are you thinking of money? Are you doubting whether I have heard it? I have heard all the truth. I might have told you so myself, but I was too soon to feel it now. You have seen Magdalen? She went out to find you—you must have met her?"

"In the garden. I couldn't speak to her: I couldn't look at her. Magdalen has frightened me."

Norah rose hurriedly; rose, startled and distressed by Miss Garth's words.

"Don't think ill of Magdalen," she said. "Magdalen suffers in secret more than I do. I am not to grieve over what I have heard about us this morning. Does it matter who we are, or what we have been? Does it matter here or after the loss of our father and mother? Oh, Miss Garth, there is the only bitterness! What have we known about them when we laid them in the grave yesterday? Nothing but the love they gave us and the love we gave each other hour by hour. What else can we remember to-day? What change can the world, and the world's cruel law, make in the memory of the kindest father, the kindest mother, that children ever had?" She stopped: a sudden pang of pain was in her gentle, resolutely kept it down. "Will you wait here," she said, "and let me go and find Magdalen? Mag-dalen was always your favorite: I must her to be your favorite still." She kissed the music-book on the keepsake. "Mother loved it," she said, softly.

"Magdalen was always your favorite."

Tenderly as they had been spoken, those words fell reproachfully on Miss Garth's ear. For the first time in her long experience of herself, of principles and herself, a doubt whether she, and all those about her, had not been mistaken in their relative estimate of the sisters, now forced itself on her mind.

She had studied the natures of her two pupils in the daily intimacy of twelve years. Those natures, which she believed herself to have studied through all their changes, had been suddenly tried in the sharp ordeal of affliction. How had they come out from the trial? Was the present experience had prepared her to see them? No: in that contradiction to it.

Was it such a crisis as this imply?

Thoughts came to her as she asked herself that question which have startled and saddened us all.

Does there exist, in every human being, beneath the best outward and visible character which is shaped into form by the social influences surrounding us, an inward and spiritual character, known in part of ourselves; which education may indirectly modify, but can never hope to change? Is the philosophy which denies this, and declares that we are born with dispositions like blank sheets of paper, a philosophy which has failed to remark that we are not born with blank faces—a philosophy which has never compared together two infants of a few days old, and has never observed that those infants are not born with blank tempers for mothers and nurses to work on, but with natures, infinitely varying with each individual, inbred forces of Good and Evil in all of us, deep down in the hidden life of the unconscious years, and mortal repression—hidden Good and hidden Evil, both alike at the mercy of the shaping opportunity and the sufficient temptation? Within these earthly limits is earthly Conscience ever the key? and can we honestly balance warn us beforehand of the forces locked up in ourselves which that key may unlock? For the first time thoughts such as these, darkly—as shadowy and terrible possibilities, in Miss Garth's mind. The first time, associated those possibilities with the past conduct and characters, with the future lives of Norah and Magdalen.

Searching, as in a glass, darkly, into the natures, she had studied for twelve years, for the possible truth to another. It might be the upper surface of their characters was all she had there regularly seen in Norah and Magdalen. It might be that the unalluring sameness of one and the all-attractive variety and reserve of the other, were the results, not of the parents of the other, were the less preferable, in each case, to those physical which really influenced the underlying moral results. It might be that under the face so formed—a surface which there had been nothing, further, in the happy, prosperous, eventful lives of the sisters to disturb—Nature, reborn and unrestrained, had remained concealed which the shock of the first serious calamity in their lives had now thrown upon them. Was it so? was it so? Were the future shining with prophetic light through the surface-shadow of Norah's reserve, and the dark prophetic gloom under the surface of Magdalen's bright spirits? If the latter, was the time already at hand appointed to the ripening-ground of the undeveloped God in us, for the sowing of the seed? Was the harvest was in her, was the field of mortal conduct, to be reaped forces of Evil in herself?

On the brink of that terrible conclusion Miss Garth shrank back in dismay. Her self-reliance, the heart of a true woman. It instinctively, the moment it was roused. Norah higher in it rejected the doubt which threatened to Magdalen lower. It was not to be tried impartially; she recoiled with an angry firmness from the whole train of thought in which her mind had been engaged for the last minutes. What if there were dangerous elements in the strength of Magdalen's character? was it not her duty to help the girl against her? How had she performed that duty? She had not herself to see that the first serious impressions; she had never waited to ascertain whether Magdalen's openly avowed sympathies of those impressions might not imply a sacrificing fortitude, which promised in the future the noblest results. She had left Norah to Norah go and speak those words of tender remembrance, of pleading sympathy, which should first touch and reach herself. "Oh!" thought bitterly, "how long I have lost sight of the world, and how I have forgotten the weakness and wickedness until to-day!"

The door of the room opened. Norah came in, as she had gone out, alone.

"Do you remember," she said, "telling any thing a little while before the garden-seat?" she asked gently.

Before Miss Garth could answer the question she held out her father's will and her father's letter.

"Magdalen came back after you went," she said, "and found these last relics. She heard all that you remembered of the letter. When I went into the garden she was reading the letter. There was no need for me to speak to her: Magdalen knows all that is in her from his grave. See how she has loved him!"

She pointed to the letter. The traces of tears—large drops that clung to the kindly writing—were still there.

"Her tears," said Norah, softly.

Miss Garth's head drooped low over the letter. She kissed the Magdalen's tears.

Oh, never doubt her again!" pleaded Norah. "We are alone now—we have no way through the world to walk on as we have always walked together. Come back, help her for the love of old times her against herself!"

With all my heart and strength," she shall judge me, with the devotion of a sister. Miss Garth rose from her seat. She swered. She took the hand which Norah out to her, and put it, in a manner, into hand lips. "Oh, my love, forgive me! I been miserably blind—I have never seen as I ought!"

Norah gently checked her before she could say more—gently whispered to her. "Leave me the garden—comfort and help Magdalen: look patiently to the future."

Miss Garth left her. She could see the glimmer of it? Who could see any future the ill-omened figure of Michael Vanstone, on the verge of the present moment, closing all the prospect that lay beyond?

COMMODORE FOOTE AT FORT WRIGHT.

OUR WESTERN artist, Mr. A. Simplot, has sent us the sketches which we present to-day. They represent COMMODORE FOOTE DESCENDING THE MISSISSIPPI WITH HIS GUNBOATS, and the COMMENCEMENT OF THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORT WRIGHT on the Chickasaw Bluffs, thirty-five miles in a straight line from Memphis.

The correspondent of the World thus describes the approach to Fort Wright:

On approaching the locality, all that can be seen of us is the wide rushing stream now swollen dimensions, so that it is overflowing its banks, sweeping along in majesty and might. A gap was made in the second Chickasaw Bluff looms up in the distance like a low range of hills, whose blue outline strikingly contrasts with the uniformly low and pleasing shores of the river which extend from Columbus down. On rounding the point, as we took occasion to do with Captain Pike on a reconnoissance with a view to discover the top of the bluff covered in places, and in others still standing, although not over one-third its diameter. The good-sized oak is one of the finest excavations was to be discovered in one or two large near the water's edge, and mounted on a platform far up the hillside. There are also several small and neatly constructed batteries thrown up within a few days, and are armed with some very heavy guns. The older fort, which has been in process of construction for several months, stands nearly seventy feet above the water's edge, and the land. The river batteries extend along the base, and rest about one-third of the hill's height, and are not more than three miles.

The position is very strong and its relation to that of the enemy is not unlike that at Island No. 10. The commencement of operations is no doubt the result of some description might attract here for both. Here we have the rebels on the opposite shore, and the river at this point is about a mile wide. The main channel of the rising wall of rock—the same intervening point of the river—the point of view of the rebel position, and upon which the older fort as it is heavily wooded, and projects further into the stream. We have but one string of heavy guns, and that for miles above, the mortars chained to the shore just above the point, and the gun-boats lie in the channel ready to act at short distance in the stream.

The contrast both from the most terrible maelstrom in volumes of smoke across the point in the same Venetian style; the little smoking funnels keep up the same monotonous hum from boat to boat, and the transports, tugs, and armaments look as peacefully at the opposite shore as though nothing earthly from their towering chimneys, very much as they did when the sun rose on a hundred miles above, and not the least sensation to show no part in the hostilities. The position seems to be the key to the fort and keep the rebels from passing down.

For reasons best known to our officers, there is no disposition to make an immediate assault upon it or to proceed with the gun-boats. Whether this be the old standing difficulty of the shore batteries, or the want of co-operation from the heavy guns mounted in the earthworks—the horror of the work every one must see for himself, which, from their range, their weight, and the comparative safety with which they can be used, are singularly suited to the purpose.

NEW ORLEANS.

We give on page 292 a fine view of New Orleans, and on page 294 views of the forts PROCHORE TO THAT CITY BY WAY OF THE RIGOLETS. On page 293 we illustrate COMMODORE FARRAGUT'S GUNBOAT SQUADRON, passing the forts JACKSON and ST. PHILIP; and on page 296 we give a MAP OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, from its mouth to its course from its mouth to Cairo.

At the time we write we know nothing positive, by with regard to the progress of affairs at New Orleans, but dispatches through rebel sources state that the city fell on 25th.

We know that Commodore Farragut's expedition reached the city in safety. For a month ago—in the last week in April—in the forts to have been inactive. But on 24th we heard through rebel sources of the bombardment of Fort Jackson, which was represented as "terrific." Our next intelligence is contained in the following telegram which was published in the Petersburg Express of 26th:

> "Mobile, April 25, 1862.
>
> The enemy passed Fort Jackson at four o'clock yesterday morning. They have the new vessel Mississippi, and the Louisiana, and the Missouri. Martial law was put in full force and the bombardment was completely successful.
>
> All the steamers and steamboats, excepting such as were necessary to transport cotton, ammunition, etc., were burned.
>
> At six clock to-day the operator bade us "good-by," by which time the enemy had appeared before the city.
>
> This is the last we know regarding the fall. Will send particulars as soon as they can be had.

New Orleans, as every one knows, is the queen city of the South. It is situated on the left bank of the Mississippi River, about 100 miles from its mouth, 1663 miles southwest from New York, and 1365 southwest from Washington. The city is built around a bend in the river, from which circumstance it bears the sobriquet of "The Crescent City." The site includes gently from the margin of the Mississippi toward the marshy ground in the rear, and is from two to five feet above the level of the river at the usual spring freshets. The present boundaries an embankment or levee, about seven feet wide, six feet high, which has been raised, extending 120 miles above the city, and 70 miles below, a distance of 43 miles below it. The old city proper, originally laid out by the French, is in the form of a parallelogram, thirteen hundred and twenty yards long and seven hundred yards wide. Above this are what were formerly the faubourgs of Lafayette, Annunciation, and La Course; below, Marigny, Bourbon and Declouet; and the former Fauxbourg St. John. The streets of New Orleans are of course well laid out, well paved, and usually intersect each other at right angles. Canal Street, the widest, being over one hundred feet in width, with a grass-plot in the centre almost twenty-two wide, extending throughout its entire length. Most of the buildings are constructed of brick, and are generally low, rarely in the business portion exceeding three stories high. There are usually five or six stories high. The dwellings in the suburbs, many of them of particularly in Lafayette, are surrounded with spacious and beautifully decorated with the orange, lemon, magnolia, and other ornamental trees. In different portions of the city are several public squares, among which may be mentioned Jackson Square, usually called Place de Armes, occupying the front of the river front of the old town plot, now the First District. It is ornamented with trees, walks, shrubbery, statuettes, etc., and is much frequented for recreation. Lafayette Square, in the second district, is finely laid out and adorned with a profusion of shade trees. Congo Square, in the part of the city, is also a handsome inclosure.

New Orleans is the chief cotton port in the United States. It had a population before the war of about 160,000.

The following descriptions of Forts Jackson and St. Philip, which Commodore Farragut must have taken or silenced, will be read with interest:

FORT JACKSON.

Fort Jackson is on the right or west bank of the river, immediately opposite Fort St. Philip, and about twenty-five miles from the head of the passes leading into the Mississippi Sound. This is a very strong casemated fort, intended to mount one hundred and fifty guns, thirty-one of which were intended to have been mounted en barbette, but the fort was not complete, and we have no knowledge that they were. The fort is constructed in the most substantial manner, considerably strengthened by the State authorities, and its casemates are bomb-proof. Before the secession movement it was the United States nearly a million of dollars, and is capable of holding six hundred men. The Confederate States and Fort Jackson also mounted the Mississippi that no vessel could pass them in the day we visited it operation.

FORT ST. PHILIP.

This fort is situated on the left or east bank of the Mississippi River, about seventy-five miles from the city. It is a very strong casemated fort, and, with its one hundred and fifty guns, commands the navigation of the river. It was bombarded in 1815 by the British vessels of war, at which time it was commanded by Major Overton, uncle of Thomas Overton, Esq., the present Governor of Louisiana. The rebels have now in this fort about 1,200 men, commanded by Colonel Fort Jackson, and the same number of the old guns, besides otherwise increasing the heavy armament of the fort. It is casemated and upper exterior battery, mounting twenty-eight guns each.

The fort is constructed in the most substantial manner, considerably strengthened by the State thousand dollars, and its armament cost one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It is capable of holding one hundred men, and no doubt now contains at least that number.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

International Exhibition, 1862.

THE LONDON ART JOURNAL FOR APRIL.

Contains the first division of an

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF THE International Exhibition.

This portion, with nearly all the letter-press (nearly one thousand engravings), and will be continued for eight successive months,

WITHOUT EXTRA CHARGE.

Price 75 cents per month. $9 per Annum.

Subscriptions received, and Specimens supplied by VIRTUE & CO., 20 John Street, New York.

FIRST-CLASS Agents wanted.—to Assume Agencies in their own Counties. Extraordinary inducements. Address, with stamp, for particulars, J. S. DYER, 307 Broadway, N. Y.

HICKOCX'S STENCIL CHEST

CONTAINS A COMPLETE OUTFIT FOR CUTTING

For Cutting, Cards, Books, &c. Price from $15 to $20. List of capitals: 1 set Capital Letters; 1 set Small to Match; 1 set Figures, Border Pieces, &c., &c.; 1 pair Shears; 1 steel Hammer, 1 Ilgeum vien Block, 1 Die Paper, 1 Block Scraper, 1 Scroll Pattern, 1 Rule, 1 Scriber, 1 pair Dividers, 1 Whetstone, 1 Graver, 1 bottle Polishing Powder. Stock for fifty plates (best quality) $10; stock for 100 plates with $20 chest, namely: 100 Steel-in Ink, 100 Brass Plates, assorted 100 Brass Plates, and 100 Brushes. For catalogue and samples, send red stamp. Address C. W. HICKOX, 239 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Bronze Corn and Bunion Alleviator, a sure and certain cure for Corns, Bunions, Inverted and Ingrowing Nails, 25 and 50 cts., sent by mail. Sold by Druggists. Dr. J. Bolgh, Chiropodist, Philadelphia, 122 Broadway, N. Y.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

The six-, or Navy Size, carries a Ball weighing 58 to the lb., and the No. 32, or 5½ Revolver, a ball 80 to the lb. Hitting at 50 yards, they penetrate 1¼ inch pine boards; are warm pronounced the best and most effective weapons in use. Also,

Ballard's Patent Breech-Loading Rifle.

This arm is entirely new, and is universally acknowledged to be the most perfect of any breech-loading rifle ever made. Length of barrel 24 inches, weight 8 pounds, carries a ball weighing 52 to the pound. Will cost 44-cl repeater-target-proof Cartridges. For particulars call or send for a Circular to

MERWIN & BRAY, Sole Agents.

No. 37 Wall Street, New York.

F. Derby & Company,

TAILORS and IMPORTERS, invite the special attention of all friends and the public to their LARGE CHOICE, and ATTRACTIVE ASSORTMENT of SPRING and SUMMER GOODS for gentlemen's wear—among NEW STYLES, which they are willing to make up to order, at very low prices. Staple goods always on hand at POPULAR PRICES,

No. 97 Walker Street, New York.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Organat will force them in six weeks, or in six days (in most instances) without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, free of postage, for $1 25. Address, Dr. F. R. GRAHAM, No. 100 Nassau Street, N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT.—Agents Wanted in every Town and County to enter into a respectable and permanent business. For particulars address, with red stamp,

D. E. J. H. WARNER,

64 East 13th Street, New York.

For Sale or to Let.

The premises No. 29 and 31 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, formerly occupied by Messrs. L. J. Levy & Company. For Terms, &c.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS,

New York.

Look

In Harper's Weekly of May 3d, No. 279, page 277, and notice that the name of the firm of W. Forsyth & Co. is changed to J. H. Wilmerding & Co. All Certificates with the name of W. Forsyth & Co. are void and no good, and will be redeemed by us as fast as sent in. Address

J. H. WILMERDING & CO.,

No. 6 Dey Street, New York.

Commercial Travelers and Agents Wanted to Sell our 25 Cent Portfolio Package.

Contents—Letter Paper, Note Paper, 25 Envelopes, 1 Pencil, 1 Pen, 1 Penholder, 1 Lead Pencil, 1 Rubber, 1 Set Rules, 1 Package Wafers, 1 Book Method for Computing Interest—2 Fashionable Cards, 1 Package Sealing Wax, 1 Set Visiting Cards, 1 Set Cards for Ladies' Writing, 1 Set Cards for Gentlemen's Writing, 1 Set Cards for Business, 1 Set Cards for Gentlemen, and One Beautiful Article of Jewelry. $10 a day can be realized. Send stamp for Circular of wholesale prices.

WEIR & CO., 43 South Third Street, Phila., Pa.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers' Comfort, Wristlets, Woollen Hood, Neckers, and all places occupied by Union troops, should be sent, at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 74 Broadway. Suttern charged low rates.

To all Wanting Farms.

We have for sale Improved and Unimproved Farms in Pennsylvania by Railroad. Good terms sell, highly productive for Wheat, Corn, Grass, Fruits, and Vegetables—good market—delightful climate—when farming is profitable, especially these times, and where good business openings can be found. Large numbers are settling. Soon very good. Farms from $10 to $20 per acre only. Village 8 and 10 acre lots for sale. Four years' time given. Report of Agent, Mr. Wm. H. Hunter, at Lock Haven, Pa., who visited the place, together with the "Vineland Rural," CHAS. K. LANDIS, P.M., Vineland P.O., Cumberland County, New Jersey.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.

HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BRACELETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BROOCHES.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR RINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR VEST CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR NECK CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF SETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF PINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR MINIATURE PINS OF ALL THE GENERALS. Enclose stamp for full particulars.
W. A. HAYWARD, MANUFACTURING JEWELER,
208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Grand Opening!!!

BRODIE'S

Stock of Spring and Summer

MANTILLAS,

Now Ready for Inspection at his

OLD STAND,

300 Canal Street,

and

His Palace of Fashion,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Corner of 23d Street,

New York.

VIOLIN MUSIC—A NEW COLLECTION.

ONE HUNDRED BRILLIANT MELODIES for the Violin, selected from all the best Operas. Price, 50 cents. Sent by mail on receipt of the price. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

Rheumatism, Dropsy, &c.

Those afflicted with Rheumatism, Gout, Neuralgia, Dropsy, and all Nervous Diseases, Tender feet from long walking or Standing will find, by using the METHAM GAS & VAPOR GALVANO ELECTRIC METALLIC BATH, immediate and permanent cure from their wretched suffering yet failed in hundreds of cases. Call, or send for a circular. Hours from 9 A.M. to 6 P.M. Office No. 629 Broadway, New York.

EMPLOYMENT. A NEW ENTERPRISE. THE LARGEST SELLING ARTICLE in the market. A number of Agents. A liberal salary and expenses paid, or commission allowed. Address, with stamp, Hazen Burrington, Boston, Mass. (Cigs this out for reference.)

ENTERPRISING AGENTS ARE now selling DOWNER'S FAT HUMORS and BIRDS for Hand-Sewing, and other new articles of ready sale. Liberal terms. Sample sent on receipt of the price (25c.). Send 3-cent stamp for price-list and terms. A. H. DOWNER, 442 Broadway, N. Y.

Wedding Cards and Note Papers at J. EVERDELL'S celebrated Engraving Establishment, 302 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York. Samples by mail.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire. 259
IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES, GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogue mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM,
209 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

THE ALBION, A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER, Established in 1822,

DEVOTED TO

NEWS, POLITICS, CRITICISM, AND LITERATURE.

PRICE $3 PER ANNUM; 6 CENTS PER COPY.

Sold by Newsmen generally, and by mail by the Publisher,

ALBION OFFICE, 19 Beekman St., N. Y.

Card Albums Patent.

Public Notice.—My patents, that all infringements of the Letters Patent granted by the United States Patent Office, at Washington, to E. R. GREENE, of Geneva, Switzerland, for a certain new and improvements in PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS, commonly known as CARD ALBUMS, will be prosecuted to the extent of the law. The improvements, patented by Mr. GREENE, consist chiefly in that it is present sold in this market, under the designation of CARD ALBUMS. So many infringements have occurred on Mr. Greene Patent, by publishers and others in the United States, that Mr. GREENE has instructed us to take immediate legal proceeding against infringers; and that purchasers may be cautioned against it. J. C. MCMANUS, Esqr., 371 Broadway, to commence suits at law and in equity against infringers in the United States.

Mr. GREENE has, by articles of attorney, duly authorized us to prosecute in the name of Mr. GREENE, the full benefit of the said rights, under the Letters Patent. A manufactures and dealers in Photographic Albums, are invited PHOTOGRAPHIC CARD ALBUMS, the only beautiful specimens of which can be seen at our store.

J. C. MCMANUS & CO.,

367 Broadway,

Agents for F. R. Greene, for the U. S.

New York, April, 1862.

Every Man his own Printer.

Portable Printing Offices for the Army and Navy, Druggists, Merchants, Non-university. Send for a circular.

ADAMS PRESS COMPANY.

31 Park Row (under Harper's Building), New York.

BEST Chance for Agents.—Send stamp for Circular. C. A. BALDWIN, Nashua, N. H.

AGENTS!

Send for our Circular, wanted free.

PRIZE KNITTING MACHINE.

PRIZE PACKETS FOR THE MILLION.

UNION SPATTERDASHES AND PRIZE PACKETS.

UNION STATIONERY AND RECIPE PACKETS.

PRIZE PACKETS of every description. Circulars free.

HEADQUARTERS for UNION STATIONERY AND PRIZE PACKETS of every description. Circulars free.

F. HASKINS & CO., 25 Ann Street, N. Y.

"MOUSTACHES and WHISKERS IN 20 DAYS!" or money back on "Professor" Wood's Hair Restorative. Sent by mail, post-paid, for $1. Address, with stamp, for circular, WOOD & CO., Lock Box 43, Utica, N. Y.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE! MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 25c. IN SILVER. Five of different powers, $2. Address

P. C. BOWEN, Box 278, Boston, Mass.

The New Postage Stamps, of all denominations for sale. Apply to

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

To European Travellers.

In Press:

Harper's Hand-Book

FOR

Travellers in Europe and the East.

Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Sicily, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. By W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE. With a map embracing colored routes of travel in the above countries. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 75; Leather Tucks, for Travellers, $3 00; Half Calf, for Librarians, $3 50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

Close of the Twenty-Fourth Volume.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For May, 1862.

CONTENTS.

The Number for June $0 25
Two Copies for One Year 2 00
Four Copies for One Year 5 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Four Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

A Thrilling Story,

Entitled,

NO NAME,

By Wilkie Collins,

AUTHOR OF

"The Woman in White,"

Richly Illustrated by John McLenan,

Was commenced in the Number for March 15 (No. 272) of

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

and will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can always be had.

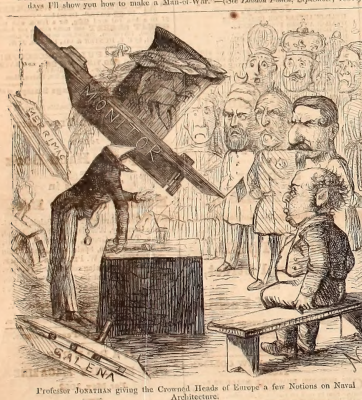
Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V. for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861, of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth cases, Price $3 50 each, are now ready.



HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

A PROMISE FULFILLED.

1851.

BROTHER JONATHAN. "There, JOHNNY, that's the way to build a Yacht! Some of these days I'll show you how to make a Man-of-War."—(See London Punch, September, 1851.)

Professor JONATHAN giving the Crowned Heads of Europe a few Notions on Naval Architecture.

1862.

BROTHER JONATHAN. "There, JOHNNY, I said I'd tell you how to make a Man-of-War! I guess that's about right! How do you like it?"—(See London Times, April, 1862.)

New Dime Books.

Beadle's Dime Base-Ball Player, for 1862. Almost Eclipse. Containing Reports of the Base-Ball Conventions—the Average Play of the Leading Clubs—the celebrated Fashion Course Matches—and the Great Silver Ball Match.

Beadle's Dime Novels, No. 29.

The Wrong Man:

A Tale of the Exiles' Settlements.

We have in this fine Novel the history of the early Western Settlements daguerreotyped to life, with all its remarkable characters and startling incidents.

Ten cents each. Sold by all News Dealers. Send for price-list, or receipt of price. Send for a Catalogue. Address BEADLE & COMPANY, Publishers, New York.

AGENTS for the SOLAR MATCHES WANTED in each city where not already disposed of. Only those who can command a cash trade wanted. The only kind of match fanded with liberality. Send for Circular for Agents. Inclosing 3-cent stamp for reply. The Solar Matches are unsurpassed by any other matches in market—they remain in any climate—they do not require to be kept in a dry place—they are not affected by dampness—they are the only matches that can be sent by mail without fear of fire—they are the best paying business ever offered. Already our factory is running night and day to supply orders. Address SOLAR MATCH Co., Nos. 101 and 103 Bedford Street, N. Y.

AMALGAM BELLS for Churches, Schools, Farms, &c., superior in tone and durability to any other metal, and less than half the price, or 12½ ct. per lb. Old brass taken in exchange. Send for Circular to HENRY PRATT, DENNISON & CO., 129 William street, New York.

INVALID.—You will get the Recipe for a cure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all Lung Affections, by sending to D. Adee, 382 Pearl Street, N. Y. No cash it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

Best Military Map

IS

H. H. LLOYD & CO.'S

GREAT MAP OF THE

Border and Southern States,

Which is constantly revised and specially marked to illustrate the progress of the war.

PITTSBURGH LANDING, CORINTH, FORT WRIGHT, NORTONTOWN, STAUNTON, FREDERICKSBURG, FORT PULASKI, THE DEFENSES OF NEW ORLEANS, and all noted places are mapped out distinctly and accurately.

The Christian Advocate and Journal says (April 17):

"It is a prize for an Editor, or indeed anybody, who reads a newspaper in these times of Civil War."

We have ten kinds of war maps and charts. A sample of either mailed paid, for 25 cents. Stamps received.

UNUSUAL INDUCEMENTS OFFERED AGENTS.

H. H. LLOYD & CO., Publishers,

No. 21 Howard Street,

New York.

N. B.—Newspapers inserting this advertisement one week editorially will receive two copies of the map advertised.

Rebel Notes and Postage Stamps.

Now is the time! Rebel Notes and Shinplasters and three different Rebel Postage Stamps, sent post-paid, on receipt of 10 cents. Trade supplied at $2 per 100, or $15 per 1000. Traveling Agents wanted. Address S. C. OTIS-LAH, 382 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.—100 pieces of Cheap Jewelry for 25, comprising the same description of Jewelry as used in Stationery Packages. One piece of Jewelry sent, postage paid, for 10 cents, with a circular giving a description of our goods. Also Stationery and Jewelry Packages, the best in the market, at prices varying from 50 cents to $1 00 a dozen. Address

J. S. ANDREWS, 138 Nassau street,

Room 4, New York.

CHEWERS AND SMOKERS WHO ARE destroying their health and intellect by the use of tobacco, send for a pamphlet describing a reliable and ready. Address ISAAC G. EVANS, Drawer 59, 125, Syracuse, N. Y.

Davis Collamore & Co.,

Importers and Dealers in

China, Glass, &c.,

479 Broadway,

BETWEEN GRAND AND BROOME STREETS,

Are now prepared to offer a largely-increased assortment of Goods in their line, including all desirable articles, either staple or novel, carefully selected from the best foreign and domestic markets.

They take this opportunity of thanking their customers and the public for the liberal favor which they have extended to their Establishment since its

Formation in 1842,

and trust, by further exertion, to secure an increased patronage.

Quality Good. Prices Low.

BACK NUMBERS of HARPER'S MAGAZINE and WEEKLY constantly on hand. Also the Bound Volumes, and a full Stock of Harper & Brothers' Publications, ordered from the Trade promptly filled at Publishers' prices.

A. WILLIAMS & CO.,

100 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

The Diaphragm Filter

Has been awarded 2 Gold and 3 Silver Medals by the American Institute, Mass. Mechanics' Charitable Association, and Maryland Institute, and certificates from nearly all the medical faculty. The Winter deposits working into the streams at this season makes the water very impure. It is especially adapted for rain and river waters. Manufactured and warranted by

KLEIN, McKENNEN & CO.,

205 Fourth Street, New York,

near Broadway.

Discretion is the Better Part of Valor.

CARTE PHOTOGRAPHS, FOR ALBUMS, of the gallant sketch by the inimitable Darley, just published by E. ANTHONY, 501 Broadway, N. Y.

Sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

Also, "Grant Good" and "The Neglected Picture," same size, 25 cents.

1,000 Portraits of eminent Americans for Albums. Photographic Albums in great variety.

Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.

PASSPORT OFFICE, No. 200 Broadway, near Fulton Street, Ground Floor.

Naturalized citizens must produce their Certificates. Information for travelers furnished on application at the office, or in reply to letters addressed PASSPORT OFFICE, Box 5,515, New York.

BALLOU'S

PATENTED

F. Y. S.

French Yoke SHIRTS.

WARRANTED TO FIT.

Send for a Circular.

BALLOU BROS.

No. 189 Broadway,

New York.

For sale by all the principal Dealers through the UNITED STATES.

James Parrish,

Shirt Manufacturer,

323 CANAL STREET, near Broadway, New York.

SUPERIOR SHIRTS made to measure, $18, $21, and $24 per dozen.

☞ Family supply store of Bosoms, Collars, and Wristbands for shirt making, at reduced prices.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS & ARMS. SELPHO'S PATENT. 518 BROADWAY, N.Y. SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

AGENTS.—THE DIME PANPROSPHORUM PRIZE PACKAGE, PRICE 10 CENTS, CONTAINS 10 ARTICLES, ALL NEW AND USEFUL. EACH PACKAGE HAS A GIFT OF JEWELRY. Send stamp for a circular.

W. H. GATELY & CO., 102 Nassau (R. R.), N. Y.

AGENTS OF ACTIVITY AND ENERGY can make from $5 to $10 per day by canvassing in one of the VALUABLE PUBLICATIONS. Our RELIEF PACKAGE AND INVALIDS' GUIDE is important, and can be sold by every one. FORTY VARIETIES, each article unconditional sale. AETHON TABLET.

For information send for a circular; mailed free.

RICHARDS & CO., 192 Nassau Street, N.Y.

A GENT—IF YOU WISH TO INVEST A SMALL CAPITAL IN A PAYING BUSINESS, examine the merits of the MULTUM-IN-PARVO. Pays 100 per cent. to Agents. Call and see it, or send for a circular.

R. C. RICHARDS & CO., 192 Nassau Street, N. Y.

The New Books.—G. P. PUTNAM, Broadway, will send by mail, on receipt of price

I. IRVING'S LIFE AND LETTERS. Vol. I. $1 25.

II. UNDERCURRENTS. By Kimball. 8th ed. $1 25.

III. SO LITTLE. 7th ed. $1 25.

IV. BAYARD TAYLOR'S New Volume. $1 25.

V. Count CAVOUR. By Fred. Bates. 75 cents.

SENT BY EXPRESS

EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices. Made to Measure at $20 per doz. OR SIX FOR TEN DOLLARS.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN. With four Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good a fit as is sold in retail stores for $2 50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $36 00 PER DOZEN.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good shirt for $20 per dozen are mistaken. Here is the cost of one:

$20 the dozen.

20 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 18 c. per yd. 3 60

7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard. 3 50

Making and cutting 12

Linening, 21; buttons and cotton, 12c. 33

Profit 1 00

Total $20

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. Twelve per cent. discount.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on the receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all persons to examine the goods before paying for them. If they are not satisfactory the parties are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London,

387 Broadway, up stairs,

Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

DELMONICO'S,

Corner of 5th Avenue and 14th Street,

WILL BE OPENED

Wednesday, April 9, 1862.

Jewelry of all Kinds Repaired.

Orders by mail solicited. The cost of repairs will be moderately on receipt of Goods. Gold Pen Holders a specialty. Address E. S. JOHNSON, 49 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VI.—No. 281.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

REBELS OUTSIDE THEIR WORKS AT YORKTOWN RECONNOITERING WITH DARK LANTERNS.—SKETCHED BY MR. WINSLOW HOMER.—[SEE PAGE 315.]

GEORGE PEABODY.

On page 309 we publish a portrait of GEORGE PEABODY, the leading American banker in London, who has just given $750,000 to the London poor. Mr. Peabody is a native of Danvers, Massachusetts, and about seventy years of age. In early life he entered a merchant's office, and at twenty-one became a partner in a leading house at Baltimore. There he remained, winning respect and fortune, until 1836, when he removed to England and set up a banking-office in London. His business has been extremely successful, and he now retires with a fortune which is estimated at millions.

Mr. Peabody, who is a bachelor, has frequently made large donations to places where he has been known. He gave $60,000 to Baltimore for a Library and Institute, and a very large sum for a similar institution at Baltimore. His donation to the London poor is the most munificent act ever made by a private individual to a public charity.

MRS. MAJOR REYNOLDS.

MRS. MAJOR BELLE REYNOLDS, whose portrait we publish on page 317, from a photograph by Cole, of Peoria, Illinois, is the wife of Lieutenant Reynolds, of Company A, Seventeenth Regiment Illinois troops, and daughter of Rev. K. W. Blackmer, Peoria. Her native place is Shelbourne Falls, Massachusetts. The Seventeenth, to which her husband belongs, was one of the most popular regiments in our Western army, being one of the earliest in the field, and during the whole war having been frequently drenched with rain; and ofttimes, to the order "Fall in," she has hurriedly mounted her horse in the darkness of the night, and made long marches without rest or food except such as she might have with her. She has at all times exhibited a degree of heroism that has endeared her to the brave soldiers of the Seventeenth and other regiments that have been associated with them, and to the officers of the army with whom she is acquainted.

Governor Yates, of Illinois, and his staff were at Pittsburg Landing to look after the Illinois troops, who suffered so severely in that fearful battle, and learning of Mrs. Reynolds's heroic conduct on the field, and untiring efforts in behalf of the wounded soldiers, by and with the advice of his staff commissioned her Daughter of the Regiment, to take rank as a Major, "for meritorious conduct on the bloody battle-field of Pittsburg Landing." Mrs. R. left Pittsburg Landing a few days after the battle to attend some wounded soldiers to their homes by the rivers, leaving the last one at Peoria —Captain Swain, of Illinois, who died after he reached the wharf at Peoria. She remained at Peoria a few days to receive from her husband, who has left again to rejoin the army, and hopes and expects soon to be in Centralia.

The following letter has been addressed to Governor Yates by citizens of Peoria:

"PEORIA, April 27, 1862.

"SIR: We take pleasure to thank you for the honor conferred upon Peoria by your voluntary act in commissioning Mrs. Belle Reynolds, of this city, as Daughter of the Regiment of Illinois State Militia, showing your appreciation of valuable services so nobly rendered by a lady on the bloody battle-field of Pittsburg Landing.

"And we also take pleasure in bearing testimony to the high moral and Christian character of the Major, which will lead to whatever circumstances she may be placed she will ever honor her commission and the worthy Executive who gave it.

"We are, respectfully yours, &c."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1862.

THE CENSORSHIP OF THE PRESS.

WE have reason to believe that our subscribers in the army at Yorktown, and the gallant officers and soldiers to whom we have the pleasure of sending complimentary copies of Harper's Weekly, will receive this Number safely, and that their interest in it will not be interfered with on the way, either at Fortress Monroe or elsewhere.

We need hardly remark that seizures of this journal at particular points involve no pecuniary injury to us. Not a single copy of Harper's Weekly goes to Fortress Monroe or elsewhere which has not been paid for in advance, with the exception of copies which we send gratuitously to regimental officers, or soldiers in the army. To seize this journal, therefore, is merely to rob our gallant troops of property which belongs to them.

A censorship of the press is one of the temporary inconveniences which the present unexampled rebellion has involved. At the outbreak of the war there were throughout the North journals conducted by unprincipled men which were prepared deliberately to afford aid and comfort to the enemy. Ever since then there have been journals which, without the excuse of rebel sympathies, have been willing to betray strategical secrets, in order to outstrip their rivals in the publication of military and naval intelligence. The only means of checking the one and the other evil was a press censorship, and it is to the credit of Mr. LINCOLN that he did not hesitate to establish it.

We cheerfully bear testimony to the sagacity and forbearance which have been generally displayed by the Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War, and Colonel THOMAS A. SCOTT, Assistant Secretary for Telegraphs, in the exercise of the abnormal powers with which they have been invested in regard to the press.

It could not be expected that an exercise of power so foreign to our usages and our political system could be established without occasional errors and even injustice. It is often so difficult to draw the line between legitimate and contraband news that inconsiderate censors are liable to overstrain the rules of war unwittingly; while, on the other hand, the duties involved upon the censor, in consequence of the immense number of journals published in the loyal States, and the keen appetite of the public for news, were so overwhelming that a small discretion conveyed to the enemy by a newspaper article or a newspaper illustration might give us pleasure to think that useful functions performed by Colonel SANFORD have been the mitigation and removal of restrictions which have been put by subordinate officers of the army who have filled the post of Provost Marshal at various points.

We have confidence that the present head of the Secretary of War, the Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, is discharging the duties of his most onerous station with a single eye to the suppression of the rebellion, and with a whole-souled devotion to the interest of the Union. It gives us pleasure to add that he is ably and efficiently assisted by the gentleman to whom Colonel SANFORD, whose office, though naturally ungrateful, has been, in his hands, so administered as to secure for him the confidence and respect of journalists and the public at large.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

FOREIGN journals have boasted that the troubles of the United States have given the quietus to the Monroe Doctrine. The Secretary of State, they say, will be free to colonize where they please on American soil.

The event of this past month will probably have modified the views of European nations with regard to the power and position of the United States. We mean to say that the Doctrine is not hurt it is quite safe to kick us in the face. And we are inclined to think that, whatever may have been the opinion of the Cabinets of the European Powers which lately assumed to interfere in the affairs of Mexico, none of them will now persevere in intervening without the consent of this country.

The object of the Monroe Doctrine was to obviate wars in America. The object of America's plan was, that so long as we were the controlling Power in America none of our neighbors could be strong enough to attack us with any risk of success. If, however, any European Power gained a foothold on American soil, we might be liable to the wars which have distracted Europe. Its assumed, in establishing this doctrine, that British North America would naturally gravitate toward the Union. But, while, experience has proved that he was in error. The British colonies are further than ever from us. It has been the policy of England to increase the facility of visibility to this country among the Canadian people. They are studiously educated to regard us as their enemies, and the Commissioners of the Trent quarrel, elaborate plans were formed for the bombardment of Detroit, Chicago, and other frontier cities by expeditions fitted out in Canada.

The question naturally arises, whether the successful close of the war against the Southern rebels will not afford a good opportunity for obviating the possibility of another war with our northern neighbors. If Canada were independent we should never go to war with her, nor she with us. With England we are constantly liable to quarrel, and the only guarantee against war is the 3000 miles of ocean which separate us. This guarantee is neutralized by the military occupation of British North America by British forces.

Mr. K. G. Spaulding has given notice of a motion to abolish the Monroe Doctrine, and to appoint a new Commission to negotiate another treaty. It would seem that this Commission ought to demand such material guarantees for peace as would involve the political independence of the British colonies.

We do not wish for British colonies in the Union. We should gain nothing by annexing them, and they would be excellent neighbors as independent States. But so long as they are under the British flag, and so long as England can use their bays and rivers to fit out expeditions against our lake cities, they are a standing menace to us, which it is bad policy to neglect or despise. A Federal Union of these Colonies —stretching from British Columbia to Nova Scotia—would be an independent national flag, would be a welcome neighbor, and we could live side by side with them for centuries in peace. But we can not help thinking that it will be bad policy to disband our splendid army and dismantle our navy until the Monroe Doctrine is applied to the region north of us, as well as the region south of us, and until it is physically impossible for any of the anti-American wars of Europe to find vital expeditions on American soil to bombard our cities or ravage our frontier.

The expense of the fortifications which are about to be undertaken for the protection of our northern frontier would enable us, in case the necessity were forced upon us, to conquer the British Provinces and hold them against any power which could be sent against us from Europe.

THE LOUNGER.

SOUTHERN FAPERS THEN AND NOW.

THERE can be no more pregnant and instructive statement than the tone of the Southern newspapers a year ago and to-day. The wild yell of defiance, fury, contempt, and hatred which issued from them then has significantly changed.

"The North has no officers to command or drill the cowardly, motley crew of starving foreigners and operatives that it proposes to send South to fill ditches and as food for cannon, because it has no room in its penitentiaries and poor-houses to receive or sustain them." Our people can take it(Washington), they will take it, and hand it back quicker, and Lincoln, the beast, combined, can not prevent it. The just vengeance of the Almighty will be visibly poured upon people will teach the Illinois Ape to repent his coarse and retrace his journey across the borders of the free States still more rapidly than he came; and Scott, the traitor, will be given an opportunity at the same time to try its effects once between the Pacific and the Shanghai drill for quick movements." "It is not to be endured that the Capital of Abolitionism should come down from the black North for their rooms in the heart of the South, to defile and brutalize the land." "The South will fight, and fight with right, except for pay, for pillage, and plunder. Once satisfy them that no booty is to be had, and there is for to be gotten by invading the South, and no power on earth can lash and kick them south of Mason and Dixon's line."

All these things the Richmond Examiner said. A year has passed, and the Examiner tells us that the Confederacy is trembling on the result of York-town. If successful, it will give us six months for carrying out the conscription of our strong and equipping a large army, and launching a fleet of Merrimacs; but if unsuccessful, Virginia is lost."

"In the entire Southern Confederacy, from Alexandria, swindling, swash-gunglings has no terrors for any but the Northern mercenaries," said the Richmond Dispatch last year. Last week it says: "We may expect to hear of disasters wherever the enemy's pockets can be filled by the plunder of the public still in our possession....Having made himself master of the river and sea-board towns, they mean if he wish to conquer us, mos. come into the interior. There he will have to beat our armies without the aid of his iron-clad boats, before he can boast of having subdued the country."

But these mercenaries of the Union Armies are influenced also by the thirty pieces of silver, and are not possessed of a sentiment half so sublime as that which fired the Southern heart because of Judas." This is the Norfolk Day Book last year. This year it says: "We have faith in our valiant armies; but we have very little confidence in our remember the example of Samson—remember and emulate him."

"Come on, Abraham! You are wanted," said the Newbern Progress, last spring. This spring the Newbern Progress appears under the auspices of General Burnside.

The Republic of Absalom was a prophet last April: "We predict that Jeff Davis will be on the banks of the Hudson within thirty days; that Mr. Lincoln will go, with what little may be scraped together from a bankrupt treasury, from Washington, and that General Scott will lose his commandership; that nothing will be left, a month hence, of the old Union except possibly New England and New York." And the session of Congress which on the Fourth of July will not meet nor near Washington than Trenton, Maine, if it ever meet at all." The April the Commonwealth says that the Southern people are fast losing all confidence in their river defenses, and it is generally admitted that the Union army can be no longer successfully resisted. It also intimates a lack of confidence in the stability of the Southern Confederacy, advising its patrons to invest whatever money they have in the Southern Confederacy, and not to send any of the money now in circulation, which is principally rebel treasury notes.

These extracts carry their own moral. The newspapers express the extremest public sentiment, and what consciousness of cowardly failure betrays itself in every word of the expiring gasconade of this infamous rebellion!

KNOWN BY THEIR FRUITS.

The Report of the Committee to ascertain the treasonable acts of prisoners in the hands of the army is one of the most melancholy documents in history. It is not surprising, however, for no one who has thoughtfully read the many records of the aspects and characteristics of a society based upon slavery was unconscious of its essential and necessary barbarism. You may like slavery or dislike it; you may think it a great benefit to the negro whom it stirely outrages and degrades, or not; but you can not, with our own history and the daily newspaper in your hands, deny that it obtrudes the masters. It is the most heavily-Christian people in the world that could show themselves absolutely destitute of human instinct as the Southern rebels!

It is in vain to say that there are gentle and accomplished women in the Carolinas, Georgia, and New Orleans; that there are frank and generous men at the South; for nobody who has a right to an opinion for a moment doubts it. But these are the extremely exceptional persons, and ever have been silenced by the absolute tyranny of coercive. These gentle and accomplished people are and evidently sincerely believe, things at which the heart sickens still with the deepest sympathy. Humanity, honor, justice, are all partially paralyzed in their influence. Their civilization is a manual—lovely and languid above, but ending in bestial deformity.

This ought to be not surprising, for they are human beings, and absolute power turns the brain. We are not strong enough for it. And even if it was to be allowed that the enslaved race were benefited by servitude, the enslavers have been, and must always be, ruined by it. "Is not a man a perfectly reason be assigned," says Hume, "for the severe, I might say barbarous manners of ancient times than the practice of domestic slavery? It is a wrong so monstrous that it carries its own personality, and therefore it is that slavery is the most picturesque in the system. The silent, dusky servant, by decent perhaps a barbaric king—the ox train of cotton-bales, large-lipped and silent with absolute luxury of repose, are discovered to us first and the romantic, dreamy, half-savage dancing in the warm twilight, such as Humboldt describes in San Domingo, and Edwards and Bryant and the writers of various travels sign in Jamaica—how pleasing a picture! how charming a peasant-life! what careless happiness!

But Edwards, while he contended that slavery must be maintained, was too honest not to say, in the same book in which he did so, "Unconquerable history of San Domingo—" in countries where slavery is established the leading principle on which governments of every form act is the denial of the absolute coercive necessity, which, having in view the increasing, augments the misery of life. It is in vain to deny that such actually is, and necessarily must be, the case in all countries when slavery is allowed. It is the parent of pride and supine ignorance. These are the conditions of slavery in the Southern States, and their natural results. Consequently, in our slave States the ignorance of the mass of the people is appalling. Could they have known anything of the nature of the Government, the history of the nation, or the character of the people at the North, they would not have rushed, as the Southern masses have been brought to the field by the power of a great lie; but they could not have been thus hurried by the scourge for ignorance, passion, cruelty, and prejudice which slavery occasions and requires.

Impatient of labor, slavery, they boil the dolce flesh of our soldiers to get the bones more speedily. Their women are evil-eyed, with bloodshot lids, cankers, into drinking-cups; and the women of the region, equally ignorant and cruel, wear them as great ear-drops. Even in the Mississippi Valley the people suppose us to have horns; believe that we grow the wounded, and that we eat the dead. The extravagance, the idleness of ignorance, in every quarter that our troops have been, astonishes them. Their own luxury is slovenly, their ease is slothful, their wealth is dirty. It must have ignorance at any price. Knowledge is light, and is the light to be darkened.

Let the "white trash," as the poor whites of the South are called, be what they may, the whole ruling slavery they are maintaining the riches and ease of a few slaveholders at the expense of the lives of every living dead and valuable in life, and they will soon square accounts with the few or five hundred thousand lazy slaveholders.

Can the Union ever be safe or peaceful so long as the social system of a large section shall exist which makes it the interest of the most direct ignorant of their more distant fellow-citizens? And will not the whole moral influence of the rest of the North with those of the South inspire the latter with the hope of becoming civilized, intelligent, and prosperous?

THE KING IS DEAD.

At the Charleston Convention of 1860, as most persons will remember, it was very perfectly evident that it would not be difficult to "precipitate" the Cotton States into revolution, if not to secure the secession of the whole South, because the North must have cotton, and the necessity was unfounded that the whole South assemble offtrade would control politics, and commerce would be stronger than patriotism. "Cotton is King" was the unfounded assumption. "The consumer of the world hangs by a thread," said Dickens. So glad was the South to accept this view with the wag of cotton-spinning, and takes eighty-five per cent. from this country, she will raise the bushes of the field and establish an "inland sea" of cotton. Cotton is King, and while it is so it's better to be a slave than a free wise Wigfall.

"Yes," sighed Yancey, a month ago in New Orleans; "but it is a mistake to suppose that Cotton is King. It is not." The Norfolk Day Book echoes the dreary confession. "We confess that we go almost with wiser men, were deluded on the general belief in the supremacy of cotton....The truth of this declaration (Dickens's) may year's production, and the world will have to do without it." Long and bootless may be our search for an important that cotton or tobacco."

thus the whole vision of "Southern" supremacy based upon cotton fades away. The success of the blockade is a political economy disappointment. The entire fallacy of Southern political theory is exposed. This is, of itself, a practical and instructive fact. It illustrates the character and consequence of a civilization based upon contempt of justice. Men who consent to live on the ruin of a race, can not believe that other men will be influenced by any other motive than their own selfishness. Consequently they looked for a general withdrawal of the blockade sooner than the fact that the Government was instituted to maintain it. That the interested nation might look elsewhere for it; that to raise a blockade forcibly instead of by the policy which depended upon slave labor; in short, that the Government would modify and control the foreign selfishness they had established.

The first shot fired in the wonderful Round Robin of Virginia," fired from Beauregard's batteries at Fort Sumter killed the cotton monopoly and slavery together.

A NEW FORM OF SUCCESSION.

Another of the ridiculous humors of this foreign rebellion is the project of "John M. Veryclay, Esq., of New Orleans," who proclaims that on any absent the middle of April for up country, for a Confederate decimal system for the currency of the South."

"It is," says Mr. Vernon, "a separate and distinct people, influenced by different interests and sentiments from the Yankees who would rule over us." Our manners and customs are different, our tastes and talents are different, our habits of thought are different, and—in conformity with natural laws, nature, and institutes—our currency, weights, and measures should be different."

He then suggests the following table:

10 Centimes	1 Sou.
10 Sous	1 Dollar.
10 Sous	1 Ball.

John M. Veryclay, Esq., then adds three reasons why it should be adopted; but the second is so singularly pertinent to the condition of affairs in the Southern Confederacy, that it is quite sufficient: "Second. They are emblems of cheerfulness, honor, honesty of purpose, nobility, and stability."

Rebelsin and Swift combined could not surpass that liking sarcasm.

THE FATE OF GUERRILLAS.

The fall of New Orleans is evidently felt by the rebels to be the direst wound they have yet received. "This is a heavy blow," says the Richmond Dispatch, "it is a heavy blow, and we feel it to the end of the article the paper waxes more hopeful, and it concludes with the cheerful remark that "the fate of [the national] success is scarcely a disadvantage to us." The Petersburg Express declares that "the ways of God are mysterious, and He directs the affairs of men in such a way as to lead them to consider an event calamitous which forward process the happiest that could have occurred for their welfare." The Atlanta Intelligencer says: "Memphis, we apprehend, will share the fate of New Orleans. To decide correctly what they other hope is now a folly." They all agree that the gun-boats are irresistible; that the only thing to be used the Government will restore its sway; that the case of rebels is unpromising, but yellow fever may do something to help them against us and that at last they must take to the bush and carry on a guerilla warfare.

That will be the natural course of the more desperate—and for them General Frémont's method of treatment in Western Virginia will be the best. Two men taken in the act of such warfare have been sentenced to death, and he has approved the sentence.

FORESEEING THE "MERRIMAC."

While the Merrimac is still a vague terror, and the vender and regret that we had not known two of her sea will allow, the rebels are more anxious that in this paper for November 7, 1861, as plausible, and as it proved, quite accurate, was the monster was anticipated; and why Norfolk was not sooner taken. And when that day comes, we equally plain that it is not seen that, as in the general military conduct of the war, all was done that could be wisely done.

AN ANSWER.

A friend in Baltimore writes to know why the ballad on Pittsburg Landing, in the 7th April, was called "The Waterloo of America." Certainly such a title has no meaning; but if it had been called the Waterloo of Rebellion the reason would have been that, as Blucher came up to the support of Wellington, and secured the rout of the French, so the coming up of Buell to the support of Grant secured the defeat of the rebels; and as Napoleon never recovered from the battle of Waterloo, so the rebellion will never recover from its defeat at Pittsburg Landing.

"The two great battles of the Italian-French campaign in Lombardy three years ago were Magenta and Solferino.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WANTED—An unlimited number of young men, possessing the four good qualities of steadyattentiveness, sustained earnestness, self-distrustfulness, and satisfying-slowness, with heavy capable of appreciating feminine disinterestedness.

FULL ADMITTANCE, FULL ADMISSION.

1860. Mr. Ansonmore, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, invents a hydraulic machine for raising heavy weights. He is knighted, and the Admiralty is delighted.

1861. The Admiralty recovers, and invents Iron Ships that resist any known cannon-ball.

1862. Sir William Armstrong invents a gun that smashes the Iron Ships into blackmisthorses. The Admiralty collapses.

1862. The Admiralty re-expands and invents Plutian Ships fastened with diamond rivets, and Sir William Armstrong's bills fly to pieces like bonbons.

1862. Sir William Armstrong invents a gun that will blow a Plutian Ship to the greatest part of Jericho, and in a pleasing excitement that the greatest part of Jericho is Sir William's bills.

1863. The Admiralty invents Torpedo vessels which sail under water and hollow any range of guns. Sir William Armstrong invents a gun that will blow up Jericho and Jericho.

1864. Sir William Armstrong invents a Vertical gun that discharges Greek fire straight down, and a second gun that discharges Greek fire straight up. The Lords of the Admiralty are about to hang themselves, when a thought strikes them that it is useless.

Mr. Gladstone again doubles the Income-Tax.

1867. Sir William Armstrong, the heir to whom has been living in his cash by the sack only, suddenly proclaims the discovery that it will be quite impossible to prevent the Admiralty does not invent say thing, but wish to see, and that he has therefore resolved to go and live in Switzerland. The Admiralty, in a third burst of enthusiasm, sets up against the advice of their excellent Secretary, Mr. Childers, and invents a gun which will explode gunpowder in the Gardens. As the iron, instead of lying down with a lamb, lay down with a lion, the Admiralty thinks there is some mistake somewhere, and determines to invent a new Navy.

Mr. Gladstone once more doubles the Income-Tax.

1871. The Admiralty invents a Navy of Iron Rams, Iron Steels, and debts Sir William Armstrong.

1872. Sir William Armstrong invents the Hannibal, or Ship-Shell, which contains the strongest vinegar, and melts the Iron Navy. The Admiralty, in a third burst of Iron Britain Frost, he is raised to the peerage by Lord Bomb.

1873. Sir William Armstrong is Lord Bomb, and Lord Bomb sits in the Gouls, out of fear range, and the First Lord is double-locked in the Admiralty Cellars.

Mr. Gladstone is fourth time Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Lord Bomb is Lord Bellows buttering-trait, and is sent to Switzerland to bring down all the British Fleet into the German Ocean.

1874. The Admiralty, in desperation, invents a Subterranean Fleet, which is to be conveyed by tunnels to all the coasts. Lord Bomb, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and every body now pays twice his income in taxes, the people are starving, and universal suffrage is about to be universally given.

Government therefore stop the pensions of a hundred supernumerated clerks, discharge some extra night-porters at the Treasury, and pay off the National Debt.

Sketch Fleet.

1875. Lord Bomb invents his Typhoons, or Earthquake Shells, and suffocates the British Fleet in the Tunnels. Sketch.

Mr. Gladstone is fifth time Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Admiralty and the French proclaims the Millennium, which proves to be Universal Peace, and the Admiralty is abolished, and the collectors remit the quarter's Income-Tax and Lord Bomb goes over to Voltaire and Fire-works in honor of the occasion, and by your accident burns up the Admiralty.

TRIFLE NOT WITH CUPID.

On a sunny noon a maiden
Met a boy of fifteen
With a bow and quiver laden,
Singing as he came:
"Trifle not with little Cupid,
Love will find you out
He is not so blind and stupid
As some people doubt."

As he came he plaited rushes,
Singing merrily—
"Maiden, let me make your bushes—
Come and play with me!
Lightly laughed the maiden through the valley,
Lightly laughed the maid
"Boy, you'll make your garters ruby, Joyous, gay, and glad."

Lightly had the maid decided
With the boy to rove,
When his bow was gilded
Over a branch above.
Round the wild boy was enraptured,
While the wild boy sang
Of the love the archer was captured
By the wiles of love.

"Elder, will you have a drink of cider?" inquired a farmer of an old temperance man who was spending an evening at his house. "Ah, sartain sure, thank ye," said the old man, "I never drink any liquor of any kind—specially cider; but if you'll just hand me the bottle I'll take a taste."

When some rough fellow charged Sheridan with incendiarism, the wit replied that the accusation remained him of the wonderful story of the Irishman who was charged with, who, hearing his friends aware that it was time to take action, set the two gentlemen by the throat, and screamed, "Why, you don't mind that fellow, do you? He changes his opinion every day."

"Pat," said a builder to an Irishman engaged in carrying stairs to the top of a four-story building, "have you any reason in your head?" "Sure, and I have, sir," said Pat, "there's the cistern." "How many rooms have you?" "Three, sir—the sleeping room, the parlor, and the kitchen room, and the pig pen—four rooms altogether." "That's a story," said the builder. "Sure, and I have stories," says Pat.

Sir Walter Scott's wit, though an excellent and admirable example of the genuine article, was not his only gift. One day while walking in the fields in early spring he chanced to help forth an invitation to a dinner party, and, being a wealthy farmer, the playful lambs, etc. "Ah, my dear," said the lady, "how cruel you are! I suppose you would eat the roast leg of lamb, with mint sauce, for dinner to-morrow!"

An eminent and witty preacher was once asked if he did not think such a sad thing as a broken heart could be cured. He said he feared, "I think he follows it as a man does a wife, and then he gets married."

"Do you call them large turnips?" "Why, yes, they are most lovely large." "They may be for turnips, but they are awfully small for cabbages!" "Well, I never! how have we the entire [?]" "Oh, a monster! we called the forty pounder." "Forty pounder! you took off the heads and the stalks! you never would a despise that forty pounder!" "What a whopper!" "You don't mean to say I tell a falsehood?" "Oh no; what a whopper of a cabbage, I mean."

Why is the amount of taxes the last man in the world? Because he comes after everybody else.

The worst of all kinds of eye-water is a coquette's tears.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

☞ For an account of the Capture of Fort Macon, and the Fall of Yorktown, see page 315.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, April 29, in the Senate, Senator Grimes introduced a bill to provide that the school tax collected from the colored people of the District be applied to the education of colored children. A bill to amend the bill of last session, confiscating slaves, so as to include the wives and children of persons, was introduced by Senator Wilson. The resolution calling on the Secretary of State for the correspondence relative to the late visit of Mr. Seward to the South was taken up, and, after a few remarks by Mr. Sumner, the resolution was adopted. Mr. Sumner, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, were appointed a committee to wait upon the President and inform him that the Senate was ready to receive communications from him. The resolution calling on the Secretary of War for the correspondence relative to the arrest of Generals Stone, McClernand, Hamilton, and Cochrane, and the reasons for such arrests, was taken up, and, after some remarks by Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, Mr. Sumner, and Mr. Trumbull, was adopted. Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Capitol, Executive Mansion, and other public buildings. The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The resolution calling on the Secretary of War for information relative to the number of persons who have taken up arms against the United States, Senator Davis, of Kentucky, moved to strike out all the part relating to emancipation. Senator Sumner moved to amend the motion by saying that the Lords of the Admiralty are about to hang themselves, when a thought strikes them that it is useless.

Mr. Gladstone again doubles the Income-Tax.

1877. The Admiralty, in the hope that it may have been living in his cash by the sack only, suddenly proclaims the discovery that it will be quite impossible to prevent the Admiralty does not invent say thing, but wish to see, and that he has therefore resolved to go and live in Switzerland. The Admiralty, in a third burst of enthusiasm, sets up against the advice of their excellent Secretary, Mr. Childers, and invents a gun which will explode gunpowder in the Gardens. As the iron, instead of lying down with a lamb, lay down with a lion, the Admiralty thinks there is some mistake somewhere, and determines to invent a new Navy.

Mr. Gladstone once more doubles the Income-Tax.

1878. The Admiralty invents a Navy of Iron Rams, Iron Steels, and debts Sir William Armstrong.

1879. Sir William Armstrong invents the Hannibal, or Ship-Shell, which contains the strongest vinegar, and melts the Iron Navy. The Admiralty, in a third burst of Iron Britain Frost, he is raised to the peerage by Lord Bomb.

1880. Sir William Armstrong is Lord Bomb, and Lord Bomb sits in the Gouls, out of fear range, and the First Lord is double-locked in the Admiralty Cellars.

Mr. Gladstone is fifth time Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Lord Bomb is Lord Bellows buttering-trait, and is sent to Switzerland to bring down all the British Fleet into the German Ocean.

1881. The Admiralty, in desperation, invents a Subterranean Fleet, which is to be conveyed by tunnels to all the coasts. Lord Bomb, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and every body now pays twice his income in taxes, the people are starving, and universal suffrage is about to be universally given.

Government therefore stop the pensions of a hundred supernumerated clerks, discharge some extra night-porters at the Treasury, and pay off the National Debt.

Sketch Fleet.

1882. Lord Bomb invents his Typhoons, or Earthquake Shells, and suffocates the British Fleet in the Tunnels. Sketch.

Mr. Gladstone is fifth time Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Admiralty and the French proclaims the Millennium, which proves to be Universal Peace, and the Admiralty is abolished, and the collectors remit the quarter's Income-Tax and Lord Bomb goes over to Voltaire and Fire-works in honor of the occasion, and by your accident burns up the Admiralty.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S DISPATCH.

The following dispatch was received at Washington on 10th:

HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY OF POTOMAC,
Yorktown, April 6.

To Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War:

I have the honor to report,

We have guns, ammunition, camp equipage, etc.

We hold the entire line of his works, which the engineers report as being very strong.

I have therein all my cavalry and horse artillery in person, supported by infantry.

I have Franklin's division, and as much more as I can transport by water, up to West Point to-day.

The enemy left in haste.

The gun-boats have gone up York River.

I shall write to-day to that Gloucester is also in our possession. I shall push the enemy to-day.

GEORGE B. M'CLELLAN, Major-General.

THE NEW RESULT.

General M'Clellan's dispatches state that his troops have thus far taken seventy-one heavy guns, large amounts of ammunition, and all the works of the enemy which they prove to have been most formidable, and I can now fully understand the great importance of the victory we have gained. The enemy is brilliant, and you may rest assured that in the battle of Monday last we gained a victory which, if we do clear in following up the rebels, who have been guilty of the most revolting cruelties and barbarous conduct in paying torpedoes within the abandoned works, near wells and springs, and near flag-staffs, magazines, storehouses, even in carpet bags, barrels of flour, etc. We have not lost many men in the manner—some four or five killed—but perhaps a dozen wounded. I shall make the prisoners release our wounded men.

THE REBEL BEAR-GUARD CAUGHT.

General Franklin's cavalry force overtook the rear of the rebels on Sunday afternoon, and forced them to an engagement. The rebels fought desperately, but were forced to bend. The artillery on both sides were engaged for a short time, but at the end the rebel artillery was silenced by our men to abandon their position. The want of infantry support on the part of the rebels saved the enemy's works; and it being evident that it was useless to attempt further operations, the troops fell back, and were handed yards to await the arrival of infantry, which soon after arrived. The rebels were pursued by our cavalry and skirmishers until the next morning. It was expected that Williamsburg would have been be occupied, as our troops were also in full retreat.

EVACUATION OF WILLIAMSBURG.

On Monday, May 5, there was a very severe fight, in which General Hooker and his brigade were engaged, and with glory. The rebel loss was very heavy. On Tuesday morning Williamsburg was found evacuated. The rear of all his force toward Richmond. General Chilmer and his army are following in close pursuit.

GENERAL FRANKLIN'S ADVANCE.

General Franklin's division, in transports and the gunboats, arrived at West Point and landed at the railroad bridge. It is reported that they have captured several teamsters and a number of prisoners.

SURRENDER OF NEW ORLEANS.

Brom Southern papers received at Fortress Monroe on Friday morning we learn that Farragut's powerful squadron of New Orleans had been accepted by the Mayor, Mr. Monroe, and that the City of New Orleans was at the mercy of a battalion of marines from the squadron. General Butler was to arrive there on Friday, and Commodore Farragut to Pontchartrain.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE MAYOR OF NEW ORLEANS.

The papers have published the correspondence which occurred between Commodore Farragut and Mr. Monroe, Mayor of New Orleans, on the approach of the fleet before that city. The Commodore's letter is a blunt and rude one, and tells the Mayor that Commodore Porter is in the city; for the hoisting of the Union flag over the City Hall, and the Custom-house, and the demand of the huge emblematic of any other sovereignty than that of the United States. He also says that he will hold the municipal order, quell disturbance, and call upon all good citizens to aid him in the work of restoration, promising protection, but commanding that no one shall be molested for expressions of opinion. The Mayor, in his correspondence, declines evidence of pleasure at seeing the fleet in front of the city, and says that he will not haul down the flag of the Confederate States. He says are very explicit, and says "I shall speedily and severely punish any person or persons who shall haul down the flag of the Confederate States, yesterday by armed men firing upon helpless women and children, and I call upon you to haul down the flag now waving the 'old flag.'" The Mayor responds in an utterly defiant tone, and concludes by saying that he will retain the impossibility of resistance, as the army upon which he relies has retreated him; but he refuses to haul down the secession flags, and declares, in the name of the people of New Orleans, that they will not be responsible for any insane intent despite the necessity of yielding to the control.

POINTS TO BE REOPENED.

It is announced by foreign papers that Mr. Lincoln will very soon issue a proclamation declaring all the leading points of the Southern coast open to the world's trade upon which event the restoration of the commerce of the country will be the first result. The object of this is to put most mischievous efforts of the rebellion to an end, and to remove the pretext for European foreign ministers, opening the mail communication with the South, thereby facilitating the execution of the President's proclamation and declaring the reconstruction of Southern States as well.

A COLLECTOR FOR NEW ORLEANS.

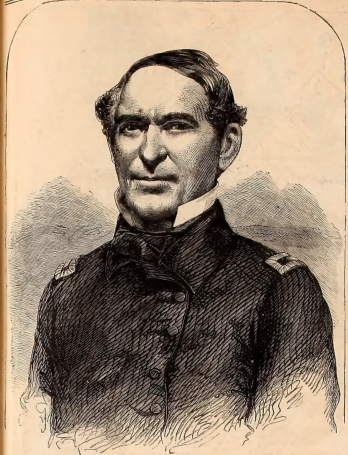
A Collector for the port of New Orleans, in the person of Mr. Charles L. Ludlow, has already been appointed and confirmed. He is a native of that State, and has formerly a resident of New Orleans, but left that city on the outbreak of the rebellion, and has since resided here.

AFFAIRS AT CORINTH.

Important events are expected to occur immediately in the vicinity of Corinth. A reconnaissance was on Sunday last in force, extending to the Tuscumbia River, about 4,000 strong, at Farmington, with four pieces. Our forces immediately attacked them, and after a sharp skirmish carried the position in fine style, compelling the rebels to abandon every thing. Many were killed on the field. Our cavalry then pushed through to Boonerille, took possession of the town, tore up the railroad track there, and destroyed the bridges. Our loss in this gallant affair is very trifling, not exceeding 50.

General Mitchel telegraphs to the Department that an expedition from Huntsville has destroyed the railroad toward Chattanooga. It was executed with complete success. They burned 18 bridges, taking all their property to Atlanta, Georgia. A force was at last penetrated to Dalton, and found a strong Union sentiment.

FOREIGN NEWS.



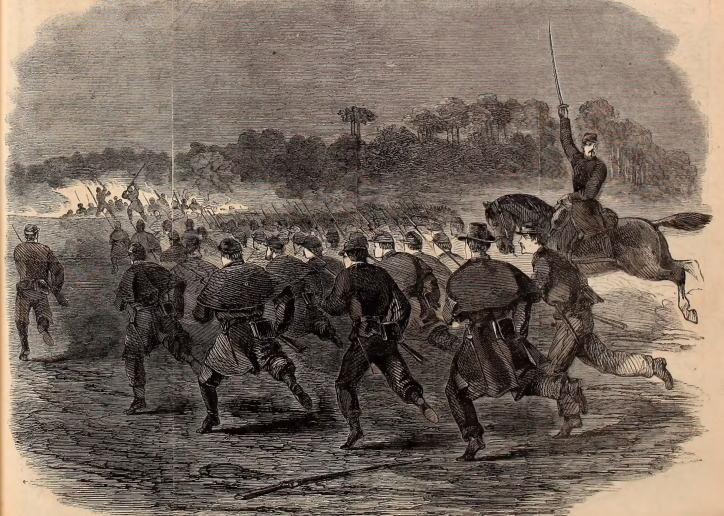
MEXICO.

FRANCE DECLARES WAR.

The news from Mexico, by the steamer Teutonia, is of the highest interest and importance. The tripartite alliance of England, France, and Spain, for the destruction of the liberties of Mexico, is now virtually at an end; but France alone has undertaken the task of crushing the growing a monarchical government upon the unwilling people. To this end, despite the malicious excuses, war has been declared against Mexico by the French plenipotentiaries. Count Saligny Jarace and General Doblado have exchanged the firm determination of rendering their Gallic independence by every means in their power, but offering still to treat amicably with the Spanish and English. General Lorencez, the new French commander, says that he is responsible to his Emperor for his action.

THE UNION CAVALRY AND ARTILLERY STARTING IN PURSUIT OF THE REBELS UP THE YORKTOWN TURNPIKE.—SKETCHED BY MR. W. HOUSE.—[SEE PAGE 315.]

COMMODORE FARRAGUT.—[From a Photograph by Holmes, 554 Broadway, New York.]



GEORGE PEABODY, ESQ.—[See Page 306.

COMMODORE FARRAGUT, U.S.N.

Flag-Officer David G. Farragut, the Commodore of the fleet now before New Orleans, is a native of the State of Tennessee, and is about sixty-three years of age. He is a citizen of his native State, and was appointed to the United States Navy from that State. He entered the service as a midshipman when a mere child, his warrant bearing date December 17, 1810. He was first on board the Essex, under the celebrated Commodore David Porter, and served with him also in the expedition around Cape Horn in 1813. After ten years of an adventurous life, in the year 1859 we find him still a midshipman on board the Franklin, a twenty-four-gun lineof-battle ship. On the 19th of January, 1825, he was commissioned a lieutenant.

In 1841 Lieutenant Farragut was ordered to act as Assistant Inspector of Ordnance, being second in command under Commodore Skinner. The position he held continued the end of the year 1853. Another field was at this time opened to the subject of our sketch by the establishment of a new Navy-yard at Mare Island, near San Francisco, California. Commodore Farragut, then standing No. 18 on the list, was ordered to the chief command of this post, and became commandant of the new yard. In 1858 he was ordered to the command of the steam sloop Brooklyn, a twenty-five-gun vessel, forming a portion of the Home Squadron under Flag-Officer M'Cluney. He was, however, removed from this command during the month of May, 1860, after being on board of that vessel one hundy months. With the present expedition was fitted out Captain Farragut was appointed by the Navy Department as its Flag-Officer, and, judging by the reports that have reached us, he has bravely filled the position, and added one more spric to the already heavy laurel wreath won by the navy of the United States.

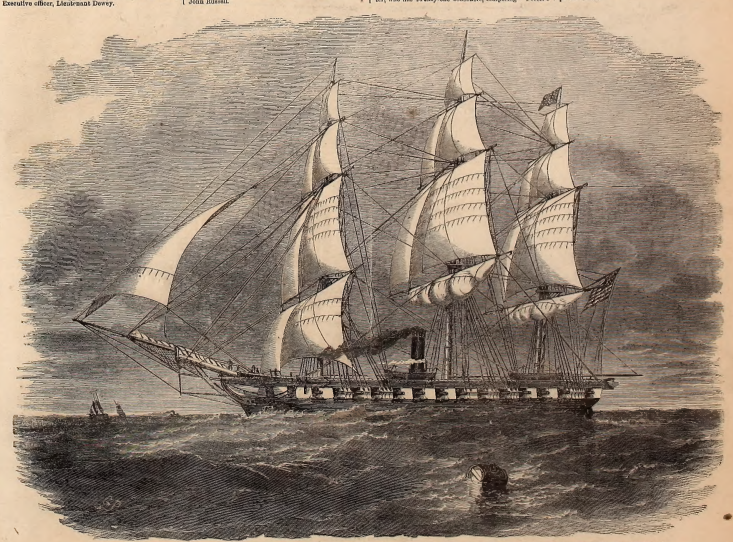
Commodore Farragut is still an active and comparatively young-looking man. He has been twice married, the first time to the niece of George Loyall, Buchanan's Navy Agent at Norfolk, and one wife is reported as related to somebody or nay in that vicinity.

CHARGE OF THE FIRST MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT ON A REBEL RIFLE PIT NEAR YORKTOWN.—Sketched by Mr. W. Homer.—[See Page 310.]

MAP OF THE THEATRE OF THE WAR IN VIRGINIA.

PICKETS CONVERSING BEFORE YORKTOWN—A COMMON SCENE.—SKETCHED BY JOS. MEAD OF THE VERMONT BRIGADE.—[SEE PAGE 315.]

OUR FLEET IN THE MISSISSIPPI.



OUR correspondent with Commodore Farragut's fleet in the Mississippi sends us a large picture of the entrance of that fleet into the river, which we reproduce on pages 312 and 313. It will give the beholder some idea of the strength of the expedition—the largest, it is believed, ever collected under our flag. Our correspondent enumerates the fleet as follows:

Flag-ship Hartford, twenty-six guns, Captain Richard Wainwright; Executive officer, Lieutenant J. S. Thornton.
Steam sloop Brooklyn, twenty-six guns, Captain Thomas T. Craven; Executive officer, Lieutenant R. B. Lowry.
Steam sloop Richmond, twenty-eight guns, Captain James Alden.
Steam sloop Mississippi, sixteen guns, Captain M. Smith; Executive officer, Lieutenant Dewey.
Steam sloop Pensacola, twenty-four guns, Captain Henry W. Morris; Executive officer, Lieutenant Francis Ree.
Steam sloop Oneida, eleven guns, Commander S. Phillips Lee; Executive officer, Lieutenant Stcord.
Steam sloop Iroquois, nine guns, Commander John De Camp; Executive officer, David B. Harmony.
Gun-boat Wachusett, six guns, Captain William B. Renshaw.
Gun-boat Kaluhdin, six guns, Lieutenant Commanding George Preble.
Gun-boat Pinola, five guns, Lieutenant Commanding Crosby.
Gun-boat Cayuga, five guns, Lieutenant Commanding Napoleon Harrison.
Gun-boat Clifton, five guns.
Gun-boat Itasca, five guns, Lieutenant Commanding C. H. B. Caldwell.
Gun-boat Kennebec, five guns, Lieutenant Commanding John Russell.
Gun-boat Kanawha, five guns, Lieutenant Commanding John Pelteger.
Gun-boat Seneca, six guns, Lieutenant Commanding Edward Donaldson.
Gun-boat Hearst, six guns, Lieutenant Commanding A. D. Harrell.
Gun-boat Owasco, five guns, Lieutenant Commanding John Guest.
Gun-boat Winona, four guns, Lieutenant Commanding Edward T. Nichols; Executive officer, John G. Walker.
Gun-boat Wissahickon, five guns, Lieutenant Commanding Albert N. Smith.
Gun-boat Kineo, five guns, Lieutenant Commanding George H. Bawson.
Schooner Katahdin, nine guns, Acting Volunteer Lieutenant Lamson.
Gun-boat Harriet Lane, six guns, Lieutenant Commanding J. M. Wainwright, with Commander David D. Porter, who has twenty-one schooners, comprising "Porter's mortar fleet," each carrying a heavy mortar and two 32-pound guns.

The fleet thus far, therefore, consists of forty-six sail, carrying two hundred and eighty-six guns, and twenty-one mortars, the whole under command of Flag-Officer D. S. Farragut—Henry H. Bell, Flag-Captain.

The Hunnington and the Pensacola grounded on the bar, and were towed off by tugs. The Colorado was unable to cross.

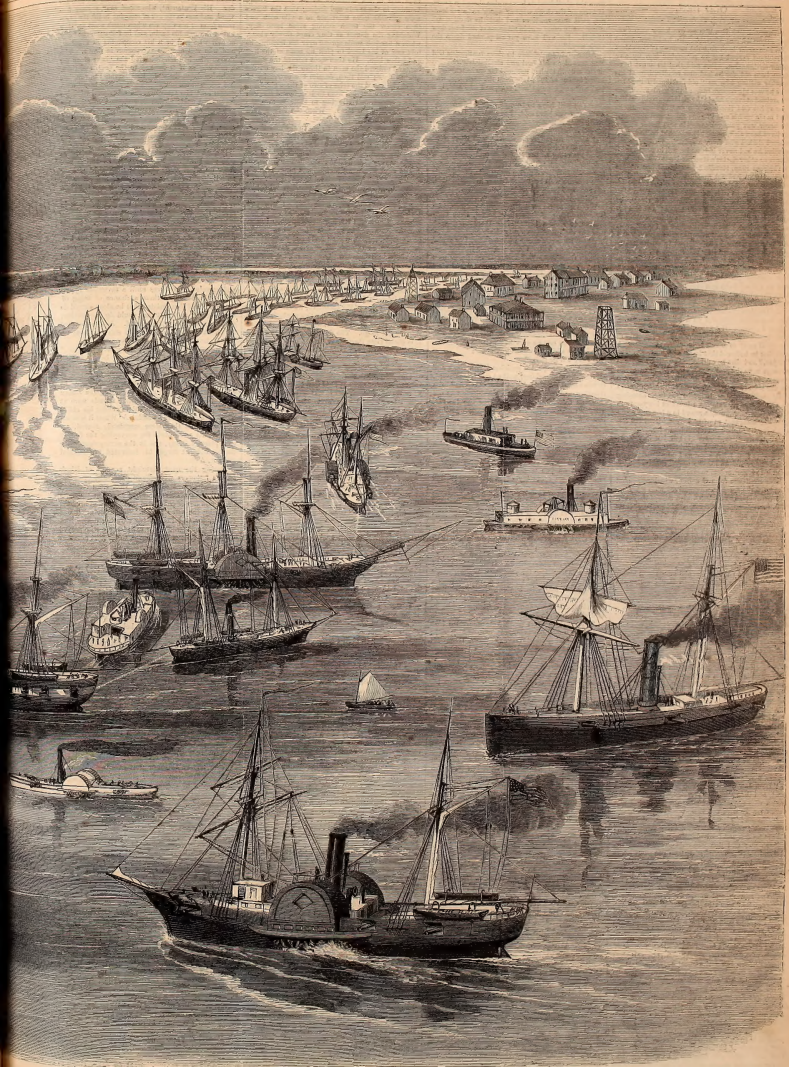
Of the Hartford herself, which is hardly seen with distinctness in our large picture in consequence of her being in the advance of the fleet, we give a separate illustration on this page. She is a noble ship, and Commodore Farragut may well be proud of her.



THE UNITED STATES STEAMER "HARTFORD," COMMODORE FARRAGUT'S FLAG-SHIP, WHICH LED THE SQUADRON UP THE MISSISSIPPI.

Light-house on Southwest Pass, Colorado, 40 Guns.

COMMODORE FARRAGUT'S SQUADRON AND CAPTAIN PORTER'S MORTAR FLEET E

ING THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.—Sketched by an Officer of the "Mississippi."—[See Page 311.]

OLD BEN,

THE SCOUT OF THE TENNESSEE MOUNTAINS.

How old Old Ben was no one knew exactly—not even Old Ben himself. He had been called Old Ben so far back that the memory of the oldest inhabitant served not to remember him by any other designation. Ben said that he must have been born old, for he had dim recollections of his mother calling him an "old-fashioned feller" before he was big enough to weed the garden. When he arrived at man's estate the girls invariably called him either Old Bachelor Ben or Old Ben. So he had made up his mind to one thing, and that was, he never was young Ben. He was never known to have been sick, except it was that he had "the cussed shakes and fever a spell." With that exception he had never invested much in patent medicines or other doctor's stuff, and was consequently a vigorous man, standing firm in his boots. He was tall and had not much flesh to spare, but he often remarked that it "tuk a lean hoss for a long race, and he was one on 'em." He knew the Mississippi, Cumberland, and Tennessee rivers, he said, better than he did his Testament, and had acquired considerable fame for his skill at the oar and the wheel. He was the man to take a craft safe through a shute or over dangerous places, and for that duty was still preferred to others many years his junior. As for old Tennessee, he knew every inch of her "sile," and on that "p'int" he wouldn't yield a notch to any man living or dead. His courage was known to be of the right stripe, and he was set down as a tough old knot that would turn the edge of many a bright axe if an attempt was made to split him.

At the time the hurricane of rebellion swept over the State, Old Ben was on a visit to Knoxville, where he was well known. The many outrages perpetrated upon those who refused to succumb to the rebel sway so aroused his ire that he at length said that he believed that he was beginning to turn "injun," and that he couldn't die until he had had revenge upon the scaly varmints, who, he asserted, were mean enough to cut their grandmothers' throats for the sake of getting what the old women had in their stockings. One night he had been listening to a chap who he knew as a briefless lawyer from Clarksville haranguing a crowd in a bar-room, and growing indignant at what he considered the fellow's insolence, he interrupted him with,

"See here, stranger, yer kin talk jest like clock-work about them cussed abolishunists—and every one knows that I hates 'em as I do pizen—but I'll jest bet yer drinks for the crowd that yer never owned a nigger for 'em to steal."

This challenge from Old Ben, which somewhat staggered the speaker, was received with much secret satisfaction by several Union men of the group who, from necessity, were obliged to conceal their sentiments, and created a general laugh. It was a few minutes before the lawyer could recover his self-possession. He then drew himself up to assume as great a degree of dignity as possible, and fixing what he intended as a withering look on Old Ben, while a contemptuous smile played around the corners of his mouth, he said,

"Old man, I suppose you are some of the Union rubbish that has not yet been swept out of the State."

"Thar yer right. I'm Union clear through to the marrow, and if I had my way I'd hang up a few such chaps as you ar', who never work, but ar' everlastin' smellin' around for some office, and who have brought all this trouble on the country. Yer ar' now goin' about deceivin' honest people—tellin' 'em that the whole North ar' agoin' to turn nigger stealers, and that the only way for Southern men to pertect that property is for 'em to dissolve the Union and 'stablish a one hoss consarn, with such one hoss chaps as you at the head of it. I'd hang yer up without judge or jury. That would be the quickest way to settle the mischief yer have made."

A loud braying from some of the converts to the new doctrines greeted the remarks of Old Ben. But nothing daunted thereat, he exclaimed,

"Yer may bray jest as much as yer a mind to. But yer kin remembar that jackasses do the same thing. And any one who jines the secession crew ain't fit to be named the same day with a jackass. Them's my sentiments, and I don't care who knows 'em."

"Look out, Old Ben! You'll be talkin' treason next, and then you'll be arrested," said one of the crowd who sympathized with the rebels, yet was very friendly with Old Ben.

"Treason!" ejaculated the lawyer. "He has been doing nothing else but talking treason, and should be arrested forthwith."

"Oh no; Old Ben won't do any harm!" exclaimed another secessionist, who did not wish to see the old man molested.

"You've arrested a good many honest people who never harmed any one, and I expect my turn will come one of these days," replied Old Ben.

"You may depend upon that!" exclaimed the lawyer. "It won't be long before you are elevated!" and here he gave a peculiar jerk with the hand which he held near his neck. "If you don't mend your manners you will go up soon, old man."

Old Ben was about to reply, but was interrupted by the entrance of a man, followed by a number of others, who called the lawyer one side, and then entered into a low but earnest conversation with him. The new-comer was a thick-set, brutal-looking man, with a face well covered with heavy black hair. He was generally known as Black Dave, and his business had been that of a negro-trader; but he was now at the head of a band of ruffians who, under his direction, had been guilty of many acts of barbarism. The lawyer was a sort of lieutenant and adviser to the band. Old Ben pointed to the spot where they stood, and said,

"Some dirty business is afloat, I reckon, when two such chaps get together. One on 'em, who never owned a nigger or enough money to pay his licker bill, talks about the 'North stealin' our niggers!' Them's his words. The other one has run off more niggers, and sold 'em down South, than the abolishunists have stolen these ten years. If them ar' the chaps what ar' agoin' to be yer leaders, ye'll soon smell so bad that the devil won't allow yer to come within rifle-shot of the front door of hell. He will have yer all pitched down the back way!"

After giving utterance to these sentiments Old Ben turned on his heel and strolled leisurely out of the room. He had not gone far ere he was overtaken by one of the party from the bar-room, who he knew as a sound Union man, and who said, in a low tone,

"You will have to be very careful of yourself after what you have said. I overheard Black Dave tell the other that your case would be attended to shortly."

"They'll attend to me shortly, will they, eh?" ejaculated Old Ben. "Then, I say, let 'em come on! I'll cling to the Union as long as thar's a splinter left! I can't live much longer, any way, but while I do live I'll live like a man!"

"You are well acquainted with the mountains, are you not?"

"Reckon I am."

"You know that a great many Union men, who have been driven from their homes, have been obliged to seek a hiding-place there until such times as the Union army gets this way."

"Yes, I know it; and what is more, I'm agoin' to make one on 'em. I itch to have a little vengeance on them scaly varmints. If the Union men about here had more of the Parson's stuff in 'em we'd make screechin' work among them turkey-buzzards."

"But you can't expect all men to be Brownlows. His very boldness awed them for a while, but you see they are getting over that now. Men have to be prudent for the sake of their families. If you will come up to my house to-morrow night you well hear something that will do you good, and how you can be of vast service to the Union men in this vicinity. Will you come?"

"Yes; I'll be thar!"

Old Ben's companion noticing Black Dave and the lawyer approaching, walked quickly forward. It was rather a secluded spot where they had been standing, and Old Ben being in the shade was not observed by either Black Dave or the lawyer. They halted, and Black Dave, with great gesticulation, said,

"I've sworn to have vengeance on the old cuss, and now is my time! He didn't think that I was good enough for his daughter. If it hadn't been for him I believe I could have got the girl; but as I've lost her, I'm bent upon having my pay."

"What do you propose to do? Has he got much that we could lay our hands upon?" said the lawyer.

"We'll go out to his place toward midnight, and drag the old hound out of his nest. If I once fairly get him in my power I'll make him sing psalms. I will let him know if I ain't as good as any of his breed! He has got a couple of fine horses; we'll take them any how. But come, let us go back now and have a drink with the boys! They'll miss us. You see, I don't want any of 'em to know where we are agoing to. It might get talked about, and some Hessian spy give him the alarm."

As they disappeared Old Ben came forth from a hiding-place where he had ensconced himself for the purpose of learning what mischief they were planning. Looking after the retreating figures, he muttered, half aloud,

"I'll head off them devils yet, or else I'll give 'em leave to call me a skunk! The old man whar right in showing Black Dave the door. He should have kicked him out. That's what I would have done. But I'll head off the villains! I'll head 'em off!" he ejaculated, as he hastened forward.

Black Dave and his lieutenant returned to the bar-room, where they with their companions indulged in a drunken revel. Toward midnight he got together some ten or a dozen of those who were the least intoxicated, and started out on his work of vengeance.

This band of "defenders of the rights of Southern men," as they styled themselves, had proceeded a considerable distance from the tavern when their commander ordered them to halt in front of a modest-looking dwelling, surrounded by pleasant grounds. He then addressed them as follows:

"Boys! now we are about to catch one of the blackest-hearted traitors in the South. He is a regular white-livered Lincolnite, and it ain't to be expected that we will show him much mercy. So, follow me!"

Black Dave then opened the gate and went toward the house, followed by his band. He gave several loud raps on the door with the butt of a pistol, and it not being promptly opened, he applied the heel of his heavy boot and administered a number of lusty kicks. The door was at length opened by rather an elderly female, who had a light in her hand. As soon as Black Dave caught a glimpse of her countenance he said, in a gruff voice,

"We want your old man. Tell him to turn out quick, and not to keep us a-waiting."

"He is not at home," was the mild response.

"You lie! we know better! If you don't turn him out we'll go in and drag him out!"

"I assure you, Sir, that he is not in the house."

"Come, boys, follow me! We won't put up with any of the old woman's nonsense."

Black Dave, as he uttered these words, entered the house, accompanied by several of his followers. After a lapse of a few minutes he returned, with a countenance blacker than usual, exclaiming,

"The old hound has run away, boys; but the black-hearted traitor don't escape my vengeance so easy. Just throw a torch in the barn yonder."

"Oh! do not fire the place! Have some mercy for the family!" entreated the old lady.

"What is the family to me? I wasn't good enough to make one of them! They are a brood of traitors, the whole of them, and if you don't want 'em roasted you had better turn 'em out!"

After giving utterance to these brutal words he strode off toward the outbuildings, seizing a torch from one of his followers as he passed along. Looking in the stable and finding that the horses were gone he gave utterance to a vile oath, and then threw the torch among some loose hay. Watching the flames as they crept slowly along, while a fiendish smile spread over his features, he told one of his band to pick up some of the hay and follow him. He then went toward the dwelling, and ordered the man to throw the hay on the kitchen floor; and then, despite the entreaties of the old lady and the cries of two or three children, who had been hurried from their beds and stood in their night-clothes clinging to their mother, the ruffian applied the torch. When the flames were fairly under way he said,

"Come on, boys! Leave 'em to shift for themselves. Let us see if we can't track the old hound."

The ruffian then, followed by his band, retreated down the road, turning occasionally to behold the flames as they licked up that once happy home.

The next evening Old Ben was prompt to his appointment, and as he listened to the narration of the outrage to a party of Union men, he exclaimed, as his countenance glowed with excitement,

"The miserable, scaly buzzards! I wouldn't a thought they'd gone so far; they're worse nor injuns! I reckoned it whar all right when I gave him the alarm and he got safe off. But to fire the house and turn the wimen folks and children out doors that time of night—I swar I'll have vengeance for it! It mout not be quite reg'lar, but yer kin jest sot Old Ben down for Black Dave and that white-livered skunk from Clarksville. If I don't fix thar flint for 'em then I won't trust bullet and powder any more. Thar's no use of yer sayin' any thin' agin it," he said, as he raised up his hand toward one of the assembly, who he supposed was about to remonstrate, "for I've settled the hull matter. It's no knowin' what they'll do next, so they've got to go. The devil wants his due, and it is about time they whar on the road to see the chief of all secessionists."

"It is what they deserve!" ejaculated one of the party.

This sentiment was generally concurred in by the assembly. The affairs of that part of the State were then discussed, and it was considered that it would be of great importance if communication could be kept up between the Union men in the mountains and those who yet remained at home. For the performance of this duty they all agreed that Old Ben, from his thorough knowledge of that region, was peculiarly qualified. He at once consented to act, but put in as a proviso that he was not to be deprived of the privilege of attending to the case of Black Dave and his lieutenant.

In the mean time Black Dave, intent upon glutting his vengeance, set his spies to work to discover the whereabouts of the man whose homestead he had so ruthlessly destroyed. A number of days passed, and the spies were unable to give any satisfactory report, other than that they thought he had gone to the mountains. At this Black Dave's rage grew furious, and he swore that he would seek revenge in another quarter. The fate he intended for the father should be visited upon the son-in-law, his successful rival, who was settled in a quiet spot some miles from Knoxville. Black Dave knew that his rival was suspected of being a Union man, and that was a sufficient cloak for him in his design of villainy.

It was on a dark and gloomy night that Black Dave got his band of ruffians together and set out on his work of Vandalism. We will not detain the reader with an account of his progress along the road. Arriving at the house, his summons was answered by a trembling black servant, who, in answer to a furious demand for his master, stammered out that he was not at home. The desperado's quick eye at once detected from the servant's manner that he was endeavoring to conceal something, and he immediately ordered his lieutenant to search the house. This duty the lieutenant performed in a style worthy of his leader. The wife, notwithstanding her delicate health, was brutally told to point out where her husband was hid, as they wanted to give him a rope elevation. All feelings of humanity were set at naught, and the search was made in the most brutal and reckless manner. But it proved fruitless. The intended victim, hearing the noise of the band as they approached, at once suspected their object, and, at the solicitation of his wife, consented to secrete himself, and succeeded in making his escape.

Black Dave fairly foamed with rage when he heard that he was again foiled—that his rival could not be found.

"The sneaking cur is hid somewhere!" he exclaimed. "But I'll smoke him and his brood out. Fire the house, boys!"

Even the entreaties of her whom he once professed to love failed to stay the hand of the incendiary. Black Dave was inexorable. The torch was applied, and soon the flames began to creep along—slowly at first, as if gathering strength, and then suddenly they darted up their forked tongues and enveloped the whole building in a fiery circle. The flames, reflected by the heavy atmosphere, shed a brilliant light over the surrounding country. For a while Black Dave stood gazing upon his work, while a sort of hellish malignity spread itself over his features, totally unmoved by the cries of the terror-stricken women and children. He then ordered the servant whom he had first seen to be tied to a wheel of a large wagon, and lashed until he revealed the whereabouts of his master. For Black Dave to order was to be obeyed, and the trembling black was immediately seized, tied, and flogged. The blows fell fast and heavy, but the faithful black, notwithstanding the blood streamed down his back, refused to betray his master. The ruffian who administered the blows paused for a moment as if to take breath, which his leader observing, he shouted,

"Give the black dog another dose, and lay them on lively!"

The words had scarcely fell from his lips ere a bullet whizzed past the negro and buried itself in the brain of the ruffian leader, and he fell to the earth to rise no more. He had given his last order. His lieutenant, who stood near, sprang forward, and was in the act of stooping to lift the prostrate form of his Captain when crash went another bullet through his brain, and he fell upon the body of him who had been his companion in villainy, and who was now his companion in death. The ruffian who had administered the blows stood for a moment as if transfixed to the spot, and then, throwing down the whip, he attempted to run, but had taken but a few steps ere a swift-winged messenger sent him traveling the same road with his leaders. Consternation now seemed to seize the remainder of the ruffians, and they took to their heels, many in their flight throwing away their rifles, which were soon picked up by Old Ben and his companions, and their contents sent after their flying owners.

It was not long before the pale and terror-stricken wife was surrounded by her husband and father. After an affectionate embrace the father, picking up a lighted torch, approached the place where the bodies lay. Stooping down to examine the leaders, he in a few moments exclaimed,

"Dead!—both of them! Old Ben hit both in nearly the same spot!"

So it was. The father, being anxious to see his daughter and her mother, who since the destruction of the old homestead had resided with her, was accompanied by Old Ben and another companion for that purpose. As they approached the farm they beheld the light from the burning dwelling, at once rightly conjectured the cause, and who was at work. They crept stealthily along, and secreted themselves until a favorable opportunity should afford them a chance of being of service. Old Ben insisted that he alone should do the shooting, and that they could do the loading, as no shots were to be wasted. As he observed Black Dave and his lieutenant standing near together, he exclaimed, in a low tone,

"Keerful! keerful now! They ar' both mine!" And creeping to a favorable spot, he discharged the shots which finished the worldly career of the ruffians.

Black Dave's rival, being secreted where he could view what was going on, seeing the ruffian leaders fall, at once judged that friends were at hand, and he sprang forward to render his aid in the destruction of the Vandals. When it was ascertained that they were completely routed, arrangements were made for conveying the family to a place of safety, and in the arrangements the master did not forget his lacerated but faithful servant.

During the next fortnight several of Black Dave's followers were found dead, and upon examination it was discovered that each one had been shot in nearly the same place in the forehead, and it was concluded that they had all been killed by the same person. The conclusion was correct, for Old Ben in his scouting duties sent many a "buzzard," as he called those who preyed upon the homes of Union men, to his final account.

"DROWNED! DROWNED!"

Into the silvery wave she stept;
The listening breezes sighed and wept;
And e'en the current as it swept
Made moan.

Her raven tresses float behind—
Float calmly on the weeping wind;
Forever from its seat the mind
Hath flown.

She steppeth on into the stream,
And, circling round, the pale moonbeam,
Of rare and glistening light, did seem
Her throne.

She bendeth in the current strong,
Upon its breast is borne along;
To her will soon be pain and wrong
Unknown.

All night, above the lonely tomb,
The waters through that evening gloom
Make murmur at her silent doom,
And moan.

LUTE.

Floated out on the fragrant air the waltz-music, burning, delirious. The rich bloom on Lute's clear brown cheek deepened into the red of wet coral, or of the fuschias that burned in the snow of her dress and drooped among her broad black braids, and the long eyelashes fell with a sudden sweep to hide the pleasure flashing too brightly in her lustrous eyes.

Jack Centyre's name was on a line with the "Gunst Werber" on her tablets. He was coming across the room to claim her hand, and she tangled the chains of her fan and her bouquet-holder inextricably together. The liking of a year could no longer be masked by cool tones and words. It struggled about her mouth, looked shyly from her downcast eyes, spoke in the very tremor of the little hand resting in his as they glided off into the wild music groaning, quivering, and whirling about them, making itself one with motion, and a part of the thrill and shuddered delight pulsing in their every vein.

In the centre of the brilliant rooms he bent low his handsome head till his bright hair touched her glowing cheek, and whispered,

"Farewell, love!"

Lute looked up aghast; her eyes met his full of solemn tenderness and warning. The music fainted, died almost away.

"As I was saying," went on Jack, steadily, "This waltz-beat is noticeable in all—"

It burst out again; his voice sunk low, his lips murmured close in her ear,

"I came here to say farewell. Walls have ears, warning may betray. I leave Nashville to-night." Another whirl and rush of music; then Lute's voice, faint and trembling,

"Leave! for what?"

"For our country, Lute—for the Stars and Stripes—for the Union!"

He lightened his grasp as he spoke, for she seemed falling. Another turn took them within the arch of the conservatory door. A full of fancy curtains separated them from the glaring, heated room, and the faint rays streaming from an opening globe of ground glass alone did battle with its shadows. He drew her into its dimmest corner, still holding her fast. She struggled slightly, with timid hands tried ineffectually to free herself from his firm clasp, then dropped her face, crimson even in the darkness, low, lower, till it was hidden quite in his shoulder.

Two hours later I shall be flying like a felon, traveling in the darkness, hiding by day, hunted down, perhaps, like a dog or a slave. So said, hurriedly. Thank how little I had to offer that for that I could not go without saying good-by to you."

"Where is the need? He asked, with a shudder.

"Every need—the direst. Our flag and our Government are not idle words, Lute—slowly its again brought to grace a pledge—by nothing worth in themselves. They have been our very life and breath all these years, and like the air we cause unseen, they have been unvalued—their very existence almost denied. Now the day of our trial is upon us, and he has be called coward and slave who shrinks or falters."

"And Lute?"

The words escaped unconsciously. She was thinking of that dear head lying low in some ditch or on some roadside ridge, uptorned to the sky, cold and dead. His stern-set face relaxed suddenly, and the dark flame in his eyes melted into infinite tenderness.

"You dear! Will you care? Will you wear heart-mourning for all I fall?"

A tear glittering on her cheek in the faint light was her answer. He stooped to kiss it away, but voices came perilously near. The door was opened. She parted curtains, soft footfalls and silken rustlings sounded close by them. He bent low over her, and pressed his lips to hers. Then, more loudly called them—the Hollitrees were upon them. Lute answered with a careless laugh, he a quick word, and they mingled again with the crowd. Who could have dreamed of that last burning kiss, that voiceless farewell?

An hour after excluded Evelyn Devereux the hostess, "Lute Locke, do you love me?" and with her bait and hook, "Only a chase? What a pity! I thought I had never seen any thing so pretty. I shall have the servants laugh at you, child."

Lute smiled faintly at thought of such profitless hooking. Miles away at that very moment, it was rising and falling every pulse of every heart that, as Jack Centrye, as he rode steadily and swiftly on in the darkness.

Let those who have kept vigil through long months with hope and fear, tell how the weary rising day looked for Lute. If women will think, if there is any expression for an undying heart-sickness, a wearying-sameness, Time's monotony, she was presently ostracized. Came there one day, Mrs. Rawlinson, the outward and visible sign of that inward and mysterious something called by quality, whatever it may be, known as the "ton," indignation thrown by her tongue and every determination enscoured about the corners of her mouth.

"Ah! come here, you naughty child," was her salutation as Lute entered; "we were talking of you, were we not, Miss Primly?"

Miss Primly, who interjected aright the ominous quiet of lips and mouth in her somewhat unmanageable waist, asserted faintly that she could not herself without other reply than a bend of the head.

"I came here to talk to you quite seriously," pursued Mrs. Rawlinson, smoothing her dress deliberately, and obviously embarrassed by the steady gaze and forbidding composure of her victim. "I know your mother, my dear, and I feel an interest in you. Young people will be indiscreet, will draw wrong conclusions, and one knows that talking is—"

A pretty girl of eighteen can't be a Sorgiless—We don't expect it. In fact, why should we expect it? As I said to the ladies yesterday, bertham not battles, pleasure not politics, is running in your little head."

No answer to so much condescension; no approbation of such wholesome kindness, either expressed or implied; only ominous silence, stormy eyes and mutinous though as yet quiet lips, and Aunt Primly looking on aghast and helpless. Clearly there was no resource left Mrs. Rawlinson but to bring out her heavy guns and open fire.

"Miss Locke, you remember of our ladies it was yesterday decided." continued Mrs. Rawlinson, "that while our husbands, brothers and brothers are away fighting our enemies, we can not in justice tolerate them in our midst. We have a list of ladies professing Union sentiments, and to which it will be, we are resolved to cause all association with them."

"The question is then, who are the sufferers?" returned Lute.

"I am sorry to say that your name is on the list."

"It is honored then."

I pleaded your youth and beauty in vain. We are more than suspected of Union feeling."

"Why not say more than suspected of Christianity, love of country, or some such heinous offence?" burst out Lute. "If I am only suspected, but suspicion be changed to certainty, I know no country but the Union. I acknowledge no allegiance to any flag but the Stars and Stripes. I desire no friendship with traitors and ingrates."

"She is mad!" gasped Aunt Primly.

"Worse!" echoed Mrs. Rawlinson, solemnly.

Lute rose to her full height.

"Mrs. Rawlinson, tell your friends that the reason men that fight for his country against the treason of secession is more honored in my eyes than any compliment can be. That I would not blush to see my words; as a woman, I am only sorry that I can not prove my sincerity by more costly sacrifice."

Mrs. Rawlinson rose, reddening and swelling.

"You will regret this, Miss—"

"Perhaps. All things are possible."

"You have ruined yourself," quoth Aunt Primly in a frenzy, as Lute left the room concluded from all recognition is to be ruined, then Aunt Primly's associates, girls, her dear friends, passed her with a giggle and whispers about strong, mindedness and abolitionism; the men with looks of cold regard for the elderly lady with real or affected horror. Aunt Primly read her a daily homily; secession was blatant all about her; not one word, not even a sneer for any king, but she ever received from Jack; yet he was not dead; for she had, with a thrill that no one can describe, in one of the local papers, that the arch-traitor Jack Centrye had escaped, and was serving as a lieutenant in Buford's army; long days of anxiety, of mental torture, light, heavy, but hard and bitter in practice.

At length Friday fell in, and with it a letter. Never was at its height come the news of the fall of Fort Donelson, and the wild panic and terror that overtook Nashville. In the midst of all this Lute sat calm and even joyous, for to her the Federal army meant simply Jack Centrye. And he, Jack Centrye, and coming back to her, was the picture Hope held up before her; and one afternoon, while the city was breathlessly waiting for the coming of Buell's army, as she sat by a lower window weaving golden dreams, she heard the jar of the gate, and looking up caught the glitter of sword and epaulets. He had come! and breathless with delight she ran to the door, opened it, and paused back aghast. The uniform of the Texan Rangers met her eye, and a face pre-eminently handsome, spite of the relentant traces of hardship, face and figure familiar to her, that of Raymond Mainwaring, outcast for his wicked deeps, but still a gallant gentleman, and her bitterest enemy because she had once rejected him. What could have brought him there? She recoiled finding him at her door, and he quickly guessed dismay.

"May I come in?" he asked, with an evil smile. "It is so long since we have met."

Even as he spoke he stepped past her into the hall, turned the key in the door, and back again.

"These are unsettled times," he sneered, "and I have no fancy for being impaled like a bug on a collateral inquisition. You see I am curiously."

Will you come into the library, Miss Locke? I am a something of a spy to you."

There was no one within call but female servants, for all the neighbors had fled; no help but in herself. Lute led the way, a silent guide. He gave her a seat, placed himself beside her and, unceremoniously, began to examine her curiously.

"You, I remember, are fond of poetry," was his most unexpected beginning" "I came here to quote a stanza or two when running in my head all day.

"Kind of you, but is it worth the risk? Pray, what is your quotation?"

He took her hand. Direful menace and fierce triumph looked out from his eyes, and his face fell. He spoke as if he would burn in every word on her memory

"For Time at last sets all things even;
And if we do but watch the hour,
There never yet was human power
Which could evade, if unforgiven.
But those who hunger and who thirst
Of him who treasures up a wrong."

He had a marvelous voice, full, deep, capable of any inflection, and he now cut out the lines like bolts of doom. Lute's breath gave a sudden bound, and then stood still in mortal terror; the blood surged, overwhelmed her, and then left her pallid, cold, and her voice shook spite of her inward efforts, though her eyes met his unflinchingly.

"Bon! I see your taste has improved; but I conclude this is only your text. What is your sermon?"

"A short one, Lute. A year ago I loved you, and you spurned me. I am a man of a curious patriacity of disposition, and I never relinquish a determination. Now I decided that you must belong to me. I have not changed my mind, though I have waited in silence. My time has come. Your consent is no longer necessary. You are alone here, in a city distracted with mut, selfish terror, and no assistance will or inquire too closely into the conduct of so useful an officer. I shall take you."

"You dare not?"

"I dare any thing."

"Gods!"

"Is on the side of heavy battalions and favorable circumstances."

She struggled to shake off his grasp on her wrist, which he had unconsciously tightened to a painful degree. A locket fell from her belt. He picked it up and opened it.

"Jack Centrye! So he is my rival! Will it interest you to hear that I saw him at Fort Donelson? He was one of the first to scale the walls, and I think was cut down at once. But come, my love! time presses."

A pistol lay on the table. Lute, in desperation, caught it up and aimed it at him. He smiled scornfully.

"Shall I show you how to pull the trigger? I think you are more afraid of it even than of me. What a soldier's wife you will make!"

She dashed down the pistol and darted toward the door, but he caught her fast. A moment's struggling exhausted her little strength, and left her utterly helpless in his iron grasp. There was no relenting in his determined face—he had no pity. Surged up then to her brain, with a dull, waving sound in her ears, all the quickened tide of life. She seemed fainting, dying; when suddenly, amidst the whirl and confusion of her faculties, she found that she was listening to a sound growing nearer and louder every moment; the quick gallop of horses; the clanking of their equipments; the loud echo of hoofs along the carriage-road.

"Come!" urged Raymond, with an oath.

Her answer was a shriek, long and thrilling, shrill. Shouts and voices responded from without. They were thundering at the door—kicked, and with quite strong enough to withstand a lengthy siege. Soon one called her:

"Lute! in God's name, where are you?"

It was Jack's voice! She answered with a second shriek, as Raymond tried to drag her toward the door. Then, with stunning concision, followed. There was a jingle and a crash of broken glass as a window was dashed in, and the cause into the room men in the welcome Federal uniform, with swords and revolvers drawn.

Lute ran to Jack's arms.

"Oh, Jack, you have saved me!" I knew that you were near, and I felt that you would come."

And so, as usual, the little things of man's existence were the agents of Providence. Jack's quick impulse to dismount, and, with her dog-whistle, call Dash to his side, had brought the troopers also; for Aunt Primly could not in decency keep to herself the discovery that Lute held to be saved. Mainwaring they marched off to the camp in triumph, and the official report coolly noted that Captain Jack Centrye had taken a "prisoner."

How many that read it dreamed of the almost tragedy depending on those simple words?

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S ARMY.

WE devote several pages this week to illustrations of the movements of General McClellan, which has just driven the rebels out of Yorktown. On page 305 will be found a fine picture of a REBEL BREAKFAST BY NIGHT WITH DARK LANTERN, preliminary to the evacuation; on page 308 the DEPARTURE OF CAVALRY AND FLYING-ARTILLERY, under General Stoneman, up the Yorktown turnpike, in pursuit of the rebels; on page 309 a spirited picture of the CAPTURE OF A REBEL RIFLE-PIT by the Massachusetts First; on page 312 a complete PLAN OF THE SEAT OF WAR IN VIRGINIA, which will enable our readers to follow the movements of the various armies under McClellan, Franklin, Heintzelman, Banks, and Fremont; and on page 311 a semi-humorous picture representing FIVE PRISONERS OF WAR UNDER CONVOYING FROM THE SHELTER OF TREES. The brilliant charge of the Massachusetts First upon a rebel rifle-pit is thus described in the Herald letter:

Five companies of Massachusetts troops participated in a splendid little engagement which took place this morning. The company made a brilliant charge on a rebel redoubt, drove the rebels from their rifle-pits, and captured a number of prisoners, who were taken prisoners. The redoubt is situated in front of the woods, and faces an open space which is in the right of the Yorktown road. It was determined last evening to drive the rebels out of the woods what fortifications were behind, beyond the woods. Early this morning three companies of the First Massachusetts Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Wells, and two companies of the Sixteenth, under Major Hall, were drawn up in line on the ground just about daylight. Company A, Captain Wells, was detailed as skirmishers, and were ordered to the field to prevent a flank movement of the enemy.

Captain Wells, who had a reserve toward the right near the redoubt, ordered his men to charge. The charge was executed in double quick across the field and charged upon the work. Four companies of Massachusetts First followed on the double quick pell-mell, in confusion. Every one seemed to be out against manner. As soon as they reached the ditch they found a number of four or five hundred yards from the redoubt, the rebels opened a spirited fire from the redoubt, and from the woods. In face of this gallant little band of sixty advanced at a double quick with a cheer. The rebels, seeing they were cut off from the ground behind them, but not a man on our side from a gun until those who charged had reached the ditch, within a few yards of the ditch in front. Then they discharged a volley, and the rebels immediately broke and fled, pursued by the men across the corn-field, our men jumped into the ditch, and the rebels were driven from the redoubt. The successful charge was made by Captain Wells, Lieutenant-Colonel Wells was among the first to reach the ditch, and was the first man to enter the redoubt. Lieutenant-Colonel Wells was among the first to reach the ditch, and was the first man to enter the redoubt. No other casualties occurred on our side.

The rebels who occupied the redoubt fell within the ditch, which was six or seven feet deep and eight feet wide in front. Many of them were killed in the ditch by their position as skirmishers to the left, and subsequently the Sixteenth Massachusetts Regiment was ordered to the left. In the meantime Company A, Eleventh Massachusetts, Captain Hall, had charged upon the redoubt in front, quick and kept the rebels back, while Company G, Lieutenant Allen, Company K, Lieutenant Hall, and Company C, Lieutenant Hall, and with pick and shovel, and our artillery, also advanced, and with pick and shovel commenced throwing up earth works. Our artillery did not fire a single shot. The rebels were driven from the redoubt without time for their fortifications to be left. Our brave lieutenant-colonel was wounded in the wrist, and a number of their comrades were shoveling the earth from the parapet of the rifle pits into the ditch. A little to the right of this work there was an opening through the woods on the road to Yorktown, and through which the rebels retreated. From this the rebels poured forth a continuous fire. But the Massachusetts troops, after having driven them from all of the right and left, covered by the woods, and then escaped the rebels' fire. When the rebels fled from the redoubt our left the rebels were driven in confusion in every direction. The Massachusetts troops, after having driven them from the redoubt, were driven from the redoubt, and then rushed out a white flag was seen in the redoubt. They then rushed out with a white handkerchief in the direction of the redoubt, and with a white handkerchief in the direction caused for a moment. He said some words to him and to those who wanted to surrender. Soon they appeared and were taken prisoners. Fourteen rebels were captured altogether—one sergeant, one corporal, and a dozen privates. They all belonged to Company E, Nineteenth Virginia Regiment. They were a company of sharp-shooters who were on duty in the fort. They said they were surprised when taken by surprise, and when we opened the attack there was great confusion among them, as they were not aware of our forces to the right and left. Our soldiers acted in the most gallant manner, and the Massachusetts troops, under Lieutenant-Colonel Wells, who was on the ground, deserve the highest praise for the gallant manner in which they conducted the attack. Their conduct was witnessed by the whole army, and our men retired from the field in perfect order.

FORT MACON REPOSSESSED.

ON page 316 we illustrate the BOMBARDMENT AND RECAPTURE OF FORT MACON, at Beaufort, by the United States troops under the command of General Burnside. Our pictures are from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Angelo Wiser. The fort was taken on Friday, April 25. The following account of the bombardment is from the correspondence of the Times:

Friday morning—a day whose early augury has been so plausibly reversed in the history of the expedition—was pleasantly, but a fresh breeze sprang up from the south at daylight. At precisely 5 A.M. under a flag of truce, Captain Morris's battery started the town from its slumbers. Its thunder echoed from the hills behind the inside foundations, and while the echoes of its shrill, hurtling shell were still dying along the distant horizon, engineers, with half-clothed intent, filled the windows, or found sure cover in the ditches of the fortress. Another and another followed in quick succession, and then came the deep-mouthed roar of the heavy guns from the fleet, and the bombardment of Fort Macon was fairly and magnificently begun! Before the smoke had cleared sufficiently to mark the effect of the first shots the heavy guns of the fleet poured forth a whole smoke cyclone from the right, and in advance of the fleet. It was Lieutenant Perry putting in the acknowledgment points to the new creation from his 8-inch mortar battery. Three hundred and fifty pounds of fixed shell in twenty minutes was a sign of ill-will to be seen upon the fort. The rebels, surrounded in the break-cover upon the flag-staff, had dropped from the cross-trees as if the balls had been bullets, and they had been observed to have deserted no more to return. Still the firing continued. At the end of every twenty minutes objects were cautiously stealing in the direction of the bastardic gone on the lower parapet, and the rebels were evidently trying to get out of the range of the shells. Suddenly, from this infantile effort, and finding they still lived, others crawled out from their covers, and every gun was turned upon them. Shells were poured on the border of the Parrott battery, and directed their fire upon the rebels as they were seen moving about and loitering. Their solid 32-pound shot accurately struck about fifty yards in advance of each of the rebels who passed over their bands, and went bowling in among the trees in the rear. The effect of this kind of practice precise had taught our boys to dodge these missiles with composition ease.

Many of the shells from the heavy mortar battery, during the first two hours of the firing, went clear over the fort, flying on the beach at the eastward or in the water—the latter by far the best place for them, as they did not do their slightest harm. In range, however, they improved with greater precision. Lieutenant Flagler stood at the right of the Parrott battery in position as the range to see the effect of each shell, and directed the adjustment of every fuse and the training of the gun. Soon after 8 o'clock the firing from the fort became very sharp and well sustained, and the rebels were driven at their guns almost entirely half a dozen were at work at once. The Parrott battery was the most accurate, though the shells passed over the parapets, and their solid balls plowing up the sand in the rear of the fort. Soon after the firing began the parapets, the fort, for an instant, would be enveloped in heavy clouds of black smoke, which would be followed to the top of the flagstaff, while fragments of brick, stone, and timber would be thrown up, and the solid shot would be seen to strike the parapet.

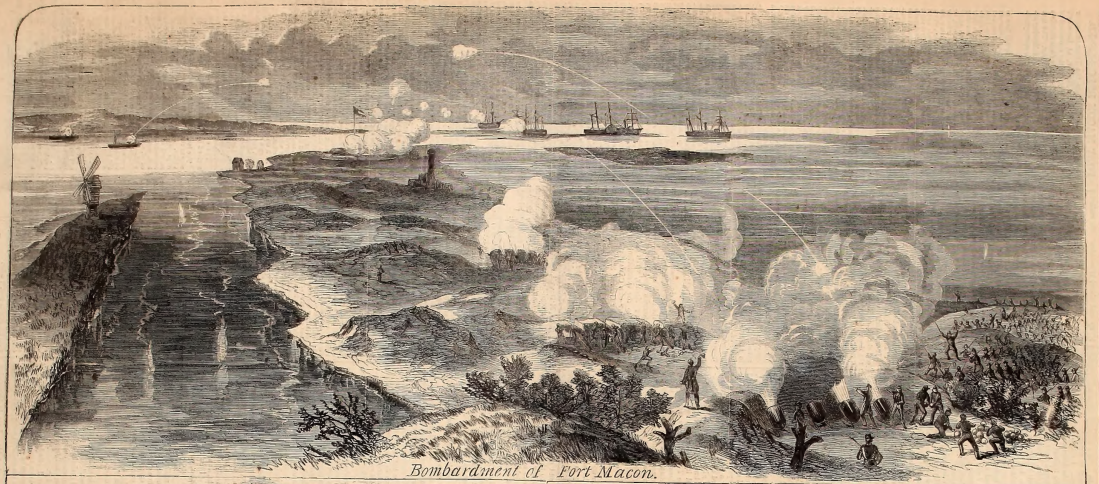
It was now apparent that the rebels were doing their utmost to demonstrate Captain Morris's opinion that embrasures afforded the only visible point of attack. Lieutenant Flagler, who was stationed at the right of the Parrott gun, the shots which were aimed at it would strike the parapet and expend their force and be found. Lieutenant Prusty, whose position was at the extreme left, reported that the embrasures had, after a considerable time before attracting much attention from the rebels gunners. Later in the afternoon they drew a share of the rebel shot in return for its well-directed fire.

At 9 o'clock A.M. the rebel fire was considerably slow, the fort was kept up with nearly equal spirit and determination, and at 10 o'clock A.M. the fire from the fort was considerably weakened as to quickness, but was even more admiration from many sympathizing spectators in Beaufort and from the fleet of transports in the harbor.

About 9 o'clock A.M. the United States gun-boats came steaming in, and after the manner of Sumter, they steadily outlasting them from our batteries on the beach. The Daylight, Lieutenant Commanding Davis, was the nearest clear over the fort, which burst within half a mile of the fort. The majority of these shells exploded in the air and went parapets with effect, and did great execution in the rear of the fort. At 10 A.M. the fire from the fort was considerably slackened, and at 2 o'clock only two or three guns were fired from the fort, and the fire from the fleet was also continued with little steadiness, every shell telling with terrible effect.

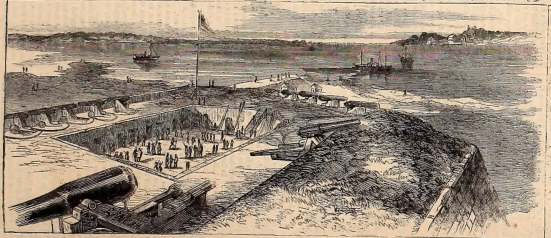
At 3 o'clock the gun in the water-battery, which had been the most annoying to our troops in the rifle-pits, shells, and only an occasional discharge was made from the fort, and the fire from the fleet ceased.

The effects of the bombardment are thus described by the same correspondent:



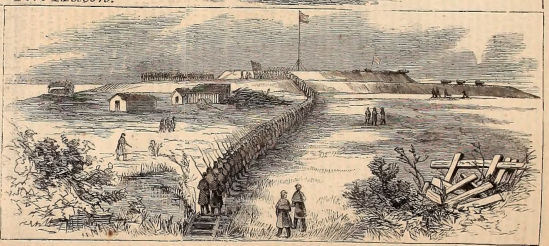
The inner walls and parade-ground of the fort bore witness to the terrific force of the shells which had exploded in the air, and the fragments of which fell in the fort with steps torn from their foundations; the water-house store and the officers' quarters were in a terrible condition, in fragments; and even the ends of upright bars of railroad iron were twisted and bent as though they had been but wire. In all, and the shells had been thrown into the fort, the effects were evidence of the visible effects of the iron storm. Dismounted guns were lying in every direction on the ground. The magazine were breached and placed up on end, and the shells and shot were scattered promiscuously among the garages; chimneys knocked flat, and gun-carriages and platforms broken to pieces. Of the guns originally mounting up the Spin were dismissed, and several dismounted by the fire from the fleet and shot fell in the fort, and about 190 shells burst in the inner fort.

Seven persons were killed at the guns and in the fort, and eighteen wounded, one mortally. One man had his leg cut off by the fragments of a shell while sitting on his bunk in the casemate. Another had his knee badly crushed by a piece of shell. Major Wilkin and Lieutenant Prusty, of the Rifles, were wounded.



The rebels carried out in rough boxes at the Union troops' camp ground.

The garrison consisted of 450 men, 250 being effective.



So our troops are repossessing, one by one, the forts belonging to the United States.

Bombardment of Fort Macon.

Fort Macon from the Upper Parapet.

The First Rhode Island Regiment entering Fort Macon.

FORT MACON REPOSSESSED.—Sketched by Mr. A. Waud.—[See Page 315.]

MRS. MAJOR BELLE REYNOLDS.—Photographed by Cole, of Peoria, Illinois.—[See Page 306.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "The Woman in White," "Dead Secret," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XV.

On the next morning but one news was received from Mr. Pendril. The place of Michael Vanstone's residence on the Continent had been discovered. He was living at Zurich, and a letter had been dispatched to him at that place on the day when the information was obtained. In the course of the coming week an answer might be expected, and the purport of it should be communicated forthwith to the ladies at Combe-Raven.

Short as it was the interval of delay passed wearily. Ten days elapsed before the expected answer was received; and when it came at last it proved to be, strictly speaking, no answer at all. Mr. Pendril had been merely referred to an agent in London who was in possession of Michael Vanstone's instructions. Certain difficulties had been discovered in connection with those instructions, which had produced the necessity of once more writing to Zurich. And there "the negotiations" rested again for the present.

A second paragraph in Mr. Pendril's letter contained another piece of intelligence entirely new. Mr. Michael Vanstone's son (and only child), Mr. Noel Vanstone, had recently arrived in London, and was then staying in lodgings occupied by his cousin, Mr. George Bartram. Professional considerations had induced Mr. Pendril to pay a visit to the lodgings. He had been very kindly received by Mr. Bartram, but had been informed by that gentleman that his cousin was not then in a condition to see visitors. Mr. Noel Vanstone had been suffering for some years past from a wearing and obstinate malady; he had come to England expressly to obtain the best medical advice, and he still felt the fatigue of the journey so severely as to be confined to his bed. Under these circumstances, Mr. Pendril had no alternative but to take his leave. An interview with Mr. Noel Vanstone might have cleared up some of the difficulties in connection with his father's instructions. As events had turned out there was no help for it but to wait for a few days more.

The days passed, the empty days of solitude and suspense. At last a third letter from the lawyer announced the long-delayed conclusion of the correspondence. The final answer had been received from Zurich, and Mr. Pendril would personally communicate it, at Combe-Raven, on the afternoon of the next day.

That next day was Wednesday, the twelfth of August. The weather had changed in the night, and the sun rose watery through mist and cloud. By noon the sky was overcast at all points; the temperature was sensibly colder; and the rain poured down, straight and soft and steady, on the thirsty earth. Toward three o'clock Miss Garth and Norah entered the morning-room to await Mr. Pendril's arrival. They were joined shortly afterward by Magdalen. In half an hour more the familiar fall of the iron latch in the socket reached their ears from the fence beyond the shrubbery. Mr. Pendril and Mr. Clare advanced into view along the garden path, walking arm in arm through the rain, sheltered by the same umbrella. The lawyer bowed as they passed the windows: Mr. Clare walked straight on, deep in his own thoughts, noticing nothing.

After a delay which seemed interminable; after a weary scraping of wet feet on the hall mat; after a mysterious, muttered interchange of question and answer outside the door, the two came in—Mr. Clare leading the way. The old man walked straight up to the table without any preliminary greeting, and looked across it at the three women with a stern pity for them in his rugged, wrinkled face.

"Bad news," he said. "I am an enemy to all unnecessary suspense. Plainness is kindness in such a case as this. I mean to be kind; and I tell you plainly—bad news."

Mr. Pendril followed him. He shook hands, in silence, with Miss Garth and the two sisters, and took a seat near them. Mr. Clare placed himself apart on a chair by the window. The gray rainy light fell soft and sad on the faces of Norah and Magdalen, who sat together opposite to him. Miss Garth had placed herself a little behind them, in partial shadow; and the lawyer's quiet face was seen in profile, close beside her. So the four occupants of the room appeared to Mr. Clare, as he sat apart in his corner; his long claw-like fingers interlaced on his knee; his dark vigilant eyes fixed searchingly now on one face, now on another. The dripping rustle of the rain among the leaves, and the clear, ceaseless tick of the clock on the mantle-piece, made the minute of silence which followed the settling of the persons present in their places indescribably oppressive. It was a relief to every one when Mr. Pendril spoke.

"Mr. Clare has told you already," he began, "that I am the bearer of bad news. I am grieved to say, Miss Garth, that your doubts, when I last saw you, were better founded than my hopes. What that heartless elder brother was in his youth he is still in his old age. In all my unhappy experience of the worst side of human nature, I have never met with a man so utterly dead to every consideration of mercy as Michael Vanstone."

"Do you mean that he takes the whole of his brother's fortune, and makes no provision whatever for his brother's children?" asked Miss Garth.

"He offers a sum of money for present emergencies," replied Mr. Pendril, "so meanly and disgracefully insufficient that I am ashamed to mention it."

"And nothing for the future?"

"Absolutely nothing."

As that answer was given the same thought passed, at the same moment, through Miss Garth's mind and through Norah's. The decision which deprived both the sisters alike of the resources of fortune did not end there for the younger of the two. Michael Vanstone's merciless resolution had virtually pronounced the sentence which dismissed Frank to China, and which destroyed all present hope of Magdalen's marriage. As the words passed the lawyer's lips Miss Garth and Norah looked at Magdalen anxiously. Her face turned a shade paler, but not a feature of it moved; not a word escaped her. Norah, who held her sister's hand in her own, felt it tremble for a moment, and then turn cold—and that was all.

"Let me mention plainly what I have done," resumed Mr. Pendril; "I am very desirous you should not think that I have left any effort untried. When I wrote to Michael Vanstone, in the first instance, I did not confine myself to the usual formal statement. I put before him, plainly and earnestly, every one of the circumstances under which he has become possessed of his brother's fortune. When I received the answer, referring me to his written instructions to his lawyer in London—and when a copy of those instructions was placed in my hands—I positively declined, on becoming acquainted with them, to receive the writer's decision as final. I induced the solicitor on the other side to accord us a further term of delay; I attempted to see Mr. Noel Vanstone in London for the purpose of obtaining his intercession; and, failing in that, I myself wrote to his father for the second time. The answer referred me, in insolently curt terms, to the instructions already communicated; declared those instructions to be final; and declined any further correspondence with me. There is the beginning and the end of the negotiation. If I have overlooked any means of touching this heartless man, tell me, and those means shall be tried."

He looked at Norah. She pressed her sister's hand encouragingly, and answered for both of them.

"I speak for my sister as well as for myself," she said, with her color a little heightened, with her natural gentleness of manner just touched by a quiet, uncomplaining sadness. "You have done all that could be done, Mr. Pendril. We have tried to restrain ourselves from hoping too confidently; and we are deeply grateful for your kindness, at a time when kindness is sorely needed by both of us."

Magdalen's hand returned the pressure of her sister's—withdrew itself—trifled for a moment impatiently with the arrangement of her dress—then suddenly moved the chair closer to the table. Leaning one arm on it (with the hand fast clenched), she looked across at Mr. Pendril. Her face, always remarkable for its want of color, was now startling to contemplate in its blank, bloodless pallor. But the light in her large gray eyes was bright and steady as ever; and her voice, though low in tone, was clear and resolute in accent as she addressed the lawyer in these terms:

"I understood you to say, Mr. Pendril, that my father's brother had sent his written orders to London, and that you had a copy. Have you preserved it?"

"Certainly."

"Have you got it about you?"

"I have."

"May I see it?"

Mr. Pendril hesitated and looked uneasily from Magdalen to Miss Garth, and from Miss Garth back again to Magdalen.

"Pray oblige me by not pressing your request," he said. "It is surely enough that you know the result of the instructions. Why should you agitate yourself to no purpose by reading them? They are expressed so cruelly; they show such abominable want of feeling, that I really can not prevail upon myself to let you see them."

"'READY?' HE ASKED, STOPPING SHORT AFTER A WHILE."

"I am sensible of your kindness, Mr. Pendril, in wishing to spare me pain. But I can bear pain; I promise to distress nobody. Will you excuse me if I repeat my request?"

She held out her hand—the soft, white, virgin hand that had touched nothing to soil it or hurt it yet.

"Oh, Magdalen, think again!" said Norah.

"You distress Mr. Pendril," said Miss Garth; "you distress us all."

"There can be no end gained," pleaded the lawyer—"forgive me for saying so—there can really be no useful end gained by my showing you the instructions."

("Fool!" said Mr. Clare to himself. "Have they no eyes to see that she means to have her own way?")

"Something tells me there is an end to be gained," persisted Magdalen. "It is a conviction to a very strong one. It is more serious to me"—She looked round at Mr. Clare, who was closely watching her, and instantly looked back again, with the first outward betrayal of emotion which had escaped her yet. "It is more serious to me," she resumed, "for private reasons, than it is to my sister. I know nothing yet but that my father's brother has taken our fortunes from us. He must have some motives of his own for such conduct as that. The motives of his own for such conduct as that. The motives of his own for such conduct as that. The motives concealed. He has deliberately robbed Norah, and robbed me; and I think we have a right, if we wish it, to know why."

"I don't wish it," said Norah.

"I do," said Magdalen; and once more she held out her hand.

At this word Mr. Clare roused himself and interfered for the first time.

"You have relieved your conscience," he said, addressing the lawyer. "Give her the right she claims. It is her right—if she will have it."

Mr. Pendril quickly took the necessary instructions from his pocket. "I have warned you," he said, and handed the papers across the table without another word. Not a line of writing was folded down at the corner, and at the folded page the manuscript opened of itself. Magdalen first turned the leaves. "Is this the place which refers to my sister and myself?" she inquired. Mr. Pendril bowed. Magdalen smoothed out the manuscript before her on the table.

"Will you decide, Norah?" she asked, turning to her sister. "Shall I read this aloud, or shall I read it to myself?"

"To yourself," said Miss Garth, answering for Norah, who looked at her in mute perplexity and distress.

"I shall be as you wish," said Magdalen. With that reply she turned again to the manuscript, and read these lines:

"——You are now in possession of my wishes in relation to the property in money, and to all the real estate, carriages, horses, and so forth. The last point left on which it is necessary for me to address myself is to the persons inhabiting the house, and to certain prospective claims which will call on me by a solicitor's application for gifts, who has no doubt interested reasons of his own for making application to me.

"I understand that my late brother has left two illegitimate children, both of them young women, and both of an age to earn their own livelihood. Various considerations, all equally irregular, have been urged on me by those persons by the solicitor representing them, that the good act to let this matter continue undisturbed, and not to do with questions of mere conscience, what the motives are plainly, for his own profit, he himself has suggested to me, which regulate my action. Such considerations I have hitherto resolutely refused to entertain, and I am fortified in making for the two young women. Your instructions on both these points you will find detailed in the next paragraph.

"I wish the persons concerned to know, once for all, how I regard the circumstances which have placed my late brother's property at my disposal. Let them understand that I consider those circumstances to be a Providential Interposition, which has used my brother as the instrument that ought always to have been mine. I receive the money, not only as my right, but as a proper reparation for many of the injuries which I suffered from my father, and a property actually paid by my brother himself. His intrigue by which he succeeded in disinheriting me, his conduct with regard to my marriage, his utterly objectionable and unjustifiable behavior to me in all the relations of my life, are the principal causes of the poverty and suffering of his own legal representative after the time when I ceased to hold any connection with him. He appears to have systematically imposed a wrong on me, and on his wife as well as on his wife, and to have completed the outrage on mortality by afterward meeting me in a public conflict in which he called down a judgment on himself and his children. I will not invoke further punishment on my host by maintaining my claim to continue the imposition which their private proceeded, and by holding them to a place in the world to which they are not entitled. Let them, as becomes their birth, quit their present habitation. If they will not do so, let them depend to accept it on proper position, if not, let them be left unthought of by me. I will not take back them to start virtuously in the knowledge of the world and proud pends each. This end, I acknowledge, is attainable by the means which I propose, with the necessary acknowledgment of respect; but on the express understanding that the transaction, as completed, is to be the beginning and the end of my connection with them. The correspondence under which they quit the house I leave to your discretion, and to the sense of what is my duty toward my sister, so on all other matters, is positive and final."

Line by line—without once looking up from the pages before her—Magdalen read those atrocious sentences through, from beginning to end. The other persons assembled in the room, all eagerly looking at her together, saw the dress rising and falling faster and faster over her bosom—saw the hand in which she held the loose manuscript at the outset close unconsciously on the paper until it was in the shortest possible space of manner to the end—but detected no other outward signs of what was passing within her. As soon as she had done she silently pushed the manuscript away, and put her hands on a sudden over her face. When she withdrew them all the four persons in the room noticed a change in her. Something in her expression had altered, subtly and silently; something which made the familiar features suddenly look strange, even to her sister and Miss Garth; something foreign to all the prayers, never to be forgotten in connection with that day—and never to be described.

The first words she spoke were addressed to Mr. Pendril.

"May I ask one more favor," she said, "before you enter on your business arrangements?"

Mr. Pendril replied ceremoniously by a gesture of assent. Magdalen's resolution to possess herself of the Instructions did not appear to have produced a favorable impression on the lawyer's mind.

"You mentioned what you were so kind as to do in our interests when you first wrote to Mr. Michael Vanstone," she continued. "You said you had told him all the circumstances. I want—if you will allow me—to be made quite sure of what he really knows about us when he sent these orders to his lawyer. Did he know that my father had robbed us, and that he had left our fortunes to my sister and myself?"

"He did know it," said Mr. Pendril.

"Did you tell him how it happened that we are left in this helpless position?"

"I told him that your father was entirely unaware, when he married, of the necessity for making another will."

"And that another will would have been made, after he saw Mr. Clare, but for the dreadful misfortune of his death?"

"He knew that also."

"Did he know that my father's untiring goodness and kindness to both of us?"

Her voice faltered for the first time: she sighed, and put her hand to her head again. Norah spoke entreatingly to her; Mr. Clare sat silent, watching her with close and anxious eyes. She answered her sister's remonstrance with a faint smile. "I will keep my promise," she said.

"I will directly." With that reply she turned again to Mr. Pendril, and steadily reiterated the question—but in another form of words.

"Did Mr. Michael Vanstone know, in his father's great anger, that he was to make sure of providing for my sister and myself?"

"He knew it," said the lawyer's own words. I had him as extract from your father's last letter to me."

"He knew it which asked you to come for God's sake, and relieve him from the dreadful thought that his daughters were unprovided for? The letter which I have left out rest in his grave if he left us disinherited?"

"That letter was destroyed."

She paused, still keeping her eyes steadily fixed on the lawyer's face.

"I want to direct it all in my mind," she said, "before I go on. Mr. Michael Vanstone knew of the letter. He knew what provision of the making of the second will; he knew of the letter, and he read the words. What did he know of Norah and me? All of us left at my mother's last illness? Did you say that her share in the money was left entirely in my care as if she had been lifted her dying hand in your presence? Did you try to make him ashamed of the cruel law of Inheritance which left all to an Institution Nobody's Children, and which allows him to use us as he is using us now?"

"I put all those considerations to him. I left none of them doubtful; I left none of them out."

She slowly reached her hand to the copy of the Instructions, and slowly folded it up again in the shape in which it had been presented to her. "I am much obliged to you, Mr. Pendril," she said, quietly. Her hand and gently pushed the manuscript back across the table; then turned to her sister.

"Norah, I think," if we both of us live to grow old, and if you ever forget all that we owe to Michael Vanstone—come to me and I will remind you."

She rose and walked across the room by herself to the window. She would have resented that unscrupulous intrusion on her thoughts from any man alive but Frank's father. She stopped for a moment at the place, and taken it, and let her go on to the window. "No," she said, to herself, in those extreme, what ever else it may be. So much the worse for her, and for all belonging to her."

She looked out into the garden. Once more the dripping rustle of the rain and the steady sweep of the wind filled the air with their sound. Mr. Pendril put the Instructions back in his pocket, consulted a little, and, turning toward Mr. Clare, spoke to him. The words referred to the present and pressing necessities of the time.

"Our consultation has been needlessly prolonged," he said, "by painful references to the past. We shall be better employed in settling our arrangements for the future. I am obliged to return to town this evening. Pray let me hear from you when you have come to tell me what trouble and what responsibility I can take off your hands."

For the moment neither Norah nor Miss Garth seemed to be capable of answering him. Magdalen's resolute conduct in the matter of making the marriage prospect that her father's own lips had placed before her not a month since had bewildered and dismayed them alike. They had summoned their courage to meet the shock of her passionate grief, or to face the harder trial of witnessing her speechless despair. But they were unprepared for the calm which had consented to read the Instructions; for the terrible questions which she had put to the lawyer; for her unwonted self-possession, and for the circumstances was in her mind under which Michael Vanstone's decision had been pronounced. There she stood at the window, an unfathomable mystery to the sister who had never been parted from her, to the governess who had trained her from the time when Miss Garth remembered the dark doubts which had crossed her mind on the day when she and Magdalen had met in the garden. Norah looked forward to the coming time with the first serious dread of it on her mind—a dread which she had felt yet. Both had hitherto remained passive, in despair of knowing what to do. Both were now silent, in despair of knowing what to say.

Mr. Pendril patiently and kindly helped them by returning to the subject of their future plans for the second time.

"I am sorry to press any business matters on your attention," he said, "when you are necessarily unfitted to deal with them. But I must take my instructions for my London with the night. With reference, in the first place, to the disgraceful conduct of your father, I have already alluded. The younger Miss Vanstone having read the Instructions, needs no further information than they give. The eldest will, I hope, excuse me if I tell her (what I should be ashamed to say to her but that it is a matter of necessity) that Mr. Michael Vanstone's provision for his brother's children begins and ends with an offer to each of them of two hundred pounds."

Norah's face expressed with indignation. She started to her feet, as if Michael Vanstone had been present in the room and had personally insulted her.

"I see," said the lawyer, wishing to spare her, "I may tell Mr. Michael Vanstone you refuse his money."

"Tell him," she broke out, passionately, "if I was once driven by the roadside I wouldn't touch a farthing of it!"

Shall I notify your refusal also?" asked Mr. Pendril, addressing Miss Magdalen next.

She turned round from the window, but kept her face in shadow by standing close against it with her hand on the sash.

"Tell him, on my part," she said, "to think again before he puts me in life with a hundred pounds. I will give him time to think." She spoke those strange words with a marked emphasis, and then went back quickly to the window and hid her face from the observation of every one in the room.

"You both refuse the offer," said Mr. Pendril, taking out his pencil and making his professional note in the memorandum book. As he shut up his pocket book he glanced toward Magdalen doubtfully, as if he was not sure whether she had heard which. She had roused in him a new and unexpected nature: he had his suspicions of her looks; he had his suspicions of her language. Norah interested him even more influence over her than Miss Garth. He resolved to speak privately to her sister before he went away.

While the idea was passing through his mind his attention was claimed by another question from Magdalen.

"Is he an old man?" she asked, suddenly, without turning round from the window.

"If you mean Mr. Michael Vanstone, he is sixty-two years of age," answered the lawyer.

"You spoke of his son a little while since. Has he any other sons or daughters?"

"None."

"Do you know any thing of his wife?"

"She has been dead for many years."

"There was a son—Why do you ask these questions?" said Norah.

"I beg your pardon," replied Magdalen, quietly; "I won't ask any more."

For the third time Mr. Pendril returned to the business of his visit.

"The servants must not be forgotten," he said. "They must be paid their wages in advance: I will give them the necessary explanation before I leave. As for the house, no questions concerning it need trouble you. The furniture, and the horses, the furniture and plate, and so on, must simply be left to the persons to await Mr. Michael Vanstone's further orders. But any possessions, Miss Vanstone, personally belonging to you or to your sister—your jewelry, dresses, and any little presents which may have been made to you recently at your own discretion—With regard to the time of your departure, I understand that a month or more will elapse before Mr. Michael Vanstone returns to Zurich; and I am sure I only do his solicitor justice in saying—"

"Stop, sir," said Mr. Pendril, "interposed Norah; "I think I understand, from what you have just said, that we are to keep every thing to belongs to—?" She stopped, as if the mere utterance of the man's name was abhorrent to her.

"Mr. Michael Vanstone," said Mr. Pendril. "The house goes to him with the rest of the property."

"Then I, for one, am ready to leave it to-morrow!"

Magdalen started at the window as her sister spoke, and looked at Mr. Clare with the first open signs of anxiety and alarm which she had shown yet.

"Don't be angry with me," she whispered, secretly and hurriedly, in the midst of the agitation of look, and a sudden nervousness of manner. "I can't go without seeing Frank first!"

"You shall see him," replied Mr. Clare. "I am here to speak to you about it when the business is done."

"It is quite unnecessary to hurry your departure as you propose," continued Mr. Pendril, addressing Norah. "I can safely assure you that a week hence will be time enough."

"If that is Mr. Michael Vanstone's house," repeated Norah, "I can ready to leave it to-morrow."

Magdalen impatiently quitted her chair and seated herself further away on the sofa. As she laid her hand on the back of it her face changed. There, at the head of the sofa, were the cushions which had supported her mother when she lay down for the last time to repose. There, at the foot of the sofa, was the clumsy, old-fashioned arm-chair which had been her father's favorite seat on rainy days when she and her sister used to amuse him at the piano opposite by playing his favorite tunes. A heavy sigh, which she tried vainly to repress, burst from her lips. "Oh," she thought, "I had forgotten these old things! How shall we part from them the time comes!"

"May I inquire, Miss Vanstone, whether you and your sister have formed any definite plans for the future?" asked Mr. Pendril. "Have you thought of any place of residence?"

"I may take it on myself, Sir," said Miss Garth, "to answer never your sister's wish. When they leave this house they leave it with me. My home is their home, and my bread is their bread. Their parents have been my friends, and loved me. For twelve happy years they never had a thought apart that I was their governess, they only let me know myself as their companion and their friend. My memory of them is the memory of unvarying kindness and generosity, and my life shall pay the debt of my gratitude to their orphan children."

Norah threw herself into the sofa, Magdalen impetuously left the window. For once there was no comfort in the comfort of the friendless. For once the same impulse moved their hearts, the same earnest feeling inspired their words. Miss Garth waited until the first outbreak of emotion had passed away, then rose, and, taking Norah and her sister each by the hand, quietly dressed herself to Mr. Pendril and Mr. Clare. She spoke with perfect self-possession; strong in her active consciousness of the right of action.

"Even such a trifle as my own story," she said, "is of some importance at such a moment as this. I wish you both, gentlemen, to understand that I have not promised to be the instructors of your old friend than I can perform. When I first came to this house I entered it with the full determination to remain here as an not common in the lives of governesses. In my younger days I had known what it was to suffer as my elder sister: we established a school in London, which grew to be a large and prosperous one. I sold it with the unwillingness to leave experience because the heavy responsibility of the school was more than my strength could bear. I am in the receipt of a small annuity, and I possess a pecuniary interest in our establishment to this day. That is my story, Mr. Pendril. When we leave this house I propose that we shall go back to the school in London, which is now under the management of my sister. We can live there as quietly as we please until time has healed the wounds which are bleeding now, and then we can hear it now. If Norah's and Magdalen's altered prospects oblige them to earn their own livelihood, I shall be glad to have to earn it as a gentlemen's daughters should. The best families in this land are glad to ask my sister's advice in the interests of their children's home-training are concerned; and I answer beforehand for the success of the establishment of their claims whenever you please."

Without waiting for the lawyer's answer, without even looking at him, she turned to her own terrible situation, she moved at once toward the door. It was plain to every one that the only coming trial by doing much and saying little. Before she could leave the room Mr. Clare followed her, and detained her for a moment.

"I never envied a woman's feelings before," said the old man. "I envy you now for the letter; but I envy yours. Visit! I have something more to say. There is an obstacle still left—the obstacle of Frank's father. I have not yet seen him. Shall I see him, or will you leave the elder sister along with you and the lawyer, and leave me here to wait and see with his poor old friend?"

While Mr. Clare was addressing these words to Miss Garth Mr. Pendril had taken the opportunity of speaking to Norah. "Before I speak to you," he said, "I should like to have a word with you in private. From what his sister has told me, Miss Vanstone is very much influenced by your discretion; and, as an old friend of your father's, I want to take the liberty of speaking to you in confidence."

Before Norah could answer she was summoned, in compliance with Mr. Clare's request, to the conference with the servants. Mr. Pendril followed Miss Garth as a matter of course. When the door closed on them Mr. Clare, who re-entered the room, closed the door, and signed peremptorily to Magdalen to take a chair.

She obeyed in silence. He took a turn up and down the room with his hands in the side pockets of the long, loose, shapeless coat which he habitually wore.

"How old are you?" he said, stopping suddenly, and speaking to her with the whole breadth of the room between them.

"I was born on my birthday," she answered, humbly, without looking up at him.

"You have shown extraordinary courage for a girl of eighteen. Have you got any of that courage left?"

She clasped her hands together and wrung them hard. A few tears gathered in her eyes and rolled slowly over her cheeks.

"I can't give up Frank," she said, faintly. "You don't care for me, I know; but you used to care for my father. Will you try to be kind to me for my father's sake?"

The last words died away in a whisper; she could say no more. Never had she felt the illimitable power which a woman's love possesses of sacrificing itself to the object it loves, even at their joy or sorrow of her life, as she felt it then. Never had she felt more passionate pain than at the moment. Never had the impenetrable atmosphere of illusion through which women behold the man of their choice—the atmosphere which had blinded her to all that was selfish, selfish, and mean in Frank's nature—surrounded him with a brighter halo than now, when she was pleading with the idol for the happiness of his own. "Oh, don't ask me to give him up!" she said, trying to take courage, and thankful to from head to foot. In the next instant she flew to the opposite extreme, with the suddenness of a flash of lightning. "I won't give him up!" she burst out violently. "No! not if a thousand fathers ask me!"

"I am one father," said Mr. Clare. "And I don't ask you."

In the first astonishment and delight of hearing those unexpected words she started to her feet, crossed the room, and tried to throw her arms round his neck. She just missed it, and attempted to move the house from its foundations. He took her by the shoulders and put her back in her chair. His inexorable eyes looked her into submission; and his lean forefinger shook at her warningly, as Dr Syntax during a fractious child.

"Hug Frank," he said; "don't hug me. I haven't done with you yet: when I have, you may shake hands with me, if you like. Wait, and compose yourself."

He left her. His hands went back into his pockets, and his monotonous march up and down the room began again.

"Ready?" he asked, stopping short after a while. She looked up at him. "Ready with one more," he said, and resumed his walk with the regularity of clock-work. "These are the creatures," he thought to himself, "into which keeping men, otherwise sensible, give the happiness of their lives. In my own house, keeping my creation, I wonder, which answers its end as badly as a woman does?"

He stopped before her once more. Her breathing was easier; the dark flush on her face was dying out again.

"Ready?" he repeated. "Yes; ready at last. Listen to me; and let's get it over. I don't ask you to give Frank up. I ask you to wait."

"I will wait," she said. "Patiently, willingly."

"Will you make Frank wait?"

"Yes."

"Will you send him to China?"

Her head drooped on her bosom, and she clasped her hands again in silence. Mr. Clare saw where the difficulty lay, and went straight up to it on the spot.

"I don't pretend to enter into your feelings for Frank, or Frank's for you," he said. "The subject doesn't interest me. But I do pretend to state two plain truths. The one plain truth that you can't be married till you have money enough to pay for the roof that shelters you, the clothes that cover you, and the victuals you eat. It is another plain truth that you can't find the money; that I can't find the money; and that Frank's only chance of finding it is going to China. If I tell him to go, he'll sit in a corner and cry. If I insist, he'll say yes, and stay with me. If I go a step further, and see him on board ship with my own eyes, he'll drop off at the pilot's boat, and sneak back secretly to you. That's his disposition."

"No!" said Magdalen. "It's not his disposition; it's his love for Me."

"Call it what you like," retorted Mr. Clare, "Sneak, or Sweet-heart—he's too slippery, in either capacity, for my fingers to hold him. My shutting the door won't keep him from coming back. Your shutting the door will. Have you the courage to shut it? Are you fond enough of him not to stand in his light?"

"Fond! I would die for him!"

"Will you send him to China?"

She sighed bitterly.

"Have a little pity for me," she said. "I have lost my father: I am lost to my mother; I have lost my fortune—and now I am to lose Frank. Oh, don't do it unless you must! Try to help me with a little pity. I don't say it's not for his own interests to send him to China; I only say it's hard—very hard—for me, sir."

Mr. Clare had been deaf to her violence, insensible to her caresses. Had he been moved by her tears? He was not. He was only sorry for Frank's sake. Frank's interests, what Frank is too weak to do for himself. It's no fault of mine—it's no fault of Frank's; but it's not the less true that the fortune you were to have brought him has changed owners."

She suddenly looked up, with a flerce light in her eyes, with a threatening smile on her lips.

"It may change owners again," she said.

Mr. Clare saw the alteration in her expression, and heard the tones of her voice. But the words were spoken low—spoken as if to herself: they failed to reach him across the breadth of the room. He stopped instantly in his walk, and asked what she had said.

"Nothing," she answered, turning her head away toward the window and looking out mechanically at the falling rain. "Only my own thoughts."

Mr. Clare resumed his walk, and returned to his subject.

"It's your interest," he went on, "as well as Frank's interest, that he should go. He may make money enough to marry you in China; he can't make it here. If he stays at home, he'll be the ruin of both of you. He'll shut his eyes to every consideration of prudence, and pester you to marry him; and when he has carried his point, he will be the first to turn round after. Send and accompany him, or I'll send with him. Hear me out! You're in love with Frank; I'm sure, and I know him. Put you two together often enough; give him time enough to hang, cry, pester, and plead, and I'll tell you what the end will be—you will marry him."

He had touched the right string at last. It rang back in answer before he could add another word.

"You don't know me," she said, firmly. "You don't know what I can suffer for the man I love. He shall never marry me till I can be what my father said I should be—the making of his fortune. He shall never, as Mr. Clare says he will, be a promise you that! I'll be the good angel of Frank's life; I'll not put a pennikin's cost in him and drag him down." She abruptly left her seat, advanced a few steps toward Mr. Clare, and stopped in the middle of the room. Her arms fell helpless on either side of her, and she looked him steadily in the face. "Listen to me," she said. "If my heart breaks in doing it, I'll tell him to-morrow that we must say Good-by!"

Mr. Clare walked up to her to meet her, and held out his hand.

"I'll help you," he said. "Frank shall hear every word that has passed between us. When he comes to-morrow he shall know beforehand what the course of your duty is."

She took his hand in both her own—hesitated—looked at him—and pressed it to her bosom. "May I ask you to do me a favor, sir?" she said, timidly. He tried to take his hand from her; but she knew her own power, and held it fast. "Suppose there should be some change for the better?" she went on. "Suppose I could come to Frank, as I have said, and tell him prior to him—?"

Before she could complete the question Mr. Clare made a second effort, and withdrew his hand. "As your father said you should come to him?" he completed the sentence for her.

"Yes," she replied. "Strange things happen sometimes. If strange things happen to us, will you let Frank come back before the five years are out?"

What did she mean? Was she clinging desperately to the hope of melting Michael Vanstone's heart? Mr. Clare could draw no other conclusion from what she had just said to him. At the beginning of the interview he would have roughly dispelled her delusion; at the end of the interview he left her compassionately in possession of it.

"You are hoping against all hope," he said. "But if it gives you courage, hope on. If this impossible good fortune of yours ever happens, tell me, and Frank shall come back. In the mean time—"

In the mean time," she interposed, sadly, "you have my promise."

Once more Mr. Clare's sharp eyes searched her face attentively.

"I will trust your promise," he said. "You can trust Frank to-morrow."

She went back thoughtfully to her chair, and sat down again in silence. Mr. Clare made for the door finally, and left her to her reckoning the pass between them. "Deep!" he thought to himself as he went back at last to leave his rest out: "only eighteen—and too deep for my sounding!"

In the hall he found Norah, waiting anxiously to hear what had happened.

"Is it all over?" she asked. "Does Frank go to China?"

"Be careful how you manage that sister of yours, Norah," was the only answering question. "She has one great misfortune to contend with: she's not made for the ordinary jog-trot of the world. If she can't go up I can't go straight to the end of the good or the evil in her —I only warn you her future will be no common one."

An hour later Mr. Pendril left the house, and by that night's post Miss Garth dispatched a letter to her sister in London.

TO BE CONTINUED IN THE NEXT NUMBER.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.

HEAD-QUARTERS FOR BRACELETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR LOCKETS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR RINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR VEST CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR GUARD CHAINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF PINS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR ALL KINDS OF EARRINGS.
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR MINIATURE PINS OF ALL THE CELEBRATED PERSONAGES. Also, full particulars. W. A. HAYDEN, WHOLESALE MANUFACTURING JEWELER, 208 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

AGENTS!

Send for our Circular, containing full particulars, free.

PRIZE STATIONERY PACKETS.
PRIZE PACKETS FOR THE MILLION.
UNION STATIONERY AND PORTRAIT PACKETS.
UNION STATIONERY AND BRIEFF PACKETS.
EXCELSIOR STATIONERY PACKETS.
GOLD PEN AND PENCIL STATIONERY AND PRIZE PACKAGES of every description. Circulars free.
J. C. HOLBROOK & CO., 107 Fulton St., N. Y.

Wedding Cards and Note Papers at J. EVERDELL'S celebrated Engraving Establishment, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane Street, N. Y. Samples by mail.

You must Notice,

That the name of the firm of W. Forsyth & Co. is changed to that of Forsyth, Bliss & Co., Mr. Forsyth having retired. Business continues at the same, and all Certificates with the name of W. Forsyth & Co. attached are good, and will be redeemed by us under the same name. Correspondence and Satisfactions as heretofore, as their being returned to us.

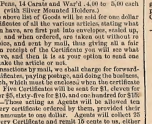
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000.

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

Splendid List!

Of Articles to be Sold for One Dollar each.

100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....$100,00 each.
100 " Watches.....50,00 "
100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches.....50,00 "
500 Ladies and Gents' Silver Watches.....20,00 "
1000 Vest and Guard Chains.....10,00 "
2000 Gold Band Bracelets.....5,00 to 10,00 each
1000 " " .....3,00 to 5,00 "
3500 Cameo Brooches.....4,00 to 6,00 each
1000 Mosaic and Lava Brooches.....4,00 to 6,00 each
2000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.....4,00 to 6,00 each
3000 Coral, Jet, Mosaic, &c. Ear Drops.....4,00 to 6,00 "
5000 Gents' Breast Pins.....3,50 to 5,00 each
5000 Ladies' " " .....3,50 to 5,00 "
5000 Pair Lava Sleeve Buttons.....3,50 to 5,00 "
5000 Sets of Studs.....3,50 to 5,00 each
5000 Sleeve Buttons.....3,50 to 5,00 "
7000 Plain Rings.....3,50 to 5,00 each
7000 Stone Set Rings.....3,50 to 5,00 each
7000 Lockets.....3,50 to 10,00 each
7000 Solid Gold Jewelry.....4,00 to 10,00 each
10000 Gold Pens, 14 Carats and Warr'd.....4,00 to 5,00 each
10000 Silver Pens and Pencils.....2,00 each



All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Combination of the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelope, sealed up, mixed well, and when ordered, we take out one without regard to choice, and send by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar, and receive the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business. Certificates will not be sent unless the money for them either is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1, eleven for $2, thirty for $5, and five for $10, and so on to extend to $100.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State, in full.

J. E. WILSON & CO.,
P. O. Box 5070, 598 Broadway, New York.
N. B.—We wish it distinctly understood that all articles of jewelry not giving perfect satisfaction can be returned and the money will be refunded.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

The Sin., or Navy Size, carries a Ball weighing 38 to the pound. The Army Size, 31 to the pound. A Ball for 36 lb. By recent experiments made in the Army, these Revolvers were pronounced the best and most effective weapons in use. Also,

Ballard's Patent Breech-Loading Rifle

This arm is entirely new, and is universally acknowledged to be the surest to perfection of any Breech-Loading rifle ever made. Length of barrel 24 inches, weight 7½ lbs., carries a Ball weighing 52 to the pound. Ball and 44 copper water-proof Cartridges. For particulars call or send for a CIRCULAR.

SHERWIN & BALL, Sole Agents,
No. 103 Broadway, N. Y.

International Exhibition, 1862.

THE LONDON ART JOURNAL, FOR APRIL.

Contains the first division of an
ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF THE
International Exhibition.

This portion will consist of 100 Illustrated pages (nearly one-third of the volume), and will be continued for eight consecutive months.

PUBLISHED WITHOUT EXTRA CHARGE.

Price 75 cents per month. $9 per Annum.
Subscriptions received, and the trade supplied by

VIRTUE & CO., 26 John Street, New York.

To all Wanting Farms.

NEW SETTLEMENT OF VINELAND.—30 miles from Philadelphia by Railroad. Good soil, healthy climate. Unsurpassed for Wheat, Indian Corn, Fruit and Vegetables—good market—delightful society—churches and schools established—pleasant village, where good business openings can be found. Improved farms are settling. Some can be had from $15 to $20 per acre only. Village 5 and 12 acre Lots for sale. Four years' time given. Apply to SOLON ROBINSON, Agt. Ed. of the Tribune, who has rented the property together with the "Vineland Rural," giving full description, will be furnished. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Fld., Vineland P.O., Cumberland County, New Jersey.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for the Army and Navy Sanitary Commission, Hospitals, and all places occupied by Union Troops, will be forwarded free of charge by the ADAMS EXPRESS. No. 74 Broadway. Sutlers charged low rates.

Every Man his own Printer.

Portable Printing Office for the Army and Navy. Price, complete, and Business Men generally. Send for a circular.

ADAMS PRESS COMPANY,
31 Park Row (under Ley-Jay's Hotel), New York.

NOW READY.—A Package containing a variety of Articles indispensable to Gentlemen. Gets one. Price 25 cents. Address

H. T. HART, 25 Ann Street, N. Y.

CATARRH!! Dr. GODDARD'S CATARRH REMEDY penetrates the secret nesbrik of the system, and cures it without pain or grief. Depot 612 Broadway. Send stamp for circular.

Watches.

Annexed is a partial descriptive Catalogue of Watches for sale, at prices to suit the times:

No. 1. Open Face Verge Compendier.....$ 8 50
2. Open Face Verge Silver Fatte.....4 00
3. Hunting Case Verge Silver Fatte.....6 50
4. Heavy Silver Plate Hunting Case, superior finish.....7 50
5. Heavy Gold Plate Hunting Case.....9 00
6. "Soliter Own," Gold Plate Hunting Case.....10 00
7. Silver Hunting Case, fine Gold Plate, Cylinder Escapement.....12 00
8. Silver Hunting Case Lever, fine Gold Plate.....12 00
9. Silver Hunting Case Lever, Jewelled in 7 Holes.....13 00
10. Silver Open Face Cylinder.....10 00
11. Silver Hunting Case Lever.....10 00
12. Silver Hunting Case Lever, Heavy Case, Plate Movement.....12 00
14. Silver Hunting Case, Hammered Size.....15 00
15. Silver Hunting Case AMERICAN THIN KEEP-ING WATCH.....18 00
16. 18 k. Gold Open Face Lever, Jewelled.....15 00
17. 18 k. Solid Gold Hunting Case, Ladies' Size.....18 00
18. 18 k. Solid Gold Hunting Case Lever, Gents' Size.....18 00
19. 18 k. Solid Gold fine Enameled, genuine Diamond Set.....30 00
20. 18 k. Solid Gold fine Enameled, genuine Diamond Set, Stem Winder.....40 00
21. 18 k. Solid Gold Heavy Case, Enameled, genuine Diamond Set, Stem Movement.....70 00
23. Chronometers, Gimbrel &c., Makers, Henry Sharp.....18 k. Heavy Cases.....140 00
25. Julius Sturz, Maker, Heavy 18 k. elaborately Engraving Case, set with numerous Diamonds, one of the finest Watches imported.....250 00

Parties ordering will please enclose Ten Dollars, as a guarantee that the package will be taken from the Express. All orders from points South of Washington, D. C., must be accompanied by funds in full.

J. L. FERGUSON, 49 Broadway, New York.

Grand Opening!!!

BRODIE'S

Stock of Spring and Summer MANTILLAS,

Now Ready for Inspection at his

OLD STAND, 300 Canal Street, and his

Pale of Fashion,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Corner of 234 Street,

New York.

Commercial Travelers and Agents Wanted to Sell on 25 Cent Portfolio Package.

Contents—Ink and Pencil Eraser, Ink Paper, 19 Envelopes, 1 Pencil, 1 Pen, 1 Pencil, 1 Blotting Pad, 100 Recipes, 1 Year Hymn Book, 1 Package, 1 Year Almanac, 1 Surprising Interest.—2 Fashionable Embroidery Designs for Collars, 4 for Under-Sleeves, 6 for Under-Skirts, 1 for Corner of Handkerchief, 2 for Cuffs, 1 for Silk Purse, 1 for Child's Apron, 1 for Garment Cover, 1 Pantin Gentleman, and Odd Beautiful Articles of Jewelry. $10 a day can be realized. Send stamp for particulars. Address

WEIR & CO., 43 South Third Street, Phila., Pa.

ENTERPRISING AGENTS ARE Doing well selling the Patent Self-Sealing Envelope. SUITED for Hand-Sowing, and other new articles of ready sale. Sample Envelope Sewing Machine sent on receipt of the price (25c.). Send 3-cent stamp for price-list and terms. J. C. HOLBROOK & CO., 107 Fulton St., N. Y.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—My Organent will force them to grow heavily in six weeks upon any smooth face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1—sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of a letter. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 189 Nassau Street, N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT. A NEW ENTERPRISE. Sure and honorable. Persons between the ages of 18 and 30 can secure a number of Agencies. A liberal salary and expenses paid, or commission allowed. Address, with stamp, LAMSON BROTHERS, Boston, Mass. (Give this out for reference.)

EMPLOYMENT.—Agents wanted in every of the Town and Country. Also a respectable and permanent business. For particulars address, with stamp, DR. J. H. WARNER, 54 Dey Street, New York.

SOMETHING NEW. Agents wanted to make $30 to $100 a month, selling our newly-patented articles to every family. Sample sent free by mail. Satisfaction guaranteed. Samples 25c. each. Endless stamp. RICE & CO., No. 17 Tremont Row, and 4 Chicago, Ill.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year each.....2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Four Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$2 00
One Copy for Two Years.....4 00
Two Copies for One Year.....3 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

"Whew! That Old Hen, JEFF DAVIS, has been trying to hatch a Rotten Egg"

The Mayor of New Orleans yielding to "Brute Force."

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire. IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES, GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogues mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINGS & WICKERSHAM, 259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York. 259

MME. DEMOREST'S MIRROR OF FASHIONS.—Summer No. now ready.—contains three large and magnificent Fashion Plates. Very numerous and splendid engravings. Valuable full and reliable information on Bonnets, Dresses, Fashionable Supplies, Science of Dress Cutting. Three full-sized Patterns of Dresses, and a Sheet of New and Elegant Braid Work and Embroidery Patterns, all for 25 cents. Yearly Subscription, $1.00, with which the privilege of selecting 12 cash worth of Fiash Patterns as an extra premium.

Published Quarterly, 473 Broadway. Mailed on receipt of price.

The unrivalled and emphatically the Largest and Best Fashion Magazine in the World.

STEINWAY & SONS'

PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRANDS, AND UPRIGHT PIANOS

Are now considered the best Pianos manufactured, and will be sold to suit the times. Each Instrument warranted for five years. Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y. Send for Circular.

PASSPORT OFFICE, No. 200 Broadway, near Fulton Street, Ground Floor.

Naturalized citizens must produce their certificates. Information for travelers furnished on application at the Office, or in reply to letters addressed PASSPORT OFFICE, Box 5,015, New York.

A BEAUTIFUL PRODUCTION! MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 26c. IN SILVER. Size of Stereoscopic Card, 3½ by 4. Mailed Free. F. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

Watches.

Don't fail to see Advertisement on preceding page.

BALLOU'S PATENTED F. Y. S. French Yoke SHIRTS. WARRANTED TO FIT. Send for a Circular. BALLOU BROS., 99 Broadway, New York. F. Y. S.

For sale by all the principal Dealers through the UNITED STATES.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.—100 pieces of Cheap Jewelry for $1, comprising the same description of Jewelry as used in Stationery Packages. One piece of Jewelry sent, postage paid, for 10 cents, with a circular giving a description of our goods. Also Stationery and Jewelry Packages, the best in the market, at prices varying from 60 cents to $1 00 a dozen. Address J. S. ANDREWS, 176 Sudbury Street, Boston, Mass.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS. Selpho Palmer, 516 Broadway, N. Y. Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel. Send for a Circular.

Victory!!!

All in want of Linens, Yarn Goods, or Trimmings of any description, send for a Circular to C. F. BURTON, Manufacturing dealer, 595 Broadway, New York.

SENT BY EXPRESS EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices, Made to Measure at $20 per doz. OR SIX FOR TEN DOLLARS.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN, With Reinforced Bosoms, and warranted as good a Shirt as can be sold in retail stores for $2 50 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $36 00 PER DOZEN.

P. S.—Those who think I can not make a good Shirt for $20 per dozen are mistaken. Here is the cost of one dozen $20 fine shirts.

36 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 18 c. per yd.. $5 40
7 yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard..... 3 50
Making and cutting..... 6 00
Laundry, 24; buttons and cotton, 76c..... 1 00
Profit..... 3 70
Total..... $20 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars, sent free everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. I warrant a perfect fit.

The cash can be paid to the Express Company on receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all parties to examine the goods before paying for them. If the goods are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London, 387 Broadway, up stairs, Between Walker and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

To the Nervous and Debilitated.

DR. ADAM LAURIE'S CHINESE LIFE PILLS.

This wonderful remedy, chiefly composed from the essence of a plant that grows in the dry districts of China, and is used by the Emperor of the Celestial Empire, is, at last, entitled to the offer of public trial. It was discovered by Dr. Adam Laurie, M.R.C.S., while attached to the French and British Embassies at Hong Kong, and by him introduced into European practice.

These Pills take no effect as a Cathartic but act specifically on the blood and nervous centres; are a speedy and infallible remedy for and all diseases from impure blood or nervous derangement, and may be taken with entire safety by the most delicate of tender child.

Neuralgia, Ticdoloreux, Dyspepsia, St. Vitus' Dance, Languor, Lassitude, Depression of Spirits, Nervous Headache, Irritability, Excitement, Excessive Use of Tobacco,

One Dollar per carton of forty pills, or a hundred for Two Dollars, sent by mail on receipt of cash, by GEO. HUNT, 79 Gerard Agent, 413 Broadway, Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel, New York.

AGENTS ARE MAKING MORE MONEY BY SELLING RICKARD'S UNION PRIZE SECRETS, AND RECIPE PACKAGE, Than by any other business. OUR PACKAGE IS IN SUCH DEMAND THAT AGENTS EASILY MAKE FROM $20 TO $35 A DAY. CIRCULARS MAILED FREE. S. C. RICKARD & CO., 160 Nassau Street, N. Y.

WE CAN NOT SUPPLY THE DEMAND.

AGENTS.—THE DIME PANPROSPECTUS PRIZE PACKAGE, PRICE 10 CENTS, CONTAINS 18 ARTICLES, ALL NEW AND ORIGINAL. EACH PACKAGE HAS A GIFT OF JEWELRY. Send stamp for a circular. W. H. CATLEY & CO., 168 Nassau St., N. Y.

AGENT—IF YOU WISH TO INVEST A SMALL CAPITAL IN A PAYING BUSINESS, Examine the merits of the MULTIPLYING PEN. From 150 per cent. to Agents. Call and see it, or send for a circular. S. C. RICKARD & CO., 160 Nassau Street, N. Y.

THE UNION SPY!

Southern Aristocracy. A revelation of the mysterious personages supposed every week in

THE WIDE WORLD.

Published in Boston. Sold everywhere. 4 cts.

Gold Pens Repointed—Equal to New, On receipt of 75 cts in money or stamps. Orders by Mail promptly attended to. Gold Pen 25 cts. Pen and Holder 50 cts. E. S. JOHNSON, 18 Maiden Lane, New York.

CHEWERS AND SMOKERS WHO ARE destroying their health and intellect by the use of tobacco, send for a pamphlet describing a voluntary and remedy. Address ISAAC G. SWAN, Drawer No. 59, Syracuse, N. Y.

Beware of Counterfeits.

To the Public.

Brandreth's Pills and New Style.

☞ THE WHOLE OBJECT TO INSURE A CURE in most cases of sickness, is to remove

Impure Humors

faster than they are formed. The time of cure will be governed by this rule. Thus by using BRANDRETH'S PILLS according to printed directions, the nutrition in you producing sickness will become less; your sickness will be of the past, and your health will be of the present, fresh and enduring.

This Case of C. J. Fay, should command attention from the sick. Let him in search of health ask if these things be so; being assured they are, let him take courage and the Pills, and cease his health:

HANCOCKTON, N. J., May 7, 1861.

DR. BRANDRETH—DEAR SIR: I have long wanted to write to you and express my gratitude for the beneficial effects that have been experienced in by my own family, and in hundreds aye, thousands of others, by the use of Brandreth's Pills. The first year my friend Brockway sold your Pills in Boston, 1839, I was then in a declining state of health, and my friends, as well as myself, supposed that my earthly voyage would soon terminate. Mr. Brockway urged me to take the Brandreth Pills; but having used so much medicine, with no good effect, I was some inclin'd to let nature take its course, and calmly submit to my fate. Mr. B. offered to give me one dozen pairs, if I would take them as prescribed. By this time he had great faith in them, and I finally consented to take them, but not as a gift. I went home, and went at it most hopefully. After taking one box I began to feel better. Well, sir, when I had used up my twelve boxes I was a well, healthy man, my weight having gone from 121 pounds up to 165 pounds. I then ordered a supply, and between that time and the present, I have rolled three thousand dollars worth of these invaluable Pills, and am quite sure that I have thereby been instrumental in saving not hundreds, but thousands of lives.

Yours truly, C. J. FAY, P. M.

New Style of Brandreth's Pills.

The New Style is a small band of paper around the box of Pills and directions. On the band are printed, in

RED INK,

Benjamin Brandreth's Pills.

Benjamin Brandreth's Pills.

The paper is covered with three words in many successive repeats, and when the whole is spun off of the cock's plaster, to keep the band secure in its place.

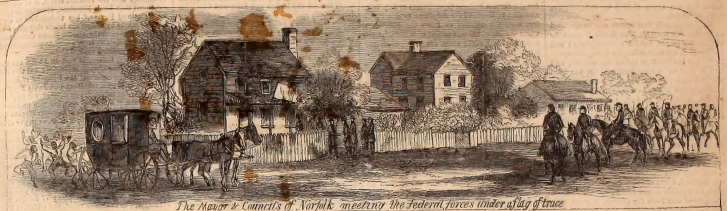
This New Style ensures you fresh Pills, and the Genuine; but it is not to be denied, that many vegetable Dealers sell Genuine Brandreth's Pills of Old Style. These will be exchanged for New Style, if not over two years has passed since they were in my possession.

B. BRANDRETH.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, with directions, at No. 4 Union Square, N. Y.; Gamble's corner Eighth Avenue and Twenty-Eighth Street; Mallory, Asbury; Frank Taylor, Washington, D. C.; Geo. E. Stanton, Chicago; Philadelphia, 14 North Eighth Street; S. R. Callender, N. W. corner of Third and Walnut Streets; L. Upham, 403 Chestnut Street; Trenton, N. J., C. C. Yard; Germantown, Joseph Potter; Sarnark, C. W. Badger, 328 Broad Street; Jersey City, R. W. Gardner, 320 Bergen's Avenue; Elizabeth, M. M. Gilbert, 207 Broad Street; New Brunswick, I. F. Randolph; Albany, Dr. Swarts; Troy, Friswell; Rochester, Ellsworth, Dr. Sievers; Bordentown, A. I. Sexton; Burlington, N. J., James Shaw; Camden, H. S. Hand; Cincinnati, A. E. Blackman; and by respectable druggists dealer in medicine, who should have the new style. BE SURE TO BRANDRETH, New York, will inquire for none not in any address in the United States, without further charge.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE,

294 Canal St., Brandreth Building, N. Y.

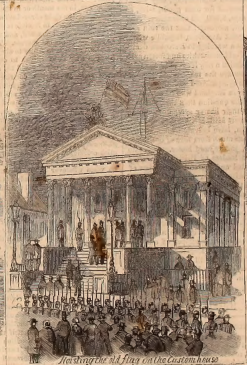


INVALID.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all Lung Affections, by sending to E. Aden, 301 Pearl Street, N. Y. He could it free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VI.—No. 282.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $2 50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.



Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

The Mayor & Councils of Norfolk meeting the Federal Forces under a flag of truce

The Council Tree

Hoisting the Flag on the Custom House

Entering the City of Norfolk

Burning of the Gosport Navy Yard

THE REOCCUPATION OF NORFOLK BY THE UNION FORCES, UNDER GENERAL WOOL, MAY 10, 1862.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 327.]

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE ENGLISH.

SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1862.

MR. GLADSTONE, Chancellor of the British Exchequer, has lately attempted, in a public speech, to show that the contempt which the course of the English with regard to this country has aroused among liberal people of all nations is unjust and unmerited. He admits that Great Britain has sympathized with the Southern rebels. This he justifies, first, on the ground once taken by Earl Russell, that the North is contending for power, the South for independence; and secondly, because it would have been impolitic for England to have made enemies of 8,000,000 Southerners (whereof 4,000,000 are negro slaves) by sympathizing with the North.

Mr. Gladstone's first reason can be disposed of in very few words. The North is not contending for power, but for national unity; and the South is not contending for independence—for it was independent before the contest, and will be just as independent after it has been whipped back into the Union. Southern independence has never been imperiled for a moment. There is, in fact, no such thing as Northern or Southern independence. The whole Union is alike independent. Mr. Gladstone is evidently confounding the case of the Southern rebellion with that of other rebellions in which his interest has been more direct. When the people of Bengal and the Northwestern Provinces of British India rebelled against England in 1857 they were contending for their independence and England, when she sent armies to put them down, to desolate towns and villages, and blow prisoners of war from the mouths of guns, was really contending for power. According to Mr Gladstone's argument, the civilized world should have sympathized with Nena Sahib.

As to the shop-keepers' argument, that England could not afford to quarrel with 8,000,000 future customers, that is no concern of ours. We would have no right to complain if John Bull chose to toady to the King of Dahomey in order to sell him Birmingham knives or to win his people's threats. But, in effect, the mean fear of offending the South has led the English into a course which has disgusted liberal men of both alike. The present generation of Southerners will never forgive England for having declined to break the blockade; and at the end, then the anti-English feeling was never so universal. In trying to curry favor with 8,000,000 of our people, the English have made enemies of 30,000,000. It is very sad, and we heartily wish it were otherwise; but the fact is, that there is probably no other point on which so many Americans are thoroughly agreed at the present moment as in cordial hatred of the English.

Mr. Gladstone's speech leads us to believe that it is hardly necessary to explain why this feeling exists. The British conscience admits its justice. When the sword was forced into our hands by the madness of the Southern rebels, we had every reason to believe that, of all foreign nations, England would be most ready to sympathize with us in our troubles. We were her best customers and closest ally. We were connected with national ties by an institution of which she was the uncompromising foe. It was evident that our cause would fatally weaken, as our failure would mightily strengthen slavery. And England was the leading anti-slavery power in the world. The best feeling existed between the two nations; the Prince of Wales had just received, in this country, an ovation as brilliant as that which was granted to Kossuth nearly thirty years ago—the only place which contributed an exception to the general rule of civility and respect being the rebel capital, Washington.

Yet when the war actually broke out, England did every thing she could do to assist the rebels short of actually declaring war upon us. With indecent haste she recognized the Confederate States as belligerents the very day before Mr. Lincoln arrived in England. Her newspapers, great and small, with a few bright exceptions, elaborately decried us and taunted the rebel cause. They decided our every movement at our navy, strove vigorously to break down our credit; while, in the same breath, they lauded the rebels, talked of the valor of their soldiers, the sagacity of their leaders, and the utter impossibility of subjugating such a people. From time to time, shrieking hawks of war uttered apologies for slavery. Nor was this sort of thing confined to the press. Lord John Russell, Foreign Secretary, gravely implied a sympathy in the eyes of the world by announcing that we were fighting for power against the poor Southerners, who were struggling for freedom; comparing us, as it were, to Austria, and the rebels to Hungary. Lord Palmerston, Prime Minister, hoped that we would see the folly of our policy, and submit to what Jeff Davis wanted. Lord Stanley, Cabinet Minister, deemed our enterprise utterly hopeless. Mr. Gladstone, Cabinet Minister, justifies England's sympathy with the rebels. As in word, so in deed. The French press have well depicted, in the contemptuous language it deserved, the fiery haste with which England tried to force us into a war on the Trent affair—at a time when our every nerve was strained to keep the rebels in check; and the savage fury with which the British rulers and most of the people learned that their efforts had escaped them—when Mason and Slidell were released. But for the aid afforded by British officials, privateering would have died out by mid-summer 1861. But the British port of Nassau in the Bahamas, within sight of the privateer Nashville, laden with the spoil of our merchant ships which she had burned; British and French states agreed by a joint declaration to the channel; the British port of Gibraltar gave refuge to the privateer Sumter; the British port of the Cape of Good Hope, and almost all the British islands, Bermuda and Bahama, have been nests of privateers ever since the war began. British flags and British registers have been at the service of the rebels whenever they were needed. So with arms. Belgian arms, bought for the Federal Government at Liege, were sent to England for shipment to this country, were not allowed to leave the kingdom; while the Bavaria was armed with British cannon, British Enfield rifles are taken from the rebels in every battle; and every rebel fort contains more cannon from England, and shipped to the South since the war broke out. Whatever support, moral or material, the enemy has received from the British nation, and which is not actually declaring war upon us, has been freely rendered to Jeff Davis and his allies.

Lord Lindsay, who visited this country long since, argued that it was unreasonable to charge England with rebel sympathies, as she had no interest in the success of either party. He was right, but his countrymen didn't see it. They have thought all along they had a deep interest in the dissolution of the Union, and, subject to the feeble, jarring republics, which would have no weight whatever in the family of nations. They have thought that the successful establishment of the Southern Confederacy, they would obtain an open market for their goods, with, as Mr. Gladstone says, 8,000,000 customers. But they have thought, moreover, that the ruin and collapse of the great American Republic would prove to people everywhere, to European democrats, that Old World monarchies and rotten aristocracies would derive a new lease of power from this event. Such, we believe, was the way the English people have sympathized with the rebels.

There are men in England who have taken a broader view of the matter, and who, at all times, have granted us their hearty sympathy. John Bright, John Stuart Mill, Mr. Forster, and others prominent in the Liberal ranks, battle on our behalf; not so much from love of us as from regard for truth, justice, and honor. But who are they? The Manchester School—democracy—as heartily hated and feared by the rulers of England as ourselves; men who argue that no one is born with a right to a title, a seat in the legislator, and who, consequently, are traduced and scorned by the leading British journals, and have no more influence over the British government than so many Chocktaws.

If these men were in power in England, there might be a hope of reaching the hearts of the people of that people. But for aristocratic England the present generation of Americans will go down to their graves bitter. Our deeds in 1861 have been forgotten or forgiven.

THE LOUNGER.

GLADSTONE UPON THE WAR.

MR. GLADSTONE is one of the most brilliant, accomplished, and humane of English statesmen. He is a sincere scholar, an eloquent orator, and a successful man of affairs. He offers a series of "budgets" to English squires and three volumes on Homer to English scholars with an equally enthusiastic welcome. In the Church a Tory, in the State a Conservative, and in Politics, he is a man of many sympathies, and as good a representative Englishman as the times furnish.

Mr. Gladstone has lately made a speech at Manchester about American affairs. It is not a studied speech, as Burke's was; nor is it a short speech, like Gregory's and the other allies of Slavery in the British Parliament; nor a consciously false and malignant speech, as the London Times and the Times are; but it is a curiously-mistaken speech, and in three sentences he has overthrown the theories of intelligent Englishmen, as they understand the American question. John Stuart Mill, John Bright, and Mr. Forster are the champions there who have shown that knowledge of our political history and system without which all opinion is visionary. Nor do we suppose that Mr. Gladstone are ignorant; but we may justly wonder that, being so, he should say what he has said. Nor, again, shall we affect indifference to what such men as Gladstone say. Nations, like individuals, can not dispense with sympathy or intelligent appreciation, and may properly desire that their motives and their conduct should be understood.

Mr. Gladstone says that our expectation of sympathy was extraordinary. But why? If, as he says in the same part of his speech, England would have been content to see us expand—and if, as we all know, the essential cause of both nations is the same, namely, constitutional liberty—why is it strange that we should look to the nation in this paper a year ago, that England would see that her interest in this country lay in the success of the Government? His answer is, that to have expressed sympathy would have alienated the six or ten millions of men who might become an independent people. But if this were the question, why should England have alienated twenty millions who were already an independent people? Granting that the rebels succeeded, Mr. Gladstone did not doubt that we at the North were to remain a separate power, and therefore he must allow that England considered the friendship of the rebel nation more valuable; in which case the theory of impartiality falls, and John Bull, cotton-spinner, stands clearly unmasked.

To suppose, which is his only alternative, that the United States would have to have resorted to proclamation of equal belligerence, is to assume that the British people would not have resented the recognition by Smith O'Brien's emissary of Nena Sahib's actual revolt against British rule. However, Mr. Gladstone knows, and probably better than he, that there was no serious chance of the rebels becoming an independent people if all nations friendly to the United States had refused to recruit as powers friendly to great Britain have always treated the Indian and Irish and Canadian troubles.

Mr. Gladstone's sneer at the possibility, or as he thinks, probability of a revolt against the rebels, leaving slavery untouched, is to be excused by his ignorance of the real feeling of the great mass of the citizens of this country when he satirically compares with the mass of English people, and of a philosophical mind he observes of the people of certain newspapers professedly loyal—by the way, Mr. Gladstone names Mr. Bellingham, Salisbury, Powell, and Bayard in Congress—that with the votes and words of Union men like Garrett Davis, Crittenden, and Bayard.

He proceeds to repeat Lord John's platitude that one side is fighting for supremacy and the other for independence, as if the latter was Gladstone's principle can make it less a platitude. For is it not the fact that the Southern rebels authority over their own state itself, and the recounts to overthrow it? There can be no doubt of the fact, the question lies in the right. Has a citizen a right to take up arms to destroy a government against which they allege no grievances? Is that a right which any people possess? For the American principle is not, and never was, in the mouth or in the pen of any proper exponent, the right of revolution. It is the right of man, and resort to forcible revolution only when that right is threatened, and when there is and can be no peaceable redress. The right of any number of people to refuse to obey the laws merely because they choose to obey them is not, never was, and never could be, an American any more than an English doctrine. It belies the genius of the race, and contradicts its constitution. The rebels in this country are fighting for independence and for secession. If they succeed in admission, never oppressed them, which they have always controlled, and which provided peaceable remedies for redress. On what grounds, therefore, Mr. Gladstone, a civilized, Christian, educated Englishman, sympathize with the people of one of the English colonies in 1776, who stated their grievances, and appealed and petitioned for redress—who had by voice in the Government, in Parliament, as they had no Constitutional remedy? Gregory, Lindsay, Ferguson, Roebuck, the Duke of Newcastle, and Lord Mason, Yancey, and W. H. Russell, L.L.D., Barrister-at-Law, may say such things, but Mr. Gladstone is of another class.

He adds, that we may conquer but can not conquer peace. That is the only really wish to go they will go—and he falls back upon the analogy of the Revolution. The prophecy, of course, is to be proved by the analogy. But the analogy of the Government of United States representing a rebellion within its borders can not successfully be compared with that of Great Britain attempting to subdue colonies three thousand miles away.

Finally, Mr. Gladstone declares that history will record that civilized nations never before endured so grievously the real misery occasioned by the civil war and the quarrel of another state. And yet he does not the event show that if those nations had originally had the power they would have crushed insurrection which we knew it and represented it to be. It would have been suppressed long before that misery became real. The rebellion was born, not in the hope of foreign aid—a hope justified by the insolent boast of English and other foreign states to recognize the rebels as belligerents.

The spring of this year will reveal to those states their fatal mistake. A great war, as Mr. Gladstone says, as death-stricken, because they wished us dead. They hated the political principle, for its triumph was their defeat. They feared the aspiring nation; for united America was the arbiter of the world. The rebellion and war in the South—the cotton supply should be endangered, and the state should create trouble at home. Therefore they did all they could, short of aiding the rebels with arms, to force their success, to divide the Union, and to destroy the Republic. And the delay which they interpreted as defeat was the necessary recoil for the decisive blow. To overthrow they saw at Bull Run was the fall of Lucifer, never to rise ground. At Fort Royal, at Mill Spring, Fort Henry, Donelson, Roanoke Island, Pea Ridge, Newbern, Winchester, Fittsburg Landing, Pittsburg, Island No. 10, Macon, Yorktown, Williamsburg—and, probably before these lines appear in print, at Richmond—we see that Antæus has risen again invincible.

Great Britain has thrown away forever the friendship of this country, and Mr. Gladstone and the English Cabinet are directly responsible for it. The year convicts them of incompetent statesmanship; and in his effort to apologize and explain the adroitest orator in England becomes dull, stammers, and the pitiful weakness, jealousy, and rage of Britain stand hideously exposed.

GUESSING.

THE visit of the French Minister to Richmond is an old story. But at the moment its meaning is not revealed. That every body should have a guess about it was most natural. But that the most humiliating of all conceivable interpretations should be put forth and gravely treated as possible by a loyal paper like the New York Times is significant and extraordinary. And as it is a story that may be revived in spirit or terms, it is worth while even now to look at its enormity.

The French Minister, according to the guess of the Times, went to Richmond by order of the Emperor to announce that the French and English world sees that their game is up, and that they must lay down their arms, nor attempt a guerrilla warfare. They can be assured that they will enjoy their honor and their existence as a free people. If Mr. Lincoln declines submission, he will be held to a faithful observance of the programme which may be appealed to Europe." He further informed them that "their country shall not be destroyed, that their industry shall not be overthrown," for the "consensus of civilized governments" does not approve of such barbarous extermination.

This is certainly the most remarkable sensation performance since the outbreak of the rebellion. Translated into the shortest terms, it is simply a statement that Louis Napoleon, affecting to speak for "civilized Europe," has undertaken to do our difficulties by telling the rebels that they must keep fighting until they have the power of independent action. But to suppose that, with a movement of suppressing a sanguinary rebellion of its citizens by means of an invading army, the people of the Government of the United States would tolerate an agent of any other Government in the world, which should say to it, "Your enterprise is a failure, it is suppose an absolute humiliation of the country, which is ready to fall at the most favorable moment, with all the sympathy of foreign Governments, was unable to effect, and which, at least, is not probable to be successful, will be the death agony and that sympathy is suppressed.

That the French Minister made no pretensions, should think that the national interest required no departure from the course he has already indicated, no interference of the French Emperor, is simply a ridiculous impertinence, as any interference of the Government with the Emperor's dealing with his own rebels would be. If the French Minister should think fit to change the policy, then the French Emperor's interference would be a matter of consideration. In either case it is utterly disrespectful to the Government of this country.

If the Emperor, or his Ministers, or any European King should at any time consider that our troubles constituted a dangerous crisis for the whole race to endure, they might take the risk of telling us that we are advised to put down the rebellion at our peril. That is intelligible. But nothing else. But no other interference which shall not be insulting to the Government in the power and spirit of dictation. The rebels in arms have by the law of their country forfeited their lives, if nothing more. Whatever power any King or Emperor may will not in all cases exact the utmost penalty," it is not for him to say that it is not necessary, because this Government will not be found less wise than the wisest, or less humane than the humanest. But the notion that we are to be deterred from this talk about saving the existence of the rebels "as a free people," and of holding this Government to fidelity to its promises, is the most disgusting and insolent tone of superiority upon the part of any power whatever which can be believed of any Government by the people of this country. Whoever gravely announces that it has been taken by Louis Napoleon, and the President and Secretary of State look serene in consequence, only shows what an extraordinary moral conception we have of the character of those gentlemen and of the honor of the nation.

But Louis Napoleon may have seen the sure defeat of the rebels, that he may have admitted the necessity of their subjugation, and that he may have instructed his Minister to ask permission of our Government to go to the rebel ringleaders and say to them that the Emperor of the French Empire should feel a certain satisfaction at this conduct upon the part of a power which was in such haste to recognize the rebels as belligerents in a naval rebuff. That is an obvious and easy explanation of the extraordinary conduct of the President and Secretary of State and the French Minister. But the fact that the President and Secretary looked hopeful because the French Minister had told them that Louis Napoleon was going to hold the President to his word is the joke of a very funny man.

THE QUAKER GENERAL.

MR. OWEN LOVEJOY has not been considered a wag, but there seems to be a very amusing in the simultaneousness of his resolution of praise to McClellan and Vallandigham's "democratic" address. Both are admirable, but they differ widely. Those who do not like Mr. Lovejoy call it an act of pensioned zeal. But Mr. Lovejoy's speech is graceful and praiseworthy; and there is nothing to unusual in human speech as a public confession of error.

We do not remember that Mr. Lovejoy has been conspicuous in sharp criticisms upon "the Quaker General." If he has been, his resolution is all the more honorable to him. That there was a general desire that McClellan should fight is very true. That public confidence in him, even in this city, began to fade was also true. But throughout he has had the inestimable gift of silence. Though all the weary winter months in which he was so bitterly abused for not advancing, months in which men in Congress and out sneered and gibed at his miraculous faculty of staying in one place, he held his tongue triumphantly. For an American in his place at this time silence was greatness. What other man of us all, except Frémont, would not have written a letter, or made a speech, or authorized some friend to speak for us?

The question is not, and never has been, whether he were Napoleon, Hannibal, or Frederick the Great; whether if Alexander had been in Washington he would not have moved in December, or whether the Prince of Parma would not have cleared the Potomac. The question has always been perfectly simple—when and how can he best go to Richmond? Of that M'Clellan was the judge, and not a prejudiced newspaper correspondent at Willard's Hotel, nor a vehement partisan at the Capitol. Moreover he has always necessarily acted under this stringent condition, that he must not lose a battle. Other Generals might be beaten for a while, but his defeat lost Washington. Other Generals might move and retire, but M'Clellan could only march to assured victory.

And he has marched; and for the first time, in a private bulletin to his wife from his first victorious battle-field, he alludes quietly to the long abuse and doubt that have followed him, by saying that "the Quaker army" have done superbly. Events show that he has not been mistaken; that his estimate of the numbers and the strength of the enemy and their works has been correct. Every account declares that his coming turned the lingering day of Williamsburg into a brilliant victory. He came, he saw, he conquered—are almost the words of the reports. And at this moment the public confidence in him is entire, because he has persuaded every honest man in the country that he does not move until he is ready, and then moves resistlessly.

The week after the rebel flight from Yorktown reads like the Rich Mountain week of last spring. It blazes and rings with the light and the shouts of victory. And to complete his crown, it is Owen Lovejoy—politically the representative of his bitterest detractors, if not himself one—who rises in his place as a Representative and moves the sincere thanks of this House to Major-General George B. M'Clellan, for the display of those high military qualities which secure important results with but little sacrifice of human life.

And all the people say Amen!

MILITARY PARTISANSHIP.

SINCE there are so many lively and graphic correspondents at the various seats of war, it would be a good thing if they could inform us exactly what we are to believe. It is curious, but it is true, that you can always anticipate the tone in which the correspondents of the different papers will treat facts. If General M'Clellan does something or doesn't do any thing, there are papers which will express a sneer. If General Frémont does or doesn't, others will do the same. You are sure never to know quite the truth about one General in one paper, or about another General in another. We are all as desperate military, as we have been political, partisans.

This feeling inevitably colors the statements of fact, so that the future historian of the war will have many a sharp word over the clashing testimony of eye-witnesses. For instance, there was the late retreat of the rebels from Yorktown. All the M'Clellan papers celebrated the "bloodless victory." In Albany they fired a hundred guns over his "glorious success." He had driven the rebels, demoralized and disorganized, in a panic rout. He had struck the coup de grace of the rebellion. The anti-M'Clellan papers, on the other hand, "didn't see it." He had been outwitted again. The rebels never meant to stand at Yorktown. They had no serious works. They mounted Quaker cannon. "The balloon first informed General M'Clellan of the escape of the foe, and of the disappointment of his preparations."

These are general statements, but side by side with them are details of fact—so called. A M'Clellan journal, recording that a party had returned from Yorktown, adds: "The stores abandoned by the rebels, they say, were immense, and exhibit the most conclusive evidence of demoralization and confusion in the retreat." "Competent judges, who went carefully over the ground abandoned by the rebels near Yorktown," says an anti-M'Clellan journal of the same morning, "say that there are no signs that their retreat partook of the character of a rout. There were no signs of demoralization whatever....The retrograde movement has all the appearance of being well ordered, in obedience to a preconcerted plan."

The animus of such conflicting statements is evident enough.

THE WORDEN TESTIMONIAL.

NOBODY will deny that in this war the American Navy has sustained its old fame. When the rebel Commodore Barron, who was taken at Hatteras, heard at Fort Warren, where he is imprisoned, of the beautiful and brilliant victory at Port Royal, he jumped up, forgetting his treason in hearty pride and admiration of the service which had given his family name all its renown, and exclaimed: "I tell you nothing can stand against our navy!" The rebel Captain spoke truly. It was prophecy as well as history. Nothing has stood against it. Hatteras, Port Royal, Fort Henry, Roanoke, Island No. 10, and New Orleans are the witnesses.

But chief witness of all was the Monitor in her first fight with the Merrimac, for that marked an epoch in naval science and history. The battle itself resulted in defeating the only really formidable weapon the rebellion has brought against us. It saved more than can be computed. It was the single service of the war which stands pre-eminent among all the glorious successes, and it deserves—every loyal man feels it—the heartiest and amplest national recognition.

When General Grant took Fort Donelson he was properly made a Major-General; when Burnside captured Newbern he justly received the same honor; when Siegel and Curtis conquered at Pea Ridge they earned the grade they won; when Mitchell occupied Huntsville the President spoke for the grateful nation in nominating him also a Major-General. These were instances of splendid service promptly and honorably acknowledged and rewarded. Each sent a thrill of satisfaction to every sympathizing and admiring spectator. Surely Dupont, and Foote, and Worden have not done less brilliantly or deserved less than their brothers of the army, and we all wonder why they have not been distinguished with similar rewards.

The difficulty is not the ingratitude of the people nor the reluctance of the President, but simply the rule of the service. But whatever the impediment it should be removed at once. New grades of rank to be conferred for signal service should be immediately established. But meanwhile something can be done to show the sincerity of national feeling.

Lieutenant Worden, the gallant Captain of the Monitor in her most famous and eventful moment, was sadly wounded. The blow virtually destroyed his sight and shattered his system. In the instant of his glorious victory he fell—happily not so fatally hurt as Nelson at Trafalgar, but hopelessly and permanently. A generous instinct seeks to offer him the homage of respect and gratitude which the law can not afford. Mr. Everett and other noted gentlemen have suggested a subscription to a fund to be presented to the hero upon whom so many hopes hung that day, and who did not disappoint them. The sum already subscribed is considerable, and as the facts are made known it will doubtless largely increase. Mr. W. H Aspinwall is the treasurer, and every man will see the peculiar propriety of this offering to an officer injured for life in serving us, and whom our imperfect laws can not honor by that superior rank with which his brother-soldiers are honored.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHEN Sir John Scott (afterward Lord Eldon) brought in a bill for restraining the liberty of the press, an Irish member moved the insertion of a clause providing that all anonymous works should have the names of the authors printed on the title-pages!

THE BITER BIT.—A lady having accidentally broken her smelling-bottle, her husband, who was very petulant, said to her, "I declare, my dear, every thing that belongs to you is more or less broken." "True," replied the lady, "for even you are a little cracked!"

In a large party one evening the conversation turned upon young men's allowance at college. Tom Sheridan lamented the ill-judging parsimony of many parents in that respect. "I am sure, Tom," said the father, "you need not complain; I always allowed you three hundred a year." "Yes, father, I must confess you allowed it, but then it was never paid."

A clever man, M——, who had run counter to the general opinions, pronounced himself strongly against a popular work. In all societies he was answered that the public had come to a very different conclusion from his. "The public!" he rejoined; "how many fools must you collect together to form a public?"

"What are those speckled birds?" inquired Mrs. Skinflint of a poulterer. "Guinea fowls, ma'am." "Keep 'em, then," murmured the lady, as she walked away, disgusted at such imposition; "you don't get my guineas for 'em, that's all!"

When Dean Goodenough preached before the peers a wag wrote:

"'Tis well enough that Goodenough
Before the lords should preach;
For sure enough they're bad enough
He undertakes to teach."

It is said that printed declarations, with blank forms, are to be used by young ladies who have lovers too modest to propose. The ladies themselves fill out the blanks, and, of course, no sensible man can refuse signing them.

A public writer thinks that much might be gained if speakers would observe the miller's creed—always to shut the gate when the grist is out.

This pleasant little word we notice in the Darmstadt newspaper—"Civildienerwittweninstitut," meaning Institution for Widows of Civil Service Officers.

LETTING THE CAT OUT OF THE BAG.—A little girl, the daughter of a baker, being asked in her class at a Sunday-school what bread was made of, answered at once, "Flour and alum, Sir!"

"Boy, why don't you go to school?" "'Cause, Sir, daddy is afeard that if I larns every thing now, I sha'n't have any thing to larn ven I comes to the 'cademy."

NEXT DOOR TO A FOOL.—"Mr. Brown," said a little boy to a gentleman who was calling on his father, "who is your next-door neighbor?" "Mr. Jones, my dear," replied the visitor. "Isn't he a very silly man, Sir?" asked the child. "No, my dear; Mr. Jones is a sensible man enough." "Oh, I don't think he is," persisted the boy, "for I heard mamma say to papa that you were next door to a fool!"

"I can bear," said a sufferer, "I can bear the squealing of a pig, the roaring of thunder, or the squall of ten thousand cats; but the voice of a dun is like the crack of doom; and when I hear a dun, I am done out and out."

DISADVANTAGES OF IGNORANCE.—A farmer recently received a very polite note from a neighbor, requesting the loan of an ass for a few days. Being unable to decipher his friend's hieroglyphics, and wishing to conceal his ignorance from the servant, the farmer hastily returned for answer, "Very well; tell your master I will wait upon him myself presently!"

TO CURE THE GOUT.—Accustom yourself to virtue and well-water.

CATCHING A TARTAR.—"Remember, Madam, that you are the weaker vessel," said an irate husband. "Exactly," said the lady; "but do not you forget that the weaker vessel may have the stronger spirit in it!"

"Sambo, whar you get dat watch you wear to meetin' last Sunday?" "How you know I hab watch?" "Bekase I seed de chain hang out de pocket in front." "Go 'way nigger! S'pose you see halter round my neck, you tink dar is horse inside ob me?"

A drunken fellow, at a late hour in the night, was sitting in the middle of the Place Vendôme. A friend of his happening to pass, recognized him, and said, "Well, and what do you do here? Why don't you go home?" The drunkard replied, "My good fellow, 'tis just what I want; but the place is all going round, and I'm waiting for my door to go by."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

ON Tuesday, May 6, in the Senate, a resolution calling for all the official reports relative to the battle at Pittsburg Landing was laid over. The Homestead bill was taken up, and passed by a vote of 33 to 7. The debate on the Confiscation bill was resumed; and finally the subject was referred to a select committee. The Finance Committee reported the Internal Tax bill, and it was ordered to be printed. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a bill was reported appropriating $2500 indemnity to the officers and crew of the Spanish bark Providencia, illegally detained by the blockading squadron. A bill to punish frauds on the Government by fine and imprisonment was referred to the Judiciary Committee. A resolution directing the steps to be taken for the impeachment of West H. Humphreys, Judge of the United States Courts for Tennessee, for high crimes and misdemeanors, was adopted. The Pacific Railroad bill was passed by a vote of 79 to 49. Mr. Segar was admitted a Member from the First District of Virginia, and took his seat. A resolution declaring F. W. Lowe not entitled to represent California was adopted. The Nebraska contested election was discussed till the adjournment.

On Wednesday, May 7, in the Senate, the House bill appropriating $30,000,000 for the support of the army for the year ending June 30, 1862, was reported by the Finance Committee, and after a brief discussion as to the number of men in the army laid aside. The House bill to provide increased revenue was passed. A resolution was adopted directing inquiry as to what legislation is necessary with reference to the vessels seized by the rebels at New Orleans and other ports, and recaptured. Senator Sumner offered a resolution for the expulsion of Senator Stark, of Oregon, who is charged with disloyalty, which was laid over. A bill for the relief of Captain Farragut, for advances made while in California, was passed. The House Committee appointed to impeach Judge Humphreys, of Tennessee, charged with high crimes and misdemeanors, appeared in the Senate and stated their business, but no action was taken on the subject. A bill regarding the number of generals in the army was debated; but no action taken. The select Committee on the Confiscation bill was announced, as follows: Messrs. Clark of New Hampshire, Collamer of Vermont, Harlan of Iowa, Cowan of Pennsylvania, Wilson of Massachusetts, Sherman of Ohio, Henderson of Missouri, and Willey of Virginia. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, a bill making Port Royal, South Carolina, a port of entry was passed, and Mr. Daily was confirmed in his seat as delegate from Nebraska.

On Thursday, May 8, in the Senate, the House bill appropriating $30,000,000 for the pay of the army for the year ending June 30, 1862, was passed. The House bill making Port Royal, South Carolina, a port of entry was also passed. Messrs. Foster, Doolittle, and Davis were appointed a select committee to which was referred the House resolution relative to the impeachment of Judge Humphreys, of Tennessee. The bill limiting the number of major and brigadier generals was passed. It limits the number of major-generals to 30, and of brigadiers to 200. Senator Sumner offered a resolution, which lies over, declaring that it is inexpedient to inscribe on the colors of regiments the victories won over our own citizens. The bill providing for the collection of taxes on lands in insurrectionary districts was explained by Senator Doolittle, and then laid aside. The bill relating to the selection of Jurors for the District of Columbia was passed. A bill to abolish the office of Marshal of the District of Columbia and establish that of Sheriff was introduced by Senator Hale. The bill providing for the education of colored children was taken up, and an amendment adopted, repealing the black code of the District of Columbia. The Senate then adjourned.——No business of general importance was transacted by the House. Mr. Lovejoy called up his bill to secure freedom to all persons within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government, to the end that freedom may remain forever the fundamental law of the land, and in all places whatsoever, so far as it lies within the power or depends upon the action of the Government of the United States to make it so. A motion to lay the bill on the table was negatived by a vote of 50 against 65.

On Friday, May 9, in the Senate, the resolution presented by Senator Sherman, calling for the reports of the officers commanding in the two battles of Pittsburg Landing, was taken up, and debated at considerable length. It was finally passed. The Select Committee on the Humphrey's impeachment case reported assurance that they would proceed with the case immediately. The bill for the education of colored children in the District of Columbia was passed, 28 to 7. After an executive session the Senate adjourned until Monday.——In the House, Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois, offered resolutions giving thanks to Almighty God for the recent successes of our arms against the rebels—expressing special satisfaction at the great triumphs of the Army of the Potomac, and tendering the sincere thanks of the House to General M'Clellan for the display of those high military qualities which secure important results with but little sacrifice of human life. The resolutions were unanimously adopted. Mr. Lovejoy offered a substitute modifying the bill introduced by him on Thursday, and acted upon, providing for freedom in the Territories. A motion to lay it on the table was disagreed to, 65 to 50. Mr. Lovejoy demanded the previous question, but the House refused to second the demand. Mr. Lovejoy then moved to recommit the bill, and a long debate then occurred on the merits of the negro question generally, in which a number of members took part. The House finally adjourned until Monday without taking a vote.

On Monday, May 12, in the Senate, the bill providing for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts was taken up, and passed by a vote of 32 against 3. The House resolution, that Congress adjourn on the 19th of May was then taken up, on motion of Senator Davis, of Kentucky, who moved to amend by fixing the 2d day of June as the time for the final adjournment; and in the course of his remarks said Congress had passed unconstitutional, iniquitous, and unwise measures, which he should counsel his people to resist by every mode of resistance they can devise. Senator Wilson pronounced the remark treasonable. Senator Davis explained that he meant nothing treasonable; and after some discussion the subject was dropped, and the resolution laid on the table. After an executive session the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the bill introduced by Mr. Lovejoy, abolishing slavery wherever the Federal Government has jurisdiction, was passed by a vote of eighty-five against fifty. The Senate bill empowering the Medical Inspector-General to discharge from service men physically disabled for duty was also passed. A Committee of conference on the Homestead bill was appointed. A bill defining and punishing treason was introduced and referred. The bill appropriating $6,000,000 for soldiers' bounties was passed. In case of the death of a person entitled to bounty it is to accrue to the widow, children, father, mother, brothers, or sisters of the deceased.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S ARMY.

General M'Clellan has pursued the enemy to a point within twenty-two miles of Richmond. The rebels were still in sight on Saturday at three o'clock, but were rapidly falling back. It was reported that they would make a stand at Bottom Bridge, on the Chickahominy River, fifteen miles from Richmond.

GUN-BOATS ASCENDING THE JAMES RIVER.

The Galena, Aroostook, and Port Royal, started up the James River on Thursday morning, at six o'clock, to cut off the river communication with the rebels on the Chickahominy. They had passed Day's Point before seven o'clock, and heavy firing was heard at that time.

PANIC IN VIRGINIA.

The advance of the iron-clad gun-boat Galena up the James River has created the utmost consternation in Petersburg. The fact that she had silenced the rebel batteries at Day's Point and was approaching Petersburg caused a complete panic there.

SKIRMISH NEAR FREDERICKSBURG.

The rebels made a sortie upon General M'Dowell's advance, near Fredericksburg, on the Bowling Green road, on Saturday afternoon (10th), driving the pickets toward the city. General Patrick at once threw forward his brigade, whereupon the enemy made no further demonstration. The Harris Light Cavalry provoked the attack from the rebels by making a dashing reconnoissance, in which they captured a lieutenant and ten privates of the rebel force.

NAVAL FIGHT IN THE MISSISSIPPI.

A dispatch, dated Cairo, May 11, says: The desperation of the rebel cause in the Mississippi culminated yesterday in an attack on the flotilla. Early on Saturday morning eight of their gun-boats came round the point above the fort and boldly attacked our fleet. The Cincinnati, which was stationed at the point where the rebels came up to on Friday, did not attract them until the fleet had passed above her. As soon as she was seen a simultaneous attack from the whole of their gun-boats was made upon her, with but little effect, as the guns were poorly aimed. The Cincinnati in the mean time had hauled into the stream, when an iron-clad ram supposed to be the Mallory, advanced in the face of the continued broadsides from the former until within forty yards, and, being a faster sailer, succeeded in mooring between the Cincinnati and their right hand, when men appeared upon her decks, preparing to board with grapnels thrown out, which design was frustrated by throwing hot water from the steam batteries of the Cincinnati. In the mean time the rest of our gun-boats had arrived on the scene of action and engaged the fleet. The Mallory, undaunted by her failure, crowded on a full head of steam and came toward the Cincinnati, evidently intending to run her down. Captain Stembel, in command of the latter, waited until the rebel monster was within twenty yards, when he sent a broadside into her from his Parrott guns, which did fearful execution. The two boats were so close together by this time that it was impossible for the gunners of the Cincinnati to swab out the guns, and it was only by bringing the steam batteries to bear upon her again that the Mallory was compelled to haul off. Captain Stembel shot her pilot with his revolver, and was himself wounded by a pistol-shot fired by the pilot's mate of the Mallory. While the engagement between the Mallory and the Cincinnati was in progress our shots exploded the boilers of one of the rebel gun-boats and set fire to another, burning her to the water's edge. The air was very heavy, and under cover of the dense smoke which hung over the river the rebel fleet retired, but were pursued until they gained shelter under the guns of Fort Wright. None of our boats were injured except the Cincinnati. The damage to her is so slight that she can be repaired in twenty-four hours. Four men were wounded on her, including the master's mate. No other casualties are mentioned. When the smoke cleared away a broadside from the flag-ship Benton was sent after the Mallory, and shortly after she was seen to careen, and went down with all on board.

GENERAL HALLECK'S ARMY.

The national forces now in the Southwest, and under the immediate command of Major-General Halleck, are divided into three corps d'armée—the Army of the Ohio, the Army of the Tennessee, and the Army of the Mississippi.

The Army of the Tennessee is divided into two grand divisions, commanded by Major-Generals Thomas and M'Clernand, and into divisions commanded by Major-General Lew Wallace, Brigadier-Generals Davis, T. W. Sherman, Hurlbut, M'Kean, and Crittenden.

The army of the Ohio is commanded in person by Major-General Buell, and the divisions commanded by Brigadier-Generals M'Cook, Nelson, Mitchell, and Woods.

The army of the Mississippi is commanded by General Pope in person, and its divisions commanded by Generals Paine, Stanley, and Hamilton.

The order of succession is arranged so that General Grant is second in command, that General being without any special command, his late army being distributed between Generals M'Clernand and Thomas.

THEIR MOVEMENTS.

General Buell's army has seized the portion of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad between Corinth and the Grand Junction, cutting off all communication between the two points.

On Friday the rebel General Bragg's division attacked General Paine's division, in position two miles beyond Farmington. A sharp engagement followed, our men fighting bravely, and making several bayonet charges on the enemy, who were repulsed with great slaughter. Large reinforcements of rebels having arrived, our troops returned to Farmington.

We lost nearly 200 in killed, wounded, and missing. No particulars are received.

THE BRIGAND MORGAN.

The rebel brigand, Morgan, with a force of about one thousand cavalry, attacked a small body of Union troops at Pulaski, Tennessee, on Friday last, and after a fight of two hours and a half, during which the rebels lost six killed and two wounded, and our troops lost two killed, three wounded, and one missing, the whole force was taken prisoners. The prisoners were released on parole, and are now in Nashville. The rebels outnumbered our forces four to one.

On Monday morning General Dumont, who had sent a strong body of cavalry in pursuit, found and attacked the united rebel cavalry under Morgan and Wood, at Lebanon, and utterly routed them, after killing a great number, capturing 150 prisoners and nearly all their horses and arms. The fight lasted an hour and a half, and the rebels fled, closely pursued by General Dumont.

BRINGING THE REBELS TO THEIR SENSES IN TENNESSEE.

Governor Johnson, of Tennessee, has issued a proclamation to the effect that, for every Union man captured or ill-treated by the rebel bands of marauders, five prominent rebels shall be made to suffer, and that ample remuneration shall be made to all loyalists who may be despoiled of their property out of the property of such parties as have given aid and comfort to the enemy.

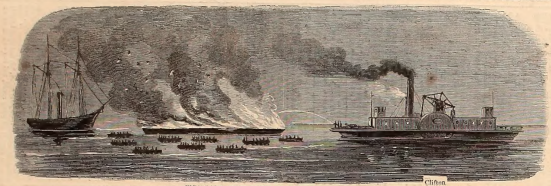
THE COTTON BURNERS.

The rebel Secretary of State, J. P. Benjamin, has addressed a letter in answer to an inquiry by a Southern firm whether cotton purchased on foreign account would be treated as exempted from the general law which declares that all cotton shall be destroyed when it is about to fall into the hands of the enemy, in which he says: "I know no law which prohibits the purchase of cotton on foreign account, but I am not aware of any law or reason of policy which should induce this Government to extend to property thus purchased greater protection than is extended to that of our own citizens. It is the settled determination of the Government to allow no cotton to fall into the hands of our enemies, as it is perfectly well known that they would seize and appropriate to themselves all cotton they could find without regard to ownership. If your correspondents buy cotton they must expect to share the same risks as are incurred by our own citizens."

FIRE AT TROY.

On Saturday afternoon a most destructive fire commenced in the city of Troy, originating in the covered wooden bridge across the Hudson. At the time the fire broke out the wind was blowing a furious gale from the west, and fire-brands from the bridge were carried over various parts of the city; and a large number of the most valuable buildings of the city, including the Union Railway Dépôt, were destroyed. The area over which the fire extended is said to cover about fifty acres. The loss of property has further been attended with a serious loss of life.—[See Illustration on page 334.]

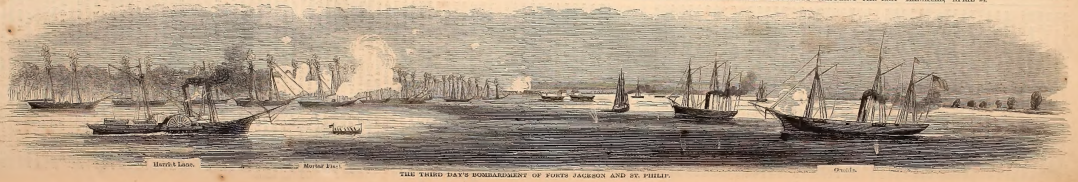
FOREIGN NEWS.



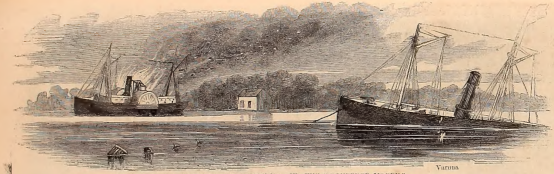
ENGLAND.

THE RECAPTURE OF THE "EMILIE ST. PIERRE."

THE recapture of the British ship Emilie St. Pierre from an American prize crew by her English captain, and her arrival in Liverpool, with the Federal seamen in irons, caused quite a sensation in the commercial world. The St. Pierre was from Calcutta, and was taken by the Union steamer James Adger, off Charleston. She was being navigated to Philadelphia by a prize crew, when her commander—a Scotchman—although having only four men at his disposal, disarmed, ironed, and confined in the hold sixteen of our men, took control of the vessel, and ran her to Liverpool—completing a romantic incident of the war in a fortunate manner both for himself and his employers.

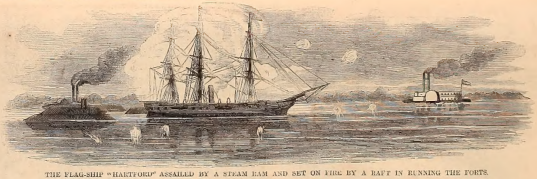


BOMBARDMENT OF THE REBEL FORTS JACKSON AND ST. PHILIP, APRIL 24, 1862.



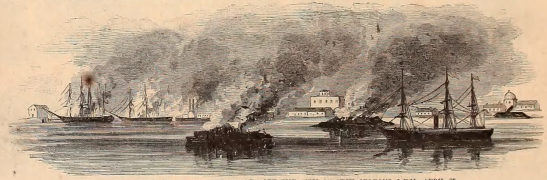
FIRE-RAFT SENT DOWN BY THE REBELS, APRIL 17.

THE UNITED STATES STEAMER "MISSISSIPPI" CRIPPLING THE RAM "MANASSAS," APRIL 24.



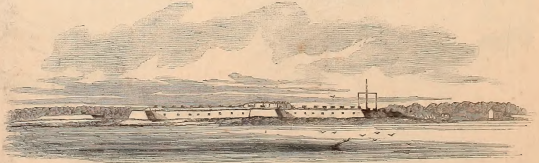
THE THIRD DAY'S BOMBARDMENT OF FORTS JACKSON AND ST. PHILIP.

Varuna

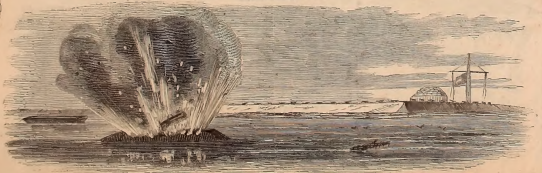


FIGHT BETWEEN THE "VARUNA" AND THE "GOVERNOR MOORE."

THE FLAG-SHIP "HARTFORD" ASSAILED BY A STEAM RAM AND SET ON FIRE BY A RAFT IN RUNNING THE FORTS.



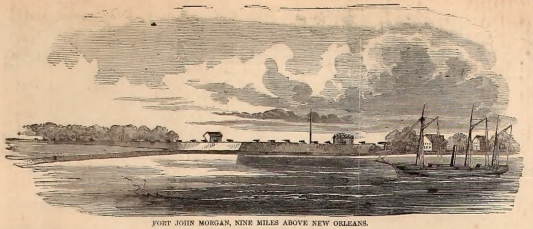
THE "HARTFORD" AND "BROOKLYN" SILENCING THE CHALMETTE BATTERIES.



ARRIVAL OF THE FLAG-SHIP "HARTFORD" OFF THE CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, 1 P.M., APRIL 25.

FORT ST. PHILIP.

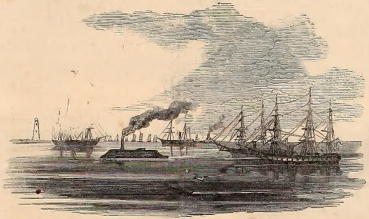
FORT JACKSON.



BLOWING UP THE STEAM BATTERY "LOUISIANA" AFTER THE SURRENDER.

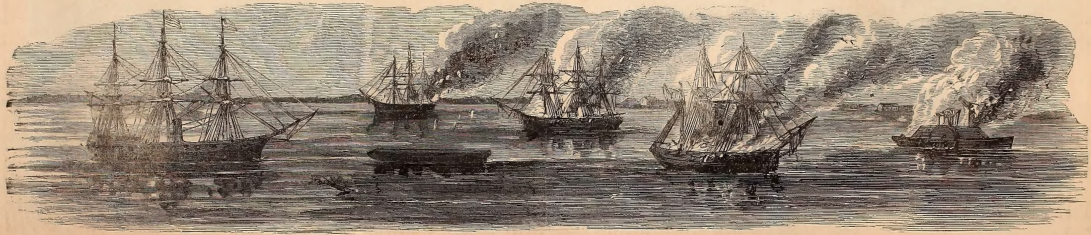
GENERAL BUTLER'S TROOPS COMING THROUGH THE BAYOU.

THE EXPEDITION AGAINST NEW ORLEANS.—Sketched by our Special Artist.—[See Page 327.]



FORT JOHN MORGAN, NINE MILES ABOVE NEW ORLEANS.

BATTERY OPPOSITE FORT JOHN MORGAN.



INTERIOR OF FORT ST. PHILIP.

THE SOUTHWEST-PASS BAR.

INTERIOR OF FORT JACKSON.

DESTRUCTION OF COTTON-LADEN VESSELS BY THE REBELS NEAR NEW ORLEANS, ON THE APPROACH OF THE "HARTFORD," ON APRIL 18, 1862.

WHEN GREEN LEAVES COME AGAIN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

When green leaves come again, my love,
When green leaves come again—
Why pain on such a cloudy face,
When green leaves come again?

"Ah, this spring will be like the last,
Of promise false and vain;
And summer will be winter's scorn
Ere green leaves come again.

"So slip the seasons—and our lives!
"Tis life is treacherous,
But yet I sigh, I scarce know why,
When green leaves come again.

Nay, lift up thankful eyes, my sweet!
Count yours the well gain;
Because, as long as the world lasts,
Green leaves will come again.

For, sure as earth lives under snows,
And Love lives unser pain,
The good is sure as very thing,
"When green leaves come again."

THE CAPTURE OF NEW ORLEANS.

THE arrival of our special artist with Commodore Farragut's squadron enables us to illustrate very fully on pages 324, 325, and 326, the splendid achievements of Commodore Farragut's fleet in the Mississippi, including THE CAPTURE OF NEW ORLEANS. The following extracts from our artist's letters will serve to explain the pictures.

The fleet started to attack Fort St. Philip and Jackson on 16th April. On 17th the rebels began to send down fire-rafts, one of which we illustrate. Our artist says:

A FIRE-RAFT.

I have just come from the deck, having witnessed one of the finest sights it has ever been my lot to see. The rebels sent down a cow, about one hundred feet long, filled with pine knots, saturated with tar, &c. The cow herself was found on shore, and, instead of being killed, was towed along with much like a prairie fire. Signal rockets were made for her the moment she was discovered, and about forty boats were manned and sent away, each provided with a grapnel and hawser. The vessels Cayuga, Kinsee and Katahdin worked around it, and fired one or two shells in it, but the Red Rover got up and ran her bow into it, and then played a powerful stream of water on it. For the boats they were commanded by and went alongside and boarded the fire-raft, and commenced hailing water into it, and in ten minutes had succeeded in putting it out. They then towed it ashore near where the one that came in the night before was moored. The object of our going on the rebels had small row-boats out watching the progress of their raft, and sent word to their forts that the ingenious rebels and our ship conjuncture. No amusement they could have had, as he could not have accomplished in our stead. The rebels in the forts were no fireraft, and so outraged had the fleet been by their attempt to send the vessel to destruction that they fired upon it all day. With their two fire-rafts the rebels have accomplished nothing, except to show us how to handle them.

THE BOMBARDMENT.

The bombardment began on 18th and lasted six days. The mortar vessels were grouped as shown in our picture.

They covered their mast-heads and rigging with green tree branches, and, while lying under the high bluff on the tier of the trees near the forts, their masts appeared as trees over the tops of the gunboats. The mortar vessels lay on the other side of the river covered their sides with the branches of trees, so that for their masts one could not tell there were any vessels there.

The artist says on 19th:

Our mortar vessels are working well, and I learn they are to do so even more so while you read this—enough at that estimate they must have thrown already about four thousand shells up to the forts. It is a most curious and tedious to hear nothing but bang, bang, bang, all day and all night without having a knowledge of the effect of our efforts.

The effect of the bombardment was thus described after the first day:

The work is terribly shattered, and the casemates are nearly broken in many places. Many guns are dismounted, entirely destroyed one. Only a few men have been killed as yet. We have nearly silenced the water battery, killed 9 Lieuten Colonelland, and knocked the carriage of another to pieces. Our fleet is uninjured except in rigging, and the least damage causes as much consternation that it requires the utmost efforts on the part of the officers to keep the men. Our shells, when they fall, bury themselves five feet below the surface before they explode, and then they explode, and make the whole fort fairly tremble with the shock. Our mortars are fired with such regularity that the rebels could not keep their batteries. There are about 1500 men in both forts, mostly Germans, but commanded by "gentle Southern blood."

THE FLEET RUNS THE FORTS.

On 24th Commodore Farragut determined to run past the forts. The fleet was formed in three divisions, and proceeded to attack as shown in our artist says:

At precisely twenty minutes of four o'clock the enemy opened fire from Fort St. Philip. At that moment I hoisted our flag—our Star-Spangled Banner at the fore—and then hastening forward, decked the fore and main each with an emblem of peace and safety. The white flag—the ensign were floating in a gentle breeze. Full speed was given to ship, the engineers and boilers being equal to it on we went, as it were, into the jaws of death. At the time the enemy opened fire the vessels were under way to attack, and the rapidity with which they threw shells at us was truly astonishing.

At five minutes of four o'clock our vessel was struck from the starboard quarter, a passenger, in the shape of a 68-inch shell, was seeking his berth in the ward-room, by the way, which we were to attend to. In a few minutes more we were broadside and broadside with the enemy, guns were replying as fast as they could. Broadside after broadside was being delivered to them in rapid succession, while the mortar vessels were adding to the dreadful noise.

Shot, shell, grape, and canister filled the air with deadly missiles. As we drew on the enemy's fire was terrific—truth—tear—whirl! Such another scene was never witnessed by mortal. Shells were bursting around us. Over head, the fore rigging rifle-shot and shell, 32-pound shot, 68-pound shell, and 10-inch shell, all did their work to this vessel. At times, all 13 mortars and the floating battery Louisiana were firing at once, and the noise was enough to make a hell-diver grow pale with confusion. Not satisfied with their firing, fire-rafts were sent down to us, and set adrift to do their work of burning. The Ram was busy at work trying to drive them under the lee of our vessels.

As we drew near abeam of the forts we intermingled grape with shell, which had the effect to silence in a measure the barbette guns. The shot from the enemy, when the same line had gone over our heads, was truly fearful.

Then in the port mizzen rigging the Flag-officer narrowly escaped being hit with a rifle shell. A shell burst on deck, and the command fell upon the gallant Lieutenant Master, of our Marine corps, so that for a time his life was despaired of. I started to go forward to see how things were working, when the wind of a huge 68-pound shell knocked the cap off my head. It was a time of terror. Our guns were firing as rapidly as possible, and the howitzers in the tops were doing excellent execution.

The rebel steamers were crowded with troops, who fired volleys of rifle balls at us, most of which did us no harm. One of them came near us, and I think we made no saying she contained two hundred men. Our howitzers opened on them, and Captain Browne, of the Marine corps, opened into her with two nine-inch guns.

I do not think the rebels liked that, and that fellow was done for. Our steamers were not to be stopped by no means did they come in sight of our gunners than they were sunk. Our broadside was a terrible one, and told with terrible effect.

In the midst of this awful scene down came a tremendous fire-raft, and the Ram dived her under our port quarter. The Ram struck her, and she blew up with a loud report. It seemed we must fall a prey to the ravages of fire. A fire was also made for the stern of the Ram. The fire was on hand, and we soon subdued the flames, and gave the Ram a clear field. Still, although we had escaped by their support, when they found it was of no use, I think they would have sunk us, and the armory all knocked to pieces. Our vessel was struck 68 times. If you can, it is more than I can describe as I would wish to.

THE ARTIST AT "MANASSAS."

The artist writes:

We steamed up to the Quarantine, when lo! the Ram steamer was approaching, and quickly fired at two vessels. The Mississippi being near at hand, about ship for the attack, and, as we passed, delivered a fire as we passed them down. The Ram ran, but finding the Mississippi gaining on him, he ran ashore, set fire to everything, and immediately about thirty men came up out of the hatchways and ran on shore. The Ram's crew were in the most broadside into her and boarded her, but finding she was to be easily overpowered, they left her, and the Ram blew down the river sinking very fast.

THE CAPTURE.

Captain Boggs of the Mortar Flotilla thus describes her last end:

Before the fleet got out of sight it was reported to me that the unfortunate Manassas, commanded by a gallant officer, had been run up the river, and, as I supposed, destroyed. I immediately got under way, and, on approaching the vicinity of the Quarantine Station, discovered the Manassas moving about, about ship for the attack, and, as we passed, delivered a fire as we passed them down. The Ram ran, but finding the Mississippi gaining on him, he ran ashore, set fire to everything, and immediately about thirty men came up out of the hatchways and ran on shore. The Ram's crew were in the most broadside into her and boarded her, but finding she was to be easily overpowered by them, they left her, and the Ram blew down the river sinking very fast.

THE CAPTURE OF THE MORTAR FLOTILLA.

Before the fleet got out of sight it was reported to me that the unfortunate Manassas, commanded by a gallant officer, had been run up the river, and, as I supposed, destroyed. I immediately got under way, and, on approaching the vicinity of the Quarantine Station, discovered the Manassas moving about, about ship for the attack, and, as we passed, delivered a fire as we passed them down. The Ram ran, but finding the Mississippi gaining on him, he ran ashore, set fire to everything, and immediately about thirty men came up out of the hatchways and ran on shore. The Ram's crew were in the most broadside into her and boarded her, but finding she was to be easily overpowered by them, they left her, and the Ram blew down the river sinking very fast.

THE ARTIST WRITES:

We steamed up to the Quarantine, when lo! the Ram steamer was approaching, and quickly fired at two vessels. The Mississippi being near at hand, about ship for the attack, and, as we passed, delivered a fire as we passed them down. The Ram ran, but finding the Mississippi gaining on him, he ran ashore, set fire to everything, and immediately about thirty men came up out of the hatchways and ran on shore. The Ram's crew were in the most broadside into her and boarded her, but finding she was to be easily overpowered by them, they left her, and the Ram blew down the river sinking very fast.

THE "VARUNA."

The gun-boat Varuna smashed the Cumberland in Hampton Roads on 9th March.

Captain Boggs of the Varuna, finding that a steamer came down upon him, ordered the men to the guns, cut away such as could not be fired, and then, apparently steaming directly at the enemy, struck her a terrific blow, and almost simultaneously fired his starboard battery. Two of our steamers had come up, and were firing rapidly at the Ram. The enemy's armored craft then came down upon the Varuna, and ordered the vessels to save their ships. She was beginning to fill rapidly, and the order was given that every man should be on fire and sinking. Her pipes were all twisted and riddled with shot, and her steam was also well shot up. She had evidently been used up by the squadron as they passed by. [SEE PAGE 326.] Her men left her quietly, and with great difficulty that the naval officers reached the City Hall. Here the Mayor, with the Governor and Lieutenant Lovell were awaiting the arrival of our commissioners.

The officer of the Varuna was the bearer of a message to Lovell from Commodore Farragut, and, as he entered the room, he assumed them of the protection of the "old flag." The fact being established, as the civil authorities could not do nothing; but Major-General Lovell, with all the composure for which he is noted, said that the city could make, and, "Sir, I will never surrender the city—I will be pulled down first." And the city was to be defended, as much as we regretted the wanton destruction of property, we could not but admire the spirited but useless demonstration against us. After some talk Lovell agreed to evacuate the city by the 1st of May, with his fifteen thousand, and turn the city over to the civil authorities, which was done on the 25th of April. The interview was carried on with dispatch, and Captain Bailey was soon on board his ship. The Ram was then ordered to be destroyed, and she was. The noise by the explosion was heard in their forts, and all manner of indignation showed to them. The Mayor, Monsieur Monroe, and Acting Master Morton—was the recipient of all manner of insult, but yielded to the inevitable.

After dark I went on deck to see New Orleans by gaslight. The appearance was fine. The levee for twelve months ago miles of shipping lined the levee; the bulks of the vessels, their masts and rigging looked dark, while bearing the banners of all nations of the world. Now were there now. The vessels were all gone, and on the clear song of the sons of Africa, who worked at night, was not to be heard. The silence about the levee was awful, and began to sad from the cries on the banks of the great river. The sounds of the voices of the negroes as they sang their negro melodies were borne along the river, and the effect was fine. The sounds were wafted to us from the shore, and the voices of the negroes were wrapped in a sweet melody, so that it was a city elated to the rich and the poor.

THE BATTERIES OF THE RIVER.

There were 15 batteries in all:

At three o'clock the four heavy vessels—Hartford, Brooklyn, Richmond, and Pensacola—got under way and proceeded up the river, and soon engaged the rebel batteries located just above Carrollton. As we passed along the levee we could see the rebels in full retreat, and the fires of their burning property.

At Jefferson City we saw the ways from which the rain Mississippi was launched, and also the large machine building ways for the construction of another; but now the ways and machine shops were deserted, and the rebel ironsmiths had fled.

The artillery at Carrollton we began to look out for the batteries; but it was not until we had passed some three miles above that we found them. They were deserted, and fires burning along the line of earth-works.

The ship dropped down slowly, and Lieutenant Keats, Engineer Purdy, and myself went on shore to reconnoitre the batteries. We found the batteries covered of people gathered around us, but made little or no demonstration against us. Lieutenant Keats, of the Marine corps, commanded the Morgan, and this it was ordered to prevent the approach of boats by the river from the northward.

It was an extended field-work, reaching from the river, along, as we thought, the Jackson Railroad. The work was well constructed, and we traveled along its line for about two miles, and found the following armament in all that is:

In the Work near the river.	Along the line.
Nine 42-pounders.	Nine 24-pounder carronades.
Two 32-pounders.	Four 18-pounders.

Five guns were dismounted, and platforms and circles for thirteen guns, not mounted, were found. The mounted guns were all of the heaviest description of 42 inches, with Mr. Purdy sighted. A fire had been kindled under the gun-carriages, and they were nearly destroyed at the time we visited it.

The magazine was empty, of course. A good hot shot furnace was undisturbed, and within it a round of 32-pounder shot lay around, intermingled with broken stands of grape. Racks of a hasty retreat were plainly visible, and we were informed that when we attacked the Chalmette batteries below the city, the troops which were located in Fort John Morgan were transferred to the former place, and after their defeat below made their way to carried away their remaining stores, took the Jackson Railroad, and left.

Of the battery on the other side of the river I have not yet learned any particulars. A boat from the Oneida was there and spiked the guns, and then left. Dark coming on we dropped down the river quietly to anchor and secure for the night.

THE SURRENDER OF THE FORTS.

Meanwhile General Butler had pushed his men through the town and landed them above Fort St. Philip and Jackson. The commanders of these forts wished to resist still, but their men refused to fight, and they spiked their heavy guns on their officers. They surrendered accordingly, and the steamer Star of the West came down and up the Louisiana Captain Porter put him in double irons.

NORFOLK REPOSSESSED.

We publish on page 321 several pictures illustrating the full restoration of our ancient Norfolk and its "reposession" by General Wool; and on page 322 a portrait of the City, showing the Navy Yard, etc. The former page is from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis.

The first movement for the expedition against Norfolk was mainly planned by General Lincoln and Mr. Stanton. General Wool embarked his troops on the evening of 16th, landed on 19th at Willoughby Point, and marched to Norfolk without obstruction. Our artist writes:

HALF-WAY CROSS-ROADS.

At seven o'clock General Wool, accompanied by General Mansfield, Lieutenant Mansfield and myself, left Camp View, and they were soon on the way to the front, the remainder following in the rear.

Upon the arrival of the party at the Half-way Cross-roads they were informed that the enemy had been driven by the shell road to Norfolk, the same distance from that point.

The rebels had destroyed the bridges between this and the one often seen, a greater portion of the plans being sketched from the steeples of the yellow city, which we hoped ere night to have seen. Under these trees were grouped, in the most picturesque style, the soldiers of Virginia.

As General Wool and others drew rein General Wyer came cantering down the road, and reported that the fort had been taken prisoners. From them he learned that the enemy had left the fort at about one o'clock that day, which had been evacuated by reason of our shelling of the eight pieces of artillery, which we had been able to get around wounded. I asked them what all the smoke was for, and they said that the enemy had set fire to the navy and spiff ten when they bore, and it just cut every thing in a blaze. It was a fine sight to see, and then we all ran away." Canada, that

THE FLAG OF TRUCE.

As they approached the city they were met by the Mayor. Mr. Davis says:

The most picturesque overtone of the city, and in front of a group of low wooden houses, we saw a white flag being waved. This proved to be the flag of truce of the Mayor of citizens, composed of the Mayor and a portion of the Common Council of the city. They had come out to see what terms would be demanded, and to present a letter from the Mayor. They, the gentlemen, were told by him that, being unable to retain possession of the place, he had surrendered it to the forces of the United States Government. They in turn, on being informed of the terms, said that the Common Council of the city were ready to place the city under the control of the United States Government.

The scene in the little room in which the parties first met was unique in the extreme. The officers were there—Generals Wool and Mansfield and Lieutenant Mansfield. Features were familiarly disguised with the pulverized dust of the road, and the Mayor, Monsieur Monroe, Monsieur Lebon, the Councilmen stubbornly so; the proprietor of the family "sans dinde" in the adjoining house said quit in his shirt.

ENTERING THE CITY.

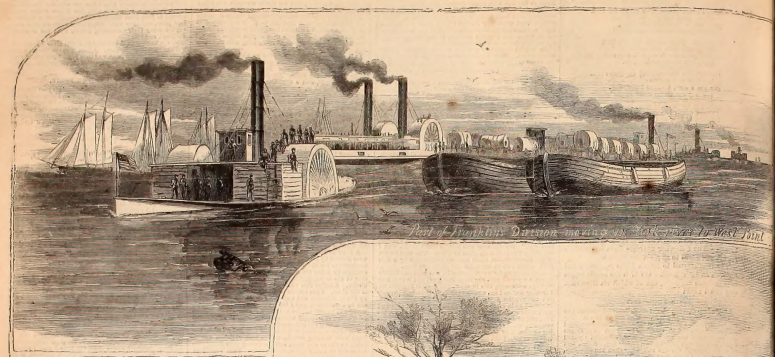
The correspondents of the press had gone before the troops, and the first article of the subjoined is from the pen of Harper's Weekly, and the correspondents of the New York Herald:

As we entered the city rife smoke of the burning Navy-Yard was ascending, and we came to a halt while the troops did wrath, and but on the crash of treason with which the air was filled. Commodore Forrest, who was in charge of the yard, was in command, and he was seen on the rebel steamer Yorktown, which was lying at the wharf, and which was soon to be destroyed, and that the people were to have more privileges than they had ever had before. The Navy-Yard and most of the building were rescued in an instant, and the party, with the Mayor and Common Council, proceeded slowly to the City Hall.

HOISTING THE STARS AND STRIPES.

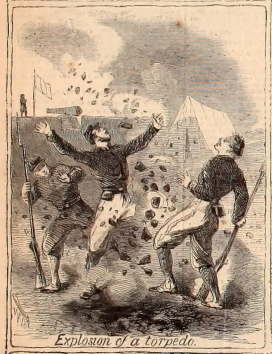
The Stars and Stripes were raised over the Custom-house at 10h, 45 m. on the morning of the 9th, and at 11 o'clock New York. They were rising to the breeze by Lieutenant Weaver, of the Minnesota, in the presence of

THE NAVY-YARD DESTROYED.



The Richmond Examiner of the 10th says that to Portsmouth as they the tremendous fire that burning the Navy-Yard. The fire was communicated to the Pennsylvania, the Bay line of steamers, was in flames. The gun-boats were also destroyed. The Merrimac, it appears, was destroyed, as was the Brandywine, United States, and others—however we know the vessels in all. The Germantown was safely destroyed, with all its appurtenances. The dry dock, which is 1000 feet long, was blown up. The city is now more quiet, I am told, than it has been for some time.

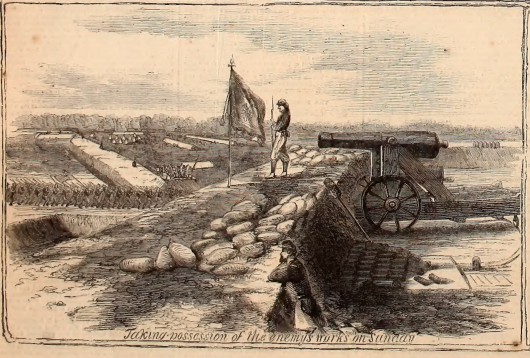
COMMODORE GOLDSBOROUGH.



Flag-officer Goldsborough, whose fine portrait we give on page 325, was born in the District of Columbia in 1805, and entered the State of Navy Department as midshipman in the United States Navy from the District of Columbia.

His first cruise was in the Mediterranean, and he subsequently was constantly at sea for many years in the United States Navy, and was promoted from grade to grade in the various grades of the naval service. Among others, he commanded the Porpoise on the coast in 1842, at the time she was attached to the squadron of Commodore Ridgely and Morris at Brazil. In 1847 he commanded the Ohio, 74 guns, and afterward commanded the Cumberland, 44 guns, and the Levant, 18 guns, at the time those vessels were attached to the squadron of Commodore Silas H. Stringham, in the Mediterranean.

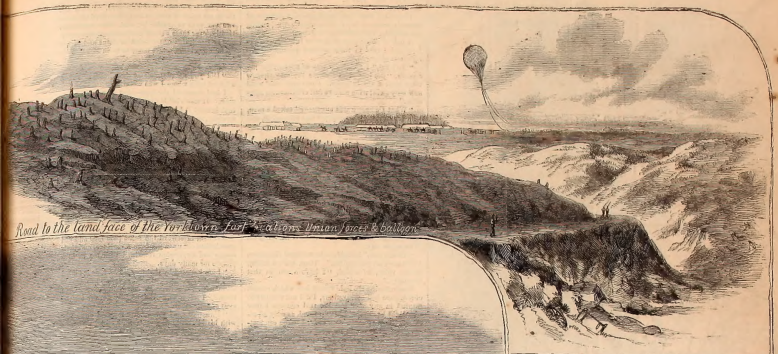
The date of his present commission is September 14, 1855. He has commanded the United States frigate Congress, four of the gallant line-of-battle ships of the squadron of the Atlantic Blockading Squadron, superintended the Philadelphia Navy-Yard, and was formerly Chief of Bureau. His flag-ship was the Minnesota, and his station for some time was Fortress Monroe.



Part of Franklin's Division moving on York river to West Point.

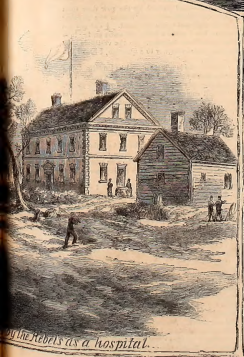
Explosion of a torpedo.

Pursuit of th



Taking possession of the enemy's works on Sunday.

The Nelson mansion Yorktown



SCENES AND VIEWS AT AND AROUND YORKTOWN

Road to the land face of the Yorktown fort – Fortress Monroe in the background.

Magazine at the head of the ravine Yorktown

...the Rebels as a hospital.

Fortifications at Yorktown looking toward the river.

VIRGINIA.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 331.]

ONLY ONE KILLED.

"Five killed and three wounded."

"That all?" said I. "Hardly worth the cost of a telegram."

There had been a reconnoissance, a surprise of enemy's scouts, a brief, sharp engagement, ending successfully, and casualties as above.

A pair of sober gray eyes were turned upon my face, and I read in them a silent rebuke for this lightness of speech.

"And yet," I added, by way of apology for my remark, "the loss of this single life may shadow more than a single home. Cups that hold until now only sweet wine may be full of bitterness hereafter."

"What Company was engaged?" asked a man, who sat near. The newspaper was referred to, and the answer given.

"Company C."

"Colonel B——'s regiment?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Are the names of the killed and wounded given?"

I noticed a slight unsteadiness in the man's voice.

"No names are given."

"May I see your paper for a moment?"

I handed him the newspaper, in which I had read about the reconnoissance, and what seemed, at the moment, a casualty not worth reporting. I saw that his hand trembled a little, and that his eyes searched through the sentences of the telegram in an eager way.

"Thank you," he said, as he returned the paper, "there are no particulars." Then, with a falling of the voice, he added, "I have a son in that Company."

Remembering the light speech into which a want of reflection had betrayed me, I did not venture to respond in any way but the real concern I now felt might be regarded, if expressed, as only a pretense. Soon after the man nodded to the conductor of the car in which we were riding; the checkstring was pulled, the car stopped, and he went out. My eye followed him as the car moved on until I saw him enter a house. Two days afterward—I had forgotten the chilling matter of one killed and three wounded—in passing this house I saw crape on the door. My heart leaped with a painful throb.

"Who is dead in the third house below?" I asked of the store-keeper at the corner.

"Mr. B——'s son. He was killed."

"In the war?"

"Yes, Sir. News came, three days ago, that one man had been killed in a reconnoissance, and it turned out to be his son, Edward. Ah! Sir, he was a splendid young man, and it will go hard with his father and mother. And hard, too," he added, heaving a sigh, "for one besides them."

"Had he a wife?" I inquired.

"No, Sir; he was not married."

"A sweet-heart?"

"Yes. He was engaged, I believe."

Only one killed! How differently the fact impressed me now! It was no longer an unrealized newspaper announcement, but a present, stern reality.

"Has the body arrived?" I asked.

"No. A sad passed through the heart, killing him instantly."

"Had Mr. B—— other sons?"

"No, Sir. Edward was his only boy. It is a great loss, Sir."

"How does he bear it? Have you heard?"

"I saw him an hour ago."

"Well?"

"He was very calm; but, Sir, he looked ten years older. Mr. B—— is one of those men who bear things patiently; but he has deep feeling nevertheless. That boy was his idol."

"How is it with the mother?"

The store-keeper shook his head. "I asked Mr. B—— but his eyes filled, and he choked in trying to answer. I'm almost afraid it will be too much for her. She is not very strong."

"Did they oppose his going to the war?"

"Mr. B—— was out. He's an earnest man, and loves his country too well to hold back any thing while she is in danger."

Only one killed! How insignificant the fact seemed when the telegraph made this announcement; but what bitterness had followed! Only one killed!

On the day following I noticed, in passing, a large funeral procession. Of the tens of thousands who had lingered scarcely a moment over the brief telegram announcing but one killed and three wounded had the imagination of an individual pictured distinctly a solemn scene like this as following in natural sequence, or given the faintest reflection of the sorrow and suffering that lay veiled behind.

Fifty killed and two or three hundred wounded! Ah! now the pulses beat. Here is something worth while! How strangely this familiarity with war ices over the heart! One, two, three hundred killed or mangled. It is awful to contemplate; and yet we must come down to the single cases to get at the heart of this fearful matter. Away from every battle-field, from every skirmishing ground, heart-cords stretch, in single lines, to as many hearts and homes as there are individuals, undimmed, or wounding, thrill these sympathetic lines, each with its own wild fear and anguish.

That is! Mr. B—— His son was killed in a skirmish with the enemy. He belonged to Company C."

"Oh, in that slight affair! I had forgotten it. There was only the trifle of one killed, I think."

"And that was Mr. B——'s son."

Mr. B—— was leaving the car in which we were riding. He was so changed that I had not recognized him as the individual in whose presence I spoke so lightly about one killed and three wounded only a few weeks before.

"Sad, isn't it?" said the other, growing serious.

"Very sad. I'm told the mother hasn't left her room since the terrible news was communicated. He was an only son."

"That is trouble," was answered. "How little do we think of what is really involved when we run our eyes so carelessly, and often half-impatiently, over these almost daily announcements of one or two killed or wounded in scout and picket skirmishing! It comes home to us in Mr. B——'s case."

A few weeks later.

"Did you see that face at the window?" asked a friend with whom I was walking.

I had observed the face—that of a young woman. It was visible for only an instant; but in that instant it had impressed me strongly, it was so white, so ghostly, so full of sadness and suffering.

"Yes, I saw it."

"There has been something more than bodily sickness," said the friend.

"Heart sickness. Pain that defies the leech's skill."

"It always touches me to see a face like that," remarked my companion. "Heart-blight in one so young—ah, it is sad, sad! How quickly the tender leaves shrink and fade when frost drops down on a spring blossom! Its life is drawn from the sunshine, and fails when the icy winds pass over. In later years we have more endurance. The heart is stronger to bear."

Not long afterward the same pale face and sad eyes looked out upon me from a carriage, and their images and expression remained with me as in a picture for many days.

"I am haunted by that face," said I, as it glided past me on the street, the eyes resting in mine for an instant. Was there not something of rebuke in them? I felt it so. And yet they were to me the eyes of a stranger.

"Unhappy one! sorrow has touched you early with his blighting fingers." So I spoke with myself as I walked on musing. "Has love failed, or the shadow of death fallen over the threshold of one dearer than life? Ah, is there not in the experience of one soul, tried in the fire as thou assuredly hast been, pain enough to make our hearts shiver in the bare imagination? First the stunning shock of a fearful calamity; then the awakening to pain as life begins to stir in the bruised and broken fibres and organs, in the quivering nerves and lacerated tissues; then the almost equally-balanced contest between life and death; and then the long period of slow recuperation, with its anguish of aching wounds, its helplessness, its despondency, its darkness. Ah! what a history is written in a face like thine, pale, suffering stranger! How little of all this is imagined by the passing crowd!

Next I saw that face in church. It was still pale and sad, and bore a look of exhaustion, as from long-endured pain. But now there was in it a softer expression—a touch of resignation blending with pious hope.

"The Strong hath strengthened her;" so I said in my thought. "The burden was too heavy for her own soul, and she hath laid it upon Him. Her refuge is with the Comforter."

Often during the services my eyes turned involuntarily toward the young lady, who had awakened in me an interest little short of fascination. No more devout worshiper sat under the preacher's ministrations. She impressed me as one who had turned hopelessly from earth, and now rested all with Heaven.

As I moved down one of the aisles, after the benediction had been pronounced, the slightly-bowed form of Mr. B—— met my observation. He was alone. My thought went instantly to his wife sorrowing for her dead son.

"This may have indeed proved too heavy a burden," so I thought. "What a fearful weight to lay upon a mother's heart!"

"What!" I ejaculated, speaking half-aloud, as a new conviction flashed across my mind, "did that arrow strike there also?"

Mr. B—— had passed by the pew door from which the pale-faced young woman was stepping into the aisle and taken her hand. I did not see his face, but I noted a faint, sad smile on her lips. They passed out together. In the vestibule they lingered, and, in answer to a question, I heard Mr. B—— say,

"I think she is a little more like herself. Come and see her, won't you? It will do you both good."

Tears sprung to her eyes. My own were filling. "I will come." I saw her lips quiver, as she thus answered, and then turned almost hastily away.

"Poor Alice!" said a voice near me.

"Doesn't it make you sad to see her?" was the response.

"Sad enough," answered the first speaker.

"They had been for some time engaged, and were to be married as soon as the war was over."

"Her friends feared a while for her reason."

"Yes, and then for her life. But she is steadily regaining strength of body and mind. I was glad to see her in church to-day. She was always pure and good, and God will comfort and sustain her."

"Mr. B—— was in church also."

"Yes. Poor man! He really looks broken."

"They say that Edward's mother has scarcely been out of her room since the dreadful news came. Oh, I have pitied her so much!"

The speakers passed on, and I heard no more.

"Only one killed! Hardly worth the cost of a telegram!"

It seemed as if some reasoning spirit had thrown these words into my mind. I was shocked, and sensible of a creeping shudder along my nerves.

Then my mind was crowded with a myriad multiplication of the sorrow and pain which had followed that one death. A year, almost, of war, with hundreds of thousands in battle-array, and killing and wounding a thing of daily occurrence—alas! alas! What imagination can reach the fearful aggregate of woe?

When peace comes—when the hydra-head of treason lies crushed at the nation's feet—shall we gaze the awful crime of those who, for selfish and wicked ends, turned our fertile fields into battle-grounds and cemeteries, and desolated our homes, on a light thing? Shall we give the fraternal hand, and offer the kiss of reconciliation, as though all were an innocent mistake or peccadillo? By the suffering and sorrow that remains unassuaged, no! Not revenge, not hate, not unforgiveness, no; not these for a Christian people; but a stern and abiding remembrance of the spirit that prompted all the evils we have endured, and a never-ceasing condemnation of all who favored it in word or deed.

GENERAL HANCOCK'S CHARGE AT WILLIAMSBURG.

We illustrate on page 332 THE SPLENDID BAYONET CHARGE OF GENERAL HANCOCK'S BRIGADE at the battle of Williamsburg, and GENERAL HOOKER'S DIVISION IN THE SAME BATTLE; on page 333 we publish a portrait of GENERAL HANCOCK. On this page we publish a MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR IN VIRGINIA, showing the country which intervenes between Richmond and Yorktown. We think we may say that our Map contains every town, road, river, creek, and considerable village in the section of country where General McClellan is operating, and where the last act of the drama of Rebellion will be performed. General Hancock's charge is thus described in the Herald correspondence:

The rebel general had seen our weakness, and sent a force of four thousand infantry and a regiment of cavalry to attack us in the rear. As soon as they appeared in sight, General Hancock ordered the artillery to retreat, and prepared to give them a proper reception.

Waiting till the enemy had approached within two hundred yards, he placed himself at the head of his column, and, taking off his cap, turned to his men and said to them, in only General Hancock can say it, "Gentlemen, charge!" and with a yell they rushed upon the enemy, scattering them in every direction.

This was probably the most brilliant charge made during the day. A great number of the enemy were killed and wounded upon the field, while our loss was very small.

Our regiments all did nobly, but none of them more so than the Fifth Wisconsin and Forty-third New York. Colonel Cobb and Major Lowber, of the Fifth Wisconsin, and Colonels Vinton and Pearson, of the Forty-third New York, are deserving of especial praise. The charge made by General Hancock saved us the day yesterday, in all probability.* By the time our reinforcements had arrived General Hancock had driven the enemy from the field.

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S ARMY.

We publish on pages 328 and 329 a number of pictures illustrating the retreat of the rebels from Yorktown and the pursuit by General McClellan; all from sketches by our artist, MR. A. R. WAUD. He writes us as follows of these sketches:

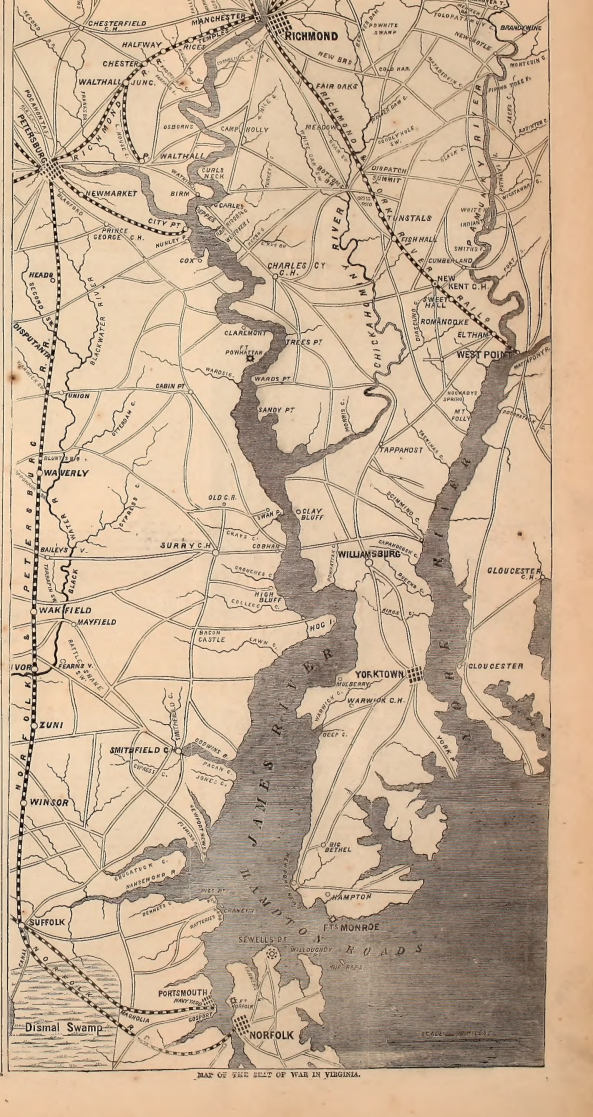
ROAD TO THE LAND FACE OF THE YORKTOWN FORTIFICATIONS.

This road leads through a desolate ravine, where the trees which formerly graced the sides have been cut down and burned, leaving black trunks and stumps upon the arid soil. An occasional dead horse, a caisson, a limber-box, and a dreadful stench mark the principal line of communication between the main works and the Warwick River defenses. In the distance is Love's balloon, taken to Yorktown early Sunday morning, to discover, if possible, the line of retreat of the recession army.

THE OLD NELSON HOUSE, YORKTOWN.

This is the largest house in Yorktown, and takes its name from its former occupant, Judge Nelson. It is of course in a filthy condition, as indeed is the whole town and its neighborhood except a portion of the fortifications, which are clean and very perfect. Cornwallis made this house his head-quarters, and for some time the patriot army refrained from firing in it, as it was the property of Governor Nelson, who had already sacrificed the rest of his property to the cause. When he heard of this he at once went to the trenches, and insisted that his dwelling should not be spared, training a gun on it, and firing the first shot himself. A dot between the two upper windows marks the place on the opposite side of the house which the ball hit.

REBEL MAGAZINE.



The river front of the fortifications is intersected by several deep ravines, used as covered ways between the works, and as shelter for the barracks and tents of the soldiers. They smell badly enough, making those who inadvertently wander there to hurry off again as quickly as possible. The magazine at the head of this hollow gives it a tomb-like appearance. What ammunition, if any, there may be in it will be found when it is certain there are no torpedoes in the way.

EXPLOSION OF A TORPEDO.

These vile arrangements of the enemy are shells placed under the surface, with a wafer and fuse just reaching the surface. Stepping on the wafer produces concussion enough to explode ..... sufficient to cause the destruction of the unfortunate who treads on it. These are said to have been constructed purposely by G. W. Rains, at the Fayetteville Arsenal, and were placed about the works by his brother, General Gabriel J. Rains. One of them was placed in a large pitcher in the hospital, with a string tied to the table, that would cause its explosion on lifting the pitcher. This was discovered by some one lifting a piece of oil-cloth laid on the top of the pitcher to hide the contents.

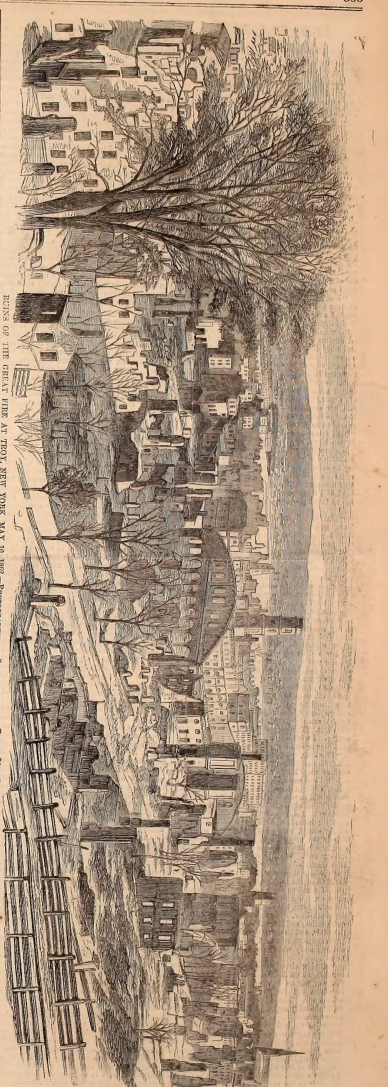
FORTIFICATIONS OF YORKTOWN, LOOKING TOWARD THE RIVER.

The scene from this point is very striking. On the top of the bluffs well-built turfed batteries command the water side. Following the beach we come to the principal water-battery, while on the distant shore is Farinholt's house, close to which is the Federal Battery No. 1, of 100 and 200 pounder Parrotts. This battery, worked by the Connecticut boys, raised a dreadful alarm in the minds of the rebels, and did much to cause their Skedaddle.

MAP OF THE SEAT OF WAR IN VIRGINIA.

GENERAL HANCOCK'S BRIGADE CHARGING THE REBELS AT THE BATTLE OF WILLIAMSBURG.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 331.]

GENERAL HOOKER'S DIVISION ENGAGING THE ENEMY AT THE BATTLE OF WILLIAMSBURG.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 331.]



BRIGADIER-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT HANCOCK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY MORAN, OF PHILADELPHIA.]

GEN. WINFIELD S. HANCOCK.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT HANCOCK is a native of Pennsylvania, from which State he was appointed a cadet to West Point Military Academy in the year 1840. He graduated on the 30th of June, 1844, standing number eighteen in his class—in which was Simon Bolivar Buckner, the notorious rebel General of Fort Donelson fame. He was promoted to a brevet second lieutenancy in the Fourth United States infantry on the 1st of July, 1844; and on the 16th of June, 1846, received his commission of full second lieutenant in the same regiment. He served gallantly in the Mexican war; and in August, 1848, was brevetted first lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, his brevet dating from August 20, 1847. During the same year he was made to fill the position of regimental quarter-master, after which he became regimental adjutant of the Sixth United States infantry. In January, 1850, he was promoted to a full first lieutenancy; and on the 7th of November, 1855, was appointed an assistant quarter-master in the Quartermaster General's department, with the rank of captain. This position he held at the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861, and still holds that rank in the regular army of the United States. On the 23rd of September, 1861, he was appointed a Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and ordered to report to General M'Clellan. He has been chief of equipment entirely in the Army of the Potomac, and his brigade formed part of the force that occupied Lexington on the 9th of October, 1861. He has also been engaged in several grand reconnoissances, which have gratefully been attended with success. The manner with which he advanced, attacked, and captured the rebeldom of the rebels at Williamsburg has merited and obtained from General M'Clellan special mention and praise. General Hancock is much liked by his command, and his acquaintances speak of him as being a perfect gentleman in his manner and a pleasant companion.

COMMODORE GOLDSBOROUGH.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BLACK, OF BOSTON.—SEE PAGE 334.]

RUINS OF THE GREAT FIRE AT TROY, NEW YORK, MAY 10, 1862.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY SCHOONMAKER, OF TROY.—SEE PAGE 336.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN M'LENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

BETWEEN THE SCENES.

I.

FROM NORAH VANSTONE TO MR. PENDRIL.

"WESTMORLAND HOUSE, KENSINGTON,
"August 14, 1846.

"DEAR MR. PENDRIL,—The date of this letter will show you that the last of many hard partings is over. We have left Combe-Raven; we have said farewell to home.

"I have been thinking seriously of what you said to me on Wednesday, before you went back to town. I entirely agree with you, that Miss Garth is more shaken by all she has gone through for our sakes than she is herself willing to admit; and that it is my duty, for the future, to spare her all the anxiety that I can, on the subject of my sister and myself. This is very little to do for our dearest friend, for our second mother. Such as it is, I will do it with all my heart.

"But forgive me for saying that I am as far as ever from agreeing with you about Magdalen. I am so sensible, in our helpless position, of the importance of your assistance—so anxious to be worthy of the interest of my father's trusted adviser and oldest friend, that I feel really and truly disappointed with myself for differing with you—and yet I do differ. Magdalen is very strange, very unaccountable, to those who don't know her intimately. I can understand that she has innocently misled you; and that she has presented herself, perhaps, under her least favorable aspect. But that the clew to her language and her conduct on Wednesday last is to be found in such a feeling toward the man who has ruined us as the feeling at which you hinted is what I can not and will not believe of my sister. If you knew, as I do, what a noble nature she has, you would not be surprised at this obstinate resistance of mine to your opinion. Will you try to alter it? I don't mind what Mr. Clare says: he believes in nothing. But I attach a very serious importance to what you say; and, kind as I know your motives to be, it distresses me to think you are doing Magdalen an injustice.

"Having relieved my mind of this confession, I may now come to the proper object of my letter. I promised, if you could not find leisure time to visit us to-day, to write and tell you all that happened after you left us. The day has passed without our seeing you. So I open my writing-case and perform my promise.

"I am sorry to say that three of the women-servants—the house-maid, the kitchen-maid, and even our own maid (to whom I am sure we have always been kind)—took advantage of your having paid them their wages to pack up and go, as soon as your back was turned. They came to say good-by with as much ceremony, and as little feeling, as if they were leaving the house under ordinary circumstances. The cook, for all her violent temper, behaved very differently: she sent up a message to say that she would stop and help us to the last. And Thomas (who has never yet been in any other place than ours) spoke so gratefully of my dear father's unvarying kindness to him; and asked so anxiously to be allowed to go on serving us while his little savings lasted, that Magdalen and I forgot all formal considerations, and both shook hands with him. The poor lad went out of the room crying. I wish him well; I hope he will find a kind master and a good place.

"The long, quiet, rainy evening out of doors—our last evening at Combe-Raven—was a sad trial to us. I think winter time would have weighed less on our spirits: the drawn curtains, and the bright lamps, and the companionable fires would have helped us. We were only five in the house altogether—after having once been so many! I can't tell you how dreary the gray daylight looked, toward seven o'clock, in the lonely rooms, and on the noiseless staircase. Surely the prejudice in favor of long summer evenings is the prejudice of happy people. We did our best. We kept ourselves employed, and Miss Garth helped us. The prospect of preparing for our departure, which had seemed so dreadful earlier in the day, altered into the prospect of a refuge from ourselves as the evening came on. We each tried at first to pack up in our own rooms, but the loneliness was more than we could bear. We carried all our possessions down stairs, and heaped them on the large dining-table, and so made our preparations together, in the same room. I am sure we have taken nothing away which does not properly belong to us.

"Having already mentioned to you my own conviction that Magdalen was not herself when you saw her on Wednesday, I feel tempted to stop here and give you an instance in proof of what I say. The little circumstance happened on Wednesday night, just before we went up to our rooms.

"After we had packed our dresses and our birthday presents, our books and our music, we began to sort our letters, which had got confused from being all placed on the table together. Some of my letters were mixed with Magdalen's, and some of hers with mine. Among these last I found a card, which had been given to my sister early in the year by an actor who managed an amateur theatrical performance in which she took a part. The man had given her the card, containing his name and address, in the belief that she would be invited to many more amusements of the same kind, and in the hope that she would recommend him as a superintendent on future occasions. I only relate these trifling particulars to show you how little worth keeping such a card could be, in such circumstances as ours. Naturally enough, I threw it away from me across the table, meaning to throw it on the floor. It fell short, close to the place in which Magdalen was sitting. She took it up, looked at it, and immediately declared that she would not have had this perfectly worthless thing destroyed for the world. She was almost angry with me for having thrown it away; almost angry with Miss Garth for asking what she could possibly want with it! Could there be any plainer proof than this that our misfortunes—falling so much more heavily on her than on me—have quite unhinged her and worn her out! Surely her words and looks are not to be interpreted against her, when she is not sufficiently mistress of herself to exert her natural judgment—when she shows the unreasonable petulance of a child on a question which is not of the slightest importance.

"A little after eleven we went up stairs to try if we could get some rest.

"I drew aside the curtain of my window and looked out. Oh, what a cruel last night it was; no moon, no stars; such deep darkness that not one of the dear familiar objects in the garden was visible when I looked for them; such deep stillness, that even my own movements about the room almost frightened me! I tried to lie down and sleep, but the sense of loneliness came again, and quite overpowered me. You will say I am old enough, at six-and-twenty, to have exerted more control over myself. I hardly know how it happened, but I stole into Magdalen's room, just as I used to steal into it years and years ago, when we were children. She was not in bed; she was sitting with her writing materials before her, thinking. I said I wanted to be with her the last night; and she kissed me, and told me to lie down, and promised soon to follow me. My mind was a little quieted, and I fell asleep. It was daylight when I woke—and the first sight I saw was Magdalen, still sitting in the chair, and still thinking. She had never been to bed; she had not slept all through the night.

"'I shall sleep when we have left Combe-Raven,' she said. 'I shall be better when it is all over, and I have bid Frank good-by.' She had in her hand our father's will, and the letter he wrote to you; and when she had done speaking she gave them into my possession. I was the eldest (she said), and those last precious relics ought to be in my keeping. I tried to propose to her that we should divide them; but she shook her head. 'I have copied for myself,' was her answer, 'all that he says of us in the will, and all that he says in the letter.' She told me this, and took from her bosom a tiny white silk bag, which she had made in the night, and in which she had put the extracts, so as to keep them always about her. 'This tells me in his own words what his last wishes were for both of us,' she said; 'and this is all I want for the future.'

"These are trifles to dwell on; and I am almost surprised at myself for not feeling ashamed to trouble you with them. But since I have known what your early connection was with my father and mother, I have learned to think of you (and, I suppose, to write to you) as an old friend. And, besides, I have it so much at heart to change your opinion of Magdalen that I can't help telling you the smallest things about her which may, in my judgment, end in making you think of her as I do.

"When breakfast-time came (on Thursday morning) we were surprised to find a strange letter on the table. Perhaps I ought to mention it to you, in case of any future necessity for your interference. It was addressed to Miss Garth, on paper with the deepest mourning border round it; and the writer was the same man who followed us on our way home from a walk one day last spring—Captain Wragge. His object appears to be to assert once more his audacious claim to a family connection with my poor mother, under cover of a letter of condolence, which it is an insolence in such a person to have written at all. He expresses as much sympathy—on his discovery of our affliction in the newspaper—as if he had been really intimate with us; and he begs to know, in a postscript (being evidently in total ignorance of all that has really happened), whether it is thought desirable that he should be present among the other relatives at the reading of the will! The address he gives, at which letters will reach him for the next fortnight, is, 'Post-office, Birmingham.' This is all I have to tell you on the subject. Both the letter and the writer seem to me to be equally unworthy of the slightest notice on our part or on yours.

"After breakfast Magdalen left us and went by herself into the morning-room. The weather being still showery we had arranged that Francis Clare should see her in that room when he presented himself to take his leave. I was up stairs when he came; and I remained up stairs for more than half an hour afterward, sadly anxious, as you may well believe, on Magdalen's account.

"At the end of the half hour, or more, I came down stairs. As I reached the landing I suddenly heard her voice, raised entreatingly, and calling on him by his name—then loud sobs—then a frightful laughing and screaming, both together, that rang through the house. I instantly ran into the room, and found Magdalen on the sofa in violent hysterics, and Frank standing staring at her with a lowering, angry face, biting his nails.

"I felt so indignant—without knowing plainly why, for I was ignorant of course of what had passed at the interview—that I took Mr. Francis Clare by the shoulders and pushed him out of the room. I am careful to tell you how I acted toward him, and what led to it, because I understand that he is excessively offended with me, and that he is likely to mention elsewhere what he calls my unladylike violence toward him. If he should mention it to you, I am anxious to acknowledge, of my own accord, that I forgot myself—not, I hope you will think, without some provocation.

"I pushed him into the hall, leaving Magdalen for the moment to Miss Garth's care. Instead of going away he sat down sulkily on one of the hall chairs. 'May I ask the reason of this extraordinary violence?' he inquired, with an injured look. 'No,' I said. 'You will be good enough to imagine the reason for yourself, and to leave us immediately, if you please.' He sat doggedly in the chair, biting his nails, and considering. 'What have I done to be treated in this unfeeling manner?' he asked, after a while. 'I can enter into no discussion with you,' I answered; 'I can only request you to leave us. If you persist in waiting to see my sister again, I will go to the cottage myself and appeal to your father.' He got up in a great hurry at those words. 'I have been infamously used in this business,' he said. 'All the hardships and the sacrifices have fallen to my share. I'm the only one among you who has any heart: all the rest are as hard as stones—Magdalen included. In one breath she says she loves me, and in another she tells me to go to China. What have I done to be treated with this heartless inconsistency? I'm consistent myself—I only want to stop at home—and (what's the consequence?) you're all against me!' In that manner he grumbled his way down the steps, and so I saw the last of him. This was all that passed between us. If he gives you any other account of it, what he says will be false. He made no attempt to return. An hour afterward his father came alone to say good-by. He saw Miss Garth and me, but not Magdalen; and he told us he would take the necessary measures, with your assistance, for having his son properly looked after in London, and seen safely on board the vessel when the time came. It was a short visit, and a sad leave-taking. Even Mr. Clare was sorry, though he tried hard to hide it.

"We had barely two hours after Mr. Clare had left us before it would be time to go. I went back to Magdalen and found her quieter and better, though terribly pale and exhausted, and oppressed, as I fancied, by thoughts which she could not prevail on herself to communicate. She would tell me nothing then—she has told me nothing since—of what passed between herself and Francis Clare. When I spoke of him angrily (feeling as I did that he had distressed and tortured her, when she ought to have had all the encouragement and comfort from him that man could give), she refused to hear me: she made the kindest allowances and the sweetest excuses for him; and laid all the blame of the dreadful state in which I had found her entirely on herself. Was I wrong in telling you that she had a noble nature? And won't you alter your opinion when you read these lines?

"We had no friends to come and bid us good-by, and our few acquaintances were too far from us—perhaps too indifferent about us—to call. We employed the little leisure left in going over the house together for the last time. We took leave of our old school-room, our bedrooms, the room where our mother died, the little study where our father used to settle his accounts and write his letters—feeling toward them, in our forlorn situation, as other girls might have felt at parting with old friends. From the house, in a gleam of fine weather, we went into the garden and gathered our last nosegay, with the purpose of drying the flowers when they begin to wither, and keeping them in remembrance of the happy days that are gone. When we had said good-by to the garden there was only half an hour left. We went together to the grave; we knelt down, side by side, in silence, and kissed the sacred ground. I thought my heart would have broken! August was the month of my mother's birthday; and this time last year my father and Magdalen and I were all three consulting in secret what present we could make to surprise her with on the birthday morning.

"If you had seen how Magdalen suffered you would never doubt her again. I had to take her from the last resting-place of our father and mother almost by force. Before we were out of the church-yard she broke from me and ran back. She dropped on her knees at the grave; tore up from it passionately a handful of grass, and said something to herself at the same moment which, though I followed her instantly, I did not get near enough to hear. She turned on me in such a frenzied manner when I tried to raise her from the ground—she looked at me with such a fearful wildness in her eyes—that I felt absolutely terrified at the sight of her. To my relief, the paroxysm left her as suddenly as it had come. She thrust away the tuft of grass into the bosom of her dress, and took my arm, and hurried with me out of the church-yard. I asked her why she had gone back—I asked what those words were which she had spoken at the grave. 'A promise to our dead father,' she answered, with a momentary return of the wild look and the frenzied manner which had startled me already. I was afraid to agitate her by saying more; I left all other questions to be asked at a fitter and a quieter time. You will understand from this how terribly she suffers—how wildly and strangely she acts under violent agitation; and you will not interpret against her what she said or did when you saw her on Wednesday last.

"We only returned to the house in time to hasten away from it to the train. Perhaps it was better for us so—better that we had only a moment left to look back before the turn in the road hid the last of Combe-Raven from our view. There was not a soul we knew at the station; nobody to stare at us; nobody to wish us good-by. The rain came on again as we took our seats in the train. What we felt at the sight of the railway—what horrible remembrances it forced on our minds of the calamity which has made us fatherless, I can not and dare not tell you. I have tried anxiously not to write this letter in a gloomy tone; not to return all your kindness to us by distressing you with our grief. Perhaps I have dwelt too long already on the little story of our parting from home? I can only say, in excuse, that my heart is full of it; and what is not in my heart my pen won't write.

"We have been so short a time in our new abode that I have nothing more to tell you—except that Miss Garth's sister has received us with the heartiest kindness. She considerately leaves us to ourselves, until we are fitter than we are now to think of our future plans, and to arrange as we best can for earning our own living. The house is so large, and the position of our rooms has been so thoughtfully chosen, that I should hardly know—except when I hear the laughing of the younger girls in the garden—that we were living in a school.

"With kindest and best wishes from Miss Garth and my sister, believe me, dear Mr. Pendril, gratefully yours,

"NORAH VANSTONE."

II.

FROM MISS GARTH TO MR. PENDRIL.

"WESTMORLAND HOUSE, KENSINGTON,
"September 23, 1846.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I write these lines in such misery of mind as no words can describe. Magdalen has deserted us. At an early hour this morning she secretly left the house, and she has not been heard of since.

"I would come and speak to you personally, but I dare not leave Norah. I must try to control myself: I must try to write.

"Nothing happened yesterday to prepare me, or to prepare Norah, for this last—I had almost said this worst—of all our afflictions. The only alteration we either of us noticed in the unhappy girl was an alteration for the better, when we parted for the night. She kissed me, which she has not done latterly; and she burst out crying when she embraced her sister next. We had so little suspicion of the truth that we thought these signs of renewed tenderness and affection a promise of better things for the future.

"This morning, at a little after eight o'clock, when her sister went into her room, it was empty, and a note in her handwriting, addressed to Norah, was lying on the dressing-table. I can not prevail on Norah to part with the note; I can only send you the inclosed copy of it. You will see that it affords no clew to the direction she has taken.

"Knowing the value of time in this dreadful emergency I examined her room and (with my sister's help) questioned the servants immediately on the news of her absence reaching me. Her wardrobe was empty; and all her boxes but one, which she has evidently taken away with her, are empty too. We are of opinion that she has privately turned her dresses and jewelry into money; that she had the one trunk she took with her removed from the house yesterday; and that she left us this morning on foot. The answers given by one of the servants are so unsatisfactory that we believe the woman has been bribed to assist her, and has managed all those arrangements for her flight which she could not have safely undertaken by herself.

"Of the immediate object with which she has left us I entertain no doubt.

"I have reasons (which I can tell you at a fitter time) for feeling assured that she has gone away with the intention of trying her fortune on the stage. She has in her possession the card of an actor by profession, who superintended an amateur theatrical performance at Clifton, in which she took part; and to him she has gone to help her. I saw the card at the time, and I know the actor's name to be Huxtable. The address I can not call to mind quite so correctly, but I am almost sure it was at some theatrical place in Bow Street, Covent Garden. Let me entreat you not to lose a moment in sending to make the necessary inquiries; the first trace of her will, I firmly believe, be found at that address.

"If we had nothing worse to dread than her attempting to go on the stage I should not feel the distress and dismay which now overpower me. Hundreds of other girls have acted as recklessly as she has acted, and have not ended ill after all. But my fears for Magdalen do not begin and end with the risk she is running at present.

"There has been something weighing on her mind ever since we left Combe-Raven—weighing far more heavily for the last six weeks than at first. Until the period when Francis Clare left England I am persuaded she was secretly sustained by the hope that he would contrive to see her again. From the day when she knew that the measures you had taken for preventing this had succeeded—from the day when she was assured that the ship had really taken him away, nothing has roused, nothing has interested her. She has given herself up, more and more hopelessly, to her own brooding thoughts; thoughts which, I believe, first entered her mind on the day when the utter ruin of the prospects on which her marriage depended was made known to her. She has formed some desperate project of contesting the possession of her father's fortune with Michael Vanstone; and the stage career which she has gone away to try is nothing more than a means of freeing herself from all home-dependence, and of enabling her to run what mad risks she pleases in perfect security from all home-control. What it costs me to write of her in these terms I must leave you to imagine. The time has gone by when any consideration of distress to my own feelings can weigh with me. Whatever I can say which will open your eyes to the real danger, and strengthen your conviction of the instant necessity of averting it, I say in despite of myself, without hesitation and without reserve.

"One word more and I have done.

"If the last time you were so good as to come to this house, do you remember how Magdalen embarrassed and distressed us by questioning you about her right to bear her father's name? Do you remember her persisting in her inquiries, until she had forced you to acknowledge that, legally speaking, she and her mother had No Name? I venture to remind you of this, because you have the double merit of being slow to think of, and you might well have forgotten the circumstance. Whatever natural reluctance she might otherwise have had to destroying a fair and degrading herself, by the use of an assumed name, that conversation with you is certain to have removed. We must discover her by personal description—we can trace her in no other way.

"I can think of nothing more to guide your decision in our deplorable emergency but Mr. Gob's sake, let no expense and no efforts be spared! I send my letter by private messenger: it ought to reach you by ten o'clock this morning at the latest. Let me have one line in answer, to say you will act instantly for the best. My only hope of quieting Norah is to be able to write a word of encouragement from your pen. Believe me, dear Sir, yours sincerely and gratefully,

HARRIET GARTH."

III.

FROM MAGDALEN TO NORAH (INCLOSED IN THE PRECEDING LETTER).

"My DARLING,—Try to forgive me. I have struggled against myself till I am worn out in the effort. I am the wretchedest of living creatures. Our quiet life bores me sometimes. I can bear it no longer: I must go. If you know what my future is to be, tell me, for I don't. I have fought against them, and how horribly they have gone on haunting me in the lonely quiet of this house, you will pity and forgive me. Oh, my love, don't feel hurt at my not opening my heart to you to-night! I have not open it. I dare not show myself to you as I really am.

"Pray don't send and seek after me; I will write and relieve all your anxieties. You know, Norah, we must give up living for ourselves; I have only gone to get mine in the way which is thrust for me. Whether I succeed, or whether I fail, I can do myself no harm in any way. I have no position to lose, and no name to degrade. Don't doubt I love you—don't let Miss Garth doubt my gratitude. I go where my misable at leaving you; but I must go. If I had loved you less dearly I should have had not courage to say this in your presence; but how could I trust myself to resist your persuasions, and to bear the sight of your distress? Farewell, my darling. Take a thousand kisses from me, my own best, dearest love, and we meet again. MAGDALEN."

IV.

FROM SERGEANT BULMER (OF THE DETECTIVE POLICE) TO MR. PENDRIL.

"SOUTH-SEA QUAY, Sept. 29, 1846.

"SIR,—Your clerk informs me that the parties interested in our inquiry after the missing young lady are anxious for news of the result. I went to your office to speak to you about the matter to-day. Not having found you, and not being able to return and try again to-morrow, I devise these lines to save delay, and to tell you how we stand thus far.

"I am sorry to say no advance has been made since my former report. The trace of the young lady which we found nearly a week ago still remains the last trace discovered of her. This case creates a mighty stir among the people round about here. Looked at close, it alters very considerably for the worse, and becomes, to speak in plain truth—a Poser.

"This is how we now stand:

"We have traced the young lady to the theatrical agent's in Bow Street. We know that at an early hour on the morning of the twenty-third the agent was called down to speak to her on the dressing, to speak to a young lady in a cab at the door. We know that, on the testimony of Mr. Huxtable's card, he wrote on it Mr. Huxtable's address, and heard her order the cabman to drive to the terminus. We know that she left by the nine o'clock train. We followed her by the twelve o'clock train. We have ascertained that she called, at half past two, at Mr. Huxtable's lodgings; that she found he was away, and not expected back till eight in the evening; that she left word she would call again at eight; and that she never returned. Mr. Huxtable's statement is—he and the young lady have never set eyes on each other. The first consideration which follows, is that of the truth of this statement. Mr. Huxtable? I have carefully inquired into the character, as know as much, or more, about him than he knows about himself—and my opinion is, that we are to believe him. To the best of my knowledge he is a perfectly honest man.

"Here, then, is the hitch in the case. The young lady sets out with a certain object before her. Instead of going on to the accomplishment of that object she stops short of it. Why has she stopped? and where? Those are, unfortunately, just the questions which we can't answer just yet.

"My own opinion of the matter is briefly as follows; I don't think she has met with any foul accident. Serious accidents, in nine cases out of ten, discover themselves. My own notion is, that she has fallen into the hands of some person or persons interested in hiding her away, and sharp enough to know how to set about it. Whether she is in their charge, with or without her own consent, is more than I can undertake to say at present. I don't wish to raise false hopes or false fears; I wish to stop short at the opinion I have already given.

"In regard to the future, I may tell you that I have set on foot inquiries in daily communication with the authorities. I have also taken care to have the handbills offering a reward for the discovery of Miss Garth more widely circulated. I have completed the necessary arrangements for seeking the pilgrim in all country theatres, and for having the dramatic companies well looked after. Some years since this would have cost a considerable expenditure of time and money. Luckily for our purpose, the country theatres are in these days, under the large cities, hardly one of them is open, and we can keep our eye on them with little expense and less difficulty.

"These are the steps which I think it needful to take at present. If you are of another opinion, you have only to give me your directions, and I will carefully attend to them. I don't by any means despair of our finding the young lady and bringing her back to her friends safe and well. Please to send them, as well as how to subscribe myself, yours respectfully,

"ABRAHAM BULMER."

V.

ANONYMOUS LETTER ADDRESSED TO MR. PENDRIL.

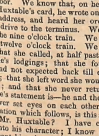
"SIR,—A word to the wise. The friends of a certain young lady are wasting time and money to no purpose. Their advertising clerk and your detective policeman are looking for a needle in a bottle of hay. The end will be ninth of October, and they have not found her yet: they will not soon find the Northwest Passage. Call your dogs off, and you may be sure of the young lady's safety under her own hand. The longer you keep them, the longer she will remain, what she is now, lost."

[The preceding letter is thus indorsed, in Mr. Pendril's handwriting: "No apparent means of tracing the inclosed to its source. Post-mark, 'Charing Cross.' Written apparently on the inside of the envelope. Handwriting, probably a man's in disguise. Words, whoever he is, correctly informed. No further notice of the younger Miss Vanstone discovered yet."]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.—Headquarters for Lockets, Bracelets, Vest Chains, Pins, Rings, Studs, Buttons, and everything else in Jewelry line. Forfull particulars address W. A. HAYWARD, Manufacturing Jeweller, 335 Broadway, New York.

Commercial Travellers and Agents Wanted to Sell our 25 Cent Portfolio Package.



Contents—18 Sheets Note Paper, 18 Envelopes, 1 Pencil, 1 Pen, 1 Penholder, 1 Blotting Pad, 1 Memorandum Book, 3 Engravings, 1 New Method for Computing Interest, 1 Table of Distances, 1 Package of Letters, 1 Letter Balance, 1 Indelible Marker, 1 Rubber Cutter, 1 Letter Cabinet, 1 Ladies' Embroidered Handkerchief, 1 Handsome Gold-colored Silver, 1 Child's Apron, 1 Child's Full Dress, 1 Misses' Embroidered Dress, 1 Handsome Lace Collar, 1 Pair Lace Sleeves, 1 Handsome Embroidered Piece of Jewelry. Agents make $30 a day. Send stamp for Circular of various prices. Sample 50 cents. PEYER & CO., Publishers, 54 South Third St., Philadelphia, Pa.

HICKCOX'S STENCIL CHEST
CONTAINS A COMPLETE OUTFIT FOR CUTTING

For Clothing, Cards, Books, &c. Price from $15 to $30. List of contents: 1 set Capital Letters; 1 set Small to match; 1 set Figures, Border Cuts, Pericds, &c.; 1 pair Shears, 1 steel Hammer, 1 ligament vial Stock, 1 Die Paster, 1 Brush, 1 Pencil, 1 Scroll Pattern, 1 Rule, 1 Berther, 1 pair Dividers, 1 Whetstone, 1 Groover, 1 bottle Foaming Powder, Stock &c. Every Machine guaranteed to cut 1000 characters for 20 places with $30 chest, namely; 150 bottles Ink, 100 Superfine Steel Stencil Plates, and 100 Brushes. For catalogue and samples, send red stamp. Address C. E. HICKCOX, 208 Pearl Street, N. Y.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

The Sin.-or Navy Size, carries a Ball weighing 38 to the lb., and the New Model Revolver, a Ball of 54 to the lb. By recent experiments made in the Army, these Revolvers are pronounced the most effective Pistols ever used in use. Also,

Ballard's Patent Breech-Loading Rifle.

This arm is entirely new, and is universally acknowledged to be the nearest to perfection of any Breech-Loading Rifle ever made. Length of barrel 34 inches, weight of Rifle 7 pounds. Size of Calibre adapted to Nos. 32, 35, and 44 copper waterproof Cartridges. For particulars call or send for a Circular to

C. E. HICKCOX & BRAY, Sole Agents,
No. 208 Broadway, N. Y.

CRAVING FOR TOBACCO PERMANENTLY CURED AND PREVENTED
Send thirty-six cents to
C. STUTESWOOD, 159 Spring St., New York.

You must Notice,

That the name of the firm of W. Forsyth & Co. is changed to J. H. Winslow & Co., Mr. Forsyth having retired. Business continued the same, and all Certificates of Deposit issued at the corner of Wall and Broadway, attended to as usual, and will be redeemed by us alone, with the same promptness and faithfulness as heretofore, on their being returned to us.

100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
WORTH $500,000.

To be sold for the benefit of the purchaser, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

Splendid List!!

Of Articles to be Sold for a Low Dollar each.

106 Gold Hunting Cased Watches ..... $100.00 each
100 Gold Lever Watches ..... 50.00 each
100 Ladies' Gold Watches ..... 50.00 each
800 Solid Gold Hunting Cased Silver Watches ..... 10.00 each
5000 Vest and Neck Chains ..... 5.00 to 10.00 each
3000 Gold Sets, Pins, Rings, &c. ..... 5.00 to 10.00 each
5000 Cameo Brooches ..... 5.00 to 8.00 each
5000 Cameo Bracelets ..... 5.00 to 8.00 each
3000 Lava and Florentine Brooches ..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Brooches ..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Cameo Ear Drops ..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops ..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops ..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
3000 Coral, Opal, and Em. Ear Drops ..... 4.00 to 6.00 each
2500 Gents' Breast Pins ..... 2.50 to 3.00 each
5000 Rings ..... 2.00 to 3.00 each
5000 Pearl and Ribbon Slides ..... 2.00 to 3.00 each
5000 Gents' Scarf Rings ..... 2.00 to 3.00 each
5000 Sleeve Buttons ..... 2.50 to 3.00 each
7000 Plain Rings ..... 2.50 to 3.00 each
7000 Gents' Studs ..... 2.50 to 3.00 each
7000 Lockets ..... 2.50 to 3.00 each
5000 Gold Pens and Cases ..... 5.00 to 10.00 each
10000 Gold Pens, 14 Carats and Warr'd ..... 4.00 to 5.00 each
10000 Gold Pens, Ladies' and Gents' Size, Warranted Finished, 3 Gold Pens, 14 Carats and Warr'd ..... 4.00 to 5.00 each

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each, and no more. Call the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, so that no one can know what they are, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, this giving all a fair chance. On receipt of a Certificate, the party will know what he can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and receive the article or not.

No Certificate will be sent by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, post-paid, and the money and the business, in all cases, will be returned when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1, eleven for $2, thirty-two for $5, one hundred for $10, and one hundred and fifty for $15.

AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every certificate ordered by them, provided the full remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State.

J. WINSLOW & CO.,
P. O. Box 5075. 208 Broadway, New York.
N. B. We will in different parts of the country that all articles of jewelry not giving perfect satisfaction can be returned and the money will be refunded.

EMPLOYMENT. A NEW ENTERPRISE.
The FRANKLIN SEWING MACHINE CO. want a number of Agents to travel in city and country, to whom liberal inducements will be offered. Address, with stamp, HARRIS BROSNAN, Boston, Mass.

EMPLOYMENT.—Agents Wanted in every City, Town, and Village in the United States. For particulars address, with red stamp, J. H. WARD & CO., 54 East 12th Street, New York.

AGENTS!
Send for the Circular containing Full Description of HEAD-QUARTERS FOR UNION STATIONERY AND FRIFLE PACKETS, and of forty other specialties.
PRIZE PACKETS FOR THE MILLION.
UNION STATIONERY AND PORTRAIT PACKETS.
UNION STATIONERY AND RECIPE PACKETS.
EXCELSIOR STATIONERY PACKETS.
P. HASKINS & CO., 96 Beekman St., N. Y.

Grand Opening!!!

BRODIE'S

Stock of Spring

and

Summer

MANTILLAS,

Now Ready for Inspection

at his

OLD STAND,

300 Canal Street,

and

His Palace of Fashion,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,

Corner of 23d Street,

New York.

RICH LACES, ETC.
MONDAY, MAY 12, at 10 o'clock, No. 703 Broadway. Will offer on MONDAY, the 19th inst.,
Black Lace Veils for $3 00, worth $4.
Black Lace Veils for $3, worth $5.
Black Lace Veils for $4, worth $6.
And a variety of other desirable goods, to which they invite the attention of customers.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIANT WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES?—If you want of them there to grow heavily in six weeks upon the smoothest face without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1, sent by mail, post free, to any address, on receipt of an order. J. CAUTION, No. 199 Broadway, N. Y.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!
All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Newbern, and all Southern Points, for sick and troops, should be sent at half rates, by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 14 Broadway. Soldiers charged free rates.

THE ALBION. A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER, Established in 1822,
NEWS, POLITICS, CRITICISM, AND
GENERAL LITERATURE.
PRICE $5 PER ANNUM; 6 CENTS PER COPY.
Send for Specimen Copy, with price, to the
ALBION OFFICE, 19 Beekman St., N. Y.

Watches!!!

Wholesale Stock of 10,000 Watches for sale at retail at wholesale prices. Prices ranging from $5 50 to $250 00 each. For List of prices, see advertisement in "Harper's Weekly," May 17, No. 291, page 318, or send for a circular. Registered letters at my risk. J. E. FERGUSON, 208 Broadway, New York.

Every Man his own Printer.

Portable Printing-Offices for the Army and Navy, Clergymen, and Business Men generally. Send for a circular.
31 Park Row (under Leveridge's Hotel), New York.

International Exhibition, 1862.

THE LONDON ART JOURNAL FOR APRIL
Contains the Articles of an
ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF THE
International Exhibition.
This portion will consist of 100 Illustrated pages (nearly one thousand engravings), and will be continued for eight consecutive months.
PROSPECTUS WITHOUT EXTRA CHARGE.
Price 75 cents per month. $9 per Annum.
Subscriptions received, and Books and Prints bought by VIRTUE & CO., 39 John Street, New York.

$ SOMETHING NEW.—AGENTS WANTED. 12 New Articles. Sells itself. Profits large. Samples 25 cents, in close stamp. RICE & CO., Box 5,643, Boston.

ENTERPRISING AGENTS ARE DOING well selling DOWSETT'S PAT. HEMMER and SHIELD. Price reduced. Simplicity and new articles of ready sale. Agents large. Samples sent free on receipt of the price (50 cents). Send for circular. 376 Pearl-st. and 375 Water-st., E. DOWSETT, 443 Broadway, N. Y.

Wedding Cards and Note Papers at J. EVERDELL'S Stationery Warehouse, 302 Broadway, cor. Duane Street, N. Y. Samples by mail.

For Sale or to Let.

The premises No. 309 and 311 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, recently occupied by Messrs. L. J. Levy & Company. For Terms, &c.,
Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS,
New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y. NOW,
Have Just Published:

CAPTAIN BURTON'S CITY OF THE SAINTS. The City of the Saints and across the Rocky Mountains to California. By Captain RICHARD F. BURTON, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Geographical Societies of France and England; H. M. Consul in West Africa; Author of "El Medinah," "Mission to Gelele," &c. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50.

THE LAST OF THE MORTIMERS. A Story in Two Voices. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Queen on the Throne," &c. 8vo. "The Last of the Mortimers" and "The Laird of Norlaw," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE SAGACITY OF ANIMALS. The Children's Picture Book of the Sagacity of Animals. Illustrated with Sixty Engravings by HARRISON WEIR. Square 16mo, Muslin gilt, 75 cents.

☞ "The Sagacity of Animals" forms the Fifth Volume in the highly popular and beautiful Series of

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOKS.

Square 16mo, about 200 pages each, beautifully printed on tinted paper, embellished with many Engravings, bound in Muslin, gilt. Each Volume complete in itself. The Series complete in four cases, $3 75.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOK OF BIRDS. With Sixty-One Engravings PICTURE-BOOK. Illustrated by W. HARVEY.

By ELIZABETH HOWARD. With Sixty-Three Engravings.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF FISHES. By ELIZABETH HOWARD. With Sixty-One Engravings.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF QUADRUPEDS, and Birds, Fish, Reptiles, &c. With Sixty-One Engravings by HARRISON WEIR.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK OF ANIMALS. Illustrated with Sixty Engravings by HARRISON WEIR.

THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE BOOK OF STORIES. Illustrated with Wolf.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

ANY Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Also, Complete Sets, neatly and carefully bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, or Express, to any part of the United States (without Expense of Carriage), for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the Purchaser paying the Expense of Carriage. Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Back Numbers, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to May, 1862, are now ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Eight Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S

WEEKLY.

Single Copies Six Cents.

WILKIE COLLINS'S New Story, entitled "NO NAME," was commenced in the Number for March 29, No. 279 of

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

And will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

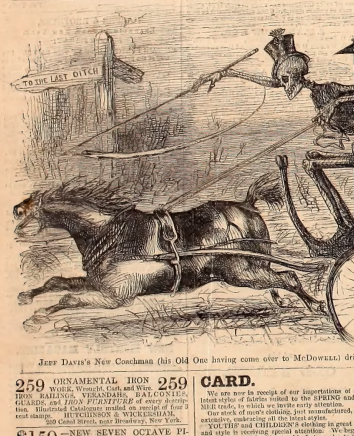
One Copy for One Year $2 50
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $6 00.

The Volume of WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V., for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861, are now ready. Each Volume, neatly bound in Cloth extra, Price $2 00 each, are now ready.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.



A BOBTAIL BULL IN FLY-TIME.

(Vide the Howls of the British Parliament and Papers about the Monitor, &c.)

BURNSIDE TAKING OFF THE GLOVES. GENERAL ORDER, No. —

"Wherever, after the issue of this order, shall, within the limits to which the Union may extend in this Department, either one word against the Government of the United States, will be at once arrested and closely confined. It must be distinctly understood that this Department is under martial law, and means to proceed or implied will meet with speedy punishment."

JEFF DAVIS'S NEW Coachman (his Old One having come over to McDOWELL) driving him in the Direction of the LAST DITCH.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON 259
WORK, Vestibule Cast and Wrought IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES, GRATINGS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description, Illustrated Catalogues mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM, 259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

$150.—NEW SEVEN OCTAVE PIANOS, $185, with iron frames and overstrung bass, with mouldings, carved legs, inlaid round board, &c., $160, $175, $185, and $200; with grand legs, $210 and $220; 11 octaves, $245, warranted for five years; second hand Pianos at $50, $60, $70, $85, $95, and $100. Melodeons at great bargains. 100 new and second hand Pianos and Melodeons to hire from $2 to $8 per month, and rent allowed if purchased. Monthly payments taken. HORACE WATERS, Agent, 481 Broadway.

Agents! Agents!

Wanted in every State in the Union, to sell DODGE'S PATENT KNOTTED OIL BUSHES, for Fluid Lamps, each; only one cent per week; no danger of explosion; sample sent on receipt of four red stamps. Address JOSEPH DODGE, No. 32 Dunne Street, New York.

Gauze Merino Under Wear,

For Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children.

A large variety, at popular prices.

UNION ADAMS,

No. 637 Broadway, New York.

INVALID.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all Lung Affections, by sending to D. Aden, 371 Pearl Street, N. Y. Be sure it is free. Write for it.—It has cured thousands.

CARD.

We are now in receipt of our importations of all the latest styles of fabrics suited to the SPRING and SUMMER trade, to which we invite early attention.

Our stock of men's clothing, just manufactured, is very extensive, embracing all the latest styles.

YOUTHS and CHILDREN'S clothing in great variety and style in receiving special attention. We beg to call the attention of families to this fact, as also to the uniformly low prices in this as well as the other departments of our business.

DEVLIN & CO.,

Broadway, corner of Grand Street.

Warren

James Parrish,

Shirt Manufacturer,

223 CANAL STREET, near Broadway, New York.

SUPERIOR SHIRTS made to measure, $18, $21, and $24 per dozen.

☞ Family supply store of Bosoms, Collars, and Wristbands for Shirt making, at reduced prices.

THE UNION SPY!

Southern Adventures of this mysterious personage are printed every week in

THE WIDE WORLD,

Published in Boston. Sold everywhere. 4 cents.

PASSPORT OFFICE, No. 200 Broadway, near Fulton Street, Ground Floor.

Naturalized citizens must produce their certificates. Information for travelers furnished on application at the Office, or in reply to letters addressed PASSPORT OFFICE, Box 1,311, New York.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE! MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 28c. IN SILVER. Five of different powers, $1. Mailed free.

F. C. BOWEN, Box 230, Boston, Mass.

To Officers of the Army.

A. P. LESURE & CO.,

Successors to WYMAN & CO., at the Old Stand, 570 Broadway, cor. Spring St., would inform their customers that they have all the measures and patterns of the late firm, and solicit a continuance of their patronage. They will also take special pains in getting up orders according to regulation. Cards containing full directions for measuring sent on application.

A. P. LESURE & CO. New York, May 1st, 1862.

BALLOU'S PATENTED F. Y. S. French Yoke SHIRTS.

WARRANTED TO FIT.

Send for a Circular.

BALLOU BROS., No. 499 Broadway, New York.

For sale by all the principal Dealers through the UNITED STATES.

CHEWERS AND SMOKERS WHO ARE DESTROYING THEIR HEALTH AND INTELLECT by the use of tobacco, send for a pamphlet describing a substitute and remedy. Address ISAAC G. SWAN, Drawer No. 1250, SYRACUSE, N. Y.

AGENTS ARE MAKING MORE MONEY BY SELLING RICKARDS' UNION PRIZE STATIONERY AND LITTLE PACKAGE. than at any other business. OUR PACKAGES ARE IN SUCH DEMAND THAT AGENTS EASILY MAKE FROM $78 TO $25 A DAY. CIRCULARS MAILED FREE. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

A GENT—IF YOU WISH TO INVEST A SMALL CAPITAL IN A PAYING BUSINESS, Examine the merits of the MULTOMICROON. Pays 100 per cent. to Agents. Call and see it, or send stamp for circular. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

SENT BY EXPRESS EVERYWHERE.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Retailed at Wholesale Prices. Made to Measure at $20 per doz. OR SIX FOR TWO DOLLARS.

MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN, With four Linen Bosoms, and warranted as good as can be sold in retail stores for $2.00 each.

ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRTS THAT CAN BE MADE, $26 00 PER DOZEN.

T. S.—Those who think I can not make a good shirt for $20 per dozen are mistaken. Here is the cost of one for $20 fine shirt.

20 yards of New York Mills Muslin at 18 c. per yd.....$3 60
7 yards of fine Linen at 36c. per yard..... 2 52
Making and cutting..... 1 50
Laundry, 11 buttons and cotton, 70c..... 1 00
Profit..... 11 38

Total..... $20 00

Self-Measurement for Shirts.

Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices and drawings of different styles of shirts and collars sent to everywhere. These rules are so easy to understand that any one can take their own measure. Express Company.

Payment may be paid to the Express Company on the receipt of the goods.

The Express Company have orders to allow all persons to examine the goods before paying for them. If they are not as represented, you are at liberty to return them.

S. W. H. WARD, from London, 387 Broadway, up stairs, Between White and Walker Streets, NEW YORK.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS AND ARMS. Selden's Patent. 659 Broadway N. Y. Send for a Circular.

A Profitable and Permanent Business for one person in every town. Address JONES & CLARK, 89 Nassau Street, N. Y.

To Consumptives.

THE Advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks, by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption, is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a SURE CURE for Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, and all Throat and Lung Affections. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he considers to be invaluable, and he hopes every sufferer will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address Rev. EDWARD A. WILSON, Williamsburgh, Kings County, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. VI.—No. 283.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

BALLOON VIEW OF THE ATTACK ON FORT DARLING, IN THE JAMES RIVER, BY COMMANDER ROGERS'S GUN-BOAT FLOTILLA, "GALENA," "MONITOR," ETC.—[SEE PAGE 343.]

JOHN LORENCE.

ROANOKE ISLAND, FEBRUARY 8, 1862.

Oh, well the Ninth New Jersey fought
On bloody Roanoke!
Its front stood firm, its colors waved,
Its line was never broke!
And every eye flashed bright that day,
And every heart-beat strong?
For every man's soul kept time
To the musket-bullet's song.

Brave men grew braver as they marked
How Corporal Lorence fought,
And ever while the contest raged
The gun of danger sought.
Columbia's grand, inspiring voice
Was sounding in his ear:
"Strike boldly now," it seemed to say
"And cast away all fear!"

Alas! before the day was won,
While fiercer grew the fray,
And John was rushing on, a shot
Took both his legs away!
Oh, not a man that saw him fall
But wished it had been he:
Each struggled, when they bore him off,
His chief regret to be.

The hero lay insensible
While knives and probes pierced deep:
God bless the noble art of man
That eased that painless sleep!
At last the surgeon's task is o'er:
The sleeper wakes. What sound
Has thrilled his soul, and made him glance
So eagerly around?

"Victory!" is the thrilling cry
Borne in upon the gale.
The patriot rose upon his arm,
His face, till now so pale,
Flushed with her joy: in waved his cap,
And gave three hearty cheers
For the Union and the glorious Ninth
New Jersey Volunteers!

And now he lies, unmourning,
A cripple, thin and weak:
Yet none mistake the patriot fire
Who chance to hear him speak.
He longs to go, though on his stumps,
And serve his country more:
Brave Lorence! well your country knows
Your fighting days are o'er!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1862.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION.

WE publish in another column the President's Proclamation rescinding the General Order of General Hunter, by which the slaves in South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida were freed. The President takes the ground that the right of emancipating negroes under the war power belongs to him, and that he does not choose to delegate it to commanders in the field.

This message will satisfy the conservative people in the Northern States. So grave a question as the abolition of slavery in the States can not be left to the discretion of military officers. A military policy must be adopted by the Government, and carried out in every case. The only person who can determine that policy is the President, and he only does it duly when he refuses to share the privilege and the responsibility.

The closing paragraph of the Proclamation indicates clearly enough to which side the President's sympathies and inclinations lean. Indeed, it may be regarded somewhat in the light of a threat and a warning. He appeals to the people of the slaveholding States to accept the generous offer made to them by Congress while it is yet time. The "signs of the times," he warns them, point to the abolition of an institution which is not in harmony with the spirit of the age or reconcilable with the peace of the country. It is for the Slave States to decide whether they will run the risk of having it abolished under the war power, with suddenness and disaster, and without compensation, or whether they will have the support, the compensate necessity, and avail themselves of a Congressional subsidy. The country pauses to hear Maryland's answer.

THE FOOD QUESTION IN SECESSIA.

THE rebel Legislature of Virginia is debating resolutions affirming the determination of the insurgents in that State to persevere in their purpose of rebellion, notwithstanding the fall of New Orleans and the other mishaps which have lately befallen the "Confederate" cause.

The fall of New Orleans and Pensacola, the capture of Fort Macon, and the successful advance of M'Clellan to within a day's march of Richmond, may not prove, in themselves, fatal to the rebel cause. They must operate to dishearten the soldiery still more, and to cause Jeff Davis, and they must serve to correct the impression, once widely prevalent at the South, that one Southerner was a match for five or six Yankees. But the mere seizure by our troops of one or two more points on the Southern coast does not in itself involve the failure of the rebellion.

It is the material results flowing from the seizure of these points which are important. The capture of New Orleans and the presence of our gun-boats in the Mississippi cut off the rebel armies from their principal supplies of food. When the cotton States first seceded their leaders insisted that the possession of the rich States of Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri was essential to their success, because without them they could not feed their armies. They lost Missouri in January, and Kentucky in March, and ever since consumed all that Virginia could supply. Texas and Arkansas, both large producers of beef, still continued to draw from them the bulk of the meat used by the rebels during the past sixty days has been drawn. They have now lost Arkansas too, and the question arises, whence can the rebel army in Virginia and the rebel army of the Southwest draw rations?

They can get corn enough, and there is some pork in Alabama, Mississippi, and the other cotton States. But in the Confederacy, as at present bounded, there is no beef. How long can the armies fight without beef?

The rebels comfort themselves by reading accounts of the Whig partisan orgies during the Revolutionary war, and assert their readiness to endure the same privations as were borne by those heroes. But there is a difference, than calculation in this. Marion, leading a small squadron of horse, could manage to exist on sweetpotatoes and the accidental products of occasional foraging expeditions. But when fifty or seventy-five thousand men are to be fed the question of subsistence assumes an entirely different shape. Such an army can not live on sweet-potatoes, nor, if they could, does the favorite Southern dish afford a very large or sufficient quantity to satisfy their wants. A successful foraging expedition may gather food enough to supply a regiment for a few days. But when it comes to feeding brigades and divisions, foraging, in a country already somewhat exhausted by the Revolutionary armies, Armies can only be fed through the agency of a regular commissariat which has depôts of provisions at certain points, and constant and reliable communication with regions where all kinds of food are produced.

If M'Clellan and Halleck remain quietly where they are, the rebellion will be starved out in a few weeks. It is not probable they will do so, because the public require them that the army would be impatient in inactivity. But for the main purpose of the war they need not move.

FOREIGN INTERVENTION.

SOUTHERN bribes have again purchased intimations in European journals to the effect that England and France will actively fight for us this country. As of old, the Emperor Napoleon is represented as panting for intervention, while England is feebly holding him back.

There is not a word of truth in the whole story. The Emperor Napoleon has never declared to intervene on our account. He will not, that intervention, so far from procuring the cotton he needs, would protract the cotton famine indefinitely. The United States would fight for fifty years rather than submit to have their internal politics regulated by foreigners. From first to last the Emperor of the French has prohibited a statesmanlike appreciation of the merits of the war which shines in bright contrast with the mean policy of the British Government, and the besotted opinions of the person his misrepresents France at Washington.

Mr. Gladstone and several leading newspapers expatiate upon the suffering inflicted by the rebel Southern armies. Whose fault is this? As Mr. Seward well said when the war broke out, the rebellion would collapse in ninety days time for the lack of foreign intervention.

The thousands of Englishmen who are starving in consequence of the want of cotton have only their own Government and their own aristocracy to blame. If the British Government had not been so eager to see this country divided and democracy discredited, the rebellion would have been crushed long ago. The iron must needs aid and comfort they gave the rebels which induced the latter to persevere in their insane policy. The British aristocracy is largely responsible for the starvation which now desolates the seats of manufacturing industry in England.

THE LOUNGER.

FREEDOM IN THE TERRITORIES.

THE Thirty-Seventh Congress of the United States has just confirmed the policy of the First Congress, seventy-three years ago. That body declared that "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said Territory, otherwise than in punishment of crimes whereof the parties shall be duly convicted." The act of the present Congress is in similar and even more comprehensive terms: "That slavery, or involuntary servitude, in all cases whatsoever other than in punishment of crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall henceforth cease and be prohibited forever in all the Territories of the United States now existing or hereafter to be formed or to be acquired in any way."

It would be thought that in any civilized Christian State a vote for such a proposition would be unanimous; but in a nation which was a population of slaves it would be a matter of wonder. And yet, while the consequences of slavery are showing themselves in the most desperate and terrible form, there were fifty representatives who voted against it. And to complete the extraordinary scene, the Democratic party rights which no power can justly take away, while their vote upon this act declares that men have no rights except such as the majority may confer. Is that their political faith?

Among the negatives votes are many from the South. If they think slavery a fair, and profitable, and peaceful system for civilized society, we may reject their opinion, but we must applaud their manly fidelity. But if they voted in the negative because they think that although it may be a great wrong for the majority to pass any political enactment to enslave a minority, they have deliberately sanctioned the principle which gives life, liberty, property, and welfare of every man in this State—white, black, yellow, or red—at the mercy of a majority. Such a principle could not only the most dangerous conceivable to human society, but it is directly repugnant to the second letter of the Constitution. Our system is a constant check upon the tyranny of a majority. A striking illustration was the choice of Mayor. The means were unconstitutional election was announced the newspapers, which at that time clamored for the submission of the nation to a rebellious faction, loudly and constantly declared that he had not a majority of all the votes cast. It was true, as the Constitution did not require that he should have. On the other hand, an overpowering majority, or a unanimous vote of the people, would not shorten or lengthen his term by a single year. For the Constitution regulates the rights of majorities. But this is true, but it declares itself to be established to protect those rights of the individual which the Revolution had vindicated.

The enormity of the principle involved in the negatives votes upon Territorial freedom is sufficiently tested. "Leave it to a majority of the people in the Territory" is the argument by which that vote is justified. Leave what? In the words of the bill, "Slavery, or involuntary servitude, in all cases whatsoever other than in punishment for crime." But who are to vote? What possible standard can you set up which will not include those that are enslaved? The bill is that some of the population of the Territory may have been slaves before does not avail, for, by the argument, they are like any other man until the vote is taken.

But if it be a tolerable principle in a Territory that a majority can decide upon the life and other rights of one man or of a minority, it is no less so in a State—in New York, for instance; and if, having in the legal form of the people decided that one or all of the representatives who voted in the negative should be hung, upon their own principle it would be all right. "Ohno!" they would reply. "The State Constitution secures our life and liberty except for crime." Yes, but who are to do so? Simply because you have a natural right to your life and liberty, except for crime. And so has every other man in the whole State, and so majority can override your right in your own State, you see, as well as in Territory. The case that in the National State, or Territory, every man should be as secure as you are. As representatives of this State you were no more entitled in abandoning the rights of men in the Territories, for which you are constitutional legislators, to the will of a majority, than you would be in destroying the safeguards that protect those rights in your own State. Slavery is not something that men enjoy because other men choose that they shall. It is the direct violation of the law of nature.

The majority of voters in this State might constitutionally amend the Constitution, by declaring that the Constitution of the State should be abrogated. Being the majority, and having the power, they might exercise it. What then? Why, suppose it were a majority of every voter in the State—even the blind themselves that decreed it. What then? Why would be the fact then? A crime of the direst conceivable wrong and wickedness. Would it be right, justifiable, human, decent? Would any one whose heart was not black accept the vote on the ground that the majority chose to do it? Not the most instinct politician and demagogue in Africa. But, gentlemen, it is no more valid against the liberty of black men in Nevada than against the lives of blind men in New York. If it is right that the majority should decide in the one case, it can not be wrong in the other.

This is the principle which your votes have sustained. It is the principle of brute force. It is the principle of the King of Dahomey and of Bomba of Naples. It is the denial of human rights. It is the assertion that men owe Liberty to the favor of a majority, and not to the grace of God. And, gentlemen, it is the effort to make that the creed of the Democratic party which has annihilated that party, by driving from it the true Democrats, who held that men have rights as well as majorities.

THE END OF GINGERBREAD.

THE progress of the National victory shows itself to military men less than in the character of the proclamations of the General-in-command in the insurgent section. They are no longer gingerbread. The Government no longer delegates to rebels its enforcing the law. The "Southern brethren" are no longer the loyal citizens of the United States in the revolted region, the proclamations are not addressed to them. They are not desired, for instance, to vote for Andrew Johnson, low, but for such as the Mayor Monroe of New Orleans—for such as the two drinking-cups the skulls of their Northern brethren whom they have murdered, and who whittle the bones of their slain foes into handles for their cheap knives.

It is clearly idle to expect any thing but sullen hatred from the men who have staked every thing upon the arbitrament of battle with the Government, and who have been educated to deem it base when they call themselves by the name the Southern nicknams for those who believe that a State ought to live by the sword of the Union and by the shield of other people. Parson Brownlow says that Tennessee will return to the Union by and by himself—but not as he says so. But meanwhile we remember that Missouri gave nearly eighty thousand majority for the Union secession, and Kentucky on the 17th of May a year ago announced a "Union" victory. The history of the year shows how simply that the minority controlled those States. And the words of the Senators and representatives from those States in a few months will be forgotten. We have no doubt upon their part whether the "Union" before their lines is not entirely conditional—which is the simple doctrine of secession.

In Western Virginia General Fremont has hung two rebels in the act of guerrilla fighting. In New Orleans General Butler has proclaimed martial law under the most stringent conditions. In Tennessee Governor Andrew Johnson has already warned the rebels that he shall retaliate fivefold for all guerrilla warfare. In the Department the South General Hunter has also established martial law. In North Carolina General Burnside has taken similar precautions—issued summary warning to all traitors to seal their mouths, and imposed severe penalties upon a man who wanted to talk politics out of season.

This is pure despotism. This is the arbitrary will of one man in the place of the law. Precisely so. When the rebels invoked war they invoked despotism. War is the appeal to brute force. War crushes out every opinion but that of despotism. If Davis and his friends Vallandigham, and Powell, and Richardson, and Bayard, and the rest of them, in Congress, are very nervous about the violation, as they call it, of the Constitution. To attempt is to destroy it by force—a treasonable fight, according to their logic; but to maintain it by force is its preservation.

But when the Government drew the sword to maintain its authority, it knew that it must use its power unsparingly to be master. It was an instrument to tickle with, but to kill with. And all the while the Government goes with it. When it has thrust open a way for the Government to enter a rebellious region it is used to enforce respect for the Union. The Government, again, takes in friends who have been oppressed. To allow Monroe to talk defiant treason was, under the circumstances, to delude the people for the purposes of suppression of New Orleans as to allow Lovell to hold a battery of Secessionists in the Park. What Lovell would dare to discover himself when a rebel regiments talked pure rebellion to the Government we know not, and can not pretend to have dared. At such times words are things.

The time for which the insurgent section will not spontaneously appear; it must be developed by the conviction of overwhelming superiority of force. When once the conviction that resistance is hopeless the mass will begin to see why they had better submit. This nation will never encounter treason in any savage and unmanly form. And which is now making war upon it. And none know this better than the rebel commanders and politicians section. They are not afraid of irritating the rebels They are the most vehement for vigorous measures. And they are the most at the South for the Government to consider.

PARSON BROWNLOW.

PARSON BROWNLOW'S speech at the Academy of Music ought to be published and scattered every where in the North. It is a most vivid picture and while who can read should read it, and those who can not should hear it. It shows the character of the war together are not such a cordial stimulant. He did not mention the words slavery or slave, but he showed that slavery or more of every evil which such deadly blows at slavery. It was a glimpse of the black interior of Secessia. It was a thrilling picture of the ghastly spirit which engendered and sustains it. "This," cried the wary, lady, sad, tears he passed through, the appealing horrors at which the heart stopped, "this is the spirit of secession, the spirit of murder, of assassination, of death, of hell"—and the audience sank inwardly Amen. "And yet you have among you men who palliate and excuse and defend it." The audience answered with a yell of indignation.

The speaker himself was a living illustration of the spirit of which he had lived. Listening to the intense vindictiveness of his noun and words, it was possible not to think of Browning's Italian, who had seen his brother fall under the bullets of Metternich's soldiers, who had been hated, hunted, exiled, losing every thing under the fell tyranny but life, and who says, calmly, that his utmost hope of happiness is to feel Metternich's

"Red, wet throat distil
In blood through my two hands."

Dr. Brownlow's appearance only deepened the effect. He is not the thick, coarse, loud man that the descriptions and his reported speeches prefigure; but he is tall, wiry, of decided and delicate, though her handsome features, with a touching expression of latent anxiety upon the pale and pensive face. His discourse was what the audience wished—a good sermon. It is the first ordained story of a conspicuous Southern Union man of the terrible days we have just passed through. The dark days of the French Revolution were not blacker. No history can furnish instances of more infernal cruelty than the treatment of men whose crime was loving their country. "Southern brethren," whom Great Britain finds to be a chivalric, refined, injured people, struggling for peaceful liberty against a cruel band of tyrants!

Mr. Brownlow's discourses showed only more clearly the terrible experience, that this is a conflict of civilizations under the same Government; and one of them will inevitably annihilate the other.

THE UNNAMED HEROES.

It is computed that in the field and hospital fifty thousand of our loyal fellow-citizens have already lost their lives in the struggle to uphold this rebellious flag. How many of them, as brave as the bravest, will never be named in history! In the Cricket on the Hearth, a modest little journal published monthly in Philadelphia, there is this touching poem upon one of the unknown soldier-martyrs:

KILLED AT BALL'S BLUFF.

He gave the trifles of a best
To those God hoarded and laid him dear,
And scattered turned—a volunteer—

The citadel stood
To equip his wife, wipe off the shame,
He cared not that the trump of Fame
Should sound about his humble name
In tropes of glory.

For Union, and for equal laws,
For Liberty—the grand old cause;
How could he speak those names and pause,
Faltering, sacrificed?
He knew not what Fate had in store,
Nor used her purpose to explore,
But calmly waited on, before
Her awful mystery.

All on a morning cold and gray,
Upon that sad October day,
He stood amidst the dewy array
Silent and steady,
Around him fell the iron hail,
He heard his dying comrades' wail,
But heart and purpose did not fail,
For he was ready.

He fought and died. A nameless grave
Where no sad willows o'er him wave,
Or sculptured stone extols brave
In chiseled numbers
Was his. The birds at morn symphonize,
The solemn murmur of the trees,
The sighing of the evening breeze,
Mar not his slumbers.

He died for Liberty; the time
Shows many another death sublime,
For his sake may my homely rhyme
Be all forgiven.
We trust he stands beside the Throne,
Martyr to Freedom! not alone,
That his forgotten name is known
In Heaven.

THE LIFE OF IRVING.

Good fortune followed Washington Irving while he lived, and did not desert him when he died. On the bank which he selected for the task writes his biography. The first volume of the three that were prepared, bringing the story of his life down to the publication of the "Sketch Book." With characteristic good sense Mr. Pierre M. Irving, the biographer, suffers the letters of Irving to show what he was and what he did, so far as possible, for with the exception of a very clear and simple narrative they furnish a very lovely picture of the life and growth of the author. And they tell two years ago more personally beloved than any American.

The life is without special incident; but the story is one of his pen, even in the young man's letters, written every day of total rest or devotion to the vocation and gayety which constantly remind the reader that the hand is the same hand which a little later wrote the tales that charm by their delicate humanity of spirit no less than by their simplicity and grace of style. He went at the beginning of the century to Europe, "pasturing on the pleasures" of such spot. There is no striking remark upon art, or literature, or literary or political men, only in his letters; but there is a freshness and devotion of appreciation, and a shrewd humorous comment which indicate the healthy mind and the eye of genius.

So human was ever more truly simple than Washington Irving. During the last twenty years he was the most celebrated of living Americans; but he was always fond of quoting the saying of one of them in their latter days, when, upon looking in a magazine, he spoke of the talent displayed by so many younger men, and, winking playfully, said, "Well, it is lucky, Moore, that we began when we did!"

But Irving, like Scott, would have been always sadly first. The peculiar qualities of his talent are those which secure permanent renown. And they, like Lamb, and Sir Thomas Browne, and George Herbert, are sure of constant affection as of perpetual admiration.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"Once," says Irving, "I was in Ingolstadt." "A clothes-line, for sure," says Tommy. "Because it stretches from Ingo to Stadt," said young Hopeful.

All liars would seem to be bankrupt laws; they are always every day.

Why is a kiss like a rumor?—Because it goes from mouth to mouth.

Among the conditions of sale by an auctioneer was the following: "The highest bidder to be the buyer, unless some gentleman bids more."

A celebrated author of the present day, who is remarkable for the flatness of his nose, was urging his suit with a lady of his acquaintance, when she replied, "Sir, you are—you are—I never can get over that nose of yours!" "I dare say," he replied, "but I should be very happy to act as your bridge to it!" In cases of Wit vs. Beauty, wit is sure of a verdict, and the lady withdrew her refusal.

"Captain Silk! What a name for a soldier!" "The finest names in the world for a captain," said a lady; "for silk will never be wounded."

Voltaire related to Mr. Sherlock an anecdote of Swift. Lady Carteret, wife of the Lord-Lieutenant, said to Swift, "Mr. Dean, why do you call me Madam, and not Madame?" "Madam," said Swift, "don't say so in England; for if you do they will think you a whore."

A young lady who lately gave an order to a milliner for a bonnet, said: "You are to make it plain, and at the same time smart, so as to be a complement to my face."

Among the rules and regulations which are posted up at the entrance of the Vienna theatres is the following: "Persons who introduce into the theatre dogs, or anything else to the Emperor and the Imperial Family, it is not to be thought, are guilty of an outrage or infraction of order."

A young officer of the Lord Verlaglen rebel went to Drury Lane to see the great tragedian, Charles Kean, in "Hamlet." He was much affected by the pathos and solemn tragedy, and on being asked how he liked it, he said, "Why, it's a very clever play, but I think it's too full of quotations!"

The man who plays at once on the trump o'thne and the horn of it is different from the man who plays on the one, eg a hay-cock crew while he was tying a knot in a cord of wood.

When Madge was a very little girl, her father found her chubby hands full of the blossoms of a beautiful tea-rose on which he was very fond of smelling. The ball provoke him, he didn't tell you not to pick one of those flowers with-out asking me?" "Why, papa," said the little darling, "I thought all these had leaves."

Simplicity sometimes very ludicrous in their significance. We remember a poem in which a lover cast a horrified glance, when he discovered that his fair one was a wavy-truth was cut into calves, instead of halves. And in Shaver's collection of anecdotes we find a gentleman who absolutely substituted for day in the following absurd manner:

"And bridle shall seize his hat bladder to day (to-day),
When pull a hair up by the roots (rooster crow)."

Tears at a wedding are only the commencement of the pickle that the young folks are getting into.

"Mamma," said an inquisitive little lady of some six summers, "what is a mother-in-law?" "She is a step-in Hot, my dear!" mmmm answered, "what makes you think it is hot?" "Why, mamma, I have just been reading about the boiling waves."

"What do they mean by a 'cut and dap life?' said a husband to his wife, after reading a letter from a friend who is living on the rug together. I wish men lived half so peaceably together as they do in Turkey." "Why, my dear," said the wife, "they have a great many wives."

A young man, on being asked by his sweet-heart what was the difference between love and friendship, answered: "Telling her that was phonography: "F R A B U T, L N E" (You are a beauty, Ellen).

Which is the wickedest part of the church?—The nave.

It is said that the wheel of fortune revolves for all; but many of us are hitched to the spokes.

"I can seem to walk more erect than usual, my friend." "Yes, I have been lately straightened by circumstances."

What is that which makes all women equally pretty?—Putting the middle out.

"I'll take the responsibility," as Jenks said when he held out his arms for the baby.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why was literature more likely to be void of novel-writing than Warren?

Because Addison wrote "Cato," Night Thoughts, and Warren only "Ana and Thoughts."

My first if you'll borrow,
My second will keep you from heaven;
My third is a pronoun,
Very seldom is taken when given.

What game is like a bustle?
Backgammon.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, May 13, in the Senate, the Pacific Railroad bill was reported back by the Select Committee. The bill was amended by the insertion of Indiana who have elected civilized habits was passed. A joint resolution providing for the appointment of another Chaplain of house to was adopted. In the House, the Senate's amendments to the bill establishing the Bureau of Agriculture were concurred in, and the bill passed. The Soldiers' Pension bill was passed by 82 to 57. The Congressional Globe reporters and mails between New York and Washington was ordered, and the bill to facilitate the same passed.

On Wednesday, May 14, in the Senate, the resolution relative to the Secretary of War and Commander of the West, owing to the great frauds perpetrated, until an investigation can be had, was discussed, but no action taken. A resolution requesting the President to inform the Senate whether any officers have been appointed in the Army since the 4th of March, was passed. Mr. Grimes introduced a supported a bill. Senator Trumbull offered a resolution, which was laid over, that under the rule of the Senate, to inform the Senate, if contested with the public interests, any information he may have of the number of men in favor of say foreign Power to intervene in the contest now existing, and whether any such Power has made any arrangements with the insurgents, or has it in contemplation to do so. The Pacific Railroad bill was discussed. A Confederation reported two bills. The first bill provides for the payment of claims for property taken by military or hereafter holding office under the so-called Confederate States Government. The second bill provides that the proceedings to be the same as in the case of prizes or forfeitures under the confiscation act, and that the proceeding to be driven by the President by proclamation. Of all persons engaged in the rebellion, except those of the highest rank, and hereafter discharged from servitude. The bills were laid over for consideration and printing. A resolution calling on the Secretary of the Interior for information relative to the number of negroes in the District, and future was adopted. The Army Appropriation bill was passed. An amendment to the bill, prohibiting the arming of negroes, and their employment in the military service, was rejected.

On Thursday, May 15, in the Senate, the Territorial Committee reported back the House bill to provide a temporary government for Arizona. The House bill prohibiting slavery in the Territories was also reported back, with an amendment which changes the language of the bill so as to declare slavery void. The amendment was agreed, which last clause was stricken out. The bill was passed. In the House a number of iron-clad vessels under contract, the character of their armament, and when they will be ready for service. A resolution was also offered inquiring as to the rights and obligations of the United States and Great Britain in the suppression of the Northern Indies.——In the House, the bill for the additional compensation to officers and soldiers in the field, and to the officers and soldiers of the troops of the United States during the rebellion was taken up, discussed, and the subject postponed till Monday next.

On Friday, May 16, in the Senate, Senator Sherman offered a joint resolution, to the effect that neither the Kansas Investigating Committee nor the Naval Investigating Committee, upon both of which he served, ever charged or received a cent of compensation or mileage for their labors. Senator Grimes offered a bill, which was referred to the Select Committee providing for the confiscation of the property of rebels. The bill was agreed to by a vote of 29 to 13. Senator Trumbull, of Illinois, said the first section, which provides for the confiscation of the property of rebels holders, was unconstitutional. He opposed the amendment of treason, and was unconstitutional. He opposed the amendment to be voted on. Senator Doolittle, of Kentucky, moved to amend the first section by striking out the clause, "and all persons engaged in the rebellion," as the Administration on hand labor for not less than five nor more than twenty years. Bill, passed by the Senate, obliged her to vote of 7 yeas to 31 nays. Senator Howard, of Michigan, moved to strike out the clause declaring forfeited the slaves of those who incite, engage in, or aid in the rebellion, as the clause was a usurpation of the powers of the Executive. This was rejected—yeas 8, nays 32. Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the section by striking out the clause "and be forever free," and his amendment was rejected. The bill provides that the steamship Pembroke, with all the cargo, appurtenances, &c., be forfeited to the United States. The bill provides that no one shall be voted for the Presidency or Vice-President who has been engaged in the Rebellion. The bill provides that the slaves of rebels become free. Senator Howard moved to make it applicable to the slaves of rebels in the District of Columbia. That effect. The discussion was continued; but without taking the question the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the special committee on the subject reported articles of impeachment against Judge Humphreys, Judge of the District Court of the United States for Tennessee. Humphreys is charged with gross neglect of official duty, violation of the laws, endeavoring to incite revolt and rebellion, publishing proclamations, and joining Tennessee, combining with Jeff Davis and others to overthrow the Government of the United States, and with other high crimes and misdemeanors. The report was accepted, and a resolution offered directing the Judiciary Committee of the committee of five to conduct the impeachment. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Army Appropriation bill, and a lengthy speech on the same topic. The Naval Appropriation bill was considered, and a proviso to the appropriation for the Naval Academy, declaring its present location at Newport, Rhode Island, to be permanent, was adopted. The bill was then passed by the House. It embraces appropriations for the naval service to the amount of $42,000,000.

THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The following proclamation by the President of the United States is published:

Whereas, there appears in the public prints what purports to be a message of Major-General Hunter, in the words and figures following, to wit:

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE SOUTH,
HILTON HEAD, S. C., May 9, 1862.

The three States of Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina, comprising the Department of the South, having deliberately declared themselves no longer under the protection of the United States of America, and having taken up arms against the said United States, it becomes a military necessity to declare them under martial law. This was accordingly done on the 25th day of April, 1862. Slavery and martial law in a free country are altogether incompatible. The persons in these three States—Georgia, South Carolina, and Florida—heretofore held as slaves, are therefore forever free.

By Order of DAVID HUNTER, Major-General Commanding.
WM. W. DUDLEY, Assistant Adjutant-General.

And whereas, the same is producing some excitement and misunderstanding.

Therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, proclaim and declare that the Government of the United States will maintain the said view, and will not recognize or uphold any such proclamation or declaration. The, nor has it yet any authentic information that the document is genuine. And further, that neither General Hunter nor any other commander or person has been authorized by the Government of the United States to make proclamation declaring the slaves of any State free, and that the supposed proclamation now in question, whenever genuine or false, is altogether void so far as respects such supposed authority.

I further make known, that whether it be competent for me, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to declare the slaves of any State or States free, and whether at any time, or in any case, it shall have become a necessary indispensable to the maintenance of the Government to exercise such supposed power, are questions which, under my responsibility, I reserve to myself, and which I cannot feel justified in leaving to the decision of commanders in the field. These are totally different questions from those of police regulations in armies and camps.

On the 6th day of March last, by a special message, I recommended to Congress the adoption of a joint resolution, to be substantially as follows:

Resolved, That the United States ought to co-operate with any State which may adopt gradual abolishment of slavery, giving to such State, in its discretion, compensation in the bonds of the United States equivalent to the loss of such change of system.

The resolution, in the language above quoted, was adopted by large majorities in both branches of Congress, and now stands an authentic and official proposal from the nation to the States and people most immediately interested in the subject matter. To the people of those States I now most earnestly and respectfully address myself. I have neither power nor inclination to force upon any unwilling people any change in their social condition. But I strongly believe that any change it contemplates would come greatly as the dews of heaven, not rending or wrecking any thing. Will you not embrace it? So much good has not been done by one effort in all past time as in the Providence of God it is now your high privilege to do. May the vast future not have to lament that you have neglected it.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, the 19th day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, and of the Independence of the United States the eight-sixth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President.—WM. H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S ADVANCE.

General M'Clellan's army has thrown up the siege to Richmond, by way of Burton's Bridge, drove the enemy across the Chickahominy, and that point on the morning. When the troops arrived within half a mile of the bridge, which is burned, they were opened upon by a brisk fire of artillery from the opposite side of the river. This bridge is fifteen miles from Richmond. At this point it is said that our troops will experience considerable difficulty, as the country is low and swampy.

NORTH CAROLINA RE-SECEDING.

General Burnside, the Executive of North Carolina, has refused to furnish any more troops to Jeff Davis, and has revoked all the commissions issued under the rebel army. North Carolina has held a Convention of its citizens and pronounced against giving further aid to the rebellion, thus virtually relegating to the Union. In reply to the letter of Jeff Davis for additional troops and means of transportation for his army to and through the eastern part of North Carolina, he said that he could not at present do so from North Carolina that he could expect, and that hereafter no troops would be furnished from that State. Gen. Burnside, and his staff, have left Raleigh for their home. Governor Clark also informed the rebels that they could use the railroads in returning home, and that they would run their own risk of being intercepted by a force of the army of the Union.

THE ARMIES OF THE SOUTHWEST.

The latest advices from Pittsburg Landing state that General Pope's army has safely reached there, and are occupies a position only three miles from Corinth. Reports from deserters state that the rebels are evacuating that place through fear of attack. A great deal of feeling is said to exist between the Missouri and Tennessee troops under Generals Pope and Buell. Gen. Schenck writes saying that they have nothing to fight for, their States having been restored to the Union, and they see no reason why they should be enrolled to fight for the independence of the Cotton States. Reinforcements are daily arriving at Pittsburg from Corinth, who are frequently in Memphis, completely liberty of that city to the Southern citizens. Guerrilla bands are still in the field, but are making no attack upon them. Memphis, Tenn., is now a free city. Every day that passes weakens him. He has received all the reinforcements that it is possible for him to receive, excepting raw levies, while sickness rages throughout his army. Reinforcements are daily arriving at Pittsburg and its opposites across the river, and the Memphis and Ohio railroad is permitted to send any written communication to his friends. He is now a whole country, for one hundred miles below Corinth, has been swept to obtain supplies for the rebel army, and it is now nearly exhausted. Heavy reinforcements from this cause are anticipated. On 14th the engagement between Tennessee and Kentucky made an attempt to come over to the Union army, and a portion of the Kentucky regiment on the other side fired on them. The advance from our lines went over in force to aid the Kentucky loyal soldiers, and ordered a bringing of some sixty of them.

GENERAL MITCHELL AT WORK.

A dispatch to the War Department from General Mitchell, dated at his head-quarters, Huntsville, Alabama, contains the encouraging intelligence that a portion of his command, under Colonel Turchin, has driven the forces of the rebels across the Tennessee River, taken possession of Hopewell's, opposite, a portion of his troops, and, having proceeded to Reed Creek, seized the bridge and ferry boat on the road to Decatur. General Mitchell continues to say: "No more troops will enter from that region, and we expect any hour upon that and every river or fifteen hundred cavalry of the enemy, in bands of three or four hundred men each, to attempt to cross and destroy, or capture. The gun-boat which I have extemporized will be ready for service to-day, and will soon be able to pay my respects to the enemy on the eastern side of the mountain and river."

BEAUREGARD GIVES UP.

The rebel leaders have virtually acknowledged the loss of the Mississippi Valley. On the 17th ult. the following rebel address from Beauregard was published in the Memphis papers:

TO PLANTERS SOUTH.

The casualties of war have opened the Mississippi to our enemies. They have thus severed from the rest the varieties of all chains, and I call on all patriotic planters to recognize in the present the positive necessities to apply the torch to it without delay or hesitation.

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

CURTIS IN ARKANSAS.

Of General Curtis's movements the St. Louis Republican of May 12 says: "We heard little in saying that he is, or will be, in a few days, in the heart of the State of Arkansas, with all his cavalry and artillery, and that his infantry force is very soon reach Batesville. It is necessary to "retake and possess" the Arsenal at Little Rock, and that will be accomplished without bloodshed by the reconstituted.

UNION MEETING AT NASHVILLE.

The Union feeling at Nashville was demonstrated very forcibly on May 13, by a large meeting of citizens in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in which many leading gentlemen of that part of the State participated, including representatives from Memphis. Resolutions were adopted by acclamation, setting forth the fidelity and loyalty of the people to the Union, and the necessity of a prompt and vigorous prosecution of the war to secure the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws. Governor Johnson was present, and addressed the meeting in a speech of great power and eloquence, in which he said that the Government of the United States would be sustained in the future, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws.

REMOVAL OF THE CAPITAL.

The Union feeling at Nashville was demonstrated very forcibly on May 13, by a large meeting of citizens in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in which many leading gentlemen of that part of the State participated, including representatives from Memphis. Resolutions were adopted by acclamation, setting forth the fidelity and loyalty of the people to the Union, and the necessity of a prompt and vigorous prosecution of the war to secure the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws. Governor Johnson was present, and addressed the meeting in a speech of great power and eloquence, in which he said that the Government of the United States would be sustained in the future, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws.

REMOVAL OF THE CAPITAL.

The Union feeling at Nashville was demonstrated very forcibly on May 13, by a large meeting of citizens in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in which many leading gentlemen of that part of the State participated, including representatives from Memphis. Resolutions were adopted by acclamation, setting forth the fidelity and loyalty of the people to the Union, and the necessity of a prompt and vigorous prosecution of the war to secure the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws. Governor Johnson was present, and addressed the meeting in a speech of great power and eloquence, in which he said that the Government of the United States would be sustained in the future, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws.

REMOVAL OF THE CAPITAL.

The Union feeling at Nashville was demonstrated very forcibly on May 13, by a large meeting of citizens in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in which many leading gentlemen of that part of the State participated, including representatives from Memphis. Resolutions were adopted by acclamation, setting forth the fidelity and loyalty of the people to the Union, and the necessity of a prompt and vigorous prosecution of the war to secure the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws. Governor Johnson was present, and addressed the meeting in a speech of great power and eloquence, in which he said that the Government of the United States would be sustained in the future, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws. He said that the Government would not be overthrown, and that the people of the South must submit to the laws.

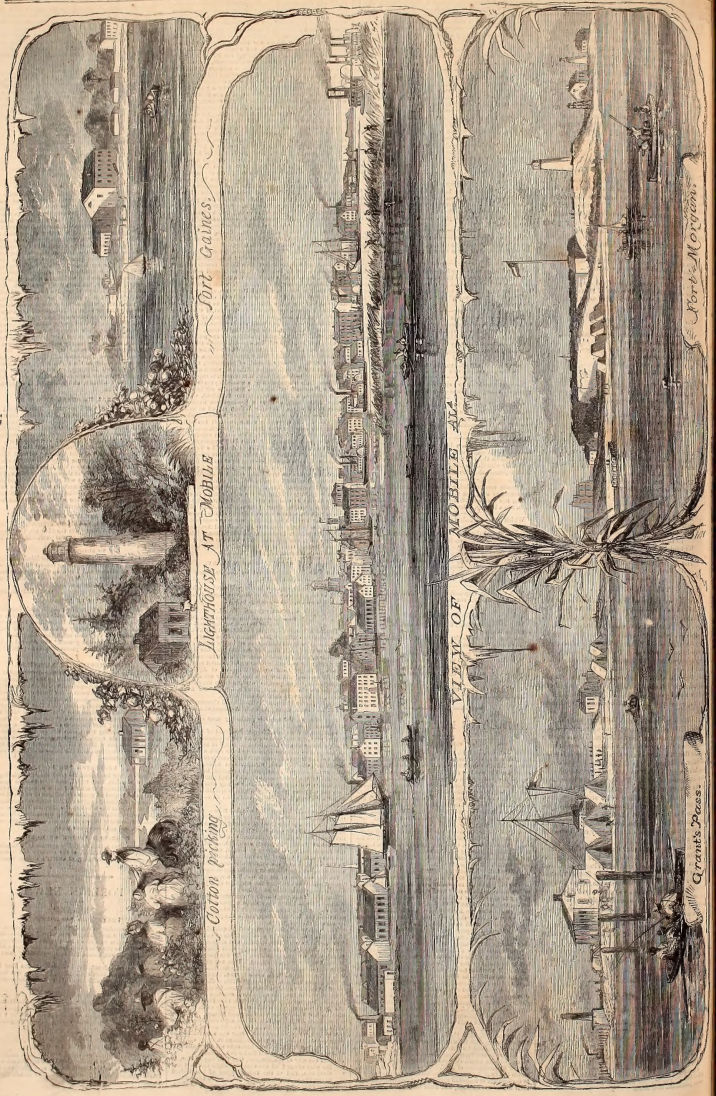
FOREIGN NEWS

ENGLAND

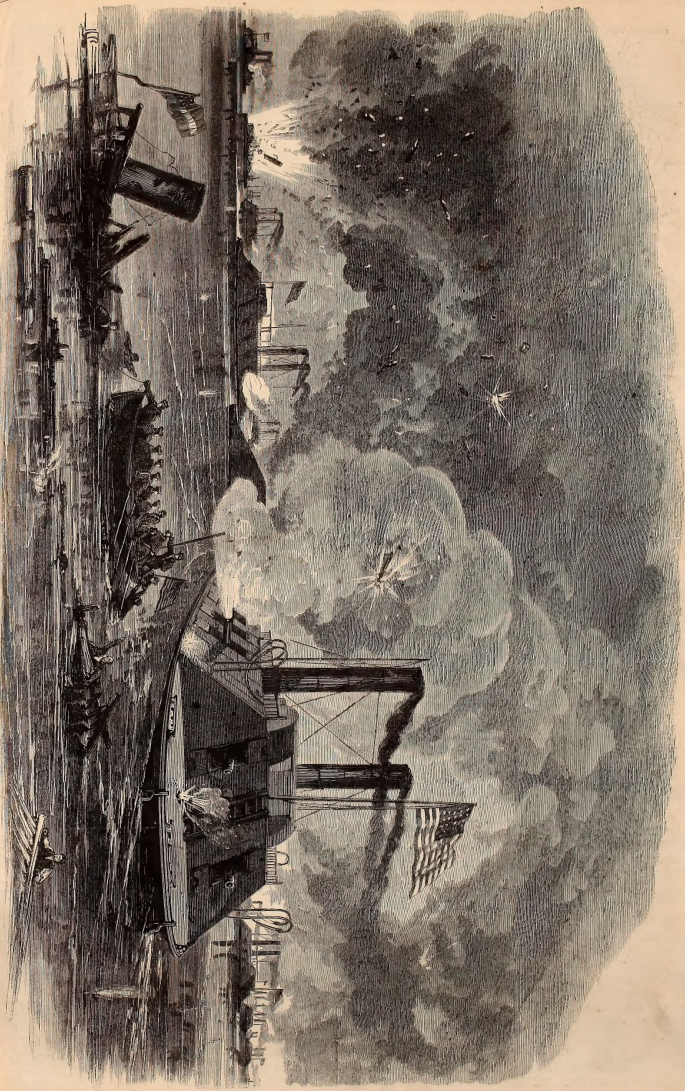
PREVAILING SICKNESS.

A LARGE number of the destitute English artizans, who met lately at Ashton-under-Lyne, moved an amendment to the resolution calling on the Cabinet to recognize the rebel States, to the effect that England and France be requested to join the United States in "crushing" down the rebellion.

The influential deputation had shown to the Poor Law Board in London that the existing law was inadequate to relieve the distress existing among the operative classes.



COAST DEFENSES.



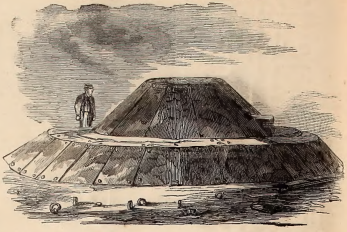
The Palmerston Cabinet has intimated to the House of Commons that members will enjoy an ample opportunity of discussing the subject of national defenses, as a new law for defensive purposes will be shortly proposed to them.

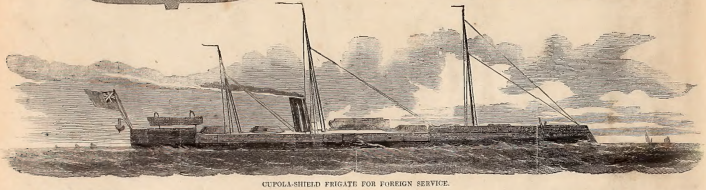
FRANCE.

THE EXPEDITION TO MEXICO.

The Paris Moniteur publishes a letter from Mexico, in which it is stated, as a probability, that the French army will not take possession of the capital on the 5th of May. The Spanish troops joining them have evacuation at Puebla.

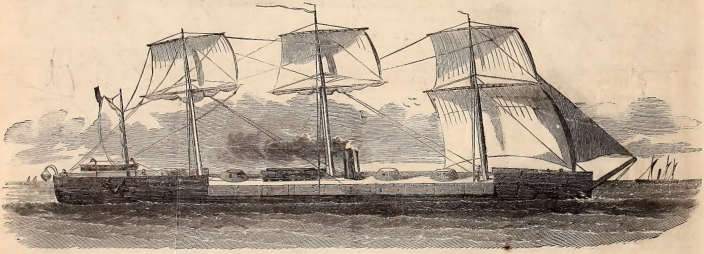
Cotton Burning
Lighthouse at Mobile
Fort Gaines
View of Mobile &c.
Fort Morgan
Grants Pass.



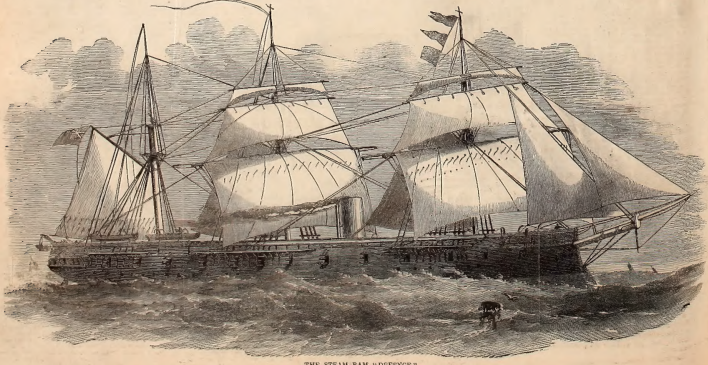


BRITISH IRON-CLAD SHIPS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

SECTIONAL VIEW OF A THREE-DECKER CUT DOWN TO A CUPOLA SHIP.



CUPOLA SHIELD AFTER GUN-PRACTICE AGAINST IT.



CUPOLA-SHIELD FRIGATE FOR FOREIGN SERVICE.

LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIP CUT DOWN TO A CUPOLA-SHIELD SHIP.

THE STEAM RAM "DEFENCE."

MY ABSENT SOLDIER.

EVENING shades are falling, dearest!
  Night is coming on;
And the sweet stars look out shyly,
  Slowly, one by one;
And I count them with my forehead
  Pressed against the pane,
And thinking of the time, dearest,
  When we shall meet again!

When I fold my hands, dearest,
  To breathe a good-night prayer,
Whose name is it that lingers longest
  Upon the evening air?
Yours! And then I slumber sweetly,
  For I know our Lord
Through the night's long hours of darkness
  Hath you in his ward.

How much I think of you, dearest!
  I know that very oft
My features rise before you,
  And then your voice grows soft:
They do not know the reason
  It thrills and trembles so;
'Tis the beautiful heart music
  That makes it sweet and low.

God bless you, my own darling!
  And keep you pure and fair;
May the calm glory of your eyes
  Be darkened by no care.
Your love—the dearest, next to God's!
  Your worth—my highest pride!
Good angels guard your homeward steps,
  And haste you to my side!

But if—Ah, God! the bitter thought—
  You should not come again;
If you should lie out in the night
  Among the battle's slain!
I could not bear such anguish, love,
  For all that I could do;
I know my widowed heart would break,
  And I should perish too!

BRITISH IRON-CLAD VESSELS.

THE exploits of the Monitor and the Merrimac have roused the British to the necessity of bringing up their navy to the modern standard, and accordingly we find that iron-clad vessels are being rapidly constructed at all the British dock-yards. We give, on page 342, several illustrations of the new iron-clad ships which are being constructed. The ship which the English seem to consider the most formidable of their new fleet is the Defence—an iron-clad steam ram, carrying guns. We condense the following account of the Defence from the British papers:

She was built for the Government by Messrs. Palmer, of Jarrow, on the Tyne, and is of the following dimensions: Length between perpendiculars, 280 feet; breadth, 54 feet; depth of hold, 18 feet 3 inches; burden in tons, 3668; with engines of 600-horse power.

The Defence recently returned to Spithead after a trial-trip of nineteen days; a week of that time she lay in Plymouth Sound, so that but twelve days were spent in ascertaining he qualities at sea. Thanks to the proverbially changeable nature of the weather at this season of the year, the time, brief as it was, afforded many good opportunities of testing her. The wind, though never violent, was at times sufficiently strong to designate it a gale, and to cause a rather heavy sea. Her conduct under these circumstances was excellent evidence as to her capability to encounter worse or even the worst of weather. It is stated that her good qualities as a ship of war exceeded the expectations of all who had to do with her.

Her steering qualities, without being so bad as has been represented, are doubtless inferior; her symptoms are precisely those of a ship too much immersed, being sluggish in answering her helm, and apt to take broad shears when her head once makes a start.

The quantity of canvas she spreads is very small in proportion to her tonnage; nevertheless she is perfectly manageable under sail, and attains a speed of about two-thirds the usual rate of sailing of an ordinary frigate. Under steam her greatest speed is about eleven knots.

She is described as being remarkably easy in a seaway. No wooden ship would have the smallest chance against the Defence if the latter could use her guns or her prow. The projectiles thrown by the Defence would speedily fire a timber-built ship, and her formidable stem would certainly crush in the side of any such vessel.

The most popular class of vessels in England at present, however, are imitations of Captain Ericsson's Monitor, adapted by a Captain Coles, who modestly claims the invention as his own. We give a picture of a "CUPOLA SHIELD FRIGATE FOR FOREIGN SERVICE," from Captain Coles's models. This vessel is to be 260 feet long, 45 feet beam, 21 feet draught, and 1000-horse power. She is to carry four 150-pounder Armstrongs, or eight 110-pounders, and her bow is to be heavily armed with iron, so as to enable her to be used as a ram at close quarters. The first of these cupola-shield frigates is to be launched in February, 1863.

Captain Coles not only proposes to build new cupola-shield frigates, but professes his capacity to cut down line-of-battle ships into Monitors. We publish an illustration of one of the great BRITISH LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIPS CUT DOWN according to his plans, and likewise a sectional view of the same. The vessel, as razeed, will be 250 feet long, 58 feet beam, 23 feet draught, and 1000-horse power. She will carry five 150-pounders, or ten 110-pounders, Armstrongs.

A small diagram, on the same page, shows the effects of gun-practice against one of Captain Cowper Coles's cupolas. It does not seem to have been much injured; but perhaps the guns were small of their kind.

The first of Captain Coles's ships will be launched in February, 1863. By that time the United States will have 35 iron-clads afloat, including at least twelve Monitors.

THE BATTLE AT FORT DARLING.

WE illustrate on page 337 the unequal conflict between our gun-boats Galena and Monitor and a powerful rebel fort called Fort Darling, on the banks of the James River, some seven miles from Richmond. It seems that our gun-boats Galena, Monitor, Aroostook, Port Royal, and Naugatuck advanced up the James River to within seven miles of Richmond, passing or silencing the batteries as they advanced. At Fort Darling they found the river obstructed with sunken vessels and stones, and were exposed to a heavy plunging fire from a fort situate on a bluff 200 feet high. The Naugatuck burst her gun—a 100-pounder Parrott—at the 7th fire. The wooden vessels sheered off, being incapable of standing the fire from the fort and the rifle-pits with which the river shores were lined. For four hours the Galena and Monitor fought the forts at great disadvantage. They were exposed to a plunging fire which they were not built to withstand; the deck of the Galena was perforated by almost every shot, and her loss in killed and wounded was heavy. Neither vessel could elevate her guns sufficiently to silence the batteries of Fort Darling. After four hours' fighting the squadron therefore withdrew.

Commodore Goldsborough has since gone up the the river with his squadron and some mortar-boats, with which it is believed he will soon be able to take Fort Darling and clear the way to Richmond.

RICHMOND, MEMPHIS, AND MOBILE.

WE publish in this week's paper views of three rebel cities, all of which we hope to be able to report have fallen into the hands of our brave troops by the time our next paper is published.

RICHMOND.

On pages 344 and 345 we give RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, THE REBEL CAPITAL, together with Vignettes of the various PRISONS in which so many of our poor brothers have languished during the past year. The following account will be read with interest:

Richmond is situated on the James River, 23 miles north of Petersburg, 113 south by west of Washington, and about 150 miles from the mouth of the river. Its population in 1854 was 30,000; its exports about $3,000,000, chiefly wheat and tobacco.

The principal feature that strikes every one who sees Richmond for the first time is its curious topography. From the James River, which, tumbling over its rocky bed, makes a wide bend here, with its convex face to the city, rise, without any regard to uniformity of direction, some half dozen hills of gravel formation and of pretty considerable elevation. There has never been any attempt to grade them into level streets, but the city is scattered promiscuously up and on and over them, just as fashion, taste, or business may have happened to dictate. The principal part of the city, however, occupies actually only one of those elevations, and the garden spot of that one is the Capitol Square, where stands the building of which Jefferson procured the design in France, but which, however magnificent it may have been deemed in the simple, unostentatious days in which it was built, is certainly not to be lauded now either for its beauty or for its adaptation to the wants of a State Legislature, much less to those of a Congress of Confederate States. In the centre of the Square is the beautiful equestrian statue of Washington, looking as calm and serene and commanding as if the city which he overlooks was not the centre and hot-bed of the foulest treason that ever showed itself in the light of day. The pedestal is designed for eight other statues of distinguished Virginians, but three of which have yet been put in their places. These are Jefferson, Henry, and Mason—not the arrogant, self-conceited blockhead who recently represented the State in the Senate at Washington, and has now gone seeking recognition at London as the diplomatic representative of secessiondom, but a far purer, wiser, and more patriotic namesake of his. Here also is a small statue of Henry Clay.

Richmond has really but one business thoroughfare. That is Main Street. Most of the hotels, banks, newspaper offices, and stores are located on it. It extends northward into the open country, and southeastward to a suburb called Rocketts. In this latter section of it are situated some of the tobacco warehouses where our Union prisoners are now confined. These are large old brick edifices, of mouldy, dilapidated appearance. They stand three together on one side of the street—which here is of a most dingy character—and two nearly opposite. Those on the north side are overlooked by the bluffs in which Church Hill here terminates, and which supply gravel for the city, while those on the south side of the street have the James River and Kanawha Canal, and the river itself immediately in their rear.

Near the summit of the elevation known as Church Hill is a large, old-fashioned brick building known as the almshouse. It has been converted from its original purpose, and now serves as a hospital for our sick and wounded. Sisters of Charity come and go, untiring angels of consolation, and the hearse is kept in constant requisition, so great is the mortality that prevails here. Many of the private houses in the vicinity are also converted into temporary hospitals. As a general thing, the former residents of this part of the city have gone elsewhere since the location of the hospitals here; and now on every tenth house or more you see waving a little dirty, whitish-yellow flag, denoting a lazaretto. The Odd Fellows' Hall, on Broad Street, is also used as a general hospital. On the most commanding part of Church Hill still stands, in good preservation too, the church in which Patrick Henry made the famous speech at the commencement of the Revolutionary struggle, where he used that memorable and oft-quoted phrase, "Give me liberty, or give me death!" Around the church are the graves of the last generation of the people of Richmond, and I was no little disgusted to observe that few of the head-stones had escaped the profane Vandalism of some scoundrels, who, as a proof of their wit, cut the figure "1" before the figures recording the ages of the deceased, making it appear that those who rested here from their labors had enjoyed incredibly patriarchal length of years.

Between this hill and the rickety suburb known as Rocketts there is a large encampment, and I believe there are also batteries here, for the defense of the river. I know that there certainly are batteries on the bluffs, above and beyond Rocketts. Near here the few steamers and sailing craft that used to trade to Richmond had their mooring-places, and here also the James River and Kanawha Canal has its southern outlet into the river. This is a great work of internal improvement, so far as the design is concerned; but, unfortunately for Virginia, her execution does not keep pace with her plans, and the canal, though open for many years, does not come within a long distance of the Kanawha River, which it was intended to tap. If it ever will do so, it must be after secession is crushed and the Union restored.

MOBILE.

Mobile, Alabama, of which we give several views on page 340, is one of the largest cities on the Gulf. It is on the junction of the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers, at the head of Mobile Bay.

The city is an old one, having been held successively by the British and Spaniards before it came into our possession.

The city is built upon a plateau elevated some fifteen feet above high-water-mark, thirty miles from the mouth of Mobile Bay, the entrance to this bay being protected by Forts Morgan and Gaines.

Fort Morgan was known as Fort Boyer during the war of 1812, when the gallant Major Lawrence defended it successfully against repeated attacks both by land and sea. The fort since then has been rebuilt and strengthened, and was but a short time since one of the most picturesque and interesting of our sea-coast defenses. In shape it is a pentagon trace, built upon regular angles, protected on the sea front by a strong water-battery of masonry and turf. The greater number of the guns of the fort are Columbiads of heavy calibre, with an occasional rifle upon a salient. A bomb-proof citadel in the centre of the fort, pierced for musketry, affords a secure retreat during a bombardment, as well as a dernier resort from a successful storming party. The fort and water-battery, with their full armament, mount forty-five guns.

Fort Gaines, the other fort which protects Mobile, is situated on Dauphin's Island Point, three miles and one-fourth from and nearly opposite Fort Morgan. This fort was under construction at the outbreak of the rebellion, and, if finished, would have mounted eighty-nine guns.

The rebels, making a virtue of necessity, have now deferred its completion, and are making use of those portions nearly finished, which, with the sand-batteries that have been erected, make them exceedingly confident of their ability to sustain and withstand any attack that may be made upon them.

Grant's Pass is the one through which the New Orleans steamers used to puff their way before the regularity of their trips were interfered with by a healthy fear for their safety; for truth to say, the probability is that a steamer would make but a small portion of her journey now ere she fell into the safe keeping of one of the many gun-boats that compose our Gulf squadron. This pass has been fortified and protected in the best manner possible under the circumstances, sand-batteries having been erected upon either side of the little island upon which the keeper of the pass and light used to live.

MEMPHIS.

Memphis, Tennessee, of which we give a view on page 348, is probably by this time in possession of our forces. The following description of the place is accurate:

Memphis, previous to the rebellion, was a flourishing city and port of entry of Shelby County, Tennessee, and is beautifully situated on the Mississippi River, just below the mouth of the Wolf River. It is located on what is known as the fourth Chickasaw Bluff, which is about forty feet high nearest the shore. It is distant from St. Louis about four hundred and twenty miles by water, and from Nashville about two hundred and nine miles, in a west-southwesterly direction. It was at one time considered the most populous and important town on the river between St. Louis and New Orleans, and occupies the only eligible site for a commercial dépôt from the mouth of the Ohio to Vicksburg—a distance of at least six hundred and fifty miles. The bluff on which the city stands, and before alluded to, is elevated about thirty feet above the highest floods, and its base is washed by the river for a distance of three miles; a bed of sandstone projects into the stream and forms a complete, convenient, and natural steamboat landing. The appearance of Memphis from the river is exceedingly fine. An esplanade, several hundred feet wide, extends along the bluff in front of the town, and is bordered with blocks of large warehouses. The population, since 1854, has doubled itself, and was still rapidly increasing when the troubles commenced. It contains several churches, an academy, a medical college, two banks, and a telegraph office. A naval dépôt was established there by the United States Government, but proved a failure. The river is, however, deep enough to float a very large ship-of-war, and the rebels have taken advantage of the money expended by the United States Government to use the Navy-yard for the purpose of building vessels to oppose their navy. The means of communication to and from the city are good, and the trade of the place has been excellent. In 1840, the population was 3300: in 1850 it had increased to 8841, and in 1853 it was estimated at 12,000. What it now is can not be definitely stated.

THE SKIRMISH AT PEA RIDGE, TENNESSEE.

WE illustrate on page 348 a remarkable incident of the Battle of Pea Ridge, Tennessee, when the Eighth Missouri Regiment charged over the Eighteenth Regulars—the latter being composed of raw recruits, and showing an unwillingness to charge. The artist thus describes his picture:

PITTSBURG LANDING, TENNESSEE, April 25, 1862.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Inclosed herewith please find sketches of a sharp little action which took place yesterday, some seven miles from here. A reconnoitring force, consisting of two regiments from each division, was sent out early yesterday morning to ascertain where the main body of the enemy lay. Some seven miles from camp the advance-guard of the Eighth Missouri Volunteers discovered the videttes and pickets of the enemy directly in front and posted in the edge of the woods, and advancing drove them in. Our forces coming up discovered three regiments of rebels drawn up in line of battle in the edge of the woods on the other side of a large open field, and protected by a strong fence. At this juncture the Eighteenth United States Regulars, having the advance, refused to go forward (this is a new regiment), the enemy having opened a heavy fire upon them. Colonel Morgan L. Smith, commanding the Eighth Missouri, seeing this, gave his famous regiment the word, and off they went, double-quick time, over the regulars and after the rebels, firing as they ran. In the mean time, however, one of our batteries had been pouring shot and shell into the enemy's ranks and had broken them. The Seventy-sixth Ohio and Captain Powell's cavalry made their appearance, coming up from woods in the rear. This was the signal for flight upon the part of the enemy, and they obeyed it. Our forces then burned their camp—large amounts of clothing, stores, officers' trunks, etc.—besides capturing quantities of ammunition and arms. Nine prisoners were taken, and the estimate of the rebels killed, made by one of the artillery officers, is thirty. Not a man was lost by our forces.—In haste, yours,

J. F. GOOKINS.

P.S.—I find I have made one mistake. The Eighth Missouri was commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel James Peckham; Colonel M. L. Smith, of the Eighth, leading the brigade.

GUN-BOAT FIGHT ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

ON page 341 we illustrate the combat which took place on the Mississippi River, off Fort Wright, on 8th May. The correspondent of the Herald thus describes the scene:

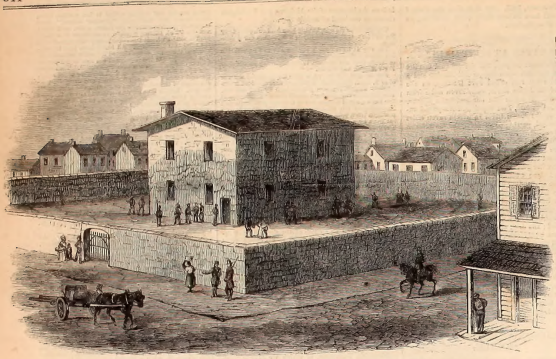
The morning was one of the finest of the season, though, as is very common in this region, before sunrise a dull haze spread over the water, making it difficult to see at any great distance away. Just at daylight the mortar-boats were towed down to their positions, ready for their day's work. This morning the gun-boat Cincinnati was sent down with them as a precautionary measure. The latter dropped anchor just abreast of the mortars, and but a short distance out in the stream. Scarcely had she swung around and become settled in her position when the look-out gave the signal, "Steamer astern!" Sure enough, by peering through the masts, a low, dark object was discovered, bearing a strong resemblance to a steam craft of some kind. It was subsequently ascertained to be the rebel ram Louisiana. All hands were beat to quarters, and the gun-boat was cleared for action immediately. The promptness of the response of the men in putting the boat in fighting shape was most remarkable. The anchor was up almost simultaneously with the issue of the order, the decks were cleared of all rubbish and every thing in the shape of obstruction, and every man was standing at his gun. By this time the rebel craft had approached near enough to be readily recognized, and just as the early sun was dispelling the haze the Cincinnati swung around and welcomed the visitor with a full broadside. As the sound of the report and its tremendous reverberations ran along the shore and reached the ears of those manning the other boats of our fleet, there was one general shout of gladness as every officer and man sprang to his feet and prepared for duty. With the report came also reinforcements to the rebel boat. Three in number, they came quickly around the point, and prepared to grapple with the spunky Yankee. The Louisiana ram carried two heavy rifled pieces, both of which, together with the guns of her consorts, were soon bearing upon the Cincinnati, and throwing in shot after shot in rapid succession. But against them all the Cincinnati boldly held her position, her sloping iron sides repelling their heaviest missiles as though they were but paper balls. This unequal contest lasted for full twenty minutes, during all of which time the rebel gun-boats were kept in check by the Cincinnati alone. The ram, however, ran up close to the Union boat, and manifested a disposition to run her down.

Just at this juncture the other iron-clad boats of our fleet came to the rescue—the Benton (flag-ship), Carondelet, Pittsburg, Cairo, and St. Louis—and relieved the Cincinnati of the necessity of giving any further immediate attention to the rebel gun-boats, thus enabling her to close in with the ram alone.

The Louisiana came along up, under full steam, until nearly upon the Cincinnati, when the latter put her head about and avoided the well-intended blow. Her crew were on deck, armed with cutlasses, boarding pikes, and carbines, fully prepared for a close hand to hand encounter. The ram, foiled in her first attempt, withdrew a short distance, and again turned upon the Union boat. This time she got her sharp bow full in upon the heavy iron sides of the Cincinnati; but her headway was not sufficient to cause any very serious damage. Before she could get away, however, Captain Stembel, commanding the Cincinnati, rushed upon the hurricane deck, and, seizing a pistol, shot the rebel pilot, killing him instantly. The rebel crew retaliated, when a musket-ball entered the gallant Captain's right shoulder, high up, nearly to the neck, and passed quite through. The wound was a troublesome and painful one, but not sufficiently serious to detain the Captain from his post longer than to have it dressed. In the mean time the ram had prepared for another assault, and this time evidently with the intention of boarding her antagonist. She came up under full headway, and with her steam batteries ready for immediate us. Just as she struck the Cincinnati, however, her steam apparatus collapsed, scalding a large number of her crew. Captain Stembel was also prepared with his steam battery to add to their discomfiture, and almost simultaneously with the explosion a dense volume of scalding water and steam came pouring upon the rebel crew from the deck of the gun-boat. This was too much for them to withstand, and those who were left uninjured and alive managed to get their craft away beyond the reach of further injury.

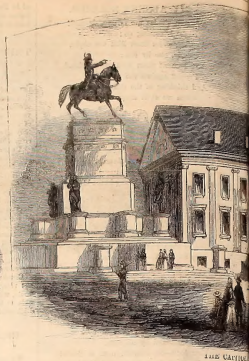
The casualties on the Cincinnati were very slight. Her gallant commander was wounded, as mentioned above. Her first master received a flesh wound in his thigh, and two seamen were slightly wounded.

As the ram drew away the iron-clad gun-boat Mallory appeared as a new antagonist. This is one of the new boats of which so much boast has been made by the rebels. She had just been completed at Memphis, and on this occasion made her first public appearance. She was a powerful craft carrying ten or twelve guns, and sheathed with heavy boiler iron over heavy timber bulkheads stuffed with cotton.



Her first manœuvre was an attempt to run the Cincinnati down by butting against her. This was baffled by the dextrous handling of the latter boat, though several times attempted. Then she hauled alongside and opened a close fire, but received rather more than she gave. The heavy Dahlgrens of the Union craft were too much for her, and again she resorted to the battering process. Just as she was preparing to strike, with all the power of momentum acquired by a quarter of a mile's running, the St. Louis—Union iron-clad boat—bore down upon her, and, striking her fairly amidships, nearly cut her in two. She sank almost immediately, and within two hundred feet of the vessel she was attempting herself to run down. The most of her crew must have perished, though a number were picked up by our boats. She is a total loss, having sunk in deep water.

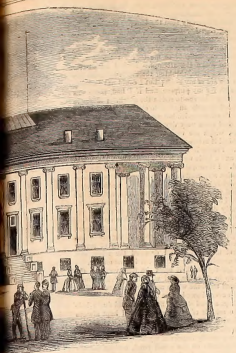
Comparatively few of our shots were wasted. They were all admirably directed and did wonderful execution, as the condition of the rebel boats fully shows. But their execution was better apparent in the explosion and total destruction of two of the most powerful of the rebel gun-boats. The names of these I have not yet been able to ascertain.



Their destruction occurred nearly at the same time and when the engagement was at its height. Above the loud din of the cannon could occasionally be heard the shouts and cheers of the loyal crews as they discerned one and another evidence of their sure approaching final triumph. The whole scene was shut out from view by the dense volumes of smoke that settled over the fleet, the result of the heavy firing. There was something grand and inspiring in all this, even to one outside, who could only hear the din and see the smoke. But suddenly there came a report louder than, and distinguishable above, all the others; and accompanying it could be seen a volume of white smoke rolling and surging above the other smoke, and bearing on its rolling waves black masses and fragments, which again quickly disappeared. What was it? The smoke lifted and revealed the cause. A well-directed shell had struck in the magazine of a rebel boat, causing an instantaneous explosion of the shell, magazine, and boilers. The boat was blown to atoms, and her crew perished with her. It was a fearful casualty, and one that is well calculated to awaken the deepest sympathy and pity for the poor unfortunates thus suddenly sent into eternity; but "it is the fortune of war," and the din goes on, and more destruction is attempted.

During the heat of the engagement one of the rebel rams—supposed to be the Manassas—singled out the Benton as its prey. The latter at first scarcely deigned to notice so insignificant an adversary, but continued to devote her time to the heavier gun-boats. Her powerful guns were all at work. She was kept in constant motion, first discharging her four bow guns, then hauling about and letting go her broadside of five pieces, and again bringing her stern pieces in range, and so on until the round was completed. All this time the ram danced about, endeavoring to get a chance to give her a good butt. At last the opportunity arrived, and with a powerful head of steam on the ram flew to her work. She struck the flag-ship fairly, right amidships, but was doubtless much amazed, on withdrawing, to find that she had suffered more damage herself than she had inflicted. Her nose was badly jammed, while the solid iron sides of the Benton showed no signs whatever of the assault. It was a signal discomfiture, rendered doubly annoying by the reception of a round of grape-shot from her antagonist that compelled her to get out of the way with the least possible delay.

By this time it was apparent that the enemy must withdraw quickly or be wholly destroyed. They had entered the contest with five gun-boats and three rams—eight in all. Three of their gun-boats were totally destroyed. The remaining two, as also the rams, were riddled through and through, and all appeared to be leaking badly. On the contrary, our boats, excepting the Cincinnati, appeared wholly uninjured, and were in condition to continue the action all day if necessary. Under these circumstances the rebels had no alternative, and at twenty minutes past seven—just one hour and twenty minutes after the commencement of the battle—the last of them disappeared around Craighead Point, the heavy cannonading ceased, the smoke cleared away, our boats returned to their moorings, and the battle was ended.



HENRICO COUNTY JAIL, RICHMOND.

THE CAPITOL

THE CITY OF RICHMOND

RICHMOND.

REBEL PRISONS ON MAIN, NEAR TWENTY-FIFTH STREET, RICHMOND.

A, VIRGINIA.—[See Page 343.]

FROM THE BLACK ROCKS, ON FRIDAY.

I AM a clergyman, and the following is a truthful record of a memorable passage in my life.

I had been living for two years among the tribe called Ngaahla, the most powerful and important tribe in the northern part of New Zealand. I planted my own potatoes and Kumera, or sweet-potatoes, caught my own fish, and lived in a house built in great part by myself, assisted by two natives—one called Hoani Tuana, and the other Kaiwhaka—in a piece of ground given to me by the latter, and called Opotiki. I was employed in teaching the Maori or New Zealand children, and trying to establish a little church: working meanwhile with my own hands to obtain what food, clothing, and learning from the rude, uncivilized, yet hospitable natives many of their ways and customs.

The chief of the tribe was an old man named Mano, tall, well formed, of yet erect. To him I owe many obligations which I fear I can never repay. One of them was the gift of two young men, his slaves —a youth named Pilliha, a lad about seventeen years old, and a young man named Wapeti, about twenty. These two were of great assistance to me in my labors on my piece of land, bringing in my fire-wood, helping to cultivate the ground, and rowing and managing my boat in my fishing excursions.

In the month of August in the year 1859, in the second week of the month, and in the first fortnight morning, about the middle of the wet season (in the northern part of New Zealand we have in reality but two seasons, the wet season and the dry season, and winter or the wet season), I wished for a change of diet, and so my self and boy to go out for a day's fishing. Outside the harbor of the Bay of Islands, about sixteen miles off, is one of the most singular spots in the world, called Cape Brett. This cape is a well-known landmark to vessels coming from the south, and at the broadth of the Pacific washes up against its rocky sides, and rebounds with a deep sullen roar, there is nearly always a heavy swell, even in the calmest sea rolling; while, to add to the difficulties of navigation, there are several outcrops of rocks scattered at all times, and known only by the white water around them; others bare at low tide, and very dangerous at high-water—the sea never clearly seen and swirled—while about six miles out to sea, eastward from Cape Brett, are a cluster of rocks, always out of water, though at high tide but a few feet out; over these the sea breaks with a big, and, when the wind is off the land, a dangerous for small boats or canoes to approach. Hard by there is a pa, or village, which had at that time, named by the natives Whapaca or Hahpaka, frequently weighing fifty or sixty pounds each.

On this Friday morning, then, as soon as our morning meal was over, I stated my wish to my two boys, desiring them to get my boat ready and go with me to the Black Rocks. The boat was sixteen feet over all. I had before gone out alone off Cape Brett in her, and was therefore sure, so that when the boys asked me if I could spare them, as I had two desirous of taking up our potatoes—which they were then digging—that I could do so. My canoe rose and fell as I approached.

At the end of two hours' pulling we found it arrived safely at the fishing-grounds. I lighted my pipe, baited my lines, and waited patiently for a bite, which was soon came, and I had in about twenty pounds' weight. I had been out about three hours, and had caught fish to the value of a beautifully sunny and warm, the breeze had died away, and a soft easy swell was all that disturbed the surface of the sea. I felt a sensation of drowsiness after catching my last fish, when I felt a breath of air fan my cheek, and, looking up, saw a little ripple curling and cringing the waters. The land breeze was setting in. In great haste and much apprehension I rolled up my lines, hoisted my sails, and attempted to regain the place I had left in the morning. But the wind was dead against me, and the tide was ebbing, and a strong current set me more and more rapidly from the Black Rocks and the land. To add to my perplexity, the gulf of my main-sail gave way, and the sail came down. This took several minutes to repair, and by the time I was being gradually drifted farther out to sea. Feeling that I could not manage the boat, single-handed against wind, sea, and current, I hauled down both sails, and, putting out my small paddles, advanced slowly and with a good deal of hours' hard and strenuous exercise, completely foiled and weary, I had to give that up.

In the midst of affairs I took out my pipe, and, with a strange feeling of despair, began to smoke, feeling the land drift. As usual after helpless periods and helplessness stole over me. I felt as if all that was passing were a hideous dream. How long I remained in this state I can hardly tell, but took no note of time. But when I roused myself, and looked around me, I found the sun setting, and a thin gray mist slowly creeping over the land, quickly veiling it from my sad and lingering gaze. I knew that the worst was upon me. I can hardly say how its light comforted me. Even now I scarcely dare to think how that long and weary night would have passed had it been dark and cloudy.

I knew that far away out at sea were a group of three small islands. I had heard the natives frequently speak of them as being high, rocky, and covered with forest. I had, moreover, heard of canoes having drifted out there, carried onward by the very wind and current which blowing, I suppose it dawned upon me that I might reach them, I accordingly once more set sail, and ran all night before a steady, mild breeze. Oh, how long that night seemed!

The day—so eagerly longed for, and yet bringing with it a dreary consciousness of affording no relief—at length came: first, a light gray streak along the eastern horizon, gradually assuming a rosy hue, then changing to a deeper crimson flush. The sun, round, large, and red, rose from a vast bed of blood, softening to a brilliant gold, the which sky being flecked with little golden clouds. I remember that I marked each change of form; how dreamily I watched the sun rise; and then, waking up as it were with a start, how I placed my hand over my eyes, and looked long and eagerly in the direction where I thought the islands lay. After off on the distant horizon I saw what at first I thought were clouds low down and resting on the water. I looked again when a short time had elapsed. The outline was unchanged, but more distinctly defined, and, as the sunlight glinted on it, I could perceive that it was land. Yes, there it stood straight toward them. I kept on my course. I then ate my breakfast, and, having eaten sparingly of the water, the first food that had passed my lips since I had started. I then lighted a pipe and smoked on steadily in the course of which I had a new and unexpected shock awaited me. Happening to look behind my head I saw a huge shark following silently in my wake. I cut off a piece of scribe the cold thirst of harter that tiffled through my throat and mouth. Nearer the rocks which I inclosed this flat piece of ground in an irregular semicircle grew tall ferns, finding root in the soil and oblate wreaths down from the upper grounds, and shaded and kept moist by the overhanging rocks.

This is an imperfect description of the place on which, Crusoe-like, I had been so strangely thrown, and which I was about to explore with my pocket-knife, a pair of blankets, a few pieces of broken pots (the remnants of a few bottles which I found on the rocks, and which I carefully treasured), and my tattered nails and a broken boat. My long hair I had carefully braiding by the sun and the water when mending my boat. How far the islands were from any inhabited land I knew not. I only knew it was uninhabited by human beings, and that I could have no fellowship with any of the birds that flew around me, however anxious for it. How long that sojourn was likely to be God only knew. Unlike Robinson Crusoe, I had not even a dog or a cat for my companion; I had no wrecked ship wherefrom to draw any resources. And I could not hope to find in the rocks and tools to build, or plant, or dig; I had no seeds to plant even had I had tools. I had no books to while away the weary hours, no means whereon to write even an account of my sufferings and fate, except perchance I left my pencil and a few of my bones withering on the beach. I was without house or shelter, and without fire.

I had my clothes, my knife, with a rule, and I wore wet through; fortunately it was not very cold. After I had been down to the rocks and taken my morning meal of oysters, I sat down and had a long consultation with myself about a house. I determined to make to see if I could find a cave. I did find a small one; but I could not live in it, as the water dripped incessantly from the roof, and the floor was wet. The next thought was to build a small hut after the fashion of the Maories, and I began to look about for a spot. I found a suitable one in cutting with my knife the bobrushes or raupo in the swamp, and two days more in tying it up in bundles. I then found, about the middle of the pond for that purpose. All this occupied that day, and I felt much pleased and interested myself from brooding too much. I took care to tire myself so thoroughly that I generally fell asleep as soon as I had said my prayers and laid myself down. Sunday following I resolved to keep free from labor, and, therefore, spent the whole day, pay into the forest, and found growing, as I expected, among the trees, abundance of the wild flax, the Harakeke of the Maori. I at once began I cut out with my knife. The heart of this palm is about the thickness of a man's wrist, is about a foot long, and tastes not unlike cabbage-stalks, but when roasted on the ashes of a fire. It is very nutritious. On the oysters, composed my supper on the second Sunday of my stay on the Rocks. The day was warm and sunny, and, coming after the two wet days, very pleasant indeed. After supper I planned out my house, having chosen the place for it during my walk in the afternoon.

Before I lay down for the night I sat on a great stone, looking over the sea, and began to practice a psalm in which occurs the verse, "Why art thou so full of heaviness, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise Him for the help of His countenance."

So ended the second Sunday on the island.

I woke early next morning, and after my usual visit to the oysters commenced the work of cutting one of the lining-boards spent an hour or so in trying in fashion it into something like a spade. This I dug a small piece of ground, where I intended placing my house, and then made perfectly level a space about fourteen feet long by ten feet wide, pulling up the grass and plants, and throwing into the forest and cut down four long, straight saplings, about an inch and a half in diameter, and five to six feet long, forked at one end. These were for the corner posts. I cut two about the same thickness, and about nine feet long, forked in the same manner at one end. These were to carry the ridge-pole. I then cut a number of straight saplings of long straight sticks of various lengths and thickness. This took me altogether two days—namely, cutting and carrying them down to the place I had chosen for my house, the frame-work of which took me two days more to complete. The labor of breaking open the oysters in sufficient quantities to satisfy my appetite very considerably abridged the length of my days. It was a task of no small difficulty, in which my fingers nearly always suffered, and, as the many oysters as I would, I rarely left the rocks perfectly satisfied—there was ever within me a disagreeable sensation of hunger. I was tortured with dreams of solid substantial breakfasts, dinners, and suppers. I had not even a handful of rice or a drop of water at hand when I awoke with a raging thirst upon me, having no vessel to keep it in. (I afterward tried to make a vessel of holding water from a certain soft clay; but though I baked it in the fire to harden it, it was so porous that the water evaporated during the night, and I generally found the vessel empty in the morning.)

I had frequently seen the Maories obtain fire by rubbing together two sticks, and I had once or twice attempted it myself, but without success. Now, however, the obtaining of fire was a matter of such consequence to me that I resolved once more to make the attempt. First I sought for some hard stone, thinking therewith to strike fire with the aid of my knife; but I could not find any stone fit for my purpose, and if I had, there was no tinder-wood at hand to strike the sparks upon. resolved to make an effort to obtain fire by rubbing the two sticks—with but small hope of success. I gathered some very dry ferns and small manuka twigs, which are very resinous and inflammable. I rubbed the two pieces of wood very slowly at first. Presently the wood began to smell of burning, and a little wreath of white smoke curled up. Then I rubbed more violently, and I felt the perspiration streamed down my face, while my elbows and wrists began to ache painfully. In this way I rubbed for well-nigh twenty minutes, and all the result I obtained was the smell of fire and smoke. I nearly despaired, and was about to give it up, when one of the minutes shavings flew up a living spark. What a thrill of joy I went through me! I forgot my weariness; and redoubling my efforts for a few seconds, had the satisfaction of seeing several more sparks. I dropped the sticks, blew gently on the heap until it was on fire. It was gently raised, and, upon the fern, wrapped the fern up in fir-twigs, and soon had a roaring my head until the whole mass was in flames. This was the first fire I ever kindled.

I kept a good stock of fire-wood, and dug a hole in the middle of my house, which I kept always filled with dry sticks ready for lighting. All of dry garnish sticks for light at night. With a gun I could have wandered about, improved my stock of plump of wild-ducks on the small pond, besides parrots and pigeons in the forest. I attempted to hit the ducks with stones, but never succeeded in killing any, although I twice hit. I next thought of a sling, and practiced myself assiduously at this. However, I added another dish to my meagre fare, and that was fern-root, of which I had abundance.

I had now been about three weeks on the island; although in no way reconciled to the idea of living there, the hope of ever getting away again daily became fainter and fainter, and more dim. I sat down for a short while and tried to think over my situation, I was in a high-driven in despair. One morning, on going out of my house, I perceived an intolerable stench coming up from the beach. I went down to see what it was, and saw a great disgust, found the dead body of a large shark, in the last stage of decomposition, washed up by the tide. After a time, however, it occurred to me that, as I had seen the Maories make their fishhooks out of bone, why not I make one?

I had already tried to make hooks out of the copper nails out of my boat, but the iron was too soft, and bent too readily. Now, however, I could lay on the shark's bones, and moreover it would be a pleasant occupation for my long solitary days. In the evening was always the most wearisome part of my time. Many a dull evening I spent, my thoughts far far away, roaming about unconsciously over spots where, in all likelihood, my feet would never tread again. I would weary myself with brooding over my condition, and wondering what my friends would think of my long-continued absence.

In six evenings, with the aid of my knife, and some stones, I succeeded in making two very hooks, sufficiently sharp and strong to catch any fish I might find off the rocks. Another week passed away in making raw fish and fishing-lines. Next morning I was up with the early dawn, and, about noon for any discoveries that might prove useful. I found growing same a large orange-colored pod producing a very fragrant pepper. With this I made a slurry of my potatoes, salt in the crevices of the rocks deposited there by evaporation. After collecting fire-wood I next morning I was up with the early dawn, and, in preparation for my mid-day meal, for which I generally now had fish, and always fish or birds or wild cabbage which I found growing at the foot of the rocks. I made a change occasionally in my food by the method of cooking. I tried boiling it, and another day cooking it in a native kapura or basket, which I made of flax. This afternoon I generally spent in a walk in the forest, into which, however, I dared not penetrate very far for fear of losing my way. It is the evening and morning to the pond and caught a few eels ready for bait the following morning, as soon as it was dark. I retired into my hut, and, throwing a few sticks on the fire to make a light, employed myself in making fish-hooks, or any other article I could think of making and was able to make. I had dug a hole in the earth close by the door, in which I deposited every night sufficient fuel to last until morning. My last employment was my prayers, after which, commending myself to God, I lay down to sleep.

I had been seven weeks and two days on the island, and according to my reckoning—which reckoning consisted in merely repeating to myself occasionally, during each day, its name and the date of the month—when, as I was coming from the forest with a load of fire-wood, I looked toward the sea, and was startled by the sight of a vessel passing at about eight miles' distance. I scarcely knew what to do. I threw down the wood and rushed down to the beach, and, in my excitement was hauling up in a tree for signal. I carried the blankets up the rocks, and climbed half way up a tree, when the thought occurred to me I should be too late, and that the smoke of a fire would be seen more plainly. I accordingly slid down the rocks again for some fire, lighted the pile of wood I had thrown down, and then began to climb once more into the tree to hang out my blankets. Alas! I had made the fire of dry wood, and it burned too brightly to emit much smoke. It was now too late to place some green branches on it. The vessel faded slowly out of sight—never having noticed my attempts at signaling her.

I know not what effect such an event would have had on others placed in my situation, whether it would have awakened and encouraged other men to hope, or would have driven them to despair. It had the latter tendency on me; and for the first time since I landed on the island I gave way to tears. I sat down, listless and dejected, and cried long and bitterly. All that day I cried bitterly.

At night I was startled. I had caught, as usual, several small eels and placed them on the roof of my hut to be ready for my morning's fishing. In the middle of the night I was aroused by hearing a strange scratching, scrambling noise upon the roof. It was with no small trepidation that I ventured out to see what it was. The night was very dark, and the first thing I saw were two fiery balls of light glaring at me from the top of the hut; next moment a black object flew at me. I stooped suddenly, and the animal went over me with a loud hiss and disappeared in the darkness. It was a large black cat. How it came there I know not. I had never seen it before and never saw it afterward, although I heard it once or twice wailing dismally in the forest.

Of the next two or three days I have a very confused recollection. I remember wandering about all day seeking rest and finding none, careless, heedless, hopeless. It was during this time, I doubt not, that I lost my reckoning; for somehow or other I found that I had lost three days.

How long this state might have continued I can not tell, but it was most mercifully diverted in the following way: I had penetrated deeper into the forest one day than I had ever ventured before, where I came to a rather abrupt gully; here I stumbled over a tree root and rolled down a descent. When I recovered myself I got on my feet and looked round. I had rolled into the midst of some tall plants, with a broadish leaf, long, entire, and smooth, that felt sticky or glutinous when touched, and with a dusky-colored flower. It was tobacco. A coarse, bitter kind, but still it was tobacco. Eagerly I gathered all I could find, and then retraced my steps. As soon as I arrived at home I hung up my tobacco-leaves on a long string of flax inside my hut. I then set my wits to work to invent a pipe, in which I at last rudely succeeded. How great a comfort it was no words of mine could adequately tell.

One thing that more than any other impressed my mind with the utter solitude of the island on which I was cast was the absence of animal life and the silence. I had seen, during several weeks' residence, little or no traces of life beyond the solitary instance of the wild cat, which had probably been thrown overboard or had swum ashore from some passing ship. The only other living things I had yet seen, except birds, were lizards. Wild pigeons abounded. I made about twenty snares to catch some. For several days I did not succeed, and I had almost despaired, when one day, to my great delight, a couple were caught. How eagerly I cooked them, and the enjoyment I had in eating them I need not describe. I afterward took several more, securing altogether during the time I was on the island fourteen birds.

I now went up on the rocks, where I had cleared a place to lie and bask in the sun, and whence I could overlook the sea. Several weeks had elapsed since I saw the vessel.

About this time I found in the forest, near my tobacco plot, some yellow clay, a quantity of which I carried home, and occupied my evenings in trying to convert into some vessel to hold water. I made several ungainly-looking things, and spoiled all but two in trying to bake them. The occupation, however, served to divert my attention and keep me from brooding too much over my misery.

In the hope of finding honey, I had several bee hunts. How bees came on this desolate island puzzled me; but there they were; they could hardly be indigenous. I traced an immense swarm to a tree, which I had the cruelty to burn down, that being the only expedient by which I could obtain the honey hived high up in the trunk. I was rewarded for this toil (which was great, first and last) by the largest stock of honey I had ever yet seen taken, even in New Zealand, from a tree. A part of the mass of honey was two or three seasons old, being of a deep yellow color, and the wax brown; the rest was of a pale straw color, in snow-white virgin combs. Of the latter I ate eagerly, and then collecting the rest, deposited it in my clay vessels, leaving the oldest a prey to the lizards and ants. I found this honey a delicious addition to my fish. I found afterward two more bee trees, the contents of which I obtained and enjoyed.

I had frequently noticed what I took to be the footsteps of some kind of animal on the pathway leading up the rocks into the forest. I had not, however, seen any thing of any animal. I knew pigs and goats to be the only animals found in New Zealand in a wild state, and they are not indigenous, having been introduced, I believe, by Captain Cook. One day, as I was returning with a load of fire-wood, I heard below, to my great surprise, some animals bleating. Laying down my load quietly, I looked on the ground below, and, to my great delight, saw a herd of wild goats licking the salt on the rocks. How was I to come at them? How could I catch one of them? I remembered that Robinson Crusoe became swift enough of foot to run them down. I much doubted my capability of doing so. As, however, no plan suggested itself to me other than that of stealing quietly upon them, and then making a sudden rush, I resolved forthwith to try that course. Slowly and stealthily I got within fifty yards of them unnoticed. One suddenly observed me and gave a loud bleat of warning, and they all made a rush up the rocks where no human foot could follow. Having got out of my reach, they turned round and stared at me. What could I do? Nothing but quietly return for my fire-wood, and try to devise some mode of catching them at some future time. Many were the devices that passed through my mind, all equally futile. Lying in the hut some days later, I heard some animals running over the gravel in front of it. It was mid-day, and I was resting from the heat of the sun. I peeped out, and saw six goats separated from their companions and browsing on some karaka bushes near my spring. I crept out as stealthily as cat after mouse; the plashing of the little stream over the rock drowned any little noise I might have made, and, fortunately, the wind blew from them to me. I found the distance between me and them gradually lessen, while the space between the pool of water and the steep precipitous rocks gradually narrowed, leaving them less and less room to rush past me. At length they saw me, and seemed so near that for a moment they stood perfectly still—paralyzed. I rushed at them with a whoop. Five passed me; but the last, a she-goat, heavy with kid, got separated from her companions, and in her perplexity leaped upon a large stone in the water, and there stood bleating most pitifully. I made one bound after her, threw my arms about her neck, and held her in a close embrace. Now, I thought, I have succeeded in catching the very goat I would have chosen; how shall I get her home? My doubts as to this important question were very soon settled. The stone on which we both were was covered with a green slimy moss, and gradually I felt my feet slipping from under me. The goat made a sudden plunge for liberty, and down I came with her into the water. I was forced to loosen my hold. She beat me at swimming, short as the distance was to land, and with a loud bleat she rushed up the rocks after her companions.

I was consoled on the same evening by finding an enormous shell which had been washed up by the tide; this, along with two or three smaller ones, I carried away, rejoicing in them as vessels to hold water. Many and many a time, however, I sat planning how to secure a goat; for even one goat, as a companion, would have been a great boon; but it was all to no purpose, I never got one.

One bright moonlight night I fell short of wood. I had that day neglected getting it (why I forget now), so I had to turn out and go up into the forest. The moon shone beautifully, and the effects of light and shade among the huge trees and gigantic creepers was so fantastic and weirdlike that I could not help sitting down on a fallen tree, and, half-frightened yet utterly entranced, gazing on the wonderful scene. As I sat, a loud shrill whistle sounded close behind me. After a short time I recovered sufficient self-possession to look cautiously around, and saw a dark object moving. I waited until it came into the full light of the moon, when I saw what at first I took for a quadruped. But it was a bird—a bird with neither wings nor feathers, but a sort of fur. It occurred to me that this must be the "kiwi" I had heard much of from the natives, called by the whites the apteryx. Apart from its skin, which I wished to obtain, it was, as I knew, exceedingly good eating. I looked round for a stick or a stone, and at length got hold of a stick without alarming the bird. I started forward, and made an unsuccessful blow at it. It ran very quickly; I managed, however, to overtake it, when the brute threw itself on its back and struck at me with its legs, ripped up my trowsers with a sharp hind claw, and tore the skin of my leg most grievously. I was so taken aback that the bird escaped. I had one satisfaction, however; I had ascertained the cause of the mysterious whistling, and thus set all fears on that score at rest. In a day or two I found apteryx eggs, which made a welcome addition to my larder.

Four long weary months and two weeks had passed. Three or four times in the day I regularly went up the rocks, trying to sight a sail. A long time had now elapsed since I saw the last, and my hopes of ever seeing another became every day fainter and fainter. At length, one fine warm sunny day, as I was lying on the rock, looking every now and then seaward, I descried a small speck far out to sea. At first I thought my eyes deceived me; I rubbed them, and looked again, and saw it still more distinctly. I took a short walk in the forest, and coming back found the object grown larger and plainer. I could now discern glistening in the light of the sun the white sails of a vessel. How my heart beat! Would she come near enough for me to signalize her? I made ready a fire, and this time gathered several green branches to make a smoke with. Nearer and nearer she came, until at length I made her out to be a large schooner bound to the southward, I supposed to Auckland. When she arrived (as near as I could guess) about four miles from the island I lighted my fire, and heaped on it a mass of green wood and damp moss, and watched the smoke ascend in a large dense cloud. I looked eagerly toward the schooner. She came nearer and nearer. My heart palpitated. I could distinctly hear and almost count its loud and anxious throbs. "They see the smoke, they see it!" I cried in ecstasy as she suddenly hauled up to the wind, and I heard her sails flap sharply against her masts. In my excitement I screamed until my throat was sore, with the vain hope that the people on board would hear my cries. Do they really see the smoke? Will they lower a boat for me? The few minutes of suspense during which she lay aback seemed hours. Hours? Years. "I know they see the smoke, I know it!" I cried; "how cruel not to hasten! Why do they not lower a boat and pull off?" "They are going!" I shrieked in my agony, as I saw the vessel's head slowly turn, and the sails again belly out to the wind. "They are going! Oh, my God, they are going! And leaving me here! Have mercy, have mercy, and do not utterly forsake me!" I cast myself with my face to the ground, my eyes hot, dry, and tearless. I dared not look again. I felt as if I was going mad. At length I got up, and took one last despairing look at the receding ship, now again diminished to a small speck.

Silent and tearless, I sat for hours looking down into the quiet deep blue waters. Here and there corals of all strange hues and many forms branching out in different directions, with bright-colored, strange-shaped fish gliding in and out among the grotesque stony foliage, and snow-white shells gleaming in the bright clear water among the dark-green weed, which swayed idly backward and forward with the plashings of the tide. All down there looked so serene and peaceful that the thought crept into my mind, "Would it not be better to roll off this rock and seek that resting-place? It would be but one plunge, a very brief pang, and then to sleep."

As I sat brooding over those wicked thoughts, the words, "Call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me," came suddenly into my mind. I rushed down to my hut, fell on my knees, and prayed God to pity me and give me patience and submission.

Four more weary weeks passed without any incident worth noting. Methodically I fished and gathered fire-wood, roamed through the forest, and formed futile plans for catching goats. In this manner another month passed. I had now been five months alone on the island.

I had retired to bed one night as usual, when I was startled by hearing something bump on the beach. I jumped up, and listened. It can not be my old boat lifted off the rocks by a high tide? No, it could not be that, for the boat had been almost all removed for one purpose or other. And yet I heard footsteps, and then a loud, gruff voice saying, "Kumea, Kumea!" I knew that voice well, but I almost thought I was dreaming. I rushed out, and saw by the light of the moon, which was then near the full, five or six dusky figures trying to haul up a large boat out of the reach of the breakers. With a loud shout of joy I ran forward, but stood amazed and appalled at the sudden yell which escaped from the persons, who left off dragging the boat, and tumbled precipitately into her, as if their only safety were there. Moreover, I saw, to my horror, a large, bare, brawny arm held up, with something glittering in the moon's silver light, and I feared its flying at me. "Kowai koe?" (who are you?) shouted a loud voice. "Ko Henare ahau" (I am Henry) I exclaimed. "Stop," answered the voice, "or I throw this!" at the same time brandishing the small tomahawk. I well knew the fatal aim that would follow if I moved. I stood perfectly still. The figure then moved toward the boat. "Stop, Monganui," I cried, in an agony of fear lest they should go off again and leave me. "I am Henry—do not leave me." "Ka teka koe" (you lie), he exclaimed, "kua mate Henare" (Henry is dead). "You are his spirit." "No, no," I answered, "I swear to you I am he. Come and touch me, and see whether I am not flesh and blood." "No," he said, "I do not believe you. You are a spirit, and I shall go." He made toward the boat. What agony I suffered at that moment! But suddenly he turned, and stood still, calling to me, "Ka kite koe tera kowhatu?" (Do you see that stone?) pointing to one at my feet. "Ae ra" (Yes), I answered. "Take it up, then." I did so. "Now, do you see that tree?" pointing to the very tree I had tied my boat to when I first landed, and which grew out of the rocks. "I see it." "Throw the stone at it." I did so, and hit it. "Ah!" he said, "no ghost could do that—only flesh and blood could lift and throw a large stone like that." "May I come, then, to you?" "Yes," he said, still, however, hesitating. I went up to him with the usual Maori salute of "Tena koutou."

He caught hold of me and grasped my hand so hard that I flinched. "Ah," he said, "that is real flesh and blood;" and then, looking me full in the face, he said, "and you look something like Henry, only thinner." "Live here five months, Monganui," I replied, "and try to keep stout on it."

As soon as he had fully got it into his mind that I was the person I represented myself to be, he began asking me innumerable questions. The others had been listening all this time in the boat, and on his order came out reluctantly: we pulled the boat up high on the beach, the women (for they were the chief's five wives) casting all the time side glances of doubt and mistrust on me. But I contrived once or twice to knock against them rather roughly, as only flesh and blood and bones could do, and this seemed to set their minds at rest. Monganui, who was the chief who had given me the two boys, came up to my hut, while his wives busied themselves in making a shelter for the night with the oars of the boat and their blankets. Monganui and I remaining at my house after supper, we lighted our pipes. I proceeded to narrate my adventures of the last few months, in the course of which I was frequently interrupted by his savage ejaculations of astonishment. When I had done he said, "Ah, well, you would make a good Maori," that being the very highest compliment he could pay me. I then asked him how he had come, and why? He told me he had been fishing at the Black Rocks, and it had came on to blow very fresh, as in my own case; so freshly did it blow at last that, despite his having a whale-boat and crew, they could not pull against it, and so ran before it to these islands.

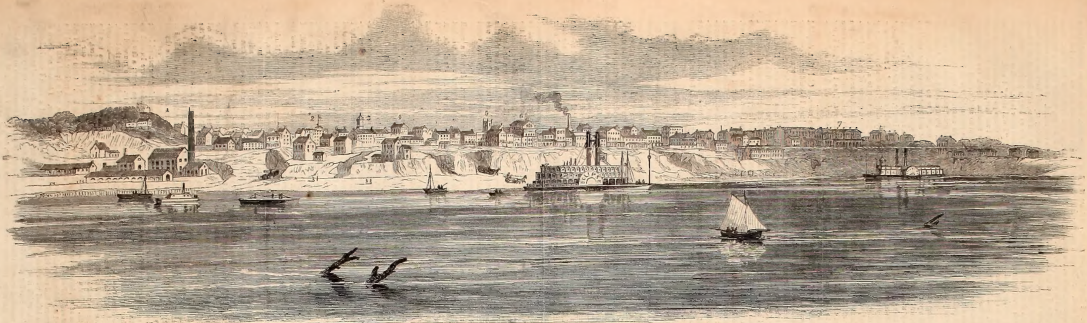
In the morning, as soon as it was light, we went out. We found the women already up, a fire lighted, and some potatoes and fish being cooked in an iron pot, or kohua. The women at first looked somewhat askance at me, but seeing me take a potato out of the pot and deliberately peel and eat it, they again seemed considerably relieved.

Of course Monganui had made his mind up that I would leave the island with him as soon as the weather moderated, which it seemed about to do. He arranged for our leaving early the following morning. The morning opened clear and fine, with the wind in the right direction for sailing back again. We were all astir early, and in a bustle of preparation. As soon as breakfast was over the things were all put on board the boat, and every thing was ready for the start. Just then my heart failed me, despite my long and lonely residence on the island. I could not overcome my fears of trusting myself in that small boat, deeply laden as she was, and leaking, as I knew of old she did, for so long a journey. When it came to the point I drew back, much to Monganui's astonishment. "I will stay," I said. "Should you land safely, please go to Kororaika and tell the white people I am here, and that I have been living here five months. Seek the magistrate there, and ask him to send a small vessel for me, and I will remain patiently here until it arrives." "But, Henry," he answered, eagerly, "there is room. The sea is quiet, and I think I can find my way home again. Do come with us!" Again and again he urged me, but to no purpose. They all got into the boat and prepared to start, when up jumped the chief again and ran to me, pressed his nose against mine, and, with tears in his eyes, said once more, "Now, Henry, now for the last time!" "No, Monganui, I feel I can not." I rushed away to my hut, scarcely daring to trust myself any longer, and there gave way to a flood of tears. After a lapse of about a quarter of an hour I rushed up the rock and looked after the boat. There it was, a little white speck dancing up and down on the swelling waters, and, as I watched it, my heart changed once more, and I shouted and shrieked for them to come back.

Alone, alone once more. Oh! that dreadful word "alone." Perhaps I should never get away from this horrible place; never, never more! Fool! Coward! How I missed the sound of human voices! How I listened for human footsteps! How horribly lonely I was! I prayed to God that they might land safely and send off some means of rescue. I felt I could not wait long; that a very short time would elapse before I became in very truth mad. I went up the rock and strained my aching eyes with gazing across the bright blue waves. Night came at last, beautiful, still, cloudless, and moonlight, and still I sat and gazed at the sea, listening in unutterable sadness to its moanings. At length, cold, weary, and sad, I betook me to my bed.

Unrefreshed, I woke in the morning, and, as soon as breakfast was over, took my lonely station once more on the rocks, and spent the weary, weary day in gazing over the sea. I calculated that at least six days must elapse before any vessel could come, yet I could not leave my look-out. So passed the second day, and so the third, and so the fourth, and so the fifth. The sixth day came, and somewhat more hopefully I took my station, waited and prayed, and watched, but the daylight faded and night came, and still no sign. So passed the seventh day, and so dawned the eighth, and so died the eighth, and so passed the ninth, and so came the tenth. On the tenth day I was scarcely conscious. Still mechanically I sat and gazed over the bright water of the cruel mocking sea.

At length, toward mid-day, I fancied I discerned a small dark speck. But I had been deceived so often that I expected it to fade away like all the rest. But no, it did not fade. I looked again, and I looked again, and still it was there, and surely increasing in size. I rushed off for a few minutes into the forest, and when I returned, there it was still; and now I saw and knew it was a vessel coming toward the island!



Nearer, nearer, and nearer. It was a small schooner. Again I lighted my fire and watched the smoke curl upward in thick dense clouds. A gun was fired. I could not hear the report. I could only see the small puff of white smoke fading slowly away.

What passed during the next few hours I very dimly know. I have a faint idea that I shouted, and danced, and whooped, and laughed, and cried. I rushed again and again down the rocks to my hut, and then again to the rocks. Once I fell and rolled down, tearing my clothes and skin, and bruising my hands and knees, and finally finding myself in the sea, whence with no small difficulty I emerged. Now a small boat rapidly approached the beach, pulled by two men. I rushed down to meet them. They grounded on the pebbles. One figure leaped out and rushed up to me, throwing his arms about my neck, and rubbing his nose against mine, crying all the time like a child. I felt my hand grasped by the other, and I saw before me my two native boys.

I hastened to my hut, and, taking my blankets and the things Monganui had left with me, I got into the boat, and they quickly pulled me alongside the schooner. From two English sailors in her I heard my own native tongue the first time for nearly six months. How strangely it sounded in my ears!

As soon as I got on board they took me below and gave me some tea. I remained on deck all that night, scarcely able to realize the events of the past few months. And so I sat and watched, and thanked God through all the watches of that most blessed night, too excited to sleep, too thankful to do any thing but return Him my humble thanks for all His goodness.

Next day, in the early morning, we neared land; there were the ill-fated rocks; there loomed up once more that dreadful Cape Brett; a few hours and we should enter the bay. We rounded the point, and once more I saw the houses on the beach. Strangely they seemed to sway to and fro—strangely a mist came before my eyes. There was the well-known pier, and on it a number of faces, dark and white, all eagerly looking toward our small vessel as she swept up the bay. Once more I got into the boat, and was rowed rapidly toward the pier. I reached the steps, and a loud and deafening cheer saluted my ears. I looked up, I saw a face I well knew, I heard a voice I dearly loved. I heard and saw no more. As I tried to mount the last step of the pier I fell down on my face, and when I came to myself I found myself in bed in my friend's house, and a doctor sitting at my side—once more, thank God, at home!

1. Navy-yard.—2. Overton House.—3. Exchange.—4. Washam House.—5. Episcopal Church.—6. Odd Fellows' Hall.—7. Gayoso House.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE CITY OF MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE, FROM HOPEFIELD, ON THE ARKANSAS SIDE.—[SEE PAGE 349.]

THE EIGHTH MISSOURI VOLUNTEERS CHARGING OVER THE EIGHTEENTH REGULARS AT THE BATTLE OF PEA RIDGE, TENNESSEE.—SKETCHED BY MR. J. F. GOOKINS.—[SEE PAGE 349.]

HAMBURG LANDING, TENNESSEE, COMMISSARY DEPOT OF MAJOR-GENERAL HALLECK'S ARMY.—[SKETCHED BY MR. ALEXANDER SIMPLOT.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

NO NAME.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "DEAD SECRET," ETC., ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY JOHN MCLENAN.

☞ Printed from the Manuscript and early Proof-sheets purchased by the Proprietors of "Harper's Weekly."

THE SECOND SCENE.

SKELDERGATE, YORK.

CHAPTER I.

IN that part of the city of York which is situated on the western bank of the Ouse there is a narrow street called Skeldergate, which runs nearly north and south, parallel with the course of the river. The postern by which Skeldergate was formerly approached no longer exists, and the few old houses left in the street are disguised in melancholy modern costume of white-wash and cement. Shops of the smaller and poorer order, intermixed here and there with dingy warehouses and joyless private residences of red brick, compose the present aspect of Skeldergate. On the river side the houses are separated, at intervals, by lanes running down to the water, and disclosing lonely little plots of open ground, with the masts of sailing barges rising beyond. At its southward extremity the street ceases on a sudden, and the broad flow of the Ouse, the trees, the meadows, the public walk on one bank, and the towing-path on the other, open to view.

Here, where the street ends, and on the side of it farthest from the river, a narrow little lane leads up to the paved foot-way surmounting the ancient Walls of York. The one small row of buildings, which is all that the lane possesses, is composed of cheap lodging-houses, with an opposite view, at the distance of a few feet, of a portion of the massive city wall. This place is called Rosemary Lane. Very little light enters it; very few people live in it; the floating population of Skeldergate passes it by; and visitors to the Walk on the Walls, who use it as the way up or the way down, get out of the dreary little passage as fast as they can.

The door of one of the houses in this lost corner of York opened softly on the evening of the twenty-third of September, eighteen hundred and forty-six, and a solitary individual of the male sex sauntered into Skeldergate from the seclusion of Rosemary Lane.

Turning northward, this person directed his steps toward the bridge over the Ouse and the busy centre of the city. He bore the external appearance of respectable poverty; he carried a gingham umbrella, preserved in an oilskin case; he picked his steps with the neatest avoidance of all dirty places on the pavement; and he surveyed the scene around him with eyes of two different colors—a bilious brown eye on the look out for employment, and a bilious green eye in a similar predicament. In plainer terms, the stranger from Rosemary Lane was no other than—Captain Wragge.

Outwardly spanking, the captain had not altered for the better since the memorable spring day when he had presented himself to Miss Garth at the lodge-gate of Combe-Raven. The rail-way mania of that famous year had attacked even the wary Wragge, had withdrawn him from his customary pursuits, and had left him prostrate in the end, like many a better man. He had lost his clerical appearance—he had faded with the autumn leaves. His crape hat-band had put itself in brown mourning for its own bereavement of black. His dingy white collar and cravat had died the death of old linen, and had gone to their long home at the paper-maker's, to live again one day in quires at a stationer's shop. A gray shooting-jacket in the last stage of woolen atrophy replaced the black frock-coat of former times, and, like a faithful servant, kept the dark secret of its master's linen from the eyes of a prying world. From top to toe every square inch of the captain's clothing was altered for the worse; but the man himself remained unchanged—superior to all forms of moral mildew, impervious to the action of social rust. He was as courteous, as persuasive, as blandly dignified as ever. He carried his head as high without a shirt collar as ever he had carried it with one. The threadbare black handkerchief round his neck was perfectly tied; his rotten old shoes were neatly blacked; he might have compared chins, in the matter of smooth shaving, with the highest church dignitary in York. Time, change, and poverty had all attacked the captain together, and had all failed alike to get him down on the ground. He paced the streets of York a man superior to clothes and circumstances; his vagabond varnish as bright on him as ever.

Arrived at the bridge, Captain Wragge stopped and looked idly over the parapet at the barges in the river. It was plainly evident that he had no particular destination to reach, and nothing whatever to do. While he was still loitering the clock of York Minster chimed the half hour past five. Cabs rattled by him over the bridge, on their way to meet the train from London at twenty minutes to six. After a moment's hesitation the captain sauntered after the cabs. When it is one of a man's regular habits to live upon his fellow-creatures, that man is always more or less fond of haunting large railway stations. Captain Wragge gleaned the human field; and on that unoccupied afternoon the York terminus was as likely a corner to look about in as any other.

"HE TUCKED HIS UMBRELLA UNDER HIS ARM, AND IODOFULY SPELLED HIS NAME FOR HER FURTHER ENLIGHTENMENT."

He reached the platform a few minutes after the train had arrived. That entire incapability of devising administrative measures for the management of large crowds which is one of the national characteristics of Englishmen in authority, is nowhere more strikingly exemplified than at York. Three different lines of railway assemble three passenger mobs, from morning to night, under one roof, and leave them to rain a travelers' riot, with all the assistance which the bewildered servants of the company can render to increase the confusion. The customary disturbance was rising to its climax as Captain Wragge approached the platform. Dozens of different people were trying to attain dozens of different objects in dozens of different directions, all starting from the same common point, and all equally deprived of the means of information. A sudden parting of the crowd, near the second-class carriages, attracted the captain's curiosity. He pushed his way in, and found a decently-dressed man—assisted by a porter and a policeman—attempting to pick up some printed bills scattered from a paper parcel which his frenzied fellow-passengers had knocked out of his hand.

Offering his assistance in this emergency with the polite alacrity which marked his character,

Captain Wragge observed the three startling words, "Fifty Pounds Reward," printed in capital letters on the bills which he assisted in recovering; and instantly secreted one of them, to be more closely examined at the first convenient opportunity. As he crumpled up the bill in the palm of his hand his parti-colored eyes fixed with hungry interest on the proprietor of the unlucky parcel. What a man happens not to be the possessor of fifty pence in his own pocket, if his heart is in the right place, it breaks with his mouth is proverbially constituted, it asserts—at the sight of another man who carries about with him a printed offer of fifty pounds sterling addressed to his fellow-creatures.

The unfortunate traveler wrapped up his parcel as he best might, and made his way off the platform, after addressing an inquiry to the first official victim of the day who happened in his way sufficiently in possession of his senses to listen to it. Leaving the station for the river-side, which was close at hand, the stranger entered the ferry-boat at the North Street Postern. The captain, who had carefully dogged his steps ever since the fair, entered the boat also, and employed the short interval of transit to the opposite bank in a perusal of the hand-bill which the bill-sticker had given to his own private enlightenment. With his back carefully turned on the traveler, Captain Wragge now possessed his mind of the following items:

FIFTY POUNDS REWARD.

Left her home in London, early on the morning of September 18th, 1848, a Young Lady of Gentlemanly Address—Step motherly. Personal appearance—height of a very light brown; eyes, warm and affectionate; color of the right gray; complexion strikingly pale; left hand and foot her large and full; teeth, regular and white; walks with remarkable grace and modesty. Speaks with considerable fluency; has many peculiarities and habits of a refined, cultivated lady. Personal appearance when she left home, altogether, on the left side of the neck. Mark on the underlip, scarcely perceptible. Answers to the name of Mary Jolland, or attempted to join, under an assumed name, a theatrical company now performing in Yorkshire. Had, when she left London, one black box, and no other baggage. Whoever will give such information as will restore her to her friends will receive the above Reward. Apply at the office of Mr. Thackeray, Solicitor, Corner Square, Lincoln's Inn Fields, Middlesex, and Gwill, Scarle Street, Lincoln's Inn, London.

Accustomed as Captain Wragge was to keep the completest possession of himself in all human emergencies, his own profound astonishment, when the course of his reading brought him to the mark on the linen of the missing young lady, betrayed him into an exclamation of surprise which even startled the ferryman. The traveler was observed, and the first exhibition was fixed on the opposite bank of the river, and he left the boat hastily as the passenger it touched the landing-place. Captain Wragge recovered himself, pocketed the hand-bill, and followed his leader for the second time.

The stranger directed his steps to the nearest street which led down to the river, approached a row in his pocket-book with the numbers of the houses on the left-hand side, stopped at one of them, and rang the bell. The captain went on to the next house, affected to ring the bell in his turn, and stood with his ear on the opening of the door behind him. The servant, waiting to be let in; in reality listening with all his might for any scraps of dialogue which might reach his ears on the opening of the door behind him.

The door was answered with all due alacrity, and a sufficiently inquisitive interchange of question and answer on the threshold rewarded the dexterity of Captain Wragge.

"Does Mr. Huxtable live here?" asked the traveler.

"Yes, Sir," was the answer, in a woman's voice.

"Is he at home?"

"Not at home now, Sir; but he will be in again at eight-o'night."

"I think a young lady called here early in the day, did she not?"

"Yes; a young lady came this afternoon."

"Exactly: I come on the same business. Did she see Mr. Huxtable?"

"No, Sir; he has been away all day. The young lady told me she would come back at eight o'clock."

Just so. I will call and see Mr. Huxtable at the same time."

"Any name, Sir?"

"No; say a gentleman called on theatrical business—that will be enough. Not one minute, if you please, Ma'am. I am a stranger in York—will you kindly tell me which is the way to Coney Street?"

The woman gave the required information, the door closed, and the stranger hastened away in the direction of Coney Street.

On this occasion Captain Wragge made no attempt to follow him. The hand-bill revealed plainly enough that the man's next object was to complete the necessary arrangements with the local minister on the subject of the promised reward.

Having seen and heard enough for his immediate purpose, the captain retraced his steps down the street, turned to the right, and entered on the Esplanade, which, in that part of the city, borders the river-side between the swing-bridge and Lendal Tower. "This is a lonely matter," said Captain Wragge to himself, persisting, from sheer force of habit, in the old assertion of his relationship to Robinson Crusoe; "I must consider it in all its bearings." He ranked the gentleman under the name of Jolland his hands behind him, and lowered himself gently into the abyss of his own reflections. The order and propriety observable in the captain's shabby garments accurately typified the order and propriety which distinguished the operations of the captain's mind. It was his habit always to see his way before him through a neat succession of alternatives—and so he saw it now.

Three courses were open to him in connection with the remarkable discovery which he had just made. The first course was to do nothing in the matter at all. Inadmissible, on family grounds: equally inadmissible on pecuniary grounds: rejected accordingly. The second course was to deserve the gratitude of the young lady's friends, rated as fifty pounds. The third course was by a timely warning to deserve the gratitude of the young lady herself, rated—at an unknown figure. Between these last two alternatives the wary Wragge hesitated: not through any of Machiavelli's pecuniary resources, for he was totally ignorant of the circumstances which had induced the sisters of their inheritance—but from doubt whether an obstacle, in the shape of an undiscovered grandmother, or of the like, might be connected with her disappearance from home. After mature reflection he determined to leave the matter to be guided by circumstances. In the mean time the first consideration was to be beforehand with the messenger from London. And, this done, securely on the young lady herself.

The "young gentlemanly girl," mused the captain, solemnly strutting backward and forward by the lonely river-side. "I always have noticed that young ladies shall look gentlemanly—in the light of a niece."

Where was the alleged relative at that moment? In other words, how was a young lady, in Magsden's critical position, likely to while away the hours until Mr. Huxtable's return? If there was an obstructive gentleman in the back-ground it would be mere waste of time to pursue the question. But if that inference which the hand-bill suggested was correct—if she was a girl-student, at the city of York—where was she likely to be?

Not in the crowded thoroughfares, to begin with. Not in the public parts of the convent in the Minster, for it was now past the hour at which the sight-seers were admitted. Not in the waiting-room at the railway? She would hardly run that risk. Was she in one of the hotels? Equally considering that point, and answering it herself. In a pastry-cook's shop? Far more likely. Sweeping about in the High Street? Certainly; but no more. Loitering away the time in some quiet locality out of doors? Likely enough, provided that that locality was central. The captain paused, weighted the relative claims on his attention of the quiet locality and the central locality, and decided for the first of the two. There was time enough to find her at the pastry-cook's, and to inquire at the principal hotels, or, finally, to intercept her in Mr. Huxtable's immediate neighborhood, from eight o'clock to eight. While the time was, the course was to use it in looking for her out of doors. Where? In the fashionable and central locality; but she was not there—not on the lonely road beyond, which ran back by the Abbey Wall. What next? Diplomacy—a little locality across the river, brightened under the influence of a new idea, and suddenly hastened back to the ferry.

"The Walk on the Walls," thought the politician, "is the place of the young lady's choice, yes." The quietest place in York, and the places that every stranger goes to see.

In ten minutes Captain Wragge was exploring the new field of search. He mounted to the wall by a flight of steps below the western junction of the city) by the North Street Postern, from which the wall winds round until it ends again at a corresponding flight of steps at the passage of Rosemary Lane. It was then twenty minus to eight o'clock, and the light was only half an hour since; the red light lay broad and low in the cloudless western heaven; all visible objects were softening in the mellow glow, and it were not darkening yet. The first few lamps in the city were lighted, and the dim little specks of yellow light as the captain started on his walk through one of the most striking scenes which England can show.

On his right hand, as he set forth, stretched the open country beyond the city, with its green meadows, the boundary trees dividing them, the broad windings of the river in the distance. On his left appeared long rows of roofs, all wrapped in the evening stillness, all made beautiful by the evening peace. On his left hand, the majestic west front of York Minster soared over the city, and caught the last bright rays of light that fell on the summits of the towers. Had this noble prospect tempted the lost girl to linger and look at it? No; thus far, as a sign of her, he saw nothing. The captain then attentively and walked on.

He reached the spot where the iron course of the railroad strikes its way through arches in the old wall. He paused at this place—where the greatest activity of a great city is represented—to beat with all the pulses of its loud-clanging life, and by side with the deepest silence of a city asleep under the old historic stones which tell of fortified York and the sieges of two centuries ago—and looked at this spot and that, and then at her again, and searched in vain. Others were walking up and down the pathway, others in the wilderness of the iron rails; but she was not among them. The captain glanced doubtfully at the darkening sky, and walked on.

He stopped again where the postern of Micklegate still stands, and still strengthens the city wall as of old. Here the prospect changed within a few steps, passed through the dark stone gateway of the old Norman fortification, and continues its course southward until the walls reach the river once more. He paused, and peered attentively into the dim archway under the old guard-room. Was she waiting there for the darkness to come and hide her from prying eyes? No; a solitary workman loitered through the stone chamber, but no other living creature stirred in the place. The captain mounted the steps which led out from the postern, and walked on.

He advanced some fifty or sixty yards along the paved foot-way; the outlying suburbs of York on one side of him, a rope-walk and some patches of kitchen garden occupying a vacant strip of ground on the other. He advanced with eager eyes and quickened step—for he saw before him the lonely figure of a woman, standing by the parapet of the wall, with her face set toward the distant view. He approached cautiously, to make sure of her before she turned and observed him. There was no mistaking that tall dark figure as it rested against the parapet with a listless grace. There she stood, in her long black dress and cape, in the last dim light of evening falling tenderly on her pale, resolute young face. There she stood, in the full possession of the priceless treasure of her freedom, never left unprotected, never tried and betrayed. There she stood in the lovely dawn of her womanhood, a castaway in a strange city, wrecked on the world!

Captain Wragge was, the first sight of her staggered even the dauntless assurance of Captain Wragge. He slowly turned his back on her, and looked at him he raised his hat with the nearest approach to solemnity that he could assume, and deliberately had left him capable of thinking.

"I think I have the honor of addressing the younger Miss Vanstone?" he began. "Deeply grateful, I am sure, for more reasons than one, to have tracked you to this with a cold surprise. No recollection of the day when he had followed her into the back-room of that very house which Miss Garth rose in her memory while he now confronted her with his altered manner and his altered dress.

"I shall not intrude," he said, quietly. "You are a perfect stranger to me."

"Quite true," replied the captain; "I am a species of relation. I had the pleasure of seeing you in the parlor of the present house. I presented myself on that memorable occasion to an honored proprietress in your late father's family, Miss Garth, on the pressing agreeable circumstances, to present myself to you. My name is Wragge."

By this time he had recovered complete possession of his own impudence; his parti-colored eyes twinkled with delight, and his voice resumed its modest announcement of himself with a fascinating ringing or tone.

Magsden frowned and drew back a step. The captain was not a man to be daunted by a cold reception. He produced his unlucky bill of the farm, and loosely spelled his name of her further enlightenment. "W, a, A, double G, Wragge," said the captain, ticking off the letters persuasively on his fingers.

"I understand your name," said Magsden. "Excuse me for leaving you abruptly. I have an engagement."

She tried to pass him and walk on northward toward the railway. He instantly met the attempt by raising both hands, and displaying the pair of darned black gloves outspread in polite protest.

"Not that way," he said; "not that way, Miss Vanstone. I beg and entreat!"

"Why not?" she asked, haughtily.

"Because," answered the captain, "that is the way which leads to Mr. Huxtable's."

The sudden astonishment and terror of hearing his reply she suddenly bent forward, and for the first time looked him close in the face. Was the first time looked him close in the face. Was the captain's previous scrutiny with every appearance of feeling highly gratified by it. "Ha, ha—Hey, Lord!" said the captain, in addressing to the old joke; "r, A—ta, Huxta; n, i, x—ble, Huxtable."

"How do you know about Mr. Huxtable?" she asked. "What do you mean by mentioning him to me?"

The captain's curly lips took a new twist upward. He immediately replied, to the best practical purpose, by producing the hand-bill from his pocket.

"There is just light enough left," he said, "for young (and lovely) eyes to read by. Before I enter upon the personal statement which your fastening eyes claim from me, may I propose a moment's attention on this Document."

She took the hand-bill from him. By the last gleam of twilight she read the lines which set a price on her recovery—which published the description of her in policies prints, full in duplication of a strayed dog. No tender consideration had prepared her for the shock, no kind words softened it to her. With a cry of sharp anguish whose cunning eyes watched her eagerly while she read it over, she crushed the hand-bill which he had stolen had only been prepared in anticipation of the worst, and was only to be publicly used in the event of all more considerate means of tracing her being tried in vain, than she knew of. The hand dropped from her hand, and she flushed deeply. She turned away from Captain Wragge, as if all idea of his existence had passed out of her mind on this occasion.

"Oh, Norah, Norah!" she said to herself, sorrowfully. "Is it for this letter I wrote you—for the hard struggle I had to go away?" Oh, Norah! Norah!!

"How is Norah?" inquired the captain, with the utmost politeness.

She turned upon him with angry bright tears in her indignant eyes. "Is this thing shown publicly?" she asked, stamping her foot on it. "Is the mark on my neck described all over York?"

"Pray compose yourself," pleaded the persuasive Wragge. "At present I have every reason to believe that you have just perused the only copy in circulation. Allow me to pick it up."

Before he could touch the bill she snatched it from the pavement, tore it into fragments, and threw them over the wall.

"There!" she said to the captain, "you remind me of your poor dear mother. The family spirit, Miss Vanstone. We all inherit our hot blood from my maternal grandfather."

"How did you come by it?" she asked, suddenly.

"My dear creature, I have just told you," remonstrated the captain. "We all come by it from my maternal grandfather."

"How did you come by that hand-bill?" she repeated, passionately.

"I beg ten thousand pardons! My head was running on the family spirit.—How did I come by it? Briefly then," Captain Wragge entered on his personal statement; taking his customary vocal exercise through the longest words in the English language, with the highest elocutionary relish. Having on this rare occasion nothing to do but to communicate facts, and from his ordinary habits, and with the utmost amazement at the novelty of his own situation, permitted himself to tell the truth plainly and briefly.

The effect of the narrative on Magsden by no means fulfilled Captain Wragge's anticipations in starting it. She was not startled—she was not irritated; she showed no disposition to ease herself on the merry side of the subject. She looked him steadily in the face, and all she said when he had neatly rounded his last sentence was, "Go on."

"Go on?" repeated the captain. "Shocked to disappoint you, I am sure—but the fact is, I have done."

"No, you have not," she rejoined; "you have left out the one thing I want to hear. The end of it is—You came here to look for me; and you came to me to use the fifty pounds reward."

Those plain words so completely staggered Captain Wragge that for the moment he stood speechless. Just he had foreseen the sordid traits of all sorts far too often to be permanently discomerted by them. Before Magsden could pause for her answer he was staggered by the discovered his balance; Wragge was himself again.

"Smart," thought the captain, living indignantly, and drumming with his un bella on the pavement. "Some more might take it serious-ly. I'm not—naturally offended."

Magsden looked at him through the gathering darkness with mute perplexity. All her little experience of society had been experience among people who possessed a common sense of honor, and a common sensibility to the claims of position. She had hitherto seen nothing but the success of human product from the great laboratory of Civilization. Here was one of the failures; and, with all her quickness, she was puzzled how to deal with it.

"Pardon me for returning to the subject," pursued the captain. "It has just occurred to my mind that you might naturally have spoken in earnest. My poor child! how can I earn the fifty pounds before the reward is offered to me? Those hand-bills may not be publicly posted for a week to come. Precious as you are to all your relations, I myself included, I am very sorry for it the lawyers who are managing this case will not pay fifty pounds for you in the most friendly way, if you are still persuaded that my needy pockets are gaping for the money? Very good. Another way of earning it, then, with your own fair fingers. There is a train to London at nine-forty-five to-night. Submit yourself to your friends' wishes, and go back by it."

"Never!" said Magsden, firing at the bare suggestion, indignantly as the captain had intended she should. "If my mind had not been made up before, that vile hand-bill would have decided me. I forgive you, Captain Wragge, for your way, and speaking to herself, "but not Mr. Pendrill, and not Miss Garth."

"Quite right!" observed Captain Wragge. "The family spirit. I should have done the same myself in your place; it runs in the blood. Hark! three goes the clock again—half past seven. Miss Vanstone, pardon this unavoidable interruption. If you are to escape your rescription—if you are to be your own mistress much longer, you cannot take a moment too hard before eight o'clock. You are young, you are inexperienced, you are in imminent danger. Here is a position of emergency on both sides; and here am I, on the other, with an uncle's interest in the case myself in my age: it runs in the blood.

"Suppose I choose to depend on nobody, and to act for myself?" said Magsden. "What then?"

"Then," replied the captain, "you will walk straight into one of the two traps which I have set for you. One is in the ancient and interesting city of York. Trap the first, at Mr. Huxtable's house; trap the second, at the railway; trap the third, at the railway station; trap the fourth, at the theatre. That man with the hand-bill is at the bottom of them all. If he has not set those four traps (with the assistance of the hand-bills) before he goes to bed, I'll be the competent lawyer's clerk I take him for. Come, come, my dear girl! if there is somebody else in the world you can trust whose advice you prefer to mine—"

"You see that I am alone," she interposed, proudly. "If you knew me better, you would know that I depend on nobody but myself."

Those words made the captain think which sow remained in the captain's mind—the doubt whether the course was clear for change. The motive of her flight from home was evidently that the hand-bills assumed it to be—a resolve fancy for going on the stage. "Two of two things," thought Wragge to himself, in his spiritual way. "She's worth more than the pecuniary way. "She's worth more than the pecuniary reward, in her present situation, or she isn't. If she is, her friends may whistle for her: if she isn't, I have only to keep her till the bills are posted." Fortified by this simple plan of action the captain returned to the charge, impolitely placed Magsden between the two intolerable alternatives of trusting herself to him, or to the hand-bill, and of returning to her friends, on the other.

"I respect independence of character wherever it is to be had," he said, with an air of virtuous severity. "In a young and lovely relative I more than respect—I admire it. But (excuse the bold assertion) to walk on a way of your own you must first have a way to walk on. Under existing circumstances, where is your way? Mr. Huxtable is out of the question, to begin with."

"Out of the question for to-night," said Magdalen; "but what hinders me from writing to Mr. Huxtable, and making my own private arrangements with him for to-morrow?"

Insisted, with all my heart"—his pulpable hit. Now for my turn. To get to to-morrow (excuse the bold metaphor more) you must first pass through to-night. Where are you to sleep?"

"Are there no hotels in York?"

"Excellent hotels for large families; excellent hotels for single gentlemen. The very worst hotels in the world for handsome young ladies who present themselves alone at the door without an escort, without a maid as an attendant, and without a single article of luggage. Dark as it is, I think I could see a lady's box if there was any thing of the sort in our immediate neighborhood."

"My box is at the cloak-room. What is to prevent my sending the ticket for it?"

"Nothing—if you want to communicate your address by means of your box—nothing else, ever. Think; pray think! Do you really suppose that the people who are looking for you are such fools as not to have an eye on the cloak-room? Do you think they are such fools—when they find a lady's box come to Mr. Huxtable's at night to-night—as not to inquire at all the hotels? Do you think a young lady of your striking appearance (even if they pretended to receive you) could take up her abode at an inn without becoming the subject of universal curiosity and remark? Here is night coming on as fast as it can. Don't let me bore you: only let me ask once more—Are you to sleep?"

There was no answer to that question: in Magdalen's present frame of mind nothing no answer to it on her side. She was silent.

"Where are you to sleep?" repeated the captain. "I reply in your own words—pray for me! Mrs. Wragge will be charmed to see you. Look upon her as your aunt; pray look upon her as your aunt. The landlady is a widow, the children is dear by, there are no other lodgers, and there is a bedroom to let. Can any thing be more satisfactory under all the circumstances? Pray observe, I say nothing about to-morrow—I leave to-morrow to you, and confine myself exclusively to the night. I may, or may not, command theatrical facilities; but I am in a position to offer you. Sympathy and admiration may, or may not, be strong within me when I contemplate the dark and independent spirit of the sex-ter. Hosts of examples of bright stars of the British drama, who have begun their apprenticeship to the stage as you are beginning it to-day, may, or may not, crowd on my memory. These are topics for the future. Let me only say that I confine myself within my strict range of duty. We are within five minutes' walk of my present address. Allow me to offer my services. Are you hesitate? You distrust me? Good Heaven! is it possible you can have heard any thing to my disadvantage?"

"Quite possible," said Magdalen, without a moment's thinking from the answer.

"May I inquire the particulars?" asked the captain, with the politest composure. "Is it the gaze my feeling; oblige me by speaking out. In the plainest terms, now, what have you been told?"

She answered him with a woman's desperate disregard of consequences when she is driven to it—she answered him instantly:

"I have heard you are a Rogue."

"Have you, indeed?" said the impenetrable Wragge. "A Rogue? Well! I waive my privilege of saving you right this point for a future time. For the sake of argument, let us say I am Rogue. What is Mr. Huxtable?"

"A respectable man, or I should not have seen him in the house where we first met."

"Very good. Now observe! You talked of going to Mr. Huxtable a minute ago. What do you think a respectable man is likely to do with a young lady who has run away because she has run away from her home and her friends to go on the stage? My dear girl, on your own showing, it's my bounden duty to see you wait in your present predicament. It's a Rogue—like me."

Magdalen laughed hitterly.

"Thank you for recalling me to myself and my circumstances. I have my end to gain—and who am I to pick and choose the way of getting to it? It is my turn to beg pardon now. I have been talking as if I was a young lady of family and position. Absurd! I am a low betrayed thing that don't, we, Captain Wragge? You are quite right. Nobody's child must sleep under Somebody's roof—and why not yours?"

"This way," said the captain, doctrously profiting by the sudden change in her manner, and cunningly refraining from exasperating it by trying more himself. "This way."

She followed him a few steps, and suddenly stopped.

Suppose I was discovered?" she broke out, eagerly. "Who has any authority over me? Who can take me back if I don't choose to go? If they all find me to-morrow, what then? I can't say No to Mr. Pendrill? Can't I trust my own courage with Miss Garth?"

Can you trust your courage with your sister?" whispered the captain, who had not forgotten the references to Norah which had twice stopped her already.

Her head drooped. She shivered as if the cold night air had struck her, and leaned back wearily against the parapet of the wall.

"Not with Norah," she said, sadly. "I could trust myself with the others. Not with Norah."

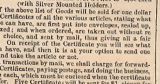
"This way," repeated Captain Wragge. She roused herself; looked up at the darkening heaven, looked round at the darkening view. "What must be, must," she said, and followed him.

The Minster clock struck the quarter to eight as they left the Walk on the Wall and descended the steps into Rosemary Lane. Almost at the same moment the lawyer's clerk from London gave the last instructions to his subordinates, and took up his own position, on the opposite side of the river, within easy view of Mr. Huxtable's door.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GOOD AGENTS and CANVASSERS WANTED.—Every one needs at the present time a New, Reliable Family Work. Address, for terms, JAMES LEE & CO., Bridgeport, Conn. Such is GOLDTHWAITE'S New Map, just published, and furnished on liberal terms. It will positively supersede, and be substituted in the business. Apply, inclosing stamp, to 13 CLIFF STREET, New York.

Weale's Series



Books on Physical Science, Building and Architecture, Civil Engineering, Ship Building, Navigation, Arithmetic, and Mathematics, can be supplied on liberal terms, by VIRTUE & CO., No. 26 John street, New York.

TAPSCOTT'S LINE LIVERPOOL AND LONDON PACKETS. REMITTANCES TO ENGLAND, GREAT BRITAIN OR IRELAND at the lowest rates, and DRAFTS issued in sums to suit purchasers, available in the UNITED KINGDOM, can be obtained, as heretofore. For circulars apply to TAPSCOTT & CO., 86 South Street.

To Wanting Farms.

New Repository of VINELAND.—30 miles from Philadelphia by Railroad. Good lands sold, highly productive for Wheat, Corn, Grass, Fruits, and Vegetables—a healthy market—delightful climate—when farming is profitable, especially these lands are adapted, and where good farmers openings can be found. Large numbers are settling. Society good. Terms from $15 to $20 per acre. Village Lots $10 to $50 each. Four years' time given. Report of SOIL, &c., FURNISHED, Age, &c., of the Purchaser. Send stamp for pamphlet, together with the "Vineland Rural," giving full particulars. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, E.M., Vineland P.O., Cumberland County, New Jersey.

Prescott's Cartridge Revolvers

The Sin., or Navy Size, carries a Ball weighing 36 to the pound. The 5½in., or Pocket Size, 48 to the lb. By recent experiments made in the Army, these Revolvers are considered the most effective Pistols ever used in war. Also,

Ballard's Patent Breech-Loading Rifle.

This arm is entirely new, and is universally acknowledged to be the nearest to perfection of any Breech-Loading Rifle. Carries a Ball weighing 54 balls to the pound, of Rifle 7 pounds. Size of Calibre adapted to Nos. 32, 33, and 44 regular Cartridges. For prices and particulars call or send for a Circular to

MERWIN & BRAY, Sole Agents,
No. 293 Broadway, N. Y.

Commercial Travelers and Agents Wanted Everywhere,
25 Cent Portfolio Package.

Contents.—16 Sheets Note Paper, 18 Envelopes, 1 Pencil-holder, 2 Pens, 1 Penoil, 1 Blotting Pad, 1 Inkstand, 1 Wax Hymn, 5 Engravings, 1 New Sketbook for Computing Interest, 1 Fashionable Gent's Pocket-book, 2 Letters, 4 Leaflet Underdrawers, 2 ladies' Collars, 1 Ladies' Undersleeve, 1 Ladies' Embroidered Bosom and Collar, 1 Gentleman's Clothing Robes, 1 Child's Apron, 1 Child's Full Dress, 1 Ladies' Embroidered Dress, 1 Handkerchief Border, 1 Lace Wiper, 1 Edging. Also, one FASHIONABLE ARTICLE of Rich Jewelry. Agents send $1 a day. Send stamp for Circular of wholesale prices. Sample 50 cents. WEIR & CO., Publishers, 56 South Third St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Grand Opening!!!

BRODIE'S
Stock of Spring
and
Summer
MANTILLAS,

Now Ready for Inspection
at his
OLD STAND,
300 Canal Street,

His Palace of Fashion,

Under the Fifth Avenue Hotel,
Corner of 23d Street,
New York.

S SOMETHING NEW.—AGENTS WANTED. 12 New Articles. Rides and prodes. Sample 25 cents. Inclose stamp. RICE & CO., N. Y., or Chicago, Ill.

You must Notice,

That the name of the firm of W. Foworth & Co. is changed to J. H. Winslow & Co., Mr. Foworth having retired from the concern. Business continued the same, and all Certificates with the name of W. Foworth & Co., 288 Broadway, attached are good, and will be redeemed at par. Those with the same promptness and faithfulness as heretofore, at the long returned to us.

100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000,

To be sold for One Dollar each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to put.

Splendid List!!

Of Articles to be Sold for One Dollar each.

196 Gold Hunting Lever Watches.....$100,00 each
100 " Watches.....60,00 each
300 Ladies' and Gents' Gold Chronometer Watches.....50,00 each
500 Ladies and Gents' Silver Watches.....10,00 each
6,000 Vest and Neck Chains.....5,00 to 10,00 each
6,000 Gold Pens and Pencils.....5,00 to 10,00 each
3,000 " .....5,00 to 10,00 each
1,000 Cameo Brooches.....4,00 to 6,00 each
3,000 Mosaic and Jet Brooches.....4,00 to 6,00 each
3,000 Lava and Florentine Brooches.....4,00 to 6,00 each
3,000 Coral, Opal, and Lva. Brooches.....4,00 to 6,00 each
3,000 Gold Lockets.....4,00 to 6,00 each
3,000 Mosaic and Jet Ear Drops.....4,00 to 6,00 each
3,000 Lava and Florentine Ear Drops.....4,00 to 6,00 each
3,000 Coral, Opal, and Lva. Ear Drops.....4,00 to 5,00 each
3,000 Gold Bracelets.....4,00 to 5,00 each
3,000 Sets Keys.....5,00 to 6,00 each
5,000 Fob and Guard Chains.....2,00 to 4,00 each
5,000 Sets of Shirt Studs.....2,00 to 4,00 each
3,000 Sleeve Buttons.....2,50 to 4,00 each
3,000 Pairs Sleeve Buttons.....2,50 to 4,00 each
3,000 Stone Set Rings.....2,50 to 5,00 each
3,000 Gold Rings.....2,50 to 5,00 each
1,000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry.....5,00 to 10,00 each
1,000 Sets Ladies' Coral and Opal (Mounted in Gold with Silver Mounted Bridoire.....5,00 to 10,00 each

All of the above will be sold for One Dollar each. On receipt of all the various articles, stating what you wish to have, the list will be put into envelopes, sealed and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, postage paid, for the above. On receipt of the Certificate you will see what it is you are to have. It is at your option to accept or decline the article or not.

In all transactions we require a small charge for forwarding certificates, prepaying postage, and doing the business. 25 cents each, which must accompany each certificate. Five certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty-two for $5; sixty-five for $10, and one hundred for $15. Our object in selling so cheap is to be allowed to rents on every certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances accompany the order. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Circulars will be sent out only by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
P. O. Box 4,870, 288 Broadway, New York.

N.B. We wish it distinctly understood that all articles of jewelry put up by us of perfect satisfaction can be returned and the money will be refunded.

Every Man his own Printer.

Portable Printing-Offices for the Army and Navy, Druggists, and Business Men. Send for a circular, to

ADAMS PRESS COMPANY,
31 Park Row (under Leroy's Hotel), New York.

BENTON'S COURSE OF INSTRUCTION IN ORDNANCE AND GUNNERY; compiled for the use of the Cadets of the U. S. Military Academy. Capt. J. G. Benton, Ord. Dep't., Prin. Ass't. to the Chief of Ordnance. 1 vol. 12mo. Cloth. Illustrated by 58 Engravings. Price $1.50. Sent free by mail on receipt of price. D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, 192 Broadway, New York.

A Great Thing for Agents!
Try it! Try it!

Send 25 cents in coin for a Specimen Copy of that beautiful Family Engraving, the "BIRD, FOREST'S DREAM," the most lenghtful and attractive thing ever published. Sells rapidly. Great discount to Agents. Copies in roller, pre-paid, cent or receipt of 25 cents.

ADAMS PRESS COMPANY,
31 Park Row (under Leroy's Hotel), New York.

Wedding Cards and Note Papers at

J. EVERDELL'S celebrated Engraving Establishment, 103 Broadway, cor. Liberty St., N. Y. Samples by mail.

FRIENDS OF SOLDIERS!

All Articles for Soldiers at Baltimore, Washington, Hilton Head, Beaufort, and all places accessible by United States troops, should be sent, at half rates, by HARDEN'S EXPRESS, No. 10 Broadway. Suitam charged low rates.

AGENTS!

Send for our Circular, mailed free,
HEAD-QUARTERS FOR UNION STAR AND PRINTERS' AND PRIZE PACKAGES of every description.
PRIZE DIPLOMA PACKAGES.
PRIZE PACKETS FOR THE MILLION.
UNION STAR PACKAGES AND PORTRAIT PACKETS.
UNION PACKAGES AND RECIPE PACKETS.
CONCERT PACKAGES.
HOWARD, WORTH & CO., 36 Beekman St., N. Y.

EMPLOYMENT.—A NEW ENTERPRISE. The FRANKLIN SEWING MACHINE COMPANY are now in want of agents. Liberal salary and expenses paid, or commission allowed. Address, with stamp, for particulars, 625 Broadway, New York, that are for reference.

For Sale or to Let.

The premises Nos. 309 and 311 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, formerly occupied by Messrs. L. T. Levy & Company. For Terms, &c.

Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS,
New York.

DYSPEPSIA AND FITS.

A sure Cure for these distressing complaints is now made known. Sufferers may address with confidence DR. J. BROWN, Pharmaceutical Chemist, 164 Fulton Street, BROOKLYN, N. Y. The prescription, furnished free of charge, is a short and simple one, and will be found, by every one who has taken it, never having failed in a single case. It is equally sure in cases of FITS and EPILEPSY, and the ingredients may be found in any drug store. Those who are afflicted with Consumption, Bronchitis, or Asthma, may safe be cured by the use of my Herbal Preparations. I would call their especial attention to my new preparation for the cure of night sweats. Address

DR. O. PHELPS BROWN,
No. 19 Grand Street, Jersey City, N. J.

THE ALBION, A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER,

Established in 1822,
DEVOTED TO
NEWS, POLITICS, CRITICISM, AND GENERAL LITERATURE.

PRICE $5 PER ANNUM; 6 CENTS PER COPY.
Send for Specimen Copies, with prospectus, to the ALBION OFFICE, 16 Beekman St., N. Y.

Watches!!!

Wholesale Store of 10,000 Watches on sale at retail at wholesale prices. Prices ranging from $3 50 to $250 00 each. For List of prices, see advertisement in "Harper's Weekly," May 17, No. 281, page 319, or send for circular. Registered letters at my risk. J. C. FERGUSON, 868 Broadway, New York.

EMPLOYMENT.—Agents Wanted in every Loal Town and County to enter into a respectable and permanent business. For particulars address, with red stamp, DR. J. R. PARKER, 54 East 12th Street, New York.

Head-Quarters for Cheap Jewelry.—Head-

Quarters for Gold Pens, Pencils, Watches, Rings, Studs, Buttons, and everything in the Jewelry line. For Circular address ARTHUR W. A. HATFIELD, Manufacturing Jeweler, 208 Broadway, New York.

MRS. ALLEN'S IMPROVED ANTI-LUXURIANT

OR WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES!—Ladies and Gentlemen will find this specialty in six weeks (upon the smoothest face) without stain to the skin. Sent by mail, or express, to any part of the country, on receipt of an order. R. G. GRAHAM, No. 49 Cedar Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have Just Published:

CAPTAIN BURTON'S CITY OF THE SAINTS. The City of the Saints; and across the Rocky Mountains to California. By Captain RICHARD F. BURTON, Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, and Fellow of the Royal Asiatic Society. With numerous Illustrations and a Map. 8vo, Muslin, $3 50.

THE LAST OF THE MORTIMERS. A Story in Two Volumes. By the Author of "Passages Mutilated," "A Horse on the Moor," "The Days of My Life," "The Laird of Norlaw," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Commencement of Twenty-Fifth Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For June, 1862.

CONTENTS:

BROADWAY, ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Park.—Something Coming.—In Union Square.—Work is over.—At Home.—Eleven o'clock.—Second Morning.

A DANGEROUS JOURNEY. (Concluded.)

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE WAR.—Rebel Attack.—San Miguel Island, California.—Fortifications of Santa Marguerita.—Lassoing a Grizzly.—Beds of the Potomac.

THE CAT-WHELPS. (Illustrated.)

ILLUSTRATIONS.—From the Bluffs at Catawissa.—View at Port Royal.—Rebel Attack.—Coal Barges.—View near Quequake Junction.—Head-Waters of the Little Schuylkill.—Bridge at Rockwood.—Palmerville Water Gap.—View from Malinsville.—View from Catawissa.—Town of Catawissa.—Sea-Mill at Wilmington.

ROUGH RIDING DOWN SOUTH.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Steamboating in Mississippi.—The Lonely Grave.—The Bereaved Negroes.—The Woods on Fire.—Sunday Burials.—Burnett and the Bear.

MADELEINE SCHAEFFER.

MONTHLY RECORD OF

MISTRESS AND MAID. A HOUSEHOLD STORY. By the Author of "Hidden Path."

BURR'S CONSPIRACY.

OLLAPOD'S TRAVELS. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. Illustrated by J. E. MILLAIS.

CHAPTER XXIII. Lady Mason returns Home.

CHAPTER LIV. Telling all that happened beneath the Lamp-Post.

CHAPTER LV. What took place in Harley Street.

CHAPTER LVI. How Sir Peregrine did Business with Mr. Round.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Lady Mason going before the Magistrates.—Sir Peregrine and Mr. Round.

CONCERNING LIGHT.

FALLING LOVE.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP. By W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XXXV. Rob Augusta Dined.

CHAPTER XXXVI. In which Philip wears a Wig.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Rob Augusta at Breakfast.—Macfarlane's Chambers.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S FOREIGN BUREAU.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Hentz's Lips.—Punh's Tavern.—The Uncommercial Traveler.—Introduction.—After Supper.—Its Consequence.

FASHION FOR JUNE.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bridal Toilet.—Undress Costume.

Any Number will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for Twenty-five Cents. Subscriptions may commence with any number, be bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, to any part of the United States, free of Postage, at Three Dollars per Volume. Or Eight Dollars per Annum. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the expense of the purchaser, at a Discount of Twenty-five per Cent. from the above rate. Twenty-Four Volumes, bound uniformly, enabling from June, 1850, to May, 1862, are now ready.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each).....2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Twenty Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
Single Copies Six Cents.

WILKIE COLLINS'S New Story, entitled "NO NAME," was commenced in the Number for March 15 (No. 279) of

HARPER'S WEEKLY,

And will be continued from week to week until completed.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$2 00
One Copy for Two Years.....4 00
Two Copies for One Year.....3 00
An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $4 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY is electrotyped, and Back Numbers can be had at any time.

Vols. I., II., III., IV., and V. for the Years 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861 of HARPER'S WEEKLY, handsomely bound in Cloth cases, Price $2 00 each, are now ready.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

CAUDLE LECTURE.

(Recently delivered at Richmond, Va., and to be repeated at Danville, N. C.)

MRS. JEFF DAVIS CAUDLE (loq.) "No, Mr. D——, I'll not 'go to sleep, like a good soul!' Where's the Trip to Washington promised me? And where's the Nice White House I was to have?"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Books for the Million.
Just Published, May 25th,
No. 9. No. 8.
Beadle's Dime Song Book.
No. 9.

A Dollar Book for a Dime.
THE LAND CLAIM.
A Story of the Upper Missouri.
Life of Gen. GEO. B. MCCLELLAN
Life of Gen. JOHN C. FREMONT.
Life of Gen. WINFIELD SCOTT.
Ten Cents each. For sale by all Booksellers and News Dealers. Sent, post-paid, on receipt of price. Address BEADLE & CO., Publishers, New York.
☞ Agents Wanted. Send for a Catalogue.

THE FIFTH EDITION
—OF—
MRS. STOWE'S NEW NOVELS!

I.
The Pearl of Orr's Island!
An American Story. 1 volume. $1 25.
BY HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

"The Pearl of Orr's Island" is a story more attractive than its last upon the Coast of Maine. It is filled with graphic sketches of New England life, whose varied phases had no better delineator than Mrs. Stowe.

II.
AGNES OF SORRENTO!
An Italian Story. 1 volume. $1 25.
BY HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

"Agnes of Sorrento" is a romance of the sunny clime of Italy, and to a plot of rare interest adds glowing pictures of nature and art in that lovely country.

The above stories, by the popular author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," have been eagerly received by the reading world. They have passed rapidly through FIVE EDITIONS each.

☞ Either book sent, post-paid, to any address, on receipt of $1 25.

TICKNOR & FIELDS,
135 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

GLORIOUS PARSON BROWNLOW.
The new Card Portraits of PARSON BROWNLOW, for which he sat in Cincinnati expressly for
E. ANTHONY,
No. 501 Broadway, New York.
are now ready for sale.
Twenty-five cents in stamps will bring the Parson by return mail. Also,
COMMODORE FARRAGUT,
CAPT. DAVIS,
GEN. HANCOCK,
And all the heroes of the day.
Catalogue sent on receipt of stamp.
Photographic Albums in great variety, and of superior workmanship and durability.

A BEAUTIFUL MICROSCOPE!
MAGNIFYING 500 TIMES, FOR 20c. IN SILVER.
Five of different powers, 15. Stamps Free.
T. C. BOYLE, Box 529, Boston, Mass.

ARTIFICIAL LEGS
AND ARMS. Sulphur Patent. 536 Broadway, N. Y. Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel. Send for a Circular.

259 ORNAMENTAL IRON 259
WORK, Wrought, Cast, and Wire. IRON RAILINGS, VERANDAHS, BALCONIES, GUARDS, and IRON FURNITURE of every description. Illustrated Catalogues mailed on receipt of four 3 cent stamps. HUTCHINSON & WICKERSHAM, 259 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.

STEINWAY & SONS'

PATENT OVERSTRUNG GRAND, SQUARE AND UPRIGHT PIANOS

Are now considered the best Piano manufactured, and will be sold to suit the times. Each Instrument warranted for five years. Warerooms, Nos. 82 and 84 Walker Street, near Broadway, N. Y. Send for Circular.

CARD.
We are now in receipt of our importations of all the latest styles of fabrics suited to the SPRING and SUMMER trade, to which we invite our patronage and attention.
Our stock of men's clothing, just manufactured, is very extensive, embracing all the leading styles.
YOUTHS' and CHILDREN'S clothing in great variety and style is receiving special attention. We beg to call the attention of country trade to this fact, as also to the favorable low prices in this as well as the other departments of our business.
DEVLIN & CO.,
Broadway, corner of Grand Street.
Warren "

To the Nervous and Debilitated.

Dr. ADAM LAURIES'
CHINESE LIFE PILLS

This wonderful remedy, chiefly composed from the essence of a plant that grows in the tea districts of China, the use of which, as prescribed by learned Chinese physicians as an antidote to the effects of long opium debauch, discovered by Dr. Adam Laurie, M. D., of the Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh, and Licentiate of the Royal College, and by him introduced into European practice.
These Pills take an effect on a Catholic but not specific order on the blood and nervous centres; are a speedy and infallible cure for and all diseases from impure blood or nervous derangement, and may be taken with entire safety by the most delicate lady or tender child.

Neuralgia, Ticdoloreux, Dyspepsia, St. Vitus' Dance, Languor, Lassitude, Depression of Spirits, Nervous Headache, Irritability, Excitement. Excessive Use of Tobacco,

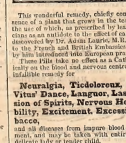
One Dollar per carton of forty pills, or a hundred for Two Dollars—free by mail on receipt of cash, by
GEO. BULPIN, General Agent,
619 Broadway,
Opposite St. Nicholas Hotel, New York.



To Consumptives.
THE Advertiser, having been restored to health in a few weeks by a very simple remedy, after having suffered several years with a severe lung affection, and that dread disease, Consumption—is anxious to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. To all who desire it, he will send a copy of the prescription used (free of charge), with the directions for preparing and using the same, which they will find a sure CURE for CONSUMPTION, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS &c. The only object of the advertiser in sending the Prescription is to benefit the afflicted, and spread information which he considers to be invaluable, and he hopes every one who will try his remedy, as it will cost them nothing, and may prove a blessing. Parties wishing the prescription will please address REV. EDWARD A. WILSON, Williamsburgh, Kings County, New York.

AGENTS—NOTHING HAS EVER AP-PEARED in the popularity of RICKARD'S UNION PRIZE STATIONERY AND RECIPE PACK-AGE, and for success is so universal, that Agents are now making from $10 to $25 per day. Send for a Circular, mailed free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

AGENTS—You can make One Hundred and Fifty per cent. by selling RICKARD'S PRIZE STATIONERY PACKAGE. THE MULTOMICROCON. It takes the people by storm. Circular mailed free. S. C. RICKARDS & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

AGENTS—You can make $8 PER DAY by selling the DIME PANFRONTHOLUM. PRICE 10 CENTS. WE CAN NARRANTEE THE DIME. Contains Sixteen New and Original Articles with A GIFT OF JEWELRY. If you would make money, send for a Circular. W. H. CATELL & CO., 102 Nassau Street, N. Y.

To Officers of the Army.
A. P. LESURE & CO.,
Successors to WYMAN & CO., at the Old Stand, 520 Broadway, cor. Spring St., would inform their customers that they have on the manuscript guidance of the late firm, and solicit a continuance of their patronage. They will also take pleasure in giving up orders according to regulation. Cards containing full directions for measuring sent on application.
A. P. LESURE & CO.
New York, May 1st, 1862.

BALLOU'S
PATENTED
F. Y. S.
French Yoke SHIRTS.
WARRANTED TO FIT.
Send for a Circular.
BALLOU BROS.,
No. 409 Broadway,
New York.

F.Y.S.
For sale by all the principal Dealers through the UNITED STATES.

James Parrish,
Shirt Manufacturer,
323 Canal Street, near Broadway, New York.
SUPERIOR SHIRTS made to measure, $15, $13, and $10 per dozen.
☞ Family supply stores of Bosoms, Collars, and Wristbands for Shirt making, at reduced prices.

THE UNION SPY!
Southern Secrets Revealed! Every message are printed every week in
THE WIDE WORLD,
Published in Boston. Sold everywhere. 6 cents.

$150—NEW SEVEN OCTAVE PI-ANOS, $150, with iron frames and overstrung scale, with rosewood case, 7 oct. jointed desk, board, &c., $107, $175, $185, and $200; with rose keys, $210 and $225; 6 octaves, $140, with rosewood case, 7 octave round front Pianos at $225, $240, $275, and $300. Melodeons at $50, $60, $75, $90, and second hand Pianos and Melodeons, from $20 to $50 per month, and then allowed if purchased. Monthly payments received. HORACE WATERS, Agent, 481 Broadway.

Gauze Merino Under Wear.
For Ladies, Gentlemen, and Children.
A large variety, at popular prices.
UNION ADAMS,
No. 637 Broadway, New York.

AN ADVOCATE OF MORAL FORCE.

BRITISH LION (rubs) "This hain't the hattitude we used to take—hem! but 'Circumstances haltier Cases.' Those Hiron Vessels of the Yankees—hem!—yes! We must go the 'Peaceable Remonstrance' Dodge."

SENT BY EXPRESS
EVERY WHERE.
WARD'S
PERFECT FITTING
SHIRTS.
Retailed at Wholesale Prices
Made to Measure at $20 per do-
OR SIX TEN DOLLARS
MADE OF NEW YORK MILLS MUSLIN,
With Ear Linen Bosoms, and warranted to give
As sold in retail stores for $2 00 each.
ALSO, THE VERY BEST SHIRT COM
MADE, $30 PER DOZEN.
P. S.—Those who think Cash not make a good
$30 per dozen are mistaken. Here is the cost of mak
$30 per dozen:
Cutting and Making Muslin at 18 c. per y
10 yards of New York Mills at 16 c. per yard.
1 Yards of fine Linen, at 50c. per yard.
Making and cutting
Laundry, 24 c. buttons and notice, 75
Profit
Total
Self-Measurement for Shirt
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of and drawings of different styles of shirts and free everywhere. These rules are so easy to und that any one can take their own measure, and perfect fit.
The cash can be paid to the Express Company receipt of the goods.
The Express Company have orders to allow to examine the goods before paying for them.
are not as represented, you are at liberty to return
S. W. H. WARD, from Lond
387 Broadway, up stairs.
Between White and Walker Streets, NEW

AGENTS wanted in every State in the Un sell DOMESTIC SEWING MACHINE for $25. Ad
Lamps, entire only one cent per week, to those Lamps; every one guaranteed for four real years.
JOSEPH DIENER, No. 32 Dutch Street, New York.

CHEWERS AND SMOKERS WHO DESTROYING THEIR HEALTH AND
just the use of tobacco, send for Circular, containing a substitute and remedy. Address HALL & CO.,
Drawer No. 120, Syracuse, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:
THE SAGACITY OF ANIMALS. The Characteristic Traits of the Sagacity of Animals. With Original Engravings by HARRISON WEIR. Square 16mo, cloth, 75 cents.
☞ The Sagacity of Animals" forms the fifth Volume of the highly popular and beautiful series of CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOKS.
Square 4to, about 300 pages each, beautifully printed on tinted paper, embellished with many hundred Engravings, and containing a volume complete in most cases, for $1 25.
THE CHILDREN'S PICTURE-BOOK. With Six-hundred Engravings. Illustrated by W. Harvey. The Children's Picture-Book. Containing Stories and Pictures for Little Folks. Over-Pictures. Illustrated by W. Harvey. The Children's Picture-Book. Containing One Hundred and Sixty-Engravings. With many Illustrations by Harrison Weir. The Children's Picture-Book. Stories for Boys or Boys. Illustrated with Engravings.
☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. VI.—No. 284.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1862. [SINGLE COPIES SIX CENTS. $3 00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1862, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE SKIRMISH AT COLD HARBOR.

We publish on this page a view of the scene of the skirmish on Saturday last, near Cold Harbor, in General M'Clellan's words, the 6th Michigan about finished the Louisiana Tigers. The following account of the affair we take from the Herald:

Intelligence having reached headquarters that quite a force of the enemy was near New Bridge, the Fourth Michigan regiment, Colonel Woodbury, was sent to feel them, and if necessary, intercept their guns. The regiment left camp at 7 A.M., their Colonel at their head, and all in splendid spirits at the prospect of a encounter with the rebels. Lieutenant N. Bowen, of the Topographical Engineers, went with the expedition, as also a regiment of the finest regular cavalry, under command of Captain Gordon; a company of the Fifth cavalry, Lieutenant Custer; a company of the Eighteenth infantry, Captain Forsyth, and a company of the Second infantry, Captain M'Millan.

New Bridge is four miles from the camp. They went down the main road about two miles, to where it crosses Old Mill, and thence turned to the right through a piece of woods, saying it fell they came to an open field, commanding a view of the Chickahominy River.

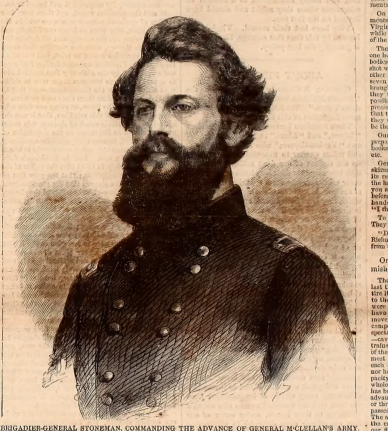
A portion of Company A, Fourth Michigan regiment, Captain Bass, was here sent forward as skirmishers, and the remainder of the company kept as reserves. The regiment filed out of the wood by fours, and formed in line of battle on the edge of the field, the right resting on the road over the main road. Here the rebels were seen lying behind a fence across the river. The right wing of Colonel Woodbury's regiment was ordered to cross the river, which at this point is about thirty feet wide. In the men plunged, all covered as they were, but forced to keep their muskets in condition to use. In some places the stream, which had been swollen by the rains during the night and morning, was so deep that the men were obliged to swim, and some got over without wading waist deep in water. But this was not the worst. The enemy, who had lain concealed behind a fence close to the opposite bank of the river, kept up an incessant fire upon them. Fortunately the enemy's shots passed harmlessly over their heads. Lieutenant Bowen attempted to cross the stream with his men, but when he was about one-third across he found he had waved a third of the way over. This presented a mark for the enemy, who commenced a fire upon the stream. All the companies had two passed the River. One of them remained behind to act as skirmishers in the wood on the right, and the other to keep an eye on the bridge and to the left beyond to prevent being flanked on either side by the enemy.

As soon as our men crossed the river the work of firing commenced. Captain Rice's company discharged the first volley on our side. All the remaining companies had their muskets to their shoulders in double-quick time. The firing was brisk and continuous on both sides. The rebels had two pieces of artillery from which they hurled shells but, like their volleys of musketry, they passed over the heads of our men. Their cannon were planted on a hill beyond, while the infantry still kept position behind the fence, which, in addition to having an embankment to the base, is the style of all Virginia fences, had a deep ard wide ditch in front. The shooting continued for several hours. Our men drove the rebels behind the fence and their encampment at the hill. They fled, leaving their dead and wounded behind them, taking refuge in encampments on the hill.

On our side the list does not exceed. They had four regiments engaged, Fourth and Fifth Louisiana regiments, a Virginia and an Alabama regiment, besides their artillery, while on our side there were actually only eight companies of the Fourth Michigan regiment who did the fighting.

The rebel loss is estimated as killed and wounded at about one hundred. In the ditch were found twenty-eight dead bodies. Among the killed were two lieutenants. One was shot with two balls through the head, and the body of the other was completely riddled with bullets. Of the thirty-seven prisoners we took fifteen were wounded. Our men brought them on their shoulders across the stream, whence they were taken to the Chickahominy, near Dr. ——, and every possible care given them by our surgeons. They all say they were forced into the fight by their officers, and that they had been told that Colonel Woodbury and his men were fiends who would be killed, and such fate they expected would be theirs.

Our men partook of the dinner the Louisiana Tigers had prepared for themselves. They enjoyed their delicious bodes, and brought away cakes, quakes, sweets, shakes, etc.



General M'Clellan, having received full reports of the skirmish, rode toward the river and met the regiment on its return. He greeted General Woodbury warmly by the hand and said, "General, I am happy in congratulate you again on your success. I have had occasion to do so before, and do so again with pleasure." He also shook hands with Captain Rice of the First Company, and said, "I thank you, Captain, your men have done well."

To some of the men he said, "How do you feel, boys?" They exclaimed, "Glorious, we feel fully!"

"Do you think any thing can stop you from going to Richmond?" he asked, and an enthusiastic "No!" rang from the whole line.

One secret of the success of our troops in skirmishes is thus given by a correspondent:

The movements of the Army of the Potomac during the last three days have resulted in the occupation of the entire line of the Chickahominy River, from New Bridge to the Long Bridge. Three divisions of the army which were to do the heavy work are on the front, while those that have been marching in the front in the general onward movement of which this divided in each have been encamped here, and have been for three days the magnificent spectacle of an unencumbered corps of troops, of all arms —cavalry, artillery, and infantry—with all their baggage and supplies left behind. The effect of this upon the rest of the entire army, from the day it left Yorktown, has been most admirable. The troops have made steady progress each day. They have not been hurried, nor overheated, nor harassed by marches of unnecessary length. The capacity of the roads not being great enough to permit the whole of the immense army to advance at once, the march line been so arranged that the corps thrown out to fix the advance one day halts and encamps the next, or for two or three days, as the case may be, till all the others have passed. Thus all the troops are kept fresh and vigorous. The army has, besides, always presented a strong front to the enemy, as numberless skirmishes have proved; and our flanks have been placed beyond all possibility of surprise.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL STONEMAN, COMMANDING THE ADVANCE OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S ARMY.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY ANTHONY.—[SEE PAGE 350.]

COLD HARBOR, NINE MILES FROM RICHMOND, VA., NEAR GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S HEAD-QUARTERS—SCENE OF A SKIRMISH ON MAY 24.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. E. WAUD.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1862.

THE RETREAT OF BANKS.

THERE is undoubtedly something humiliating in reading in the newspapers that in the month of May, 1862, thirteen months after the attack on Sumter, after the North has poured out men and money with unprecedented lavishness, it has again become necessary to call out the State militia to defend the capital. Nor is it agreeable to reflect that the rich valley of the Shenandoah, out of which General Banks had cleared the rebels by a series of brilliant manœuvres, and where we were slowly developing a healthy Union sentiment, has once more surrendered to the rebels, who will doubtless re-enact in that populous region all the atrocities of Jacksonville. These are unquestionably very painful reflections.

It must be said, however, in justification of the military policy which directed the transfer of three-fourths of Banks's army to M'Dowell, that the President, by whose orders the transfer was made, was far better able to judge of the necessity for the step than the public can be. If he had reason to believe that the rebel army in Virginia outnumbered an attacking force, M'Dowell, it would have been criminal negligence to have run the risk of a defeat at Falmouth, which would have left the road to Alexandria open and unmanned. Painful as it is to lose the Shenandoah Valley, it would have been far more painful, more humiliating, nay, almost fatal, to have the Johnston suddenly loom up with an army flushed with victory on the bank of the Potomac, opposite the White House.

The fears which are entertained by Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, and other persons for the safety of Washington, under the present circumstances, are wholly gratuitous. The rebels do not intend to invade Maryland. If any cross the Potomac they will do so with the intention of laying down their arms, for they know that they could never return except as released prisoners of war. That some of the leaders of the rebellion are ready for any thing desperate can readily be believed, but they are not quite insane enough to run their necks deliberately and hopelessly into a noose.

The object of the Government in calling out the militia is, doubtless, to liberate the regular troops now under Wadsworth at Washington, for the purpose of reinforcing Banks and Frémont. If the step shortens the conteet by a few days, it will pay.

REBEL COWARDICE.

The Legislature of Virginia have solemnly resolved to defend their capital. Governor Letcher and "President" Davis have echoed the resolve, and have called every able-bodied man into the field to carry it into practical effect. Yet we vrill take in predicting that by the time this paper reaches our readers Richmond will be in possession of General M'Clellan.

The one great quality which the rebels have developed in this war is cowardice. It has sometimes been moral, and sometimes been physical; it has been shown in both forms, and it has been seen on the battle-field; it has been noticed in the leaders and illustrated in the rank and file. Whenever else the rebels, and especially those in Virginia, may have been, they have undoubtedly been cowards.

Little more than a year ago the writer of these lines met, by appointment, at the room of Mr. Benjamin Brown a Member of the Legislature of Virginia, now an officer in the rebel army), at Washington, about a dozen members of the Virginia State Convention and one or two of the Virginia delegation in Congress. His object in seeking a meeting with these gentlemen was to ascertain the prospect of the secession of Virginia. Mr. (now Major-General) Banks had predicted in writing that Virginia would secede. The prophecy, coming from so high a source, was regarded with attention; and parties who had large interests in Virginia, who owned Virginia bonds and had large sums on deposit in the State, felt some anxiety on the point. The writer of these lines stated as much to the Virginians who had assembled in Mr. Brown's room. They one and all declared that there was no chance whatever of the secession of their State. They said that there were undoubtedly in Virginia, such as Ruffin and Pryor, but that the Union men were in a large majority in the Convention, and that they would defeat the ordinance. A cousin of Senator Mason, himself a member of the Convention, criticised severely the tendencies of his cousin, the Senator, and declared that the Old Dominion would be loyal in any event. Another leading member of the Convention remarked that "Virginia couldn't be dragged or kicked out of the Union."

Within a very few days after this interview Virginia seceded, by ordinance of the State Convention in which the Union men had so large a majority, and the seizure of Norfolk and Harper's Ferry followed at once.

The records prove that the gentlemen who vouched for the loyalty of Virginia in March, 1861, did not misrepresent the facts. There was a large Union majority in the State Convention, and the sentiment of the State was emphatically against secession. As a people, the Virginians were decidedly opposed to being dragged at the tail of South Carolina into a wild revolutionary enterprise.

The secret of the sudden somersault of the Convention, and the change in the acquiescence of the people in their decision was simply cowardice. It was the coercion of the Richmond mob, led on by crazy rebels like Pryor and his fellows, which caused the Convention to pass the Act of Secession. The Union men had not courage enough to stand by their principles. There was not nerve enough in Virginia to withstand the brawling and the threats of a few hundred desperadoes, and above all the love had deteriorated like the soil, whether the business of slave-breeding had corroded the manly instincts of the people, or whatever the cause was, the fact was palpable—the Virginian people, in April, 1861, had not courage enough to stand by their flag, and hence submitted to the dictation of miscreants whom they might and should have hanged on the first tree.

They have had their reward. Virginia has learned by this time that courage, like honesty, is generally the best policy.

ABOLITION FINISHED.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN telegraphs that the Fourth Michigan have abolished the New Louisiana Tigers." We fancy we shall have some more dispatches of this tenor.

These Southern heroes, who call themselves "Tigers," and "Lions," and "Grave-diggers," and "Yankee-slayers;" who carry black flags, and refuse quarter to unarmed men, who pick up the corpses of our dead soldiers, and send their bones home to their lady loves as trophies—these courtiers, who are the chief contrivers of the brutalizing effect of the institutions among which they have been reared, and whose savage instincts would appall the Dahomian princes of Dahomey or Patagonia—these fellows can never withstand the onset of a Christian soldiery. They are capable of assassination, of the murder of whipping a black woman to death; but when it comes to standing up in a fair fight against Northern men, in about equal force in numbers, they run like hares. Brutality and manhood can no more coexist in the same individual than oil and water can mingle.

We are not sorry to hear that the "Louisiana Tigers" are "about finished." It is about time that some effort of these Southern regiments, which have desolated the South and done their best to destroy the nation, were "about finished" also.

A gentleman from Mississippi, who was in a certain neighborhood the rebel soldiers have not only destroyed crops and fences, but have wantonly torn down houses, and have destroyed every thing that would burn, and so thoroughly obliterated every vestige of improvement from the land, that the wretched inhabitants on their returning to their homes, under cover of our flag, experience some difficulty in discovering whereabouts their houses once stood. These tell still more fearful stories of outrages—outrages nameless and horrible; of whole districts in which not a woman or a girl escaped the unbridled brutality of the Texans and Louisianians. It is about time, in the name of God and humanity, that the authors of these atrocities should be "finished."

THE LOUNGER.

THE PRESIDENT.

WHEN President Lincoln left his home in Ill., on his way to Washington, he said to his neighbors that he was about to enter upon a task for which any President had encountered since Washington. History will add that he disposed of it with a calmness and moderation unequalled since Washington.

Recent events have brought into strong relief one peculiar aspect of the difficulties of his position. Mr. Lincoln was elected, as all our Presidents are, as the representative of a party—and, namely, the constitutional Illinois party of statesmanship—upon the platform of a part of the dehated party, living in a certain section of the country, rose in arms and awaited the assistance of the whole party in other parts of the same country. But these friends were political allies under certain views only. Their political views overthrew the proper method of dealing with it, may have been changed by the revelations and suggestions of the rebellion, or may have been misunderstood. But as to the duty of maintaining the Government they were united, the record with the party that had elected the President.

Meanwhile the Abolitionists, a body who have conducted the anti-slavery movement upon moral grounds merely, and who had utterly repudiated political action of every kind, considered as aiding Union men, supporting the Government. Their position was, that slavery having provoked a war might justly be sapped by military force. This was stated to them as simple as could be, and they stated it with all their eloquence and fervor. Many, also, who were not in the technical and historic sense Abolitionists, thought at heart the same thing: "This is the time to hit slavery and make an end of it."

The duty of the President was perfectly plain. Clothed by the Constitution with the authority to invoke military power, and made by it Commander-in-Chief, he was to use that power and every thing which goes with it, to secure by success, and by every means by which he could weaken the enemy, cutting off their supplies and starving them into subjection. He was then to abandon their cause upon the existence of the Government and the peace and integrity of the nation. If it were necessary to that end that a city or ten cities should be bombarded and left in ashes, that the lives of thousands and thousands of rebel women should be taken by shot and shell as they were taking those of loyal men, that cultivation should be left to go fallow, that houses should be destroyed and fields wasted, that grain and animals should be burned, and slaves compelled to work and fight against the Government should be released from all obligation to their masters, then these things, the direct and manifest bring his virtues for the purity of his intentions and his strict obedience to law and constitutional power to save civil society from worse woes than these, the President was constitutionally empowered and bound to do.

If still the rebellion raged, and there were four million of enslaved persons who were within the military lines, who were at least our friends, and whom no crime but the most pitiful misfortune had thrown into slavery, after due warning that every enemy's farm would be laid waste, and his slaves remained, the President was constitutionally bound and empowered to declare that slavery was dead, and to appeal to war, to summon these men to strike with all the rest for the Government—and that he might do so, to arm them their own masters.

To every man who knew, as every one does who knows the history of this rebellion, that it was the logical and inevitable result of slavery, this measure was almost as important as the restoration of the Government. It was the means to compass and leave the cause untouched was merely to knock the blossoms off a tree. But the President's duty was to bear always in mind that the object of the war was not emancipation; that the very fact of this logical result of slavery had the constitutional majority of his fellow-citizens believed the slavery question could be settled otherwise than by arms. He was to bear in mind that all law, even civil and national, were wisely suspended by war only so far as was indispensable necessary; that there was a loyal sympathy for the slaves; that it was essential to maintain a resistance to secession in the Border States States which were the very pivot of our system was the harmony of state and national rights; that the legality of slavery was purely local, and that it could be reached by the military power only by the clear military necessity, while to strike it before the nation had that it was not necessary, and could imperil not only the Government and the emancipation of slaves, but the liberty of every man and the peace of civil society upon the continent.

He has not failed. He has never for a moment forgotten or mistaken the basis. Believing, as he doubtless does, that slavery began the war, and that the war will end slavery, he sees that in the conduct of the war itself the treatment of slavery is but an episode, like every other means of reducing the rebellion; and he writes it as such, and he because he is convinced, not that slavery can not be destroyed, but that the nation is persuaded that the war can not be ended without it.

And whether the war can be ended or not without ending slavery, the President undoubtedly knows, for he has access to more means of information that there will be no permanent peace in this country until slavery is at an end. Under circumstances If statesmanship be enlightened common sense applied to the management of public affairs, William H. Seward is not a greater statesman than Abraham Lincoln.

FOREIGN WAR.

THE Government is suppressing the armed effort of a faction to overthrow it. But there is no short of absolute surrender of the insurgents are therefore the victory of the rebellion. Foreign powers cannot enter the proposing of conditions, which is a proposition to the Government to acknowledge itself overthrown; a proposition forcible against those of the rebels, which is war and not intervention.

Consequently what foreign war is not whether any foreign power is likely to intervene in our difficulty, but what will any such power gain by making war upon us? The answer is necessarily a second-rate nation is less to be feared by a great state than an equal power, but if the equal power is distant and friendly, and the two are united by a mutually advantageous commerce, the attachment that a state of peril is not a sufficient preventative to the risks of war.

Or what commercial advantage is gained by a war? A very few will say that it is because what every man of sense say, that the rebellion would break England's cotton supply that incident to us for cotton now under the supply must be which depended upon forced labor. The London Times says on the 5th of April: "We do wish to liberate ourselves from dependence on a single slave-holding country for the single material of our manufactures." Now if England passes this year without her usual supply from this country she has passed the critical point. She will then be in a fair course to supplied this year by making war? We shall have in every other part abundant supplies. How soon in England likely to feed starving Lancashire if she makes war for cotton under those conditions?

If political jealousy and industrial necessity do not drive any foreign state to declare war against us, what inducement can the rebels offer to these states to run the risk? The great and only offer they can make is the military fact that the loss of the Slave States more valuable to either England or France than that of the free States? Mr. Yancey is said to have made this proposition of free trade to M. Thouvenel. "But we shall take no cotton," said the minister, "than you take silk; how shall we pay you?" "The laws of trade must have their course," replied the astute Yancey, "and you can send us the specie." "Pere," answered the minister, "that is not our way of doing business. Besides, I am told, Monsieur, that in the Southern States you do sometimes wear silk dress, and parasols, and bonnets; but I learn that the domestics of the South do not wear silk. Have you any other advantage to propose?"

So now here, a free trade. It is will interest certain classes in the South, and especially the zealots Yancey (who, Parson Brownlow told us, was another and happier days, pardoned out of the South Carolina penitentiary, where he was lying for murdering his uncle) returned to New Orleans and told his anxious fellow-conspirators and their dupes that cotton was not king, but they were sure that he has relinquished all hope of foreign war.

If any foreign state declares hostilities against the United States, it opens the tragedy of universal war, and the bond itself may be very true John Bull and Johnny Crapeau will back back very sharply at what they are likely to lose as well as to win in the event of a general shaking up of nations.

NEWS CENSORSHIP.

WHEN Mr. Stanton was called to the War Department his first official act, the issue of a congratulatory address to the army at Mill Spring, was characterized as like a victory. At last, cried all the papers, we have energy and intelligence in the War Office. With every order and proclamation the applause increased until the famous letter which attributed victory to the spirit of the Lord of Hosts was the well-nigh crowning act. But this was presently followed by the regulation requiring the censorship of telegrams. Those papers changed their tone, and the energy and intelligence of the Secretary of War are praised no longer.

Yet there can be no question of the wisdom of such an order. The present writer is a newspaper writer, and he may therefore say that, in the first place, the censorship seems like a violation of war as good fellows, but they are not such discreet gentlemen that they can be trusted. What they should say; and, in the second place, it is an immense relief to the country to know that the real truth is not known to the enemy. In the first place the fact is not inference, nor surmise, nor rumor, but satisfactory. And the order is fully justified by this certainty.

So with General Halleck's order excluding correspondents. That order is not to be criticised, but ought to be within his discretion. For it should be constantly considered that when we go to war we accept the conditions of war; and the endless free discussion and publication of every subject are incompatible with it. There is a kind of publication which has generally outgrown war; and when it is forced to recur to it, it is equally compelled to abridge those liberties.

Since the Government has taken the telegraph for war we have no more telegraphic papers, in the department at least, have become newspapers. In other departments we are still at the mercy of a class of correspondents who are there as correspondents; and every morning every question is telegraphed as settled or in the process of settling different ways. And no skillful reader of newspapers thinks of believing any thing he sees until there is some kind of official confirmation. Thus the Times, for instance, that the Times will always put the most reckless cheerful aspect upon every event or rumor; he knows that the Herald will always declare that "the radicals," meaning those who think that slavery is the root of existing perils or policy, are trying to aid Jeff Davis; and that the Tribune will always speak very coolly of General M'Clellan.

Yet we all know now, that when any of the papers announced from the war that the war it a fact. Nobody doubted that the Monitor had beaten back the Merrimac, or that Yorktown was evacuated, or that any specific and authorized news comes that Richmond has fallen, we shall no wonder if it is "all a hoax." Meanwhile the "rumor in town" that it has fallen is entirely unimportant.

And what harm has this supervision of military news done?

Correspondents are allowed to write what they please always except in the field, and even if the efforts to complain if they are not permitted to mention the number of troops, the artillery force, the route to be pursued, or the destination of the campaign? To say that the enemy knows all about it, whether we print it or not, is utter folly; for it begs the question. Do we know all about the rebel force and plan? Did we know exactly the destination and movements and arrangement of the Merrimac? Would A. Duvis not have been a greater fool than we believe him to be if he had not known that the Monitor lay Rip-Raps with all such details? Did he not, doubtlessly, and wisely, say, "If we can keep them out of my ears, I shall sleep well"?

If the Secretary of War shall have no more to trust him to be answerable for supervising the transmission of military news he will be a fortunate man.

HEROISM.

ONE of the bravest acts of the war was recently reported from Hilton Head. Eight contrabands brought out the rebel steamer Planter from Charleston harbor. Commander Parrott has the indifference to call the chattel who commanded her "a very intelligent contraband." The vessel had one 32-pounder and one 24-pound howitzer, and had on board four large guns which she was transporting to the rebel batteries, "says Commodore Du Pont in his report, "in the absence of the Captain who was on shore, and the officer next in the Government offices and head-quarters, with the Palmetto and Confederate flags flying, passed the successive forts, saluting as usual by blowing the steam-whistle. After getting beyond the range of the last gun she hauled down the rebel flag and hoisted a white one."

"Robert Small," continues Commodore Dupont, with an apparent extraordinary forgetfulness of the fact that he is speaking of a piece of property, "the intelligent slave and pilot of the boat, who performed this bold feat so skillfully, informed me of this fact (that one of the guns on board had belonged to Fort Sumter), presuming it would be a matter of interest to us to have possession of this gun. This man, Robert Small, is superior to any who have come into our lines, intelligent as many of them have been. His information has been most interesting, and portions of it of the utmost importance." He concludes by recommending to the Department the claims of "the man, Small, and his associates."

Now all this is not to be endured. As this war, according to the learned Phelps, of Missouri, is a "white man's war," he will strenuously object to availing ourselves of the assistance of black men, and he will, of course, insist that the Planter shall be returned, with compliments and regret for the inadvertence of her capture, to the excellent rebels at Charleston. While the patriotic Vallandigham, whose gentle soul sighs in concert with the amiable B. Wood's for peace, will find in this another occasion which "demands the reorganization of the Democratic Party," in order that these fugitives from a patriarchal and Christianizing system may be returned to it at once to complete the sanctification of their souls.

The patriotic Vallandigham probably remembers going to Charlestown, Virginia, in the autumn of 1859, with his friend, Mr. J. M. Mason, late of the Trent, now of Europe, to see one John Brown, and to try to extort from that old man something that might implicate Mr. Giddings or any member of the Republican Party in the trouble at Harper's Ferry, and that he did not succeed. He may further remember that upon his return to Ohio he is reported to have said of John Brown: "He is the farthest possible remove from the ordinary ruffian, fanatic, or madman." Does he also know what this man once said of black men?—"They behaved so much like folks he almost thought they were so."

Robert Small's conduct certainly favors that theory. What theory does the gentle Vallandigham's conduct in this war favor?

NOT THEY WHO CRY LORD! LORD!

It is an interesting fact in our political history that the men at the South who, two or three years ago, vociferated the most loudly that they had no platform but the Constitution and the Laws, immediately, upon the election of a President under the Constitution and according to Law, sheered straight into rebellion. The person named Henry, who during the canvass was hawked through the North as a Southern Union man of the purest kind, is a prominent member of the Rebel Congress. John Bell, the candidate for President upon the "Union, the Constitution, and the Laws" platform, is or was member of some Committee of Safety to secure the overthrow of the Government; and among many others, Kenneth Raynor, of North Carolina, now turns up with a proposition to make it penal for any citizen to show favor to the cause of his country.

How true it is, and how well to remember that those who cry most loudly "Lord! Lord!" are not necessarily the greatest saints.

JOHN LORENCE AND THE NEW JERSEY NINTH.

In the last Weekly the reader will have remarked a poem called "John Lorence," and reciting in honest rhyme the fate of a corporal of the New Jersey Ninth at the battle of Roanoke, who had both his legs shattered by a cannon-ball. Dr. Thompson, of Twenty-third Street, New York, writes that he was obliged to amputate both legs just below the knee, and that the stalwart soldier, as fine a man as he ever saw, is thus terribly crippled, and the future of his family imperiled. "But with all his sufferings, never once has a murmur escaped his lips, nor do I believe the thought entered his mind that he wished he had never gone to the war." When the news of the victory was brought to the hospital where he lay the morning after the battle, John Lorence raised himself upon his elbow and called for three cheers for the flag.

We are all debtors to John Lorence as we are to Worden. Dr. Thompson proposes to get him a pair of artificial legs, that he may follow his business of shoemaking. For this purpose about $200 are required, and a little more to give him a start. Let us help him, wisely says the Doctor, that he may help himself. Whoever will do so may send his contribution to J. B. Romar, Esq., Mayor of Jersey City.

"He longs to go, though on his stumps,
And serve his country more:
Brave Lorence! well your country knows
Your fighting days are o'er."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

The Babe Idea!—A lady and gentleman were looking down into the bear-pit at the Zoological Gardens, when the lady (Mrs. Jones, of Camden Town) exclaimed quite impulsively, "Oh! look at these dear little bears. Why, what a darling lot of 'em!" "Yes, my dear," answered the gentleman (Mr. Jones, of the same locality), "I declare it's quite an-ursa-ry—almost as full as our own!" The lady agreed with her husband, and even laughed, though it was morally impossible she could have understood the wretch's joke. We envy Mrs. Jones her ignorance.

Several of our dashing young men of fashion have, it is said, lately adopted the plan of having their clothes made without pockets; and, as their tailors allege, for the best possible reason.

Lost, a new silk umbrella, belonging to a gentleman with a curiously-carved ivory head!

Why when a chick emerges from the shell does it resemble a strike for freedom?—Because it throws off the yoke (yolk).

SPECULATIONS ABOUT MONEY, AND WITHOUT ANY MONEY

The only speculations we allow ourselves are mental ones, because they are perfectly safe, and can always be indulged in without the expenditure of a single penny. Besides, if they do occasionally turn out badly, you are not compelled to put down your horse, or to drink two glasses of wine per diem instead of three, or to exchange lump sugar for moist, in consequence of the result. Neither insanity nor suicide were ever known to grow out of a confirmed indulgence of the practice. Mental speculations may be called the art of speculating with profit and security without any money. Among other harmless things, we like to launch into the wildest speculations about money. It is a kind of consolation for not possessing any one's self. You feel all the richer at the moment, and are none the poorer when it is over. For instance, here are two little speculations in which we recently invested a very agreeable quarter of an hour while smoking a mild cigar:

First Speculation. What is a Circular Note? At first we thought it might be a milliner's note for a lady's crinoline; but we soon discarded that absurd idea, and, taking another puff at our Havana, came to the conclusion that a circular note must have been originally so framed for the purpose of holding a good round sum.

Second Speculation. What is a "Shin-Plaster?" We had often heard of shin-plasters, but never having seen one we could not very well make out what they were like. A fancy struck us that they might be plasters for the special relief of persons who had itching palms; but as the "shin" was plainly indicated, of course that notion instantly fell to the ground, as well as the succeeding one that they were probably intended to relieve persons who were laboring under a complaint of the chest. Puffing away again, we could only solve the difficulty by supposing that a shin-plaster was nothing better than a kind of poor man's substitute when he couldn't get the real "golden ointment," and was an ingenious specific invented in the first instance by a weak government that was on its last legs, and was obliged to resort to this quack remedy with the view of maintaining any thing like a footing in the money-market. The above speculation is, we confess, a most elaborate one, but the extreme ingenuity of it amused us, besides enabling us to finish in a most agreeable frame of mind our delicious cigar.

Such speculations are exceedingly harmless, and moreover they have this great merit, that they are never likely to be the ruin, much less the death, of any one. For instance, we ourselves, after the above profitable investment of a quarter of an hour, felt as happy and as contented as if we had just been making a handsome little coup of fifty thousand pounds on the Stock Exchange.

A woman lately made a pound of butter from the cream of a joke, and a cheese from the milk of human kindness.

Why are sheep the most dissipated, reckless, and unfortunate of creatures?—Because they gambol in youth, frequent the turf, think it no disgrace to be black-legs, and are often fleeced.

To discover the shortest distance between two places, jump into a cab and pay the driver in advance. To ascertain the greatest distance between two places, reverse matters, and pay him when you get there.

"Fare well," as the host said to his guest when dinner was served.

What bird tells of a tempestuous time at sea?—A nightin-gale.

Nature preaches cheerfulness in her saddest moods: she covers even forgotten graves with flowers.

Why is the labor of a mill-horse not so hard as it is represented to be?—Because it is done by turns.

An Exhausted Receiver.—A pawnbroker out of breath.

Many a person in a fine suit of clothes is but an ugly maggot in a good-looking nut-shell.

A Sign of Rain.—To see dry-goods' dealers festoon their door-posts with cheap umbrellas.

Why is a man in difficulties like an ostrich in wet weather?—Because he can't find the dust to cover his bill.

Mrs. Partington wants to know what sort of drums conun-drums are. She thinks some hard to beat.

A late traveler says it is so cold in the northern part of Greenland that it freezes the fire out.

Where is happiness always to be found?—In the dictionary.

Chaos.—A woman entering your room to put your papers "to rights."

They say that love is like the measles—all the worse when it comes late in life.

Cure for Dyspepsia.—Close all the outer doors of a four-story house, open the inner doors, then take a long switch and chase a cat up and down stairs till she sweats. These directions faithfully followed daily for three months have never failed to effect a cure.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

What is that which is a cat, is like a cat, and is yet not a cat?
A kitten.

Why are three couples going to be married like penny-trumpets?
Because they go to, to, to (two, two, two).

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Tuesday, May 20, in the Senate, Senator Sumner gave notice that he should call up the resolution for the expulsion of Senator Stark, of Oregon, who is charged with disloyalty. The Pacific Railroad bill was then taken up, but before the reading of it was concluded the morning hour expired, and the debate on the Confiscation bill was resumed, and Senator Davis, of Kentucky, made a long speech in opposition to it; but without concluding his remarks the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Senate bill declaring that negroes shall not be disqualified from carrying the mails was reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass; but without taking the question the House proceeded to the consideration of the Confiscation bill, and several speeches were delivered on the subject.

On Wednesday, May 21, in the Senate, the Census report was presented. A joint resolution giving the thanks of Congress to Flag-Officer Farragut and the officers and men under his command was adopted. The Military Committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting bounty lands to soldiers enlisted for three months and one year; also for pensions for the widows of soldiers who die in the service. The Tax bill was taken up, and several amendments proposed by the Finance Committee agreed to. The Senate held an executive session and then adjourned.——In the House, a bill providing for raising sunken vessels-of-war in Hampton Roads was referred. A resolution that Congress take a recess from Wednesday next to June 2 was laid on the table by a vote of 78 yeas to 46 nays. The Senate bill removing all disqualifications of color in carrying the mails was also laid on the table by a vote of 83 against 43. The House then resumed the consideration of the Confiscation bill, and the debate continued till the adjournment.

On Thursday, May 22, in the Senate, petitions from citizens of Maryland, asking for the better enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law in the District of Columbia, were presented and referred. Senator Sumner offered a resolution directing inquiry as to what legislation is necessary to protect negroes from unconditional seizure, or seizure by disloyal persons. At one o'clock the Senate was organized as a high court of impeachment for the trial of Judge Humphreys, of Tennessee. The Senators were duly qualified, and the managers of the trial on the part of the House read the articles of impeachment. The managers were then informed that the Senate would take proper order in the case, and that due notice would be given of the same, whereupon the court adjourned till the 9th of June. The Senate then proceeded to discuss the Tax bill, and several amendments were adopted. A resolution was adopted calling on the President for information relative to the condition of Mexico, and the alliance of European Powers as regards this country.——In the House, the bill to secure the speedy transmission of the mails, by requiring railroad companies to enter into contracts with the Post-Office Department—the rate of compensation, in case of disagreement, to be settled by the Court of Claims—was passed by four majority. The debate on the Confiscation bills was then resumed and continued till the adjournment.

On Friday, May 23, in the Senate, the resolution directing the Judiciary Committee to inquire as to what legislation is necessary to protect negroes from unconstitutional seizure was adopted. A bill providing that appointments on the army staffs shall be sent to the Senate for confirmation was passed. The Tax bill was then taken up, and on reading the seventy-fifth section the Senate adjourned.——The session of the House was devoted to debate on the Confiscation bills.

On Saturday, May 24, in the Senate, a bill was introduced to legalize and confirm the act of the President accepting volunteers under the act of the 22d of July, 1861, and to authorize the acceptance of two hundred thousand additional to those under that act. Referred. Senator Wilson introduced a bill to amend the Fugitive Slave act. The consideration of the Tax bill was then resumed, and having reached the one hundred and eighth section the Senate adjourned till Monday.——In the House, Mr. Wickliffe, of Kentucky, rose to what he considered a privileged question, and presented a preamble and resolution rehearsing the main facts respecting the recent collision of the civil and military authorities on the subject of the execution of the Fugitive Slave Law, and providing for the appointment of a select committee to investigate all the circumstances. The Speaker decided that the proposition was not a privileged question. The debate on the Confiscation bills was then resumed, and continued till the adjournment.

On Monday, May 26, in the Senate, Senator Sumner offered two resolutions in relation to slaves—one calling on the Secretary of War for information as to the execution by our Generals of the act of August, 1861, freeing slaves employed in any manner by the rebels to assist the rebellion; the other extending a general invitation to all persons, without distinction as to color, to come forward and aid the Government in putting down the rebellion. Senator Sumner also offered a bill to repeal the Fugitive Slave law and to prohibit slavery in the Territories, forts, arsenals, dock-yards, and all other places under the special jurisdiction of the National Government. Senator Howe introduced a bill, which was referred, providing for a more effective mode of procedure with obstinate rebels in places taken possession of by the Union armies. A discussion took place on the subject of the transfers of troops from some of the army corps to give strength to others, and especially with reference to the recent weakening of General Banks's army, thereby necessitating his retirement to the Potomac. The Tax bill was taken up, and several amendments were adopted. Pending the vote on an amendment to reduce the tax on tobacco from twenty to fifteen cents, the Senate adjourned.——In the House, the Confiscation bill was taken up, and some discussion ensued. The bill was somewhat amended, and finally passed, by eighty-two yeas to sixty-two nays. The bill to give freedom to slaves employed in the rebel service was next taken up, and a debate on it took place. Various amendments were offered and rejected, and finally a vote was taken on the passage of the bill, and it was defeated, by seventy-eight nays to seventy-four yeas. The Senate bill for the relief of the colored seamen who recently ran the rebel steamer Planter out of Charleston harbor, and delivered her to our blockading fleet, was then passed, when the House adjourned.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

General M'Clellan's army has crossed the Chickahominy, and is within five miles of Richmond. Skirmishes are occurring hourly. Our advance is at Mechanicsburg. The railroad bridge to Fredericksburg has been destroyed by our troops.

ADVANCE OF GENERAL M'DOWELL.

General M'Dowell on 26th advanced six miles beyond Fredericksburg. The rebels evacuated their camp on 24th, and withdrew their pickets on the morning of 25th. The Harris Light Cavalry scoured the country on that day, for fifteen miles from the Rappahannock, and found none of the enemy.

THE REPULSE OF BANKS.

General Banks has retreated back into Maryland. He had got as far as Harrisonburg, 20 miles from Staunton and the railway, when he received an order from the War Department directing him to send 15,000 of his troops, under General Shields, to reinforce General M'Dowell at Fredericksburg, and to fall back upon Strasburg, some fifty miles in his rear. The moment he began to retreat in obedience to this order Jackson followed in pursuit. General Shields passed through Manassas Gap safely and joined M'Dowell. Colonel Kenly, who commands a Maryland regiment, was started over the same route and had reached Front Royal, which lies about ten miles east of Strasburg, on the road to Manassas Gap, when he was intercepted by the rebels, and, as General Banks states in his brief dispatch, "repulsed with considerable loss," the rebels occupying Front Royal, and thus breaking his communication over the railroad with Eastern Virginia, and compelling him to fall still further back with the remnant of his force.

Our latest intelligence from him is contained in the following dispatch:

Williamsport, May 26—4 p.m.

To the President:

I have the honor to report the safe arrival of my command at this place last evening at ten o'clock, and the passage of the Fifth corps across the river to-day, with comparatively little loss. The loss of men in killed, wounded, and missing in the different combats in which my command has participated since the march from Strasburg, on the morning of the 24th inst., I am unable now to report; but I have great satisfaction in being able to represent that, although serious, it is much less than might have been anticipated, considering the very great disparity of forces engaged, and the long-matured plans of the enemy, which aimed at nothing less than the entire capture of our force. A detailed statement will be forwarded as soon as possible.

My command encountered the enemy in a constant succession of attacks and in well-contested engagements at Strasburg, Middletown, Newton; at a point also between these places, and at Winchester. The force of the enemy was estimated at from 15,000 to 20,000 men, with very strong artillery and cavalry supports. My own force consisted of two brigades—less than 4000 strong, all told—1500 cavalry, ten Parrott guns and six smooth bores. The substantial preservation of the entire supply is a source of gratification. It numbered about five hundred wagons on a forced march of fifty-three miles, thirty-five of which were performed in one day, subject to constant attack in front, rear, and flank, according to its position, by the enemy in full force. The panics of teamsters, and the mischances of river passage of more than 300 yards, with slender preparations for ford and ferry, I lost not many more than fifty wagons. A full statement of this loss will be forwarded forthwith. Very great commendation is due to Captain J. B. Holabird, A. Q. M., and Captain E. G. Breckwith, for the safety of the train.

Our troops are in good spirits, and occupy both sides of the river.

N. P. Banks,
Major-General Commanding.

HALF A MILLION MORE MEN READY TO MARCH.

The call of the President for additional troops from the Governors of the different States was responded to by nearly half a million of men, who offered their services within twenty-four hours after the proclamations were issued. Colonel Lefferts, of the 7th New York State Militia, only received the order of the Governor at eleven o'clock on Sunday night to march next day, and at nine o'clock on Monday night he started for Washington with a full regiment, thoroughly equipped, amidst the enthusiasm and plaudits of a vast multitude. Several other regiments of the militia will follow them with equal promptitude.

THREATENED RIOT IN BALTIMORE.

The report of the reverse to Colonel Kenly's command, which was principally recruited in Baltimore, created a great excitement in Baltimore, and the rebel sympathizers there were so impudent as to show their satisfaction at the reverse. The consequence was great indignation against them on the part of the Union men, who are now much in the ascendant there. An excited crowd collected in the streets, and many known secessionists were very roughly handled, one of them barely escaping hanging. At last accounts, however, the crowd had thinned down, and matters were assuming their wonted quiet.

MORE NEW YORK MILITIA TO TAKE THE FIELD.

Albany, May 25, 1862.

The Governor has ordered the Fifth New York Volunteer Artillery, Colonel Graham, and the Seventh Regiment New York State Militia, Colonel Lefferts, to leave for Washington to-morrow.

The Eighth, Eleventh, Thirty-seventh, and Seventy-first regiments of militia, of the city of New York, and the Twenty-fifth militia regiment of Albany, and others, will follow without delay.

RUMORED CAPTURE OF RALEIGH.

Rumors reached Fortress Monroe from Newbern on Saturday that Raleigh, the capital of North Carolina, had been captured a few days previous, and that the United States flag was then floating over the city. No particulars, however, had been received.

JEFF WILL NOT GIVE UP VIRGINIA.

The Richmond papers contain a highly interesting correspondence between Jeff Davis and the Virginia Legislature in reference to the last backward movements of the rebel army, in which Jeff Davis says that he had never entertained the thought of withdrawing the army from Virginia and abandoning the State; that if, in the course of events, the capital should fall, the necessity of which he did not see or anticipate, that would be no reason for withdrawing the army from Virginia. The war could still be successfully carried on and maintained on Virginia soil for twenty years.

SUFFERINGS OF THE PEOPLE OF VIRGINIA.

Some gentlemen who fled from Petersburg describe the condition of things there as fearful. They state that the sufferings of the people are almost beyond endurance. The scarcity of provisions was so great that every thing was seized for the army, and even the soldiers have been on half rations for a week past, with no prospect of even this supply continuing for any great length of time. The work of conscription was progressing, and the roads to Richmond were thronged with unarmed men, old and young, being driven along under strongly armed guards. These gentlemen represent that no people in modern times have suffered more than the people of Virginia are now suffering, every household being in fear of an approaching famine.

NORFOLK STILL SULKY.

The Mayor and City Councils of Norfolk, it appears, are still indisposed to take the oath of allegiance, in consequence of which General Wool has ordered the stoppage of what little trade they have heretofore enjoyed with the outside world. He has issued another proclamation, notifying the people that the matter is entirely in their own hands; that by acknowledging the supremacy of the Government they can enjoy its fostering care, and the advantages of trade and commerce, and assuring them that no contingency is possible whereby Norfolk will again be given up to the control of the rebel Government. Those who entertain Union sentiments, he says, can give expression to them with ample assurance of protection. A Union meeting was held in Portsmouth on 22d, at which not less than eight hundred persons were present, including many from Norfolk.

A VICTORY IN WESTERN VIRGINIA.

A National force of 1800 men, under Colonel Crook, stationed at Lewisburgh, in Greenbrier County, on the Greenbier River, was attacked on 23d by a rebel force of 3000, under Colonel Heath, and after a severe fight the rebels were defeated, and completely routed. Our loss is ten killed, forty wounded, and eight missing; that of the enemy is much greater. We captured four cannon, two of them rifled; two hundred stand of arms, and one hundred prisoners, including several officers.

COMMODORE FARRAGUT AT VICKSBURG.

A dispatch dated Vicksburg, Mississippi, May 21, states that the commander of our flotilla from below had ordered the removal of the women and children from the city within twenty-four hours, and that the Mayor had asked until Friday, the 23d. There were then reported to be ten of our boats below the city.

IMPORTANT ORDER.

Washington, May 25, 1862.

Ordered—By virtue of the authority vested by an act of Congress, the President takes military possession of all the railroads in the United States, from and after this date, until further orders, and directs that the respective railroad companies, their officers and servants, shall hold themselves in readiness for the transportation of troops and munitions of war as may be ordered by the military authorities, to the exclusion of all other business.

By order of the Secretary of War.

M. C. Meigs, Quarter-master-General.

CAPTURE OF A REBEL TRANSPORT.

Dispatches from Cape Girardeau, Missouri, inform us of the capture of a rebel steamer named the E. D. Miller, bound down the St. Francis River, laden with stores for Memphis, and carrying a company of rebel troops. Her passage was arrested by Colonel Daniels, at Camp Lagrange, who riddled her with a six-pounder gun, killing Lieutenant-Colonel Lewis and wounding several others. The soldiers, numbering sixty, were taken prisoners.

CAPTURE OF BRITISH STEAMERS.

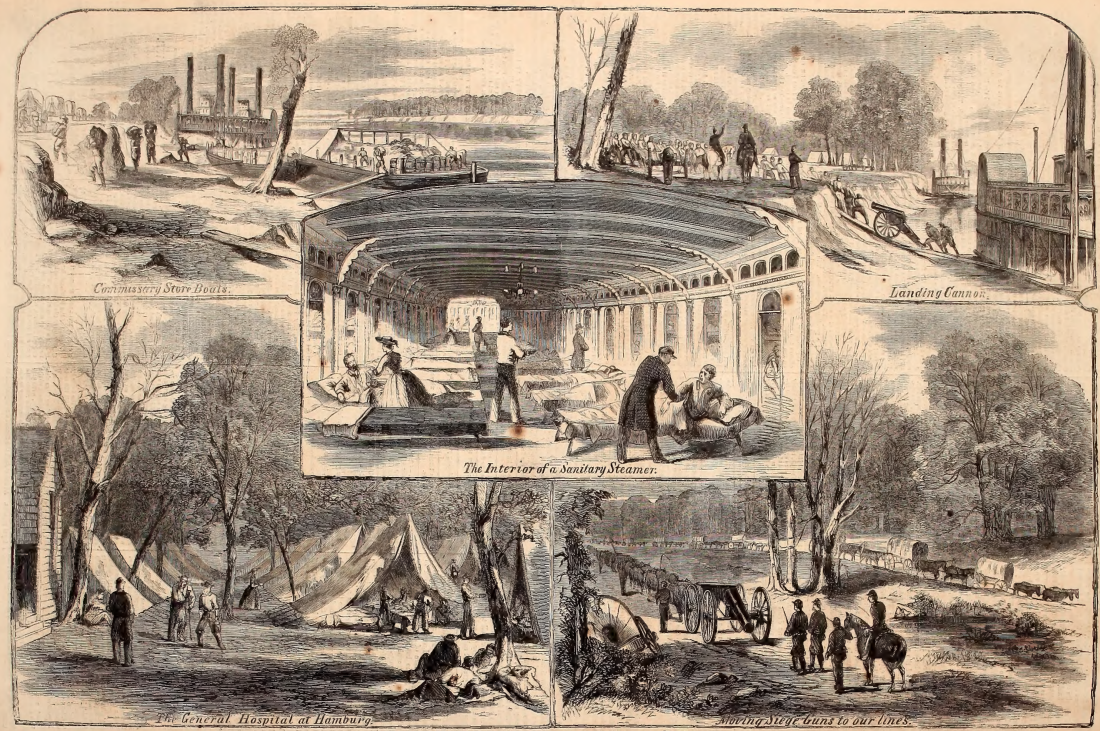
The gun-boats Mercedita and Somerset have brought into Key West two British steamers—the Bermuda and Circassian—laden with arms and munitions to the value of a million and a half of dollars, intended to be run into some Southern port for the services of the rebellion. The Bermuda had a full cargo of arms and munitions of war. Her manifest occupied some four pages of foolscap paper, and the quantity on board a vessel of her tonnage is surprising. Besides pistols and cutlasses in any quantity, there was a number of six and a half and seven and a half inch rifled guns, together with several complete field-batteries, nearly fifty thousands pounds of powder in barrels, besides cases of cartridges, fixed ammunition, and shells. The steamer Circassian was captured by the gun-boat Somerset, Captain English, on the 4th inst., twenty miles east of Havana, and was nominally coming from that port via St. Thomas. She was heavily laden, and although the exact contents of her cargo has not been ascertained, there is little doubt that she carries arms and provisions for the rebels.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

DEFEAT OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Lord Palmerston's Government has been defeated in the House of Commons by a majority of one recorded against ministers on the second reading of a bill for the abolition of church rates.



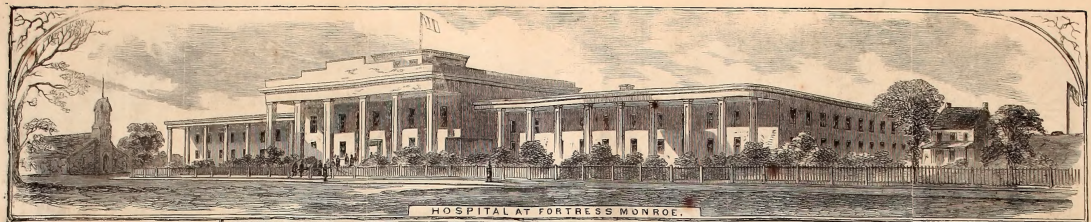
DISTRESS AMONG THE WORKMEN.

The subject of the distress of the artisans and workmen of Lancashire has been brought before the British House of Lords, without any reference to the American question.

FRANCE.

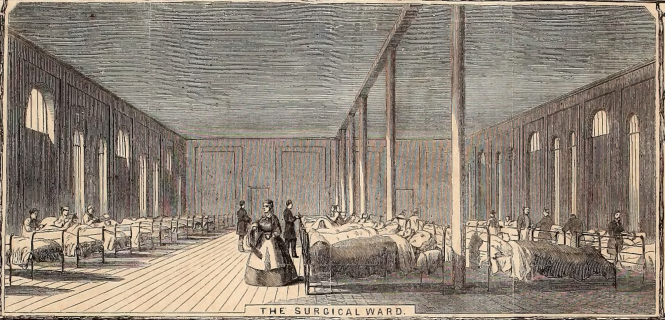
M. MERCIER'S VISIT TO RICHMOND.

The Opinion Nationale of Paris—Prince Napoleon's organ—says that M. Mercier's visit to Richmond had reference merely to a French tobacco stock. The affair was still, however, the cause of much political speculation in Paris.



OUR ARMY IN THE SOUTHWEST.—SKETCHED BY MR. A. SIMPLOT.—[SEE PAGE 356.]

CORDUROYING ROADS TO CORINTH.—SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.—[SEE PAGE 359.]



GENERAL BUELL'S ARMY CROSSING LICK CREEK ON THE WAY TO CORINTH.—SKETCHED BY MR. H. MOSLER.—[SEE PAGE 359.]

HOSPITAL AT FORTRESS MONROE.

DR. BONTECOU.

THE SURGICAL WARD.

DR. CUYLER.

GETTING WELL.

ARRIVAL OF WOUNDED MEN FROM YORKTOWN.

THE SOLDIER'S GRAVE.

THE GENERAL HOSPITAL AT FORTRESS MONROE.—[See next Page.]

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—OUR OUTLYING PICKET IN THE WOODS.—SKETCHED BY MR. W. HOMER.

THE GENERAL HOSPITAL AT FORTRESS MONROE.

Our special artist at Fortress Monroe sends us a page of sketches of the GENERAL HOSPITAL at that place. The upper sketch gives an extensive view of the building, which is the Hygeia Hotel, so celebrated and frequented only a short time ago. Mr. C. C. Willard, the proprietor, has given up the whole building excepting a very few rooms at one end for the purposes of the Hospital. The middle sketch is the immense dining-room of the hotel, now used as the surgical ward. Dr. John M. Cuyler, medical director of the Department of Virginia, is represented on the right, and Dr. R. B. Boulzeau, who is in charge of this hospital, on the left of the picture. In the lower corners are shown the pleasant front portion of the building, a favorite lounging place for the convalescent, and to the left a soldier's grave. We have also a scene on the dock at the time of the arrival of a large number of wounded men from Ship Point.

GENERAL HALLECK'S ARMY.

We publish on pages 356 and 357 several pictures which illustrate the state of affairs in the Army of the Southwest, under General Halleck. They are from sketches by our artists, Messrs. Mosler and Simplot. The following bits from the World correspondence may serve to shed some light on the subjects of the pictures:

THE COUNTRY ROUND CORINTH.

The country around Corinth is of a rolling timbered land, emerging in successive ridges and flat boggy hollows for miles in every direction. These latter seem to make it out of difficulty to approach the place with artillery. The wood has been cut down in many of the ridges over which they are encamped. The length of these works is estimated at nine miles, and their appearance is that of natural heavy slopes interspersed with the usual points. There is first a line of rifle-pits, and then a little further on, which, while it will present an obstacle to the passage of our lines, will present an admirable cover for our sharp-shooters. Beyond the timber is a cleared belt, a few hundred yards distance from the guns. Behind this breast-work it is thought the enemy's forces will be drawn after the place is invested. The inner line is a series of ridges and hummocks running from hill-top to hilltop, so very gun being placed to command every approach.

PREPARED FOR DISASTER.

That we may be prepared for any untoward occurrence, such as a stampede, a retreat, or an attempt on the part of the rebels to pierce our line, our men have been employed daily, yesterday and to-day in erecting a strong line of breast-works formed of timber and branches covered with dirt, which are again masked so as to conceal them from the view of the rebels. Other strong commanding positions have been seized, the first line abandoned, miles from Corinth. With a cheered spirit in front and eyes placed in commanding positions the enemy can not approach our line without being subjected to a murderous fire.

THE ROADS—MUD AND DUST.

But a few days since the mud was the great impediment to our progress. We are now at the other extreme. So far from being troubled with too much moisture, we have not enough to drink, much less for other purposes. Our men are digging for water, and the result is, a thick, whitish mixture of nauseous taste in all that can be had potable. Horses are ridden a mile to a muddy, stagnant pool, and not unfrequently the rebels are relieved of the same extremity. Lemons and liquors are in great demand to render the water palatable.

HOSPITALS.

The hospital arrangements are proceeding on the scale commensurate with the expectations of a great battle. A large general hospital has been established at Monterey, in charge of the accomplished brigade surgeon, R. C. Mcrrills, of the Seventh Illinois, who is busy making ample arrangements for the reception of a great number of sufferers. Seven hundred tents, litters, stretchers, ambulances, medicines, and sanitary stores, are being collected in quantities, with a large medical staff. A competent force of the older surgeons, who have been under fire, will accompany the forces to the field, and there, doubtless, save many lives which might be lost by an hour's neglect. The most ample arrangements have been made for obtaining the names of the sufferers in the anticipated battle, and if the friends of such are disappointed, they must attribute the cause not to any want of attention on the part of journalists, but to the confusion which will be rife around the battle-field, within the volume of every regulation, to be the most inconvenient of an anxious public.

MOVING FORWARD.

TUESDAY, May 13.

The cry is still we come, O Corinth! We went back, picked up leg and luggage, swept off leftward, and now occupy a superb spot for camping four miles in direct line from Corinth. The swamp in front is an immense one; they can not cross it, or we, with artillery, except by the great ordinary highway that we have built—a thundering piece of architecture. Could hardly believe my eyes yesterday when I saw the road we had made. Trees cut down, ledges picked out beyond all the efforts and cares a new mile span!

Dolores Bonet's batteries have seen probably not serve than any others, but they contain some very superior guns: among them we saw the long Rodman guns, calculated to throw shells at least three miles. Besides these, the five heavy siege guns, which were of so much use in staying the advance of the rebels at Pittsburg, commanded by Captain Madison, have been moved forward by a team composed of six yoke of oxen attached to each.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We reproduce, on pages 353, 360, and 361, several sketches by our artist, Mr. A. R. WAUD, illustrating the fortunes of the Army of the Potomac. One of them shows us THE UNION TROOPS GOING DOWN INTO THE TRENCHES WITH THEIR ARTILLERY TO CONSTRUCT PARALLELS BEFORE YORKTOWN. McClellan, as General Scott has told us, is at home in the work of "trenching." He did so well at it that in one month he had pushed his parallels against Yorktown as far forward as the Allies pushed theirs before Sebastopol after eleven months labor. When the rebels "skedaddled" the last parallel was almost completed, and the assault was at hand.

Another picture shows us the famous BATTERY NO. 1, composed of one and two hundred pound Parrott guns, the effect of whose practice scared the rebels thoroughly on the morning of 24 May this battery opened on a rebel battery situated on the heights of Yorktown, and very quickly silenced it. The rebels had never seen any thing like the 200-pounder projectiles from the Parrott gun, and asked their officers indignantly "if they were expected to stand such shots as that?"

A third picture shows us the ENCAMPMENT OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC at Cumberland, on the Pamunky River. It is a beautiful scene. A correspondent thus describes the agreeable surprise of our wearied troops as they approached it on their march from Williamsburg:

Just as I was preparing to give up the ghost from sheer exhaustion, and the troops were trudging along under their packs of baggage, beneath a scorching sun and amidst clouds of dust, which at times threatened to put an end to the march by destroying our powers of respiration, we reached the crest of a hill, and below us, upon a plain upon the banks of the river, lay spread before us a sight as beautiful as it was warlike. Two brigades lay in the field upon their arms, and long trains of wagons were finding their way along the serpentine road to the camp ground, and a perfect fleet of shipping lay moored in the stream, where twenty-four hours since floated the "rag of Secesia." The gun-boats had opened the way, and thus enabled our grand army to receive supplies which would have taken weeks to transport by land.

Another correspondent says:

The scenery all along the Pamunky, from its junction with the York River to the point to which the gun-boats ascended, is magnificent. Indeed I have seldom, if ever, seen any thing to equal it. The banks are exceedingly high. In some places, quite frequently, too, these banks form bluffs from fifty to one hundred feet high. In others they slope gradually down to the water's edge. The river is comparatively narrow, yet wide enough and deep enough for the passage of any of our vessels. Its banks are beautified with handsome cottages and buildings of more ambitious pretensions, each one surrounded by lawns and grounds beautifully laid out, and each one, doubtless, inhabited by people of comparative refinement, who must have some enough to deplore the infatuation which has brought the scourge of war to their doors.

All along the banks of the river were seen herds of cattle and sheep, which had been collected by the rebels and driven that far in their retreat from Yorktown.

The results of reconnoissances show that the road and water approaches to Richmond are open to within twenty or fifteen miles of that city, and that the enemy is in force beyond those points. The state of the roads is such that it will require some days to get the army up to those points. Ever since last Monday, now a week ago, the army has been moving from the neighborhood of West Point to this place, a distance of only about twenty miles. Yet steady progress has been made on each day. The nature of the soil is such that it is found necessary to construct "military roads nearly the entire distance in order to transport the artillery and baggage-wagons. This work has been admirably performed by the engineer corps of General Daniel P. Woodbury, whose labors have been incessant. There are some spots in the road, very swampy and narrow, where a mile a day is considered good progress. But those who feel impatient at our slow progress toward Richmond remember this and be content.

On page 365 we give a full-nimile of the CONSCRIPT LETTER of a private of the Massachusetts First indented by a Minié ball at the battle of Williamsburg. The ball penetrated the plate, but did not go through it, fortunately for the soldier.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL GEORGE STONEMAN, whose portrait we publish on page 353, was born in this State in the year 1825. He graduated at West Point in July, 1846, and entered the First Dragoons as Second Lieutenant. He rose steadily in his profession, and when the war broke out was Captain. The resignation of Southern traitors facilitated his advancement, and in May, 1861, he became Major of the Fourth Cavalry. General McClellan realized his merit, and in September, 1861, he was appointed Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and given the command of all the cavalry of the Army of the Potomac. In the advance upon Richmond from Yorktown he has commanded the vanguard of the army, and conducted his column with judgment and vigor.

General Stoneman married last year a Baltimore belle.

On this page we reproduce a sketch by our artist, Mr. Homer, showing one of our OUTLYING PICKETS ON A DARK NIGHT; and on page 364 we publish a vivid picture from a sketch by Mr. Meyer, showing THE MARCH OF OUR ARMY THROUGH MUD AND THICKET FROM WILLIAMSBURG TOWARD CUMBERLAND. Both these pictures explain themselves.

LOVE VERSUS BEAUTY.

VERDICT FOR THE PLAINTIFF.

Love, perched one day
On an orange-tree,
Saw Beauty wishing
She time were;
In a bower of his own red roses,
"Ah!" she sighed to him,
"Here's work for me!"
As he flies where the maid reposes.

"How dare you stare,"
Quoth the lady fair,
"Strutting, and bridling,
And ogling there?
None of your prawns on me!
I'm up to your tricks and your plots, Sir, now!
And I trust I believe your strongest vow,
So let by-gones bygones be."

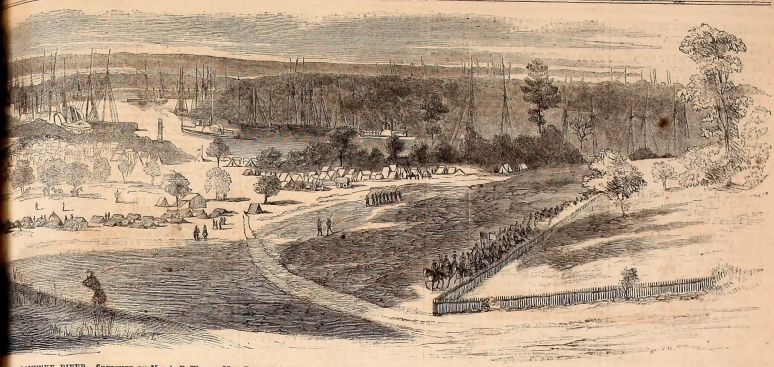
"Oh!" whimpered he,
"Did you used to be
To my sacred rites
Such a devotee,
To all my laws a friend,"
"Well, well," said she;
"Yes, that may be,
But it's never too late to mend!"



Then aloft he flew,
And his bright bow drew,
And the silver arrow
Went whistling true
To the rapid maiden's breast;
While she, blushing, laughed, with a well-feigned sigh,
"Come, we no use fighting with Destiny,
And 'second thoughts are best!'"

GENERAL McCLELLAN'S CAMP AT CUMBERLAND, VIRGINIA, WITH A VI

BATTERY NO. 1, OF ONE HUNDRED AND TWO HUNDRED POUNDER PARROTT GU

HE PAMUNKY RIVER.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 359.]

OSITE YORKTOWN AND GLOUCESTER.—Sketched by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 359.]

FLIRTING ON THE BEACH.

I STAND again upon the beach
Where first I saw you.
I thought you were beyond my reach,
Yet did adore you.

I thought that ev'ry girl I'd seen
Was far below you;
I looked upon you as my queen,
And longed to know you.

Day after day passed by—the same
The introduction:
And then began your little game—
Right rare destruction!

I see you now—your eyes—your curls:
You were crafty;
So different from other girls.
The more the pity.

That evening when you wept, because
You said "I'd grieved you,
I did not know what pain it was!"
And I believed you!

Ah, well! I'm older now. You know
"Experience teaches;"
And flirting now is all the go
On sea-side beaches.

I can but smile as now I think
On my past folly;
My madness then stood on the brink
Of melancholy.

I shall not quite forget you—nay,
Shall think, sometimes,
But, once forever, bear me say,
Can do without you.

WRECKED ON ISLAND NUMBER TEN.

"I CAN'T stand this any longer, Ned; I shall turn out and go on deck. This stifling heat is bad enough to bear without the stings of the confounded mosquitoes. I could as soon sleep in a kiln with a blister all over me."

I scrambled out of my berth and huddled on my clothes as well as the dim light would allow. The sun had not appeared at the little cabin, or four old friend and kinsman Ned Grunger, merely yawned and stretched himself. Petty annoyances did not trouble him. He had been sleeping as comfortably as if the villainous little den of a cabin close to the engine, which we had been told was the coolest on board the Two Sisters, were a cool and airy bedchamber. We had both been contented by the steamboat clerk with "first class" cabins, "we had assured us on his honor that the only disposable cabin left on board the Mississippi packet was a snug and pleasant one, free from bugs and cockroaches, and not in the least hot. And now I was stewed and steamed to the verge of fever, while Ned, whom nothing seemed to hurt, turned over on his pillow with a little sigh, murmuring, "Take it coolly, old boy, don't forget the Fahrenheit!" and the gnats when we got to Cairo and have our breakfast ashore. That is coolly."

I replied rather testily that I wished I could, but that, not being a salamander, I couldn't. And with this withering retort I left him to coolness and stumbled on deck. The hurricane-deck of a Mississippi steamer was a gay scene to one who had had a melancholy and lonely look at I saw it in the feeble moonlight, bare and deserted. The glint in his lofty wheelhouse, intent upon the helm and the bearings, and a solitary deck-hand who filled the office of look-out, appeared to be the only human beings awake save myself. To be sure, from the hatchway of the engine-room there gushed at times a tremendous glare of dull crimson fire-light, and a pitch-black figure crossed the gleam, while a sound as of the dull panting of a great wild beast, told that the furnaces had been supplied with fresh wood. It was very hot and sultry even in the air; but the atmosphere was enlivened when compared with the oven-like oppression of the boat below. The mosquitoes were still pertinacious, but I felt that I could bear their stings better than when I lay in the close cabin.

I leaned over the side rail and gazed upon the yellow river, whose tumid waters stretched for an immense distance on either hand. The moon was now and pale, but I could make out the wide mass of the Tennessee shore, though the low-lying forest of the Missouri bank was hid in dark shadow.

"Tis lonesome here, mister, ain't it?" drawled a tall, gaunt voice at my elbow. I could not help starting.

"I didn't mean to skear you, Mr. Barham;" apologized the voice, which I now recognized as that of a passenger, General Jeremiah Flint, who had taken a fancy to Ned Grunger and myself, and with whom we had struck up a friendly acquaintanceship. General Flint was a thorough-bred Yankee, one of those keen, hawk-eyed shrewd gentlemen who are found in active employment all over the Union. His complete history, of which he now and then favored us with piquant snatches, would have been very amusing even in print, and partook a good deal of the adventurous and shadowy in the career of Haji Baba. Just now the General was at rather a low pitch of the social ton-saw, being on board the boat in no more exalted capacity than that of traveling salesman to a "jobber" of dry goods and clothing.

"It's kinder dull up here, but I couldn't sleep," said the new-comer; "I've got it happened home upon my mind to-night that mischief's on the brew."

"On the what?" said I, laughing.

"On the brew, Sir," answered the General very solemnly. "Young men like you, Mr. Barham, air too apt to ridicule the presentiments of their elders, but Jeremy Flint's no green-horn, and he don't relish the feel of matters."

I had observed before that the General was a little oracular, and, what may seem odder in a Yankee, slightly superstitious; but I knew he was a keen practical person who had seen ten times as much of the world as I, at four-and-twenty, could possibly have done. Therefore, to my queer acquaintance seemed ill at ease, I strongly suspected that his prognostications of coming evil were based on other grounds than those of sentiment.

"I'll let you know, mister, the long and short of it," said he, dropping his voice, "this Two Sisters we're afloat in is an old craft, old and leaky, and clean worse out from her keelson to her billet, that's just truth. The owners had a talk about giving her up, they did, a month ago, but old Barnabas Bell, the senior partner, he's a queer, she's good for a voyage or two, and if she breaks up, the fixings are no loss—let her rip!"

"Do you mean to say that the steamer has been permitted this boat to sail, knowing she was unsafe?" I said, turning hastily, it is needless to say.

The General nodded. "This child wishes he were in his boots, and his boots ashore, do dose."

And he drummed the devil's tattoo on the rail with his long bony fingers.

I asked what grounds we were. I knew that Flint was familiar with every bend of the river.

"We're past New Madrid," he answered, scanning the blue line ahead; "we're a hundred mile near slow for all our pulling and straining. Let me see—that's Red Bluff on the Tennessee shore. I'm glad to see you now. Get hold of the beam and scramble up where I am."

General Flint was about to crawl to the top of the floating timber, where he sat at ease, with his feet dangling in the water.

"Take first time this child has seen a tiller boat. Apple quillings, I thought it would be a mad consult! I was born in the State of Maine, and Philadelphia were all well insured, that's one comfort, and my notes are in my waistband."

"Raise away, Sir. Then the boat's afloat and, we are alone! The rest of us? Ned Granger?"

"There's no danger there. He's fast asleep, and cut the bull of the steamer afloat yet," said the Yankee. "What's left of her, shrinking like a theatre coffin. If there's a diving Dutchman below aboard her, drowning will be welcome, after the misery they've had, I guess. The water and steam did scald, I reckon?"

A dull pain in my hands attracted my notice. I looked down and could see that they were swollen and red. I remember that I had grasped the side rail at the moment of the explosion, and that I had no doubt that I had been partially injured by the flash of heated water, from which Flint seemed wholly to have escaped.

I do not recollect what followed. I heard Flint's voice very indistinctly—a mere humming of meaningless words—and then I fell into a long weakness. My brain reeled. Then I grew sick and faint, and I remember that I actually fear lest I should tumble off the spar. I remember, too, trying to call to my companion for help, but I could not speak intelligibly. After this I remember no more until I was lying on a heap of trashwood ashore, and Flint was bathing my hands from my lips some drops of whisky from a metal flask.

"Cheer up, you'll do now. It kinder cane over you," said the General, soothingly, pausing the flask to his own lips and imbibing several nips of the cordial.

I gave his hand a feeble squeeze.

"I owe you my life; but where are we? And Ned—are we with him?"

Mr. Flint shook his head. "We're on Island Number Ten, and Ned's not here. I got you and gave in we grounded, and I got a grip of a snag, sticking out of the mud, and we're on dry airth. Ay. If you're strong enough, mister, we'd best look for a shelter, for 'tain't wholesome to lie out for much."

I was bruised and weak, and my hands were very painful, but I could walk pretty well. We made our way to a small log-house, which proved to be the General taking rapidly and continually, in his active way, to divert my thoughts from the sad fate of my gallant friend. He told me, then, that the island had no permanent inhabitants, but was occasionally visited by cut lying possessors of this dreary spot; but he made no doubt we should discover a settlement in tolerable repair where we could pass the night.

"And in the morn'n', mister, we'll signal a steamboat and get picked up. We four of our playin' Robinson Crusoe too long here, I guess. We'll have a banyan breakfast, but our appetite for dinner will be a caution to alligators. Ahi! here's a con-venient location."

In effect we were on the threshold of a large and substantial log-house, behind which we could dimly discern the outlines of other buildings. The heavy door was ajar, and yielded sullenly to our touch. We entered. The interior was, of course, quite dark, but a fire had glow presently evoked from some dying embers on the hearth, proving that human beings had been there within a few hours. The General showed no surprise. He merely observed that a night of shelter for New Orleans had probably run aground on the island, and wished the men had remained, that they might have given us a cast ashore in their breadhorn. He stooped, blew the embers to a glow, laid on dry brush and fresh wood, and soon the hut was illuminated by a cheery glare. It was large, in good repair, and contained an old table of sawed boards, and a pair of bedsteads with which had probably served for seats. There were shelves nailed up, but they were empty, and every provision was visible. The in an inner recess, half partitioned off from the larger apartment, were several heaps of brush-wood and fragments of mats, which beds not to be despised when mattresses and pillows were out of the question. I to my surprise, found a British Bible on the front shelf of the French proverb, qui dort, dine, but when he showed some sagacity in remarking that when asleep our bodies and minds were alike wasted in less vexatious

"Pull come o' them sassafras boughs over your face, mister; that's the way to cheat the skeeters," said he; "we'll have a good long nap, and wake up in time to hail a steamboat on one of those hemlocks down by the water-side. If a steamer don't see it a-burning, she may."

I lay still a few moments and then rolled restlessly from side to side. My nerves were strung to a painful tension, and my brain was too active to allow sleep to visit me. The accident with all its horrors, rather imagined than actually seen, recurred to me every hour; but it seemed unreal and unnatural, a vivid nightmare rather than a real reality. Poor Ned Granger, too! I shuddered when I ever again in life find such a friend as that early one, now lost?

How long I mused I can not tell, but I was startled by a sound which broke the stillness of the night—a voice, and that voice was no unknown one. Number Ten—the negro of a horse. I shook off my reverie, and half raised myself to listen. The sound was repeated. It was no sun was I that I had been no cheat of fancy that I determined to rouse my companion and tell him the news. It was not until I had shaken Flint, who was a heavy sleeper, that he woke, up, grumbling.

"Jerusalem, Barham, what's afloat? Not a Yankee swarm across, surely—"

"No," said I, somewhat ashamed, "only the neighing of a horse close at hand."

"Impossible—couldn't be. There's no horse beasts here. Couldn't they be down on the island? You must have been dreaming, Mr. Barham."

The General yawned and sank back into the pit of brushwood, nor was it long before his heavy breathing announced that he was fast asleep. I was far from convinced, but I was puzzled; imagination, I knew, does often play us strange tricks. Besides, we had no reason that a horse had neighed on shore, on either the left or right bank, and that was probably unusually acute after the excitement of the night, had caught and exaggerated the distant sound? I pondered yet a while, but it was weary work. My nerves relaxed, my eyelids became heavy, and I sank into deep slumber. Not so deep, however, but that I could still know that a conversation between ideal personages attended my fitful slumber, and that the degree this conversation grew more and more real and audible.

"I don't care a cuss how it kept slight," said some one; "just clap on a nipple more sticks, and I'll blow up the kindlers."

Directly afterward I heard the familiar noise—familiar, at least, to one fresh from prairie travel —of smoothly-planed wood being split up in a blaze, while the sharp crackle of burning wood succeeded.

"Where's Stone's, marm?" asked some one close in a high cracked voice, that contrasted with the deep tones of the first speaker; "wouldn't you like cruller got to, I admire? I'm as starved, for cuss us any will! and there's never a scrap to eat until the brier boy comes. Ten hours' work, and not a man peckish, and we must clear out of this before day."

Vaguely the thought dawned in my half-unconscious mind that I was no longer asleep, and that the General Flint and myself were actually talking of flesh and blood. I opened my eyes. The larger compartment of the log-house was illuminated by a dull red light, which brightened into a clearer glow as the wood, heaped on the fire with a lavish hand, caught the ascending blaze. Around this fire were grouped five or six men, most of whom were the red flannel shirts and coarse homespun of the regular Mississippi boatmen's garb, though one was in a suit of rusty black, of city make. Several more articles of clothing were scattered about the floor, and coming, bringing bags and barrels, which were received by two of the men within. Boatmen, thought I, who are going to fell a tree for a shore, when benighted on the rapid and dangerous river. I was perplexed. Even then, when a thrill might, unmistakably that of a horse this time and close by, was answered so shrilly and distinctly by an equine response.

"Darn them brutes! pinch their nostrils, you hasting cusses! or the whole gang by the place will be blown upon," said a deep and fierce voice from the hut. And a man whom I had not observed, stepped out, and with a vigorous and active across the illuminated space. I rubbed my eyes and cautiously raised myself on my elbow.

The last speaker was of gigantic stature, with a fell of shaggy black hair tumbling on the collar of his red woolen shirt; his face was a stern and forbidding one, like that of some robber soldier in a Flemish picture, he wore a pistol and a bowie-knife, ostentatiously displayed in the black leather belt around his waist.

"All right, boss! 'twar that rampaging black beast, Jem Hudson's colt, that got loose a minin," answered a man from without; and very soon several men and two or three women entered the log-house, the most of the new-comers were ruffling figures, with the brass bound handles of knives or pistols peeping out of their pockets, or protruding from the breasts of their homespun coats; but one or two had the air of educated men, though their keen faces showed traces of evil passions and evil habits. One old man—he must have been more than sixty—was of a different order, and his long garments of a respectable Western farmer, and his weather-beaten but mild face contrasted with the fierce and reckless boldness of those around and near him. The man with the high cracked voice, who was a tow-male suit of slaughtered broadcloth, accosted this new-comer as Mr. Stone, and asked if his wife intended to give the company any supper or not?

"The missies is comin' in: you'd best ask her," said the new farmer, philosophically lighting his pipe. Mrs. Stone, a tall, gaunt woman, bustled forward to answer for herself, which she did by telling the hungry guests that she was a lonely, cowardly, troublesome, turkey-buzzard of a Yankee, and that he had better have been helping to cache the horned and unlucked beasts than talking for food, as if he was in some fine city hotel."

While these upbraidings of the man in Yankee indeed seemed to hold a very low position in the esteem of his comrades—Mrs. Stone bustled furiously to and fro, and before long a great frying-pan, full of pieces of pork, was sputtering on the fire, while several junks of beef were roasting and broiling on impromptu spits made of ramrods stuck in the soft clay of the floor. Mrs. Stone was aided in these culinary processes by a fine, decided-looking girl of eighteen, whose pale, and face looked as if sea-sickness had been its frequent guest, and whom I discovered to be her eldest daughter. A younger girl, about fourteen years of age, looked on from the doorway, and I, who had been the slightest inclination to address the members of this group, and hardly knew what to say, when the new farmer's rough voice broke in to their privacy or object, but I instinctively covered down among the brushwood and hid myself as completely as I could. I felt that something was amiss, and that discovery might lead to awkward results. General Flint was asleep, and I feared that every moment he might awake and utter some exclamation, while he was always ready to speak. But my companion might draw the attention of some sharp-eared member of the band. Some of the party had seated themselves on the floor, and, from mere signs of fatigue, but the rest stood watching the pork as it bubbled in the pan, and the cakes as they baked before the fierce fire. Several voices were speaking at once, and I only caught unconnected scraps of the talk.

"Jem Hudson was terrible riled. He set such a tally on that colt, if his gun hadn't had too many charges for it in this cabin would have become coon, I guess."

"I think that same Stout's a deal uglier than Jem. He owes us a grudge, he does. I reckon Tennessee's gettin' too hot to hold us."

"Ay, Tennessee's opinion till it's axed for, greenhorn," said the big man who had been addressed as captain, when he spoke as one having supreme authority. "This nigger don't need a Pennsylvany chicken to tell him when a melon-squash is ripe to cut open."

"Here's your victuals ready, and no lady in Illinoy State could have fixed 'em better, nor quicker!" exclaimed Mrs. Stone in an argumentative manner, as if to challenge contradiction. But none was offered, and presently the meal was formed, some walnut-wood platters and pewter pannikins were produced from a hiding-place, the company drew their knives and forks, and, having carried round the frying-pan, in order that every one might help himself, while the rude repast was followed, one with the steaks still stuck upon the iron-tipped ramrods, the other with some lumps of corn-bread in his hand.

It was at this moment that I felt my wrist cautiously grasped by the left hand of Jeremiah Flint, and could hardly repress an exclamation, when, looking round, I saw that Jeremiah Flint was awake, and was gazing at me intently and steadily, keeping at the same time well behind the screen of brushwood.

"It's wake, Barham. Keep still, and we air." I looked round. I could see by the faint light that my companion's resolute face was very pale. "Keep still, and this—and this—and water, mebbe; we've got into the den of a grizzly, mister, and we carry our scalps out we may be thankful a few."

I began to be seriously alarmed. I was yet a stranger to a few the true character of those whose bounds we seemed to be unwitting trespassers, but I knew that Flint, who had spent years in the wild West, had a keen heart, and that his apprehensions were not likely to be roused without reason.

"Nothing more than one of the Yankees," whispered the General; "that tall fish-rod of a man in the tail-coat comes from Concord, Massachusetts, and is a regular peripatetic lecturer, I'll be bound. That German rogue in the cap is Fritz Vogel, who was nearly hanged at Chicago for foul fish, and—we I never!—but that big chap in the red shirt—the Captain—turns out to be Black Dave."

"Who's he?"

"Ay, Black Dave, or David Jossom, the most desperate villain in Kentucky. Famous for stealing horses, using bogus dollars, robbing stores, and breaking out of prison. Last time I saw him was at Little Rock, Arkansas, under trial, and was then my client as a lawyer—"

Here my friend's reminiscences were cut short by the abrupt question, put by a gentleman whose mouth was very full, and who had a huge chunk of pork in one hand and a pound or two of beef in the other: "Captain Dave, when are we to paddle over with them horses?"

"We'll see about it," answered the chief. "Some one must go over to scout fust. I expect the brute has got a pretty fair scale and can't they git into Missouri, and out of sight of the river."

These words were a revelation. The General pressed my elbow.

"They're horse-thieves, mistaken identity."

